A court challenge would be welcome news for some anti-abortion activists, who see the strict South Dakota law as a good opportunity for the US Supreme Court – with President George W. Bush's two appointees, John Roberts and Samuel Alito – to overturn Roe vs Wade, the landmark 1973 ruling that legalised abortion.

The Vote Yes for Life campaign is based in a warehouse on the outskirts of Sioux Falls. Outside, a bumper sticker declares, "The Killing Stops Here". Inside, a home-schooled teenager stops by to volunteer. There are hundreds of lawn signs to be distributed and DVDs that feature women who regret their abortions, and one who became pregnant after she was raped. "I am here to say that true compassion does not come from abortion but from giving life."

Rushing between appointments, Leslee Unruh, who is leading the campaign, mentions an abortion she had nearly 30 years ago and the support she received from other "post-abortive" women who say they regret their decisions. She has tried to expand the traditional debate on abortion beyond its effect on the unborn to its effect on women.

"We're not going to be silenced," she says. "It doesn't matter if we win or we lose. We are educating people that abortion hurts women and we're not going to stop."

She shakes her head when asked whether the state can make such decisions for others. "Don't get pregnant then, if you don't want a child," says Mrs Unruh. But maintaining legal access to abortion should not be an option. "We need to be protected. Abortion harms us, physically and emotionally."

South Dakota voters drew national attention two years ago when they surprised the political pundits and voted out Tom Daschle, Democratic leader in the US Senate. This year, voters' positions on the abortion question are difficult to predict, frequently crossing gender and party lines.

Sharon Rons, a Democrat who owns her own small business, said she would vote to keep the law. "I don't think abortion should be a form of birth control," she says, adding that the decision to end a pregnancy "could haunt women for the rest of their lives".

DOJ_NMG_0083692

But some Republicans say they will oppose it, perhaps a reflection of a libertarian strain that runs through the sparsely populated state. “I just don’t feel that somebody else should make this decision for a woman,” said one Republican pensioner.

“We are responsible people,” said Mrs Nicolay, a Rep-ublican and former member of the state legislature. “We can make our own decisions.”

Court: Groups Must Offer Contraceptives (AP-Y)

By Michael Gormley, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

New York's highest court ruled Thursday that social service agencies run by the Roman Catholic Church and other faiths must provide birth-control coverage to their employees, even if they consider contraception a sin.

The 6-0 decision by the Court of Appeals hinged on whether Catholic Charities and the nine other groups are essentially social service agencies, not churches.

At issue was a 2002 state law that requires employers to provide health insurance coverage for mammograms, bone density screening and other preventive services for women, including prescription contraceptives. The law exempts churches, seminaries and other institutions with a mainly religious mission.

Catholic Charities and the other groups sued the state for an exemption but lost in the lower courts.

The organizations "believe contraception to be sinful," the Court of Appeals said. "We must weigh against (their) interests in adhering to the tenets of their faith the state's substantial interest in fostering equality between the sexes, and in providing women with better health care."

The New York Catholic Conference said it may appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We think this has never really been about contraception. We think it was to target the church and open the door for coverage of abortion," said Dennis Poust, spokesman for the Catholic conference.

Kelli Conlin, president of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, said the ruling "shows that no one is above the law, including the Catholic bishops."

The New York court said the fact that the organizations hire employees outside their faith was a critical factor and that they deserve the rights sought under the law.

Catholic Charities said that while it considers an appeal, it will continue to cover contraceptives for employees under protest.

Sharing The Health Bills (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

It looks like a business and, in many ways, acts like one. But it is beyond the reach of most of the rules and government oversight that apply to businesses — because it is a church mission.

This is the “medical bill sharing ministry” known as Christian Care Ministry, based in Melbourne, Fla., the largest of a handful of similar ministries around the country.

E. John Reinhold, who once worked with the Campus Crusade for Christ and is now the ministry’s chairman, explains the concept simply: “You add up all the medical bills and divide by the number of sharing households. Everybody kicks in and you pay the bills.”

Every month, in roughly 19,000 households across the country, ministry members — who must be observant Christians with recommendations from their pastors — write a check to Christian Care Ministry. The amount depends on their family’s size and how much of their medical bills they are willing to pay out of their own pocket.

And each month, the ministry writes checks to health care providers — totaling more than $240 million since it was founded — to cover the medical bills submitted by its members. Roughly $57 million moved through the ministry in its latest fiscal year.

Mr. Reinhold, who formed Christian Care in 1993, says it is an efficient way for Christians to fulfill the admonition of Galatians 6:2, which tells them to “carry each other’s burdens, and in this way you will fulfill the law of Christ.”

DOJ_NMG_0083693

But over the years, some state officials have looked at ministries like Christian Care and seen what they would call unregulated health insurance. Their concern is that confused consumers looking for low-cost coverage will rely on these groups as if they were insurance companies, even though the groups may lack the resources to pay claims.

Next week it will be Mr. Reinhold's turn to defend his organization, before a state judge in Kentucky.

Kentucky was one of a half-dozen states that passed laws in the early 1990's exempting religious bill-sharing ministries from state insurance laws. But regulators there say that Mr. Reinhold's organization goes beyond what that exemption allows — a claim the Florida ministry says is misguided, because its practices actually improve on the state's requirements.

The exemption being tested in Kentucky this month is just one of a host of special arrangements for religious ministries that are not available to similar secular organizations — exemptions rooted in the First Amendment's ban on any Congressional action that would restrict the free exercise of religion or establish an officially sponsored religion.

Special breaks like these have been accumulating at a time when religious organizations of all faiths are expanding into a range of new activities that may compete directly with businesses and other nonprofit organizations that are not eligible for the same exemptions.

The Internal Revenue Service has a number of special rules for religious nonprofit groups. Under those rules, as a ministry of the American Evangelistic Association, which ordains clergy and supports various educational and humanitarian missions, Christian Care Ministry is not required to file public financial statements with the I.R.S., as secular nonprofit organizations are.

The I.R.S. makes this exemption available to all churches — including synagogues, temples, mosques and other congregational forms in different faiths — as well as church associations, auxiliaries and retirement plans; religious elementary and secondary schools; foreign mission societies; and the "exclusively religious" activities of any religious order.

As part of a church association, Christian Care is also protected by special limits Congress has put on the I.R.S.'s ability to audit religious congregations.

These restrictions, which do not apply to other nonprofit groups or for-profit entities, require a top-level I.R.S. official's approval before any audit can begin. The religious group must get advance notice and the opportunity for a personal conference before the audit can proceed. The audit must be finished in two years. Finally, if the inquiry does not turn up deficiencies, the I.R.S. cannot return to audit that issue again for five years.

How does a bill-sharing ministry become eligible for I.R.S. exemptions that apply to churches? Although the tax agency decides case by case what qualifies as a church, it lists more than a dozen criteria it weighs in reaching its decisions. These include having established times and places of worship, a recognized creed and liturgy, a distinct history and form of ecclesiastical government and spiritual leaders who are ordained in some way after a course of study.

Christian Care says the I.R.S. has determined that the American Evangelistic Association, the ministry's parent organization, meets the test. And the association's exemption extends to the ministry, Mr. Reinhold explained, because it is not considered an unrelated business — whose revenue would be taxable — but part of the association's religious mission.

But bill-sharing ministries make some regulators nervous. Indeed, the first such ministry that most regulators encountered, the Christian Brotherhood Newsletter ministry in Barberton, Ohio, faced questions, and sometimes lawsuits, from regulators in about three dozen states for more than a decade after it was founded in 1982.

The warning currently printed in Christian Brotherhood's monthly newsletter summarizes the arguments these ministries make when regulators accuse them of being health insurers: "Whether anyone chooses to pay your medical bills will be totally voluntary," members are told. "As such, this publication should never be considered as a substitute for an insurance policy."

Four years ago, a group of independent directors successfully sued Christian Brotherhood's founder and several members of his family, accusing them of diverting millions of dollars for their personal use. The attorney general's office in Ohio, which regulates charities, joined the case as co-plaintiff. By the time the founder and his relatives were removed from management, the pile of unpaid bills was as high as $27 million, a backlog the ministry expects to eliminate by next summer, according to the Rev. Howard S. Russell, who helped initiate the earlier litigation and who leads the ministry today.

Mr. Russell said the ministry had tightened its managerial controls and improved its communication with its members since the lawsuit. It makes its financial records available to the public both through an annual statement called a Form 990, filed with the I.R.S., and through responses to requests made by phone or on its Web site, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083694

Another large bill-sharing ministry, Samaritan Ministries International, based in Peoria, Ill., also files a Form 990 with the I.R.S. each year.

But Mr. Reinhold noted that churches had long been exempt from filing with the I.R.S. "I've been in Christian work since 1972 and I've never heard of a church filing a Form 990," he said in an e-mail message.

Christian Care Ministry did provide The Times with the independent audits for the parent association and affiliates for the fiscal years that ended last June and June 2005. The new draft audit substantially restated the 2005 results, to change the accounting treatment of the members' money.

Robert Baldwin, the ministry's president, said the change underscored the fact that these pending medical payments were not actually legal liabilities of the ministry — as previous accounting suggested.

The ministry reports that that member receipts in fiscal 2006 grew 11 percent over the previous year, after adjusting for the accounting change. The monthly sharing requirement was raised in March and raised again in July. The association spends about 17 percent of every member's monthly check to pay administrative costs. For years, the ministry also paid premiums for "stop loss" insurance that kicked in to cover the bills for catastrophic medical incidents.

The insurance policy had been purchased through an affiliated trust in the British Virgin Islands, which receives member contributions and sends out the medical payments.

Glenn Jennings, who until July was executive director of the Kentucky Office of Insurance, says it was the offshore insurance policy that prompted him to take a hard look at the ministry; such a policy would seem to go beyond voluntary bill sharing to the kind of formal safety net an insurance company provides.

"When I learned about that, I said to them, 'You're really starting to quack a lot like a duck,' " Mr. Jennings said.

Mr. Jennings filed suit, arguing that Christian Care does not qualify for the state's religious ministry exemption. His successor, Julie Mix McPeak, is pursuing the case, which is set for a final hearing in state court next week. .

In its defense, the ministry has argued that to deny it the safe haven of the state exemption would violate its First Amendment rights of religious freedom.

Nevertheless, the ministry eliminated one point of dispute with Kentucky regulators on Oct. 2 when it canceled its insurance, effective at the end of last month.

Mr. Baldwin, the ministry's president, said the ministry made the move, not because of the lawsuit, but because the benefits did not justify the expense.

But another difficulty remains. Kentucky requires that each sharing household send its check directly to the family whose bills it is helping to pay, not to some central office as Christian Care members do. But Mr. Reinhold said his practice leaves a clearer audit trail.

He seemed unconcerned about the Kentucky litigation. "We went through this eight years ago," he said. "Then, you have a regime change and another set of bushy-tails comes into command and it starts up all over again."

ANTITRUST:

Avery Dennison Says DOJ Closes Probe (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

PASADENA, Calif. --Label and tag maker Avery Dennison Corp. on Thursday said the Justice Department has closed its investigation into alleged price-fixing in the label stock industry, without any action.

The company, one of the largest makers of office products and adhesive labels, first disclosed the probe in April 2003.

Avery Dennison shares rose 40 cents to $62.69 on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. Closes Probe, Avery Says (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

The label company apparently is still the target of price-fixing inquiries overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0083695

Avery Dennison Corp. said it was notified by the Department of Justice on Thursday that the government had closed its investigation into competitive practices in the labeling industry.

Pasadena-based Avery said it was told that "no further action" would be taken in the case. Company executives declined to comment further.

The Justice Department couldn't be reached for comment late Thursday.

Avery first revealed in April 2003 that it was part of an investigation into the market for pressure-sensitive label stock, which is used on products as varied as shampoo bottles and office supplies.

Avery and Bemis Co., a Minneapolis-based competitor, were subpoenaed by the government later that year.

At the time, the Justice Department was suing to block the $420-million purchase of Bemis' MACtac unit by Raflatac Inc., a subsidiary of Finnish paper products maker UPM-Kymmene Corp.

The government argued that the deal would hinder competition in the label stock industry.

Avery, which commands about half of the labeling market, apparently is still under investigation by regulators in Europe and Australia regarding possible price fixing and manipulation.

Two years ago, Avery said an internal investigation had uncovered "instances of improper conduct" by employees in its European operations and said the infractions could result in heavy fines by regulators.

The company didn't describe the nature of the wrongdoing.

Avery launched the internal probe after the European Commission — the European Union's antitrust authority — began to look into the company's actions as part of a broader probe of the labeling market.

Avery's announcement came after the close of trading Thursday. Its shares, which rose 40 cents to $62.69 during the day, were little changed in after-hours trading.

martin.zimmerman@latimes.com

AmSouth To Sell 52 Branches In Antitrust Agreement (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

AmSouth Bancorp. said Thursday it agreed to sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee to settle Justice Department concerns over possible antitrust violations in its nearly $10 billion merger with Regions Financial Corp.

AmSouth said the branches have total assets of about $2.7 billion. The largest number of the offices are in the Mobile area, where 22 are located in two counties.

In exchange for the sale, the Justice Department said it agreed not to challenge the merger on antritrust grounds.

The deal is in the final stages of review by the Federal Reserve board.

The Birmingham-based AmSouth has 691 branches and $52.8 billion in assets. Regions, also with headquarters in Birmingham, has about 1,300 branches and $84.6 billion in assets.

AmSouth Identifies Branches To Be Sold In Merger With Regions Financial (BIRMBIZ)

Birmingham Business Journal, October 20, 2006

AmSouth Bancorporation will sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee to comply with antitrust requirements related to its pending merger with Regions Financial Corp., the bank holding company announced Thursday.

The branches hold deposits totaling approximately $2.7 billion.

None of the branches is in Birmingham, headquarters of both AmSouth (NYSE: ASO) and Regions Financial (NYSE: RF). Most of the Alabama branches are in the Mobile area.

The divestiture of the branches was required by the Justice Department to ensure that the merger of the two banks would not create unfair competition in certain markets in which both have a significant presence.

"We are dedicated to selling these branches to companies that share our commitment to our associates, our customers, and our communities," said Dowd Ritter, AmSouth's chairman, president and CEO. "We would expect the purchasers to offer positions to the associates in these branches, and we will work hard to ensure that our customers and associates experience a flawless transition."

DOJ_NMG_0083696

The sale of a branch includes its deposits, loans and equipment. Customers of the affected branches "do not need to do anything at this time," the news release said, as they will be notified once a sale occurs. The release notes, too, that the Justice Department and the Federal Reserve made the decision on which branches were to be sold.

Alabama branches to be sold are as follows:

Decatur: 2404 Danville Road.

Huntsville area: 107 Lily Flagg Road S.E., 4769 Whitesburg Drive S., 1470 Perimeter Parkway N.W., 2204 Whitesburg Drive, 7930 Highway 72 (Madison).

Mobile area: 511 D'Olive St. (Bay Minette), 13825 S. Wintzell Ave. (Bayou La Batre), 28770 U.S. 98 (Daphne), 111 Baldwin Square (Fairhope), 51 S. Section St. (Fairhope), 7860 Airport Blvd., 5133 Cottage Hill Road, 2820 Springhill Ave., 1402 Government St., 720 Hillcrest Road, 6241 Cottage Hill Road, 3920 Airport Blvd., 7849 Cottage Hill Road, 3942 Government Blvd., Old Shell Road, 3250 Airport Blvd., 5351 Highway 90 W., 2326 St. Stephens Road, 34 Shelton Beach Road (Saraland), 7800 Moffat Road (Semmes), 10010 Eastern Shore (Spanish Fort), 500 Spanish Fort Blvd. (Spanish Fort).

Montgomery area: 3725 Alabama 14 (Millbrook), 5375 Atlanta Highway, 1465 Eastern Blvd., 2710 Taylor Road, 743 S. Main St. (Wetumpka).

Selma: 9 Broad St.

Tuscaloosa area: 3076 McFarland Blvd. (Northport), 719 Skyland Blvd. E., 2330 University Blvd., 331 University Blvd.

AmSouth's merger with Regions Financial is expected to close in November and will create one of the nation's 10 largest bank holding companies, with assets of about $140 billion.

Kidney Dialysis Center Deal With Amgen Blocks Roche (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

In a move that could help preserve its lucrative monopoly on an important anemia drug, Amgen has reached an agreement that will make it the sole supplier of the drug to one of the nation's two main operators of kidney dialysis centers.

The deal, announced yesterday by the dialysis provider, Fresenius Medical Care, comes as Roche is preparing to enter the market next year with a drug that would offer the first competition to Amgen's drug, which is known as Epogen.

Now, it appears, Roche will not be able to sell its drug to Fresenius, which represents about 35 percent of the American dialysis market.

Some analysts said the deal, which lasts for five years, could raise antitrust concerns. "We would use an analogy of Microsoft signing an exclusive supply agreement with Dell precluding Dell from selling any computers with a competitive operating system a few months before a market entry of a competitor," Michael Aberman, biotechnology analyst at Credit Suisse, wrote yesterday in a note to clients.

Dr. Aberman said in an interview that a deal with Fresenius alone might not attract concern. But if Amgen were to arrange a similar exclusive supply agreement with DaVita, the other major provider of dialysis, with about 30 percent of the market, it would draw attention.

Marie Fay, an Amgen spokeswoman, said the company did not think the deal presented any antitrust issues. She said that Fresenius had approached Amgen, not the other way around, about having a broader collaboration.

Still, the deal comes as Amgen's marketing practices are drawing increasing scrutiny. Representative Bill Thomas, the California Republican who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has asked the Government Accountability Office to do a report on pricing and other aspects of drugs used for dialysis patients.

Medicare, which pays most expenses for dialysis, even for people younger than 65, is estimated to spend roughly $2 billion a year on Epogen, representing one of its biggest expenditures on any drug.

Epogen had $2.5 billion in sales last year. It and Aranesp, a similar drug that also is used to treat anemia, together accounted for nearly half of Amgen's overall $12.4 billion in revenue last year.

Both drugs are synthetic forms of erythropoietin, also called EPO, a protein normally made in the kidney that spurs the production of oxygen-carrying red blood cells.

DOJ_NMG_0083697

Epogen, approved in 1989, was Amgen's first product and helped transform the company into the world's largest biotechnology concern. While the basic patent protecting the product has already expired in Europe, Amgen got several patents in the United States, which could protect its franchise here until 2015.

Roche, the Swiss pharmaceutical company, has developed CERA, a form of EPO it says can be given less frequently than Amgen's drugs. Roche is expected to begin selling the drug next year, assuming approval by the Food and Drug Administration.

To block Roche, Amgen has filed a patent infringement suit against it in federal District Court in Boston. Roche said its drug did not infringe on the patent.

The deal with Fresenius, which is based in Germany, could provide further protection to Amgen.

Dr. Ben Lipps, chief executive of Fresenius, said that his company "selected Amgen as our sole supplier based on more than 10 years of demonstrated clinical efficacy and safety with Epogen." Analysts said Fresenius probably used the looming threat from Roche to extract a bigger discount from Amgen in return for making it the sole supplier.

Russians Sue To Stop Malkin From Playing (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A Russian hockey club filed an antitrust lawsuit Thursday against the NHL and the Pittsburgh Penguins, saying rookie Evgeni Malkin shouldn't be allowed to play in the league because he remains under contract in his native country.

The Metallurg Magnitogorsk hockey club, which filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, also demanded unspecified damages from the NHL and the Penguins over Malkin's deal to jump teams this summer.

NHL spokesman Frank Brown said he hadn't seen a copy of the complaint and couldn't comment. Penguins spokesman Tom McMillan said the team hadn't received the lawsuit and doesn't comment on litigation.

The 20-year-old Malkin left the Russian Super League team during August's training camp in Helsinki, Finland, slipping quietly into the United States to begin his NHL career. In his debut Wednesday night, Malkin scored his team's lone goal in a 2-1 loss to the New Jersey Devils.

Malkin was under contract for another year in Russia. The NHL had previously said the league believes any player should have the right to choose where he wants to play as long as he is legally free to do so.

After Malkin left his Russian team, he cited a Russian labor law that permits an employee to leave a job by giving two weeks notice.

The lawsuit, filed after a Russian arbitration panel ruled that Malkin is still under contract to Magnitogorsk, said the signing of Malkin to an NHL contract was a "blatant and deliberate tampering and interference" with the Russian team's existing agreement.

In the lawsuit, the team said the Penguins knew or should have known that Malkin was under contract to a Russian team when they signed him. The lawsuit said the NHL and the Penguins violated antitrust laws by conspiring in a group boycott and refusing to deal with Russian hockey clubs regarding player transfers.

Malkin and Magnitogorsk signed a one-year contract on Aug. 7, calling for Malkin to receive $3.45 million, according to the lawsuit.

It said the contract was negotiated and signed in the presence of Malkin's Russian agent and his parents, and provided favorable terms allowing him to become a free agent a year sooner than an earlier contract.

Malkin, the No. 2 pick in the 2004 NHL draft, missed the early part of the NHL season after dislocating a shoulder in his first preseason game.

The lawsuit said the NHL and its clubs have "decided to play hardball" with Russian hockey clubs to punish them for the Russian Ice Hockey Federation's rejection of a new general agreement governing the transfer of foreign players to the NHL.

It said the NHL told its clubs on Aug. 2 that they were free to sign NHL contracts with Russian hockey players already under contract with Russian hockey clubs if the players secured releases according to Russian labor law.

Tata Steel Nears Deal To Buy U.K.'s Corus For $8.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

DOJ_NMG_0083698

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

LONDON -- Tata Steel Ltd. of India is moving closer to securing its purchase of Corus Group PLC, with the British steelmaker's board poised to approve the takeover and the likelihood of a competing bid fading.

Corus is set to announce as early as today that it has agreed to be acquired in a deal valued at about £4.6 billion, or $8.6 billion, according to people familiar with the situation. Corus's board, which met Wednesday, will recommend Tata's proposed cash bid of 455 pence ($8.50) a Corus share, according to these people.

The board of Corus is bound by United Kingdom takeover rules to disclose its decision once officially made. A Corus spokeswoman declined to comment.

Corus said Tuesday that Tata Steel proposed an acquisition of the British company at 455 pence a share, subject to a recommendation from Corus's board, and that talks were taking place. Since then, most of the remaining obstacles have been resolved.

Corus shares have been trading at levels higher than Tata's proposed bid price, largely on expectations that someone would attempt to trump the offer. But people close to the matter said that such a move is unlikely, since Corus has tried to sell itself all year and has talked to nearly all potential candidates. In London trading yesterday, Corus's stock price was off 1.8% at 478.50 pence.

While Tata Steel is far smaller than Corus, it is part of the Tata Group, a diversified conglomerate run by Ratan Tata. It is one of the largest and wealthiest groups in India. The deal would catapult Tata from an Indian steel producer with relatively limited capacity into one of the world's top global producers.

The steel industry has been fast consolidating, forming giant producers that can provide customers such as auto makers the steel products they need for factories in locations around the world.

Corus operates plants in Britain, which are considered among the world's least efficient with no nearby access to iron ore. It also has a state-of-the-art facility in the Netherlands. Tata, whose mills have been running at capacity, is building a mill that will produce semifinished slabs that could go to Europe to be finished and sold through Corus's operations.

The deal will be subject to normal regulatory clearance, although many potentially thorny issues, such as clearance from the trustee of Corus's huge pension fund, already have been negotiated, according to people familiar with the situation.

Any rival bidder would need to negotiate approval from Corus's pension-fund trustee and others.

Corus is advised by Credit Suisse Group and HSBC Holdings PLC. Tata Steel's advisers are Deutsche Bank AG and ABN Amro Holding NV. The deal will include a breakup fee of 1% of the transaction value, standard in acquisitions of U.K. companies.

Corus Expected To Agree To Tata Bid (FT)

By Peter Marsh In London And Joe Leahy In Mumbai

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

Corus, the Anglo-Dutch steelmaker, is on Friday expected to agree to a £5.1bn ($9.5bn) takeover by India's Tata Steel, in a deal that would create the world's sixth- biggest steel producer.

The move will throw down the gauntlet to any potential counter-bidders for Corus, Europe's second-biggest producer. Novolipetsk and Severstal, two Russian steel companies, and CSN of Brazil are thought to be interested.

A Tata-Corus deal would be the biggest takeover by an Indian business of a foreign company and underlines Asian dominance in steel, which – assuming the deal goes through – will account for five of the top six makers.

The transaction continues the rapid consolidation of the steel sector, illustrated by June's €26.9bn ($34bn) takeover of Arcelor by Mittal Steel.

Managers at Tata Steel and Corus were meeting separately on Thursday to discuss the details of the offer, which values Corus at 455p a share. The Corus board decided on Wednesday night to recommend the offer from Tata, which will be put to shareholders over the next two months.

The £5.1bn valuation includes an equity value of £4.1bn plus roughly £1bn in debt, and is subject to how big a valuation the two sides put on Corus's sizeable pension obligations. Corus shares on Thursday night closed at 478.5p, down 8.5p but still some way above the likely 455p price for the company favoured by Tata, indicating that some investors continue to believe a new bidder could come forward.

DOJ_NMG_0083699

James Moss, a partner in First River, a US consultancy, said: "Corus represents important strategic assets in Europe for an emerging steel company such as Tata, and I find it difficult to believe this [the 455p bid] is the best offer for the business."

According to a person involved in the deal, Tata Steel – part of the Tata industrial group – plans to inject about $2.5bn of its own borrowings and $1bn cash into a special purpose vehicle that would take over Corus. This unit would then raise roughly $5.5bn of debt against Corus's cashflow.

Created in 1999 from the merger of British Steel and Hoogovens of the Netherlands, Corus is three times bigger than Tata in terms of output. Some job losses among Corus's 41,000 workforce – 25,000 of whom are in the UK – would be likely, but a number of Corus's top managers are expected to stay on if the deal with goes through.

A link with Corus would help Tata diversify away from Asia and provide it with access to more sophisticated technology.

ENVIRONMENT:

Colorado Water Wars Include Spy Campaign (FINDLAW/AP)

By Steven K. Paulson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

(AP) - WIGGINS, Colo.-If some farmers in eastern Colorado felt like they were being watched this summer, they had good reason.

Private investigators hired by some of Colorado's fastest-growing communities spent weeks spying on them, trying to determine if they were illegally pumping water for their crops, The Associated Press has learned.

The investigators put together an elaborate database on 50 plots of land in eastern Colorado, noting things like "puddles around sprinkler perimeter" and "lush corn," and turned it over to state engineer Hal Simpson, who is investigating the claims.

"There was one man taking pictures. My wife asked if she could help him and he sped off," said Steve Bruntz, who recently joined other farmers at a Wiggins gas station to talk with a reporter.

Behind the fight are farmers who depend on irrigation, on one side, and cities that rely on water from the South Platte River, on the other. State water law guarantees that those with higher-priority rights get their share first.

The water crisis came to a head in May when the state engineer told farmers along the South Platte to turn off 440 wells after forecasting lower-than-average river flows and well owners were unable to devise plans to replace the water they were using.

Millions of dollars worth of wheat, corn, sugar beets and melons were left to die after some farmers and three cities - Sterling, Boulder and Highlands Ranch - rejected an emergency plan that would have allowed well owners to continue pumping.

Water attorney Tim Buchanan, who represents farmers with senior water rights, said he ordered the spying campaign because he suspected some well owners were continuing to pump water.

Buchanan said water users, including communities and farmers, hired a private investigator to go out during daylight hours to survey 50 plots of land. They then paid engineers to verify the information.

"We started hearing rumors and people in the area where the wells are located called us and said people were pumping contrary to the state's order," he said. "We looked only at properties that had wells as their sole source of water. Not only were they wet, they were growing crops."

Exact details of the spying program, including how many acres were studied and how much was spent to gather the information, was not disclosed.

But word of the investigation stunned farmers who say they are struggling because the state shut down their wells this spring after complaints from those holding more senior rights to the water.

"I wish I could have caught them on my property. We shoot every other trespasser and he'd be the second one," said David Knievel, whose name was in the database obtained by the AP.

DOJ_NMG_0083700

Water attorney Veronica Sperling, who represents Boulder and Highlands Ranch, said her clients were concerned after hearing reports of illegal pumping.

Carol Ellinghouse, the water resources coordinator for Boulder, said she and others hired the investigator after she got a tip from a turf farm worker who said his neighbors were running their wells.

"They went out and some farms showed signs of being recently irrigated," she said. "Others were pretty lush, a condition that couldn't happen if they weren't watering."

John Hendrick, general manager of the Centennial Water and Sanitation District that supplies water to Highlands Ranch, said he was aware of the surveillance program and agreed with it.

"It's like people running a stop sign or speeding," he said. "The thing to do is identify the problem and fix it."

Farmer John Moser, who was on the list of alleged scofflaws provided to the AP for irrigating 290 acres and growing "green and vigorous alfalfa," said just because water is coming from a sprinkler doesn't mean the water is coming from a well. He said he is getting his water from a small lake on his property.

"It does upset me, for in fact they don't know the details. Does it bother me? Yes. Is there anything we can do about it? No," Moser said. "It's gotten out of hand. People are yelling and screaming at each other."

On the Net:

Colorado Foundation for Water Education: http://cfwe.org

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

'Fire In The Hole!' ATF Shows Off Site For Gonzales (FFLS)

By Jeff Branscome

Fredericksburg (VA) Free Lance-Star, October 20, 2006

U.S. attorney general visits Fort A. P. Hill for an ATF demonstration

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stopped by Caroline County's Fort A.P. Hill yesterday for a fireworks show of a different kind.

Wearing a collared shirt with the Department of Justice's logo, Gonzales stood with his hands on his hips and watched a Ford Taurus explode about 1,000 feet away.

Ten pounds of dynamite in the car's back seat sent a plume of black smoke into the overcast sky.

"That's exactly what you're seeing in Iraq," Rich Marianos, a special agent for the ATF, told a reporter after assessing the damage.

It was the last of several improvised explosions at an 80-acre training site run by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Such exercises are a "very important contribution to our effort in Iraq," Gonzales said.

With his hands cupped to his mouth, an ATF employee shouted, "Fire in the hole!" several times before each boom.

Surrounded by a gaggle of cameramen and reporters, Gonzales wore protective glasses and earplugs.

But the gear didn't keep his head from quivering after the first explosion, which sent shock waves through the ground.

He turned around with a smile and proclaimed, "Wow!"

"There's nothing like experiencing it for yourself," Marianos later said.

They generated most of the blasts electronically with equipment used by the mining and quarrying industries.

At one point, officials showed off what they called "a wall of fire" by detonating 24 milk jugs filled with gasoline. That's the type of explosion seen in movies, officials said, but not real life.

Just before Gonzales arrived in a Chevrolet Suburban with tinted windows, an ATF employee asked, "Where are my dogs?"

He was referring to two bomb-sniffing Labradors, which they introduced to Gonzales at the start of his visit.

The labs then showed off their skills, with one sniffing a car for hazardous material. The dog eventually sat down to alert its handler of a problem.

DOJ_NMG_0083701

For much of his 30-minute tour, Gonzalez spoke in low tones to Steve Beggs of Spotsylvania County, who is chief of ATF's explosives training branch at A.P. Hill.

The ATF established the training area in 2000, in part to teach local and state investigators how to check out the scene of a blast. Bomb technicians also learn how to dispose of explosives at the site, an open field with a large patch of asphalt.

"We probably have the broadest training mission of anyone in the federal government as it relates to explosives," Beggs said.

Gonzales left after a brief news conference but many folks stayed behind to check out the Ford Taurus--or what was left of it.

"You will save American lives," Gonzales told Beggs before taking a group photo with ATF officials.

Fifty pounds of ammonium nitrate--an explosive used in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing--made one blast possible.

In response to a question from Gonzales, Beggs said Timothy McVeigh used up to 5,000 pounds of the substance during his attack in Oklahoma City.

Gonzales called the demonstrations "interesting" and said they represent the "danger of explosives and the good work ATF is doing."

Jury Indicts 38 In Inquiry Into Multistate Drug Trade (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

A federal grand jury in Colorado yesterday returned an indictment against 38 persons suspected of drug trafficking in an investigation of a multistate marijuana and Ecstasy distribution and money-laundering operation in Denver, officials said.

Garrison K. Courtney, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Agency, said the probe known as Operation Berthoud led to the seizure of 95 pounds of high-grade marijuana, three indoor marijuana-growing operations containing 414 live plants, 1,500 tablets of MDMA, or Ecstasy, and more than $700,000 in cash, assets and stolen property.

Mr. Courtney said a 152-count indictment handed up in U.S. District Court in Denver accused gang members of engaging in a "pattern of racketeering activity" involving the shipment of 50-pound to 100-pound quantities of "BC Bud" marijuana -- a high-grade form of the drug grown in the Pacific Northwest -- from Washington state and California to Denver. The marijuana was valued at $3,000 to $4,000 a pound because of its potency, he said.

"This case ensures that this organization will never do business on the streets of Denver again," said Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the DEA's Rocky Mountain Division. "The fact that drug dealers are paying these prices for this high-quality marijuana reflects the appetite some in Denver have for the drug."

Police suspect the gang leader was Thanh Thea Hau, 22, of Denver, described in the indictment as the part owner of the Denver night club DC 10. He was named on 59 counts of drug trafficking.

Mr. Courtney said the charges stem from an investigation that began in March 2005 when Weld County, Colo., Task Force agents began purchasing quantities of Ecstasy from a suspected gang member.

Mr. Courtney said the purchases led agents to identify an Ecstasy trafficking organization operating in Denver, Seattle and San Francisco and bringing high-quality marijuana to Colorado.

"This case demonstrates the necessity for state, local and federal law-enforcement agencies to work in a cooperative manner to identify, target and dismantle drug trafficking organizations operating at a local, national and international level," Weld County Sheriff John Cooke said.

Mr. Courtney said that, according to agents, Mr. Hau was in contact with marijuana distributors in Seattle and San Francisco and arranged for the purchase of each load. Once the marijuana had been selected from the distributor, he said, Mr. Hau sent a driver from Denver to pick up the load and return the drugs to Denver in a rental vehicle.

The marijuana was then processed into one-pound bags for delivery to his clients, who in turn sold the marijuana to their customers for up to $500 per ounce, he said.

Denver Investigators Smash Lucrative Drug Ring (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083702

(AP) DENVER Investigators said Thursday they broke up a drug operation that was raking in up to $150,000 a month for its 22-year-old alleged ringleader by bringing high-grade marijuana from the West Coast to Colorado.

The alleged ring was bringing "BC Bud" marijuana from Washington state and California in 50- to 100-pound quantities, repackaging it and selling it for up to $500 an ounce, authorities said.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Denver district attorney's office said a Denver grand jury indicted 38 people on a total of 152 counts including drug distribution, marijuana cultivation, money laundering and racketeering.

Authorities said 25 of the suspects have been arrested and the others were being sought.

Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the DEA's Rocky Mountain Division, said the alleged ringleader was Thanh Thea Hau of Denver, part-owner of the Denver nightclub DC10.

Hau was making "pretty good money for a 22-year-old," Sweetin said.

A DEA statement said Hau faces 59 counts related to drug trafficking and is one of the 25 suspects in custody. The Denver jail said it had no record of Hau, and a DEA spokesman did not immediately return a call.

Michael Guerrero, general manager of DC10, declined to comment and referred questions to attorney Harvey Steinberg, who he said represents Hau. Steinberg did not immediately return a call.

Investigators seized 95 pounds of marijuana, more than 1,500 tablets of ecstasy, $149,000 in cash and 13 vehicles. Also seized were 414 live marijuana plants at three indoor growing operations.

The charges stemmed from a 20-month investigation dubbed "Operation Berthoud." The DEA said the Front Range Task Force, the Weld County Task Force and the Colorado State Patrol participated.

Dozens Arrested In Drug Investigation (DENP)

Denver Post, October 19, 2006

A sophisticated Denver-based drug ring that distributed ecstasy and high-grade California and Washington State marijuana in the metro area has been crushed following a year-long investigation, state and federal officials said today.

The organization, allegedly headed by Thanh Thea Hu of Denver brought 50 to 100 pounds of marijuana into Denver a month, according to Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the Rocky Mountain Division of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The marijuana was sold on Denver streets at $500 an ounce, Sweetin said.

"We uncovered a very significant organized crime group," Sweetin said. "We are talking about multi-pound deals. The transactions were conducted in residences or parking lots."

Sweetin said that Hau, 22, is part owner of the Denver nightclub, DC 10.

Denver District Attorney Mitch Morrissey said that the investigation resulted in the biggest indictment in the history of the Denver district attorney's office, with a total of 38 individuals being charged.

The 152-count indictment alleges that the individuals were engaged in a pattern of racketeering activity. Officials said Hau's organization transported 50-to-100 pound quantities of "BC Bud" marijuana, a high grade form of marijuana grown in the Pacific Northwest. The marijuana was valued at $3,000 - $4,000 per pound due to the drug's potency.

"This case ensures that this organization will never do business on the streets of Denver again," Sweetin said. "The fact that drug dealers are paying these prices for this high quality marijuana reflects the appetite some in Denver have for the drug," Sweetin said. "The principle trafficker our agents identified in Denver was determined to make up to $150,000 a month. That's pretty good money for a 22-year-old."

According to agents from several law enforcement agencies, Hau was in contact with marijuana distributors in Seattle and San Francisco and would personally arrange for the purchase of each load of marijuana. Once the marijuana had been selected by the distributor, Hau would send a driver from Denver to pickup the marijuana and drive the drugs back to Denver in a rental vehicle. The marijuana would be processed into one pound bags for delivery to his clients, who in turn sold the marijuana to their clients.

DOJ_NMG_0083703

The DEA said that on the evening of Sept. 19, investigators watched as Hau received a large marijuana shipment at his residence that had arrived from San Francisco. Agents continued to watch as Hau distributed marijuana to many of his customers.

Later that evening, agents executed search warrants on six locations in the Denver area. As a result, agents seized approximately 70 pounds of high quality marijuana, two marijuana indoor grow operations containing 344 live marijuana plants and approximately $149,000 in cash, Sweetin aid. Also seized that night were 13 vehicles valued at $274,000.

38 Indicted In Alleged Drug Ring (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, October 19, 2006

Several Colorado law enforcement agencies today announced a 152-count indictment they said brought down a large marijuana-distribution network that stretched from Colorado to Washington State.

The federal Drug Enforcement Agency named Thanh Thea Hau, 22, of Denver. DEA officials said Hau, part-owner of the Denver nightclub DC 10, faces 59 counts related to drug trafficking.

The DEA said Hau and the other 24 members of the alleged drug network are in custody.

The Denver District Attorney's office, the Front Range Task Force, the Weld County Task Force and the Colorado State Patrol were involved in the investigation, dubbed Operation Berthoud due to its origins in Weld County.

The indictment alleges the 38 individuals were engaged in a pattern of racketeering in violation of the Colorado Organized Crime Control Act.

Denver District Attorney Mitch Morrissey said the indictment names the largest number of people in the history of his office.

At a morning news conference, DEA Special Agent-In-Charge Jeffrey D. Sweetin said the people indicted have been linked to numerous criminal enterprises, including marijuana and ecstasy distribution, marijuana cultivation and money laundering.

During the course of the year-long investigation, officials seized 95 pounds of high-grade marijuana, equipment from three indoor marijuana-growing operations containing 414 plants, more than 1,500 tablets of ecstasy, about $7,040 in cash, assets and stolen property.

Announcement of the bust comes less than three weeks before Coloradoans go to the polls to vote on Amendment 44, which would legalize possession of one ounce or less of marijuana.

Sweetin was asked if the timing of the announcement had a political intent.

"I don't consider it a political announcement," Sweetin said. "It wasn't timed to be a message, but yes, I think it was a message."

Immediately after the news conference, Amendment 44 campaign director Mason Tvert held a second news conference to blast officials for the indictment's timing, which he said was an effort to scare voters into rejecting the pot referendum.

Massive Drug Trafficking Ring Shut Down (KMGH)

KMGH-TV, October 20, 2006

DENVER -- Local and federal officials on Thursday said they have shut down a massive drug trafficking ring in Denver and have indicted 38 people, including the co-owner of a Denver nightclub, whom they say was the mastermind behind the operation.

Of the 38 people who have been indicted, 25 have been arrested, including the alleged ring leader, Thanh Thea Hau.

Hau, 22, faces 59 counts of drug trafficking. Hau is known to be part owner of the Denver nightclub DC 10.

"The principle trafficker our agents identified in Denver was determined to be making up to $150,000 per month. That's pretty good money for a 22-year-old. Unfortunately for him, he is now out of business," said DEA agent Jeffrey D. Sweetin.

The investigation began in March 2005, when Weld County Task Force agents said they began buying large quantities of Ecstasy from an alleged co-conspirator. These purchases led agents to identify an Ecstasy trafficking organization operating in Denver, Seattle and San Francisco that was also bringing high-quality marijuana to Denver, officials said.

During the investigation, the Drug Enforcement Administration seized 95 pounds of "BC Bud" or high-grade marijuana, three indoor growing operations, thousands of tablets of Ecstasy, and $704,000 in cash and assets.

Thirteen vehicles were seized in the bust, and three cultivation centers in Denver, with 414 live marijuana plants, have been shut down.

Officials said the operation was bringing 50- to 100-pound quantities of the high-grade marijuana grown in the Pacific Northwest and California to Denver.

The marijuana was valued at $3,000 to $4,000 per pound because of its potency.

The DEA said the drug ring involved a very organized crime group that was operating in several states.

"This organization's leadership would fly up to the source areas, decide what marijuana was of sufficiently high potency and quality, then return to Denver and have that delivered through their distribution system, not unlike a legitimate business would," Sweetin said.

According to agents, Hau was in contact with marijuana distributors in Seattle and San Francisco and would personally arrange for the purchase of each load of marijuana. Once the marijuana had been selected from the distributor, Hau would send a driver from Denver to pick up the marijuana and drive the drugs back to Denver in a rental vehicle. The marijuana would be processed into 1-pound bags for delivery to his clients, who in turn sold the marijuana to their clients for up to $500 per ounce, the DEA said.

The investigation also determined that Hau provided clients with paper sacks filled with marijuana, and many of these dealers were seen entering and exiting his home, agents said. In addition, exchanges took place on the side neighborhood streets and in shopping center parking lots.

Once Hau had sold his marijuana supply, he would arrange for another purchase of marijuana, according to investigators.

Hau would have an associate drive the cash to Seattle or San Francisco with money hidden in the vehicle. With this information, agents intercepted the trips to Seattle and made two cash seizures of $132,000 and $149,000, respectively, the DEA said.

On the evening of Sept. 19, DEA investigators watched as Hau allegedly received a large marijuana shipment from San Francisco at his home. Agents continued to watch as Hau allegedly distributed marijuana to many of his customers, who were then followed and arrested. Later that evening, agents executed state of Colorado search warrants on six locations in the Denver area.

The 38 individuals were indicted by a Denver grand jury and are facing drug charges in Denver District Court related to marijuana and Ecstasy distribution, marijuana cultivation and money laundering.

The 152-count indictment, the largest in Denver's history, alleges the individuals were engaged in a pattern of racketeering activity in violation of the Colorado Organized Crime Control Act.

26 Arrested In Money-laundering Scheme (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 20, 2006

A U.S. attorney in New York said federal agents have arrested 26 people in connection with a money-laundering ring tied to Colombian drug sales.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the suspects, who have been accused of laundering money through an illegal "Black Market Peso Exchange" system, were arrested in the Columbian cities of Bogota and Cali as well as New York, New Jersey, Florida and London, The Washington Times reported Thursday.

Garcia said federal agents seized more than $10 million in cash and about $6.5 million worth of cocaine, heroin and marijuana.

Indictments filed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan accuse the suspects of using "peso brokers" to help drug traffickers trade U.S. dollars for pesos from Colombian businesspeople seeking to purchase dollars outside of the Colombian banking system, the Times said.

Garcia said the exchanges occur with verbal agreements, leaving no paper trial and thus complicating investigation of money laundering schemes.

Garcia said the suspects could each face 20 years in prison if convicted.

Escapee Linked To Drug Cartel (PR)

Porterville Recorder, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083705

When Porterville Police Sgt. Mike Blain was informed that federal fugitive Jose Felix was not considered armed and dangerous, Blain said he knew better.

Felix, a Porterville native who escaped from a minimum-security federal prison in Kern County on Oct. 9, was exactly that, Blain said.

"They don't know his history," Blain said, referring to the Taft Correctional Institution, where Felix spent the last three years. "We are the ones who had to live with him and the results of his and his family's actions."

Felix, 35, was a prominent player in the Felix family's sophisticated drug-trafficking network, which at its peak spread methamphetamine from Tijuana, Mexico to Bakersfield, Porterville and throughout the Central Valley for two decades.

His father, Praxedes Felix Sr., 56, was the kingpin of the drug network, officials said.

TCI officials noticed Felix missing during an inmate count at 10:50 p.m. Oct. 9. He was last accounted for three hours earlier.

Jose Felix was sentenced to 11 years in federal prison shortly after he and 15 other family members were arrested by law enforcement officials in a major drug raid in April 2003.

His brother, Praxedes Felix Jr., was also sent to TCI by a federal judge.

Fourteen agencies were involved with the six-year operation to bring down the cartel, which had its roots in Sinaloa, Mexico, according to previous reports.

Interim Police Chief Chuck McMillan referred to Jose Felix as "a long-term project."

"We've dealt with Jose for many years," McMillan said. "He and his family were big-time players in the drug trade. In previous contacts with Jose, he was armed."

McMillan said that the Felix family, which operated out of Terra Bella, may have had ties to the infamous Arellano Felix Organization, also known as the Tijuana Cartel.

What is clear, Blain said, is that the family - including Jose Felix - was extremely brazen and violent in their practice.

"There was a documented history with Jose and other family members currently in custody of kidnapping, rape, shootings of people or groups which they had disagreements, and threats made to the lives of others, including officers," Blain said. "Toward the end, they were extremely brazen in their activity."

Jose Felix was arrested on a weapons charge during the 1990s, Blain said.

During that arrest, Jose Felix threatened the life of an officer and his family, Blain said.

Thus, the question is raised: How did a criminal with a record like Jose Felix end up in a minimum-security facility without a fence.

According to Blain and TCI's warden, his previous history likely did not have any bearing on his sentence, which was reached in a plea deal with federal prosecutors.

"The charges he has on his record are not a true reflection of his actions," Blain said.

Jeff Wrigley, the warden of the privately-owned federally-operated facility, said federal officials send prisoners to the low-security facilities based on the offenses for which they were convicted.

"These criminals are sent because they have non-violent offenses and are not considered threats," Wrigley said. "But oftentimes, there may be some information about a criminal that is not brought up at the time of sentencing or in pre-sentencing."

"We've had walkaways at the prison, but we've never had any incident where a walkaway has caused any harm or wreaked havoc in a community," Wrigley said.

In Wrigley's nine years as warden, an average of five inmates each year escapes the prison simply by walking away from the camp.

These statistics are on par with similar security-level prisons, according to Wrigley and the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Wrigley said he does not know how many of those walkaways are captured.

"Sometimes what will happen is a person will be captured in another region, Wrigley said. "The U.S. Marshal's office is working diligently and coordinating with nationwide law enforcement officials and local law enforcement in the Porterville to locate Felix, and rest assured he will be prosecuted to the fullest extent for his actions."

DOJ_NMG_0083706

The Marshal's office, TCI and Porterville PD have received anonymous leads in the week since Felix's disappearance, but have not located him as of the time of publication.

"One caller said that he was in Porterville, and another caller said he was Sinaloa," Blain said. "He could be anywhere, but we will continue to look for him."

Newspaper Held In Contempt In Bonds Case (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- The San Francisco Chronicle agreed to be held in contempt of court and pay perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines for refusing to assist a federal grand jury investigating who leaked its reporters the secret testimony of Barry Bonds and other athletes, according to a court filing.

The government agreed to stay any fines pending the outcome of an appeal to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The paper, citing the First Amendment, is refusing to abide by a grand jury subpoena ordering it to release any information it has on the reporters' source or sources.

Two Chronicle reporters who wrote about Bonds' 2003 testimony before a federal grand jury investigating the BALCO steroid ring also have agreed to be held in contempt, pending appeal.

Reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada could be jailed for as much as 18 months or until they agree to divulge the source or sources of the leak. They argue the First Amendment protects them as well, a position a federal judge has rejected.

Under the proposed deal between the newspaper and federal prosecutors, which must be approved by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White, the Chronicle agreed to pay a fine of at least $1,000 per day, for up to 18 months. Both sides reserve the right to argue the amount of the fine.

The agreement is largely procedural, allowing the case to move before the appeals court.

According to the leaked testimony, Bonds told the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative grand jury that he did not knowingly use steroids and said he thought his trainer Greg Anderson supplied him with flaxseed oil and arthritic balm.

Where Do Felons Get Their Guns? (HERNTDY)

By Kyle Martin

Hernando (FL) Today, October 20, 2006

BROOKSVILLE — Brooksville police Lt. Rick Hankins decided to run an experiment last year to find out how easy it is to buy a gun on the streets.

A confidential informant was sent out to buy two guns within the hour.

The informant was back 30 minutes later, guns in hand.

"It was very surprising," Hankins said.

You can legitimately buy a gun in 30 minutes, from a flea market, classified ad or yard sale. These avenues don't require the paperwork and three-day waiting period of a licensed gun dealer.

But convicted felons are prohibited from owning guns and ammunition, regardless of where they buy them. Even so, two people were charged with the crime on Monday.

One of them is also accused of attempted murder.

Michael Lavon Lazenby has been connected with Sunday's shooting in South Brooksville of Henry Maner, who was shielding a 2-year-old girl from the gunfire.

Authorities have also arrested Marcus Tyre Barnes, who they believe shot at Lazenby and the other shooters from a separate vehicle. Barnes is also a convicted felon.

So where do felons get their guns?

"The black market, thefts, robberies, gun dealers and residences," said John Ryan, assistant special agent in charge for the ATF's Tampa field division.

A popular tactic is the straw purchase, which involves a legitimate person buying guns for a felon. Two local pawnshop owners say that's rare. "I haven't had anybody try that," said Thomas Bell, owner of Bell's Pawn Shop. "Everybody knows I go by the book."

DOJ_NMG_0083707

Still, there's no stopping a wife from taking a gun home to her husband, said George Redman, owner of Redman Pawn and Gun. "We have no control over that," he said.

Like any licensed dealer, if you buy a gun from Redman you have to fill out paperwork authorizing a background check by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

If the background check reveals any number of violations, including a felony conviction, a domestic violence misdemeanor, or most restraining orders, Redman, will return your money and bid you goodbye.

The background check usually takes three days, but sometimes it's red flagged and can take longer. If the dealer hasn't heard back from FDLE in five business days, though, he has the right to sell the gun. Redman chooses not to. "It just doesn't feel safe doing that," he said.

Redman's concern is flea markets, like the one he visited in Homosassa this weekend. There appeared to be little control over the gun sales, according to Redman. "It's shocking, really," he said.

Sales at flea markets and gun shows fall under the purview of local law enforcement. ATF gets involved because it's a federal offense to sell a gun to a felon and for a felon to own a gun. But unless you knowingly sell the gun to a felon, there's no crime committed.

Another source of guns is yard sales and classified ads in newspapers. Robert Turner, of St. Petersburg, is advertising two antique guns in the classifieds. The guns are functional, but Turner doubts anyone would spend several hundred dollars for a crime spree.

If he were selling some newer pistols, however, his attitude would be different. "You probably couldn't tell the difference," if a felon came to buy his guns, he said. But he would ask for a name, age and address. If it seemed suspicious, Turner would probably tell the buyer the gun was already sold. "I would feel responsible myself if anything happened," he said.

The area of Sunday's shooting straddles the boundary between city limits and Hernando County. This time it happened to fall in the hands of the sheriff's office.

Drugs and guns often go hand in hand, Hankins said, so a joint task force was created to handle the problem. This has cut back on drug dealers going across the street to the county after they are busted in the city, according to Hankins. "It's a game of ping pong otherwise," he said.

Reporter Kyle Martin can be contacted at 352-544-5271.

IMMIGRATION:

California City Bars Renting Housing To Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

(AP) - ESCONDIDO, California-City leaders have approved a controversial ordinance prohibiting landlords from renting to illegal immigrants, the latest of a handful of communities nationwide to pass laws cracking down on people who hire or rent to undocumented immigrants.

More than 100 police officers and sheriff's deputies dressed in riot gear were on hand for the vote, passed 3-2 Wednesday. After the measure was approved, one person ran outside the council chamber and yelled, "The USA wins!" prompting opponents and supporters gathered on the lawn to shout at each other for 30 minutes.

Inside the chamber, officers removed two men after a brief confrontation. Police said no arrests were made.

Wednesday's vote was the final reading of the ordinance, which has drawn crowds each time it has been heard. The American Civil Liberties Union has indicated it will go to court to block implementation of the ordinance, which is set to take effect Nov. 18 in Escondido, a city where Hispanics make up about 42 percent of the 142,000 residents.

Councilman Sam Abed, who supported the measure, said it will improve the city's image and reputation, "and certainly our quality of life," The San Diege Union-Tribune reported Thursday.

Mayor Lori Holt Pfeiler and Councilman Ron Newman, the two no votes, said the ordinance would create new problems for Escondido.

DOJ_NMG_0083708

Pfeiler said everyone agrees illegal immigration is a problem, but the ordinance "is going to have neighbor against neighbor."

Under the law, landlords will be required to submit documentation of their tenants' immigration status to the city, which will then submit the information to the federal government for verification.

If tenants are found to be illegal immigrants, landlords would be given 10 days to evict them or face suspension of their business license. Repeat offenders could face misdemeanor charges and fines.

A handful of cities across the country have passed similar ordinances, with local leaders arguing the federal government has not done enough to crackdown on the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants living in the country.

TAX:

Loftier Limits For Retirement Savers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Federal employees will be allowed to invest up to $15,500 in their retirement savings plan in calendar year 2007, $500 more than this year's limit, the Internal Revenue Service has announced.

The elective deferral limit, which applies to 401(k) plans in the private sector as well the federal government's Thrift Savings Plan, was adjusted for inflation, as required under the tax code.

The TSP, the 401(k)-type program for government employees, allows investors to change their contribution amounts at any time. Investors can designate withholdings from their biweekly pay in either percentage or dollar amounts.

Employees covered by the Federal Employees Retirement System, though, should structure their investments so they do not hit the IRS dollar limit until the end of the year, in order to continue receiving matching government contributions. Those covered by the old Civil Service Retirement System and persons in the military do not receive matching contributions.

The IRS also announced that the "catch-up" contribution amount will remain unchanged at $5,000 in 2007.

Catch-up contributions are allowed during a calendar year for people age 50 or older who have hit the elective deferral limit or who are on a pace to do so by the end of the year. There are no matching contributions for catch-ups, which were approved by Congress in 2002 as a way to help employees who did not have an opportunity to participate in a 401(k)-type program early in their career to save more for retirement.Back to the Drawing Board

A federal district court judge has directed the Homeland Security Department and the Office of Personnel Management to revise or abandon regulations that failed to ensure that Homeland Security employees could bargain collectively and that went too far in limiting the topics that could be put on the negotiating table.

U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer also told the agencies to file a status report on their efforts to fix the regulations by July 17. Her request for a report should not be seen as a deadline for the agencies to complete decisions on what to do about the regulations, she said.

In August 2005, Collyer ruled in a lawsuit brought by the National Treasury Employees Union and other unions that the department had gone too far when it came up with new rules that called into question whether the department would be obligated to abide by binding contracts. She issued an injunction to block the regulations, and her ruling was upheld by a three-judge federal appeals panel in June. The government decided not to take an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Government lawyers asked Collyer to close the case, saying that would not prevent NTEU from returning to court if it had objections to any revised rules. But she declined the request, and issued an order saying that "this court shall retain jurisdiction over this matter for all purposes."At Center Ice

The Partnership for Public Service and the Washington Capitals will team up tomorrow night to honor federal employees at the Capitals' game against the Tampa Bay Lightning.

The Caps are sponsoring a Federal Employees' Night with the Partnership, which seeks to encourage more young people and mid-career professionals to consider working in the federal government. For discount tickets, go to http://www.ourpublicservice.org .Talk Shows

DOJ_NMG_0083709

Steven L. Katz , an author and consultant on federal management issues, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Lt. Gen. Roger A. Brady , deputy chief of staff for manpower and personnel at Air Force headquarters, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. tomorrow on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Diary associate Eric Yoder contributed to this column. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Appoints Mine Safety Administrator (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 (AP) — With Congress now in a recess, President Bush on Thursday bypassed opposition from Democrats in the Senate and the United Mineworkers of America and appointed his nominee to head the agency that oversees mine safety.

Mr. Bush appointed Richard M. Stickler, who is expected to serve about a year until the end of the next session of Congress.

Mr. Stickler, of Terra Alta, W. Va., will head the Mine Safety and Health Administration, which has been without a leader for two years.

The mine agency is part of the Labor Department.

Mr. Bush nominated Mr. Stickler last year, but Senate Democrats have blocked the nomination. The lawmakers and the mine workers' union said Mr. Stickler had spent too many years as a mining executive and had failed to demonstrate adequate concern for safety in the mining industry.

More than three dozen miners have been killed in accidents this year, according to the mine safety agency's Web site.

Mr. Stickler headed the Pennsylvania mine safety office from 1997 to 2003.

"I think my track record in Pennsylvania proves that I did not go easy on mine operators," Mr. Stickler said in a conference call to reporters.

U.S. Judge Orders White House To Release Cheney Visitor Logs (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge has ordered the Bush administration to release information about who visited Vice President Dick Cheney's office and personal residence, an order that could spark a late election season debate over lobbyists' White House access.

The Washington Post asked for two years of White House visitor logs in June but the Secret Service refused to process the request. Government attorneys called it "a fishing expedition into the most sensitive details of the vice presidency."

U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina ruled Wednesday that, by the end of next week, the Secret Service must produce the records or at least identity them and justify why they are being withheld.

The newspaper sought logs for anyone visiting Mr. Cheney, his legal counsel, chief spokesman and other top aides and advisers.

The Secret Service had no comment on the ruling Thursday. In court documents, government attorneys said releasing the documents would infringe on Mr. Cheney's ability to seek advice.

"This case is about protecting the effective functioning of the vice presidency under the Constitution," attorneys wrote.

A lawsuit over similar records revealed last month that Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed -- key figures in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal -- landed more than 100 meetings inside the Bush White House.

The Washington Post cited those records, which were released to the Democratic Party and Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, as evidence that the documents should be released.

DOJ_NMG_0083710

Medicare Drug Aid No Longer Automatic (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

More than 600,000 low-income elderly and disabled people who automatically received federal help to pay for their Medicare drug coverage this year will have to actively apply to get such assistance in 2007, Medicare officials said yesterday.

The change affects people who were automatically enrolled in the inaugural year of the drug benefit and got the low-income subsidy in 2006 but who are no longer eligible for Medicaid or two other government assistance programs.

Some advocates say the affected seniors may not have understood a letter about the change that the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services sent last month. And even beneficiaries aware of the change might have trouble completing the six-page application, they said.

"Just sending these folks a letter and an application doesn't mean they necessarily are going to apply for the extra help even though they may need it," said Marisa Scala-Foley, associate director of the Access to Benefits Coalition at the National Council on Aging. "These are still likely to be low income folks who need all the help they can get. . . . These folks are going to need a lot of hand-holding."

There is no danger of them losing Medicare drug coverage. Even if they do nothing, they will be automatically enrolled in their current plan for 2007. But in January, most would be charged a monthly premium for the first time.

Kathleen Harrington, director of external affairs for the Medicare agency, said it has provided drug plans and community organizations with information about the affected seniors and encouraged greater outreach. The open enrollment period is Nov. 15 to Dec. 31, and the affected group will have three extra months to switch to a plan with no monthly premium, she said.

"We're very concerned about this," Harrington said. "We want to ensure that they know and that they've been contacted by plans, by us, by advocates, by community resources to make sure that they apply for this low-income subsidy, so if they have a premium liability they can minimize it."

More than 9 million of the 23 million people enrolled in Medicare drug plans this year qualified for the low-income subsidy, which meant they paid no monthly premiums and only $1 to $5 in co-payments for their prescriptions. Of those, about 7.2 million were automatically enrolled in the program and the subsidy, while the rest applied and got it, Medicare officials said.

Medicare drug plan beneficiaries qualify for special help if their annual incomes are at or below 150 percent of the poverty level, which is $14,700 for individuals and $19,800 for married couples. Also, individuals must have no more than $11,500 in assets, and married couples no more than $23,000 in assets.

Some of the affected people who no longer automatically qualify for a subsidy might have had a change in income but could still qualify for premium assistance under the drug benefit, officials said.

"The worst outcome will be someone getting surprised that they have a premium and then dropping their coverage," Harrington said. "We want to do everything we can to keep them in coverage."

House Intel Chair Suspends Staff Member (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra has suspended a Democratic staff member because of concerns he may have leaked a high-level intelligence assessment to The New York Times last month.

In a letter obtained by The Associated Press Thursday night, Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., a committee member, said that an unidentified staffer requested the document from National Intelligence Director John Negroponte three days before the Sept. 23 story about its conclusions.

The staffer received the National Intelligence Estimate on global terror trends on Sept. 21.

"I have no credible information to say any classified information was leaked from the committee's minority staff, but the implications of such would be dramatic," LaHood wrote Hoekstra, R-Mich., late last month. "This may, in fact, be only coincidence, and simply 'look bad.' But coincidence, in this town, is rare."

DOJ_NMG_0083711

A spokesman to Hoekstra, Jamal Ware, confirmed that a committee staff member was suspended this week. He said the staff member is being denied access to classified information pending the outcome of a review.

"Chairman Hoekstra considers security highly important, and the coincidence certainly merits a review," he said.

An aide to California Rep. Jane Harman, the committee's top Democrat, did not have an immediate comment Thursday night.

The New York Times did not immediately answer a telephone message seeking comment.

House Committee Dismisses Bulk Of Investigative Division (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Appropriations Committee has let go about 60 private contractors who made up most of an investigative unit that was auditing billions of dollars in government spending, including the $62 billion federal relief package for Hurricane Katrina, the panel's spokesman said Thursday.

The investigators, attached to the committee's Surveys and Investigations division, were released during the past week, committee spokesman John Scofield said. He said that the quality of the unit's work had been questioned by leaders of the Republican-controlled committee, including some Democrats, but he declined to say who.

The shake-up — which leaves only 16 full-time employees in the investigative unit — comes about a year after the Appropriations Committee's chairman, Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., launched the Katrina review by saying the unit would "conduct a wide-ranging assessment and analysis of disaster spending." At the time, Lewis said the unit had a tradition of "comprehensive" reporting.

It's unclear how the departures will affect the work of the unit, whose contract staff is made up of former employees of the FBI, CIA and other government investigative services. Some of them had worked for the unit for several years. Scofield said the dismissals would not compromise any ongoing investigations. Scofield said he could not identify the specific work being done by investigators because much of the unit's inquiries involve classified information.

Robert Pearre, the unit's director, did not respond to requests for comment.

Scofield said the "pace" of the Katrina review was not as critical as the quality of the work. "There is nothing sinister here. It's about how we do the best oversight."

The committee's ranking Democrat, David Obey of Wisconsin, was in his home state and could not be reached for comment.

Established in 1943, the investigative unit has focused mainly on defense and intelligence spending programs. Its reports usually are not made public. Regarding Katrina spending, however, Lewis has said he intends to reveal the results of the committee's investigation because of "the national importance of the Katrina recovery efforts and the record amount of funds that have been appropriated."

The committee's review of Katrina spending is one of several examinations of how government relief was directed and spent after the nation's worst natural disaster.

Last year, the Justice Department launched a separate inquiry into Katrina-related incidents of alleged fraud in which dozens of people have been charged. Many were accused of filing fraudulent claims of property damage in order to get thousands of dollars in government relief checks.

Capitol Hill Eats Own Pork (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

WHERE HAVE YOU GONE, Jefferson Smith, now that we need you? A naïf sent to the U.S. Senate on a fluke in "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," Smith (played by Jimmy Stewart) discovered that his mentor had slipped a provision into a "deficiency bill" to construct a dam on land secretly purchased by the home state's political boss. The boss stood to make a killing, and Smith's former hero figured to get a piece of the action.

But Smith would have none of it. He knew graft and corruption when he saw it, so he made a courageous stand, nearly destroying himself in the process and etching into the American psyche a fable so beloved that no member of Congress, out here in the real world, would ever try such a thing.

Instead, Capitol Hill pols are outdoing even the movies with bills and deals that rake in big money for themselves, their families and their political friends.

In one of the latest instances, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is under fire for not reporting part of a complex real estate transaction that led to the sale of some of his Las Vegas property. After a little government land swap here and some rezoning there, Reid received $1.1 million. Now that the deal has made the newspapers, Reid has seen fit to amend his ethics report retroactively.

But Reid has nothing on House Republicans, who appear to be perfecting the art of "earmarking" money in federal spending bills to boost their real estate interests. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) earmarked funds for construction of a parkway near land he owned, which he later sold for a $2-million profit. Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.) directed $11.4 million in federal funds to a highway-widening project that just happened to make it easier to get to resort acreage and subdivisions that he owns. Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Corona) directed federal money to projects near his Riverside County property that he later sold for about twice the purchase price. Earmarking in another highway bill put $1.28 million to work improving land near a development owned in part by Rep. Gary G. Miller (R-Diamond Bar).

Elected officials insist that, in earmarking funds, they are only doing what politicians have done for years: directing pork back to the home district. But that doesn't mean they should be allowed to use the federal purse to do favors for themselves or their political donors and friends who happen to own chunks of land near projects Congress approves.

Earmarking used to be done in virtual secrecy. But the House recently approved a rule drafted by Rep. David Dreier (R-San Dimas) that requires bills and reports to include a list of earmarks and the names of members who sponsored them. It's still not enough. If Congress is to repair its reputation, it must go beyond merely admitting that its members engage in self-dealing. It has to change. Jefferson Smith would demand no less. Neither do we.

OTHER NEWS:

Home Run: Dow's First Close At 12000 (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Powered by once-skeptical investors rediscovering a passion for stocks, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday closed above the 12000 mark for the first time, after testing the milestone for days. It looks as if there are more potential converts still on the sidelines.

The newfound enthusiasm comes from an array of sources, including small-time investors pouring money into mutual funds and hedge funds investing money for deep-pocketed institutions and individuals.

For all the excitement of the Dow's record close, which came on the 19th anniversary of the 1987 stock-market crash, the market barely nudged over the finishing line. The Dow, comprising 30 major companies, advanced just 19.05 points, or 0.2%, to close at 12011.73.

"It was pretty balanced between winners and losers with the bulls just getting a slight advantage," said Jon Najarian, chief executive of Najarian Capital in Chicago. "It wasn't like investors were throwing money at" shares.

Even so, the Dow is now up a solid 12% this year, reflecting a recent embrace of big companies, especially by hedge funds that traditionally prefer betting on smaller companies, where they can hunt for bargains others might not have noticed.

The blue-chip companies' gains are part of a recent marketwide rally that has seen technology and small stocks show signs of strength after months of dormancy. The Russell 2000 index of small companies is up 6.4% since Sept. 1, while the tech-stock-led Nasdaq Composite Index is up 6.7%, topping the Dow's 4.8% gain. The Russell 2000 now is just 1.8% below its high, reached on May 5, and is up 14% for the year, compared with 9.5% for the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

DOJ_NMG_0083713

The S&P 500 rose just one point to 1366.96, a 0.1% increase, and still is off 11% from its record high in March 2000. The Nasdaq Composite was up 0.2%, or 3.79 points, to 2340.94, less than half its record high. Apple Computer, a Nasdaq stock, rose $4.46 to $78.99, a nearly 6% jump.

The Dow was helped by a run-up in shares of cigarette maker Altria Group, a Dow component, which rose $1.85 to $80.19.

Analysts say the climb could continue as long as interest rates and inflation remain low and more skeptics abandon their doubts and start buying. There are also some dangers ahead: The market could be jolted by a change in control of Congress following next month's midterm elections or by signs that the housing slump is worsening.

Data suggest a sizable group of skeptics remains, which could give shares room to rise. Measures of bearish bets in the market have remained high during the recent rally. Record amounts of stock are being sold short, meaning investors are wagering that prices will fall by selling borrowed shares in hopes of replacing them with cheaper ones bought later. In the New York Stock Exchange's latest monthly reporting period, ending last Friday, so-called short interest -- a measure of how much stock is being shorted -- rose for the ninth straight time. Through mid-September, the Nasdaq Stock Market saw short interest rise more than 25% this year. (Related article on page B6.)

"You haven't really seen excitement among investors, retail brokers and institutional trading desks yet," says Tobias Levkovich, Citigroup's chief U.S. equity strategist. "If investors get more aggressive, there is more upside to the market."

One sign that investors are rapidly warming up to U.S. stocks: Last month, $2.2 billion was added to U.S. stock-focused mutual funds, the second-highest monthly figure this year. And investors have added an estimated $2.6 billion so far this month, according to TrimTabs Investment Research, which tracks mutual-fund flows. That is a sharp contrast to much of the past year, when investors chased international stocks and shunned U.S. companies.

There also are indications that large investors are getting more comfortable with stocks. The Volatility Index, or the VIX, a measure of the market's estimate of the stock market's future bumpiness that trades on the Chicago Board Options Exchange, is near its lowest levels of the past decade. This suggests that investors are "relatively complacent, and fairly optimistic," says Thomas McManus, chief investment strategist at Bank of America's Banc of America Securities.

A number of investors seem to be pulling back from commodity investments, amid marked weakness in energy prices and other commodities lately, and may look to redeploy their cash in the stock market. Investors withdrew $214 million from mutual funds that invest in gold and precious metals last month, according to Lipper Inc., a fund tracker. These funds added $129 million each month, on average, during the past six months.

Hedge funds that focus on stocks have lagged behind the market this year, in part because they had doubts that share prices would climb. Many are jumping on the bandwagon, especially in regard to larger stocks. Large "speculative" investors, a category dominated by hedge funds, held more bullish than bearish positions on the S&P 500 as of Oct. 10, according to Merrill Lynch. Two months ago, more of these investors were betting against a rise in the S&P 500.

Global macro hedge funds, a category of funds managing $115 billion that bets on trends in various markets, now hold positions that amount to wagers that stocks will rise further, according to Merrill Lynch. Just two months ago, these big hedge funds were holding positions betting that stocks would fall.

Among the largest buyers of Microsoft, a Dow component, in the second quarter, were hedge funds Perry Capital, Farralon Capital Management, Eminence Capital and D.E. Shaw, according to securities filings tracked by FactSet Research. Hedge funds including D.E. Shaw, Renaissance Technologies and Citadel Investment were buyers of Hewlett-Packard, also part of the Dow.

Hedge funds manage about $1.2 trillion compared with about $9.6 trillion at mutual funds, but their buying could make a difference. According to some estimates, hedge funds are responsible for more than 40% of daily stock trades.

Hedge funds hold a near-record number of short positions linked to the Russell 2000, which tracks smaller stocks, suggesting they are becoming less enamored with smaller companies even as they warm to bigger stocks.

Chris Johnson, of the research firm Schaeffer Investment Research, says he is encouraged that the high ratio of options on individual stocks that pay off if shares falter to contracts that rise in value if a stock jumps is roughly comparable to activity shortly before some past rallies.

In major U.S. market action:

DOJ_NMG_0083714

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the NYSE was 2.65 billion shares, as 2,033 stocks advanced and 1,268 fell.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year note declined 6/32 point, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield to 4.788%. The 30-year bond fell 11/32 to yield 4.911%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 118.16 yen, compared with 118.92. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.2628, compared with $1.2534.

Dow Closes Above 12,000 For The First Time (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

Less than three weeks after it set its first record high in more than six years, the Dow Jones industrial average closed above the 12,000-point mark for the first time this afternoon.

The achievement by the popular, though not comprehensive, barometer of the stock market indicates that investors are increasingly confident that the economy is poised to perform the rare feat of slowing without stalling. The Dow is up 12 percent so far this year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, a broader measure of the market, has also done well and is up 9.5 percent for the year.

The Dow's move above 12,000 came on modest gains for the day, with the industrial average rising 19.05 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 12,011.73.

The day's gains were just as modest elsewhere in the stock market. The S.&P. rose 1 point, or less than 0.1 percent, to 1,366.96, while the Nasdaq composite index rose 3.79 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,340.94.

"It is the best of both worlds here," said Steven M. Rogé, a portfolio manager at the Rogé Partners Fund. "We have interest rates that are still below the long-term average, capital is still flowing freely and growth is strong but not excessive."

The current rally, which started in late July after an early summer swoon, has followed a well-worn pattern in which stocks do well in the last three months of midterm election years, analysts experts note. The one difference this time is that the stock market started moving up in the third quarter, which historically has proven to be a weak stretch.

"You have to back a very long way to find a negative" in a midterm election year, said Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at Standard & Poor's. "On average, you have a positive year 90 percent of the time."

Larger stocks, particularly in consumer staples, have done particularly well, which has helped the Dow, an index of 30 blue-chip companies.

Technology companies like Intel and Microsoft, which lagged the market earlier in the year, have also done well.

Some stock pickers, however, see that strength as a worrying signal that big company stocks may have become too expensive, at least for the time being.

More broadly, some economists and bond investors do not share the stock market's sanguine view. Atop their list of concerns is a softening housing market and its direct and indirect effect on the American economy.

If home sales continue to fall at current rates or faster, that decline will reduce employment in construction, mortgage lending and other related areas. Also, falling prices will make it harder for consumers to refinance and tap their homes for lines of credit for home improvement and other spending.

Other concerns include tensions in the Middle East and on the Korean peninsula. Those and other geopolitical crisis could easily reverse the two-month-long slide in oil and gasoline prices.

Dow Notches First Close Above 12,000 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 19 -- The Dow Jones industrial average scored its first close at more than 12,000 Thursday as Wall Street, showing its growing confidence despite new evidence of a weakening economy, managed to hold on to a slim advance.

The Dow ended the day at 12,011.73, the ninth time in two weeks that the index achieved a record high close. The index gained 19.05, or 0.16 percent, for the day.

DOJ_NMG_0083715

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.00, or 0.07 percent, to 1366.96. The Nasdaq composite index rose 3.79, or 0.16 percent, to 2340.94.

The Dow's latest milestone came on the anniversary of Black Monday in 1987, when the Dow fell 508 points and also suffered its second-biggest percentage drop in history. The Dow finished that day at 1793.90.

The Dow's finish above 12,000 was the latest sign that the stock market continues a cautious recovery from the losses and despair that investors suffered in the early part of this decade. After peaking in early 2000, the Dow and other indicators fell precipitously during the dot-com collapse, recession and the impact of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Still, trading was erratic Thursday, with the overall market struggling to sustain gains after a pair of reports signaled that the Federal Reserve might have a tougher time orchestrating a soft landing of the economy. Disappointing earnings in the technology sector also weighed on stocks.

The Conference Board's index of U.S. leading economic indicators rose less than forecast in September. Meanwhile, the Philadelphia Fed's general economic index contracted for the first time since April 2003. The numbers rattled investors who had been sending stocks higher since September on optimism the Fed might cut rates in early 2007.Movers

Pfizer fell 42 cents, to $27.68.

Apple Computer rose $4.46, to $78.99. Sales of iPod music players helped fourth-quarter earnings.

Dell fell $1.58, to $23.12.

Advanced Micro Devices fell $3.22, to $21.01. The chipmaker forecast declining profit margins and lower desktop processor revenue.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 37.27, to 8,700.81.

American Stock Exchange index rose 16.21, to 1,933.08.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 3.98, to 767.39.Volume

NYSE: 2.65 billion shares, up from 2.63 billion on Wednesday. Advancers led decliners by 4 to 3.

Nasdaq: 2.03 billion shares, down from 2.24 billion. Advancers narrowly outnumbered decliners.Commodities

Crude oil for November delivery: $58.85, up 85 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $599 a troy ounce, up from $$588.90 on Wednesday.

Dow Breaks 12,000 (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK — Dow 12,000 is a big round number, a fresh, mountainlike peak never seen before, but it doesn't mean a return to the dangerous days of hyperinflated stocks.

Investors who recall the steep declines suffered by massively overvalued stocks after the 2000 market top might worry that the Dow Jones industrial average's first close above 12,000 Thursday is a sign that stocks are again at superexpensive prices relative to earnings, or P-E ratios. But “compared with 1999 and 2000, when valuations reached surreal levels, the Dow is priced attractively,” says Quincy Krosby, chief strategist at The Hartford.

Despite rising 19.05 points Thursday to a record close of 12,011.73, the 30 stocks in the blue-chip Dow are trading at lower valuations than they were at the 2000 top, when stock investing surpassed baseball as the national pastime.

In early 2000, Dow stocks had a median P-E (half higher, half lower) of 29, says Ned Davis Research. Now, the median P-E is 18. The broader Standard & Poor's 500 is trading at roughly 14 times estimated 2007 earnings, vs. a 27 P-E in March 2000, Thomson Financial says.

Falling oil prices, strong corporate profit growth and a belief that the Federal Reserve is done raising interest rates have fueled the Dow's rally. While more reasonably priced stocks don't preclude a market pullback, which some Wall Street analysts predict given the impressive run-up the past few months, it could provide some support.

The Dow is now at or near price targets projected by investment strategists at the start of the year. It has topped the 12,000 target of RBC Dain Rauscher. It is fast-approaching the 12,100 target set by A.G. Edwards and the recently updated target of 12,222 set by S&P's technical strategist Mark Arbeter.

DOJ_NMG_0083716

The Dow is also about 6% below a year-end 2007 target of 12,750 set by Citigroup's top equity strategist, Tobias Levkovich. It's 4,000 points away from Dow 16,000, an aggressive 2007 call made by Curtis Teberg, who runs a small mutual fund.

Aside from the morale boost the Dow's record-setting run gives, it also confirms that after five years, investors are finally pulling money out of small-company stocks and putting it to work in large stocks, says Joe Quinlan, chief strategist at Bank of America Global Wealth & Investment Management.

Still, it's too "early to pop the champagne," says Leo Kamp, TIAA-CREF's chief investment economist, because a slowing economy could hurt earnings. "A sustained rally," he says, "won't occur until the Fed cuts rates."

Economic Index Suggests Continued Slowing (WSJ)

By Michael Derby And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Leading economic indicators pointed to slower U.S. economic growth in September.

Separate reports showed that factory activity in the Philadelphia region was flat in a mid-October reading even as manufacturers remain optimistic, and that weekly U.S. jobless claims hit a four-month low.

The Conference Board reported Thursday its index of leading indicators edged up just 0.1% to 137.7 in September, but noted that consumer expectations have improved. The index fell by a revised 0.2% in August. Economists had expected a more robust 0.3% advance last month.

"The economy has slowed but the evidence to date doesn't suggest it will stall or go into a recession," said Ken Goldstein, an economist with the private research group. "To the contrary, the economy retains considerable strength," given the rise in stock prices and drop in energy prices, he said. Mr. Goldstein also noted that employment remains robust and inflation relatively low.

Five of the 10 indicators making up the leading index rose last month, led by consumer expectations and money supply. The biggest negatives were building permits and average weekly manufacturing hours.

The group noted that the leading index has fallen in five of the last eight months, and from March to September, the index is down by 0.9%, a 1.7% annual rate decline.

Factory Activity in Philadelphia Area Idles

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia reported that a gauge of manufacturing activity in its region slipped to -0.7 in a mid-October reading from -0.4% in September. Economists expected October's reading to stand at 8.0. Negative readings indicate a contraction in activity.

The survey is widely seen as a precursor to a national reading on manufacturing activity next month. The October report followed the unexpectedly weak showing in September, an event that had caused considerable turmoil in financial markets. The findings of that report, however, weren't borne out in other regional manufacturing surveys, or in the Institute for Supply Management's national report.

Among the area firms surveyed, 22% reported increased activity this month, while 23% reported a decrease. Measures of new orders and shipments ticked higher from negative readings in prior months. The employment index fell by one point and, the regional bank said, remains at relatively low level. Manufacturers reported continued input-pricing pressures but a measure of prices paid dropped slightly from September's reading.

Expectations for future manufacturing growth improved after last month's sharp decline. Indicators for future orders, shipments and employment were all higher.

Weekly Jobless Claims Hit Four-Month Low

The Labor Department reported that initial jobless claims in the U.S. dropped by 10,000 last week to a seasonally adjusted level of 299,000 in the week ended Oct. 14. New claims for the week ended Oct. 7 were revised to 309,000 from a previously reported 308,000. Economists had expected a gain of 2,000 jobless claims, according to a survey by Dow Jones Newswires.

The four-week moving average of new claims, which smooths out weekly fluctuations, fell by 5,750 last week to 307,750, the lowest since the week ended June 24.

DOJ_NMG_0083717

The number of workers drawing unemployment benefits for more than a week grew in the week ended Oct. 7, the latest week for which such data are available. These continuing jobless claims increased 25,000 to 2,453,000. In the week ended Oct. 7, the jobless rate for workers with unemployment insurance was 1.9%, unchanged from the previous week.

Opec Set To Defend $60 Global Minimum (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries on Thursday night agreed to cut production by 1.2m barrels a day, showing its determination to defend $60 as its new minimum international price.

The cut, which was deeper than the market had expected, will take Opec production to 26.3m barrels a day if it is fully implemented on November 1.

Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil producer, on Thursday warned that the cartel could make a second cut as early as December. The news is likely to push oil prices sharply higher this morning as traders had expected a reduction of 1m b/d.

Opec oil ministers, who had for the last two weeks been divided over how to implement the cut, on Thursday agreed that each of Opec's 10 active members would participate on a pro rata basis, said Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's oil minister and Opec's current president.

Nymex and Brent crude futures, the world's two benchmarks, had already begun to rise on Thursday in anticipation of the deal.

Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, told reporters on Thursday: "The price is determined by the market, what we try to do is to make the market balanced. Today there is a dis-equilibrium between supply and demand. Today we are trying to get the market to the normal equilibrium and the price will take care of itself."

He added that the possibility of another cut "is there".

Vera de Ladoucette, an analyst at the consultancy Cambridge Energy Research Associates, said: "Usually when the decision is taken it has already been priced into the market. But sometimes Opec can surprise. The market is going to be caught off guard today by this decision."

Oil producers have watched with concern as crude oil inventories have grown, indicating that the market is oversupplied.

US inventories of crude have risen in the past week by 5.1m barrels a day to levels 8 per cent above those of a year ago, according to data published on Wednesday by the Energy Information Administration, the statistical arm of the US Department of Energy.

Oil prices in the last three months have fallen 25 per cent to below $60 a barrel. Mr Daukoru said: "We have never seen a drop [in the price of oil] like this in many years."

But despite its price concerns, Saudi Arabia did not want to return to being Opec's swing producer of oil, a role it played from 1980-86, when it cut supplies as prices fell. Therefore, it was imperative to get the rest of Opec on board.

The full seriousness of Opec's resolve will only become apparent in the next two months as members either adhere to the decision or cheat by not fully cutting their share.

As divisions had appeared within Opec within the past two weeks, traders began to doubt the cartel's ability to act.

They will be looking at whether the cuts will be adhered to by at least the cartel's lead members.

Opec's ambition to cut supplies comes at a cost, particularly for countries that have heavily invested their petrodollars into building up their oil sectors. Libya, the United Arab Emirates, Nigeria and Algeria have courted international energy groups to help them boost their production.

Venezuela, Indonesia, Qatar and Iran also have international oil companies working in their fields. These members of Opec will now have to tell the likes of Europe's Royal Dutch Shell, BP, Total, Repsol and the US's ExxonMobil and ChevronTexaco to reduce the output from their fields and forgo revenue. How much each company will have to sacrifice will depend on how Opec splits the burden of the cut among its member states.

But the news is not all bad for the companies as they will benefit from any boost in prices that follows Opec's decision.

OPEC Signals Resolve With Cutback (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0083718

By Chip Cummins, Spencer Swartz And Anees Al Qudaihi

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

OPEC's decision to reduce production by 1.2 million barrels of oil a day -- a modestly larger cut than expected -- marks its strongest signal in years that the cartel will act aggressively to stop falling crude prices.

The decrease -- decided at a hastily arranged meeting late last night in Doha, Qatar, by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries -- represents about 4% of the group's current output and just more than 1% of global consumption. The cuts will take effect Nov. 1, OPEC said in a statement after the meeting. In comments before and after the meeting, ministers suggested the cartel could cut again this year if necessary.

OPEC ministers had indicated in recent weeks they had all but agreed to cut output by one million barrels a day -- worried that slowing demand growth, swelling inventories and new supply from non-OPEC producers threatened a downward price spiral below the $55-to-$60-a-barrel range for U.S. benchmark crude they suggested they were targeting.

But markets had largely shrugged off the threatened cut amid squabbling among ministers about how to distribute the decrease in production among members. That squabbling called into question the group's resolve.

By announcing a bigger-than-expected cut and leaving on the table the prospect of more cuts later in the year, OPEC ministers appear to be trying to send a strong message that they will stomach the temporary pain of reduced oil sales in exchange for the stability of higher prices.

If the gambit works, crude-oil prices could stabilize from their roughly 25% drop from mid-July highs. That could also put a floor under gasoline prices, which have also fallen sharply in the U.S., providing consumers a welcome boon from years of rising fuel costs.

But OPEC hasn't necessarily won its battle to stabilize crude prices. In the past, OPEC members have been reluctant to decrease production in line with their promises, fearful of the double whammy to state coffers of falling prices and reduced volume. And the cut is still a small proportion of total global demand of some 84 million barrels a day. If demand growth slackens, as some analysts are predicting, prices could continue to fall.

U.S. benchmark crude futures rose 85 cents, or 1.5%, to $58.50 on the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday, before the outcome of the OPEC meeting. (See related article on page C4.) Prices have plunged from a nominal settlement high of $77.03 on July 14 and remain well below an inflation-adjusted high of $99.56, reached in April 1980.

The decision ended for now a rancorous debate among OPEC members about how to portion out the group's first production cut since February 2004. Countries that had been struggling to pump enough oil to meet their allotted share of the cartel's output had argued the group should simply reduce those quotas. That solution would cause them little pain but require the group's heavy producers to cut back more sharply.

But ministers last night said they would cut from the group's actual current output. The International Energy Agency estimates OPEC's output reached 27.8 million barrels a day in September excluding Iraq, which is exempt from production limits.

Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali Naimi, OPEC's de facto leader as the representative of the group's largest producer, suggested OPEC would act aggressively to bolster prices. Before going into last night's meeting, he said he supported another cut in output in December if necessary.

"We're trying to get the market back to equilibrium," Mr. Naimi told reporters ahead of the meeting.

OPEC Says It Will Cut 1.2 Million Barrels A Day (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries early today announced plans to cut oil production by 1.2 million barrels a day, equal to 4.3 percent of the group's total, in an effort to stop the slide in oil prices over the past three months.

The unexpectedly large size of the cut, the cartel's first since December 2004, was aimed at the many oil traders and analysts who still take a skeptical view of OPEC's will to follow through and carry out meaningful output reductions.

DOJ_NMG_0083719

In contrast to the jawboning about production cuts that has been going on for the past three weeks, this plan emerged from an emergency meeting in the Qatari capital of Doha and had the crucial support of Saudi Arabia, the biggest producer in the group.

Qatar's energy minister, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, announced the decision after a late-night session and said that the production cuts would take effect Nov. 1 and be shared by all OPEC members except Iraq, but he did not say how the cuts would be allocated among the members, a key issue.

Earlier as he arrived for the meeting, Saudi Arabia's Oil Minister Ali al-Naimi threw his support behind a 1 million-barrel-a-day cut in production. "We're trying to get the market back to its normal equilibrium and the price will take care of itself," he told reporters in the Qatari capital. Prices have fallen from a peak of $78.40 a barrel in July to just under $60 a barrel recently.

Many analysts remained doubtful that the 11-member group could agree on how to divvy up the production cuts or whether it could avoid cheating by members even if they did reach an agreement. With prices high, the incentive for members to cheat is also high.

"Talk is cheap, oil isn't," said Fadel Gheit, oil analyst with Oppenheimer & Co. He said that OPEC members "never thought in their most optimistic forecasts that oil prices would be as high for as long as they have been. For them to have a knee-jerk reaction to $60 oil doesn't make sense."

Before the final agreement was announced, crude oil prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange closed at $58.50 a barrel, up 85 cents, for November delivery.

But other analysts said that OPEC's move would have an impact. Even if the cuts fall short of the stated target, "clearly cuts are on the way, and just at the moment when demand for crude oil is about to skyrocket" because of the start of the winter heating season, said Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers. Morse said he was surprised that Saudi Arabia agreed to publicly cut production just before the U.S. elections. "OPEC doesn't like to see the market betting against it and clearly felt the need to act to change the psychology of the marketplace," he said.

It remained unclear what price level OPEC is trying to support. As prices have risen, so too have the cartel members' expectations. Though down about 25 percent from its July peak, the price of crude oil is still high by historical standards. Just four years ago, OPEC had a target range of $22 to $28 a barrel. Now many members talk about supporting a price of $55 a barrel. (OPEC's oil basket usually carries a slightly lower value than the higher quality oil used as a benchmark on spot markets.)

Higher oil revenues have political as well as economic implications. Oil dollars have helped bankroll Venezuela's efforts to spread its influence in South America, Iran's assistance to Hezbollah and the United Arab Emirates' glittering new buildings. Virtually all OPEC members have boosted spending to contain domestic social pressures.

In Saudi Arabia, where there is a rapidly growing underemployed labor force, high petroleum prices in 2005 helped double the central banks' foreign asset holdings; they also fueled 6.6 percent growth and a budget surplus equal to 18.4 percent of gross domestic product despite a sharp increase in government spending, according to an International Monetary Fund report in August. This year, average oil prices have been higher.

Saudi support is crucial for any effective OPEC cut. The kingdom accounts for nearly 30 percent of OPEC output and it is the group's swing producer. But within OPEC, it is also considered a moderate on pricing, preferring a stable price to a volatile one that might encourage too many alternative energy projects. Most traders believe that Saudi Arabia will shoulder about half the burden of OPEC's actual cuts. Bloomberg News reported that before the meeting, Naimi said: "What is 33 percent of 1 million -- that is an excellent number."

One issue the group has faced as it has negotiated over how to implement the 1.2 million-barrel-a-day cut is whether to calculate the cut from members' actual production or from their quotas, the production ceilings that were established by mutual agreement years ago and have been suspended. Kuwait, Algeria and Libya have expanded production beyond their old quotas. Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia are already producing far less than their quotas. Naimi said as he arrived for the meeting that cuts should come out of current production; Iran's oil minister, Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh, said in a statement on the ministry's Web site that cuts should be calculated from quotas, Bloomberg News reported. Last night, the Qatari minister, Attiyah, said the cuts would be from current production.

DOJ_NMG_0083720

A senior European oil trader and consultant said yesterday that he doubted that OPEC could implement more than half a million barrels a day of output cuts, though he said even that might be enough to stabilize oil prices.

Without ceremony, Saudi Arabia has already trimmed its production in recent months. Its output has been reduced from 9.5 million barrels a day in the spring to 9.1 million barrels a day currently. Most of the reduction has been in low-quality crude oil that is difficult to refine and less sought after. Further reductions would probably be in this area, oil traders said.

OPEC has a regularly scheduled meeting in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, on Dec. 14. Ministers said they would review market conditions then, and cut further if necessary to prop up prices.

For the big oil companies, high prices remain welcome news. Doug Leggate, oil analyst at Citigroup Inc., said, "For the [producing] companies in this sector, the ExxonMobils, they are printing money at these prices."

The Petroleum Paradox (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Exactly three months ago, as oil prices touched $78.40 a barrel, people wondered where the ceiling was. Investment dollars flowed into a raft of alternative energy projects, and famous oilman T. Boone Pickens talked about $100-a-barrel crude oil and $4-a-gallon gasoline.

Since then, oil prices have dropped 25 percent, to $58.57 a barrel, leaving people to speculate about where the price floor is. OPEC ministers are fretting, some hedge funds are losing billions of dollars on bad market bets, and Pickens now mumbles about $70-a-barrel crude oil. Others are talking about half that price.

These wide-swinging cycles have long characterized oil markets, and the resulting uncertainty has served to discourage some of the big-money, long-term investments in new drilling, more-efficient refining techniques or alternative energy sources that could more easily meet growing demand. Now that prices have pulled back from the $70 range that held for much of the past year, industry watchers are worried that the urgency to invest in new supply may dissipate.

"Only high prices can turn around two decades of sluggish investment in exploration, production and refining capacity," said Leonardo Maugeri, author of "The Age of Oil" and senior vice president for strategy at the Italian oil giant ENI SpA. That is, the only cure for high oil prices is a high oil price.

Suddenly, the talk of the oil-producing countries is how to prop up prices, not how to ease the supply squeeze and calm political tensions that had kept oil prices stubbornly high. Yesterday the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries held an emergency meeting to negotiate production cuts. But energy experts put little faith in OPEC's efforts to hold the line on supply and prices; rather, the experts are bracing themselves for the downward whoosh of another boom-and-bust cycle.

"When you're told that 'this time is different,' that is usually the time for warning bells to go off," said Daniel Yergin, author of a history of the oil industry called "The Prize" and chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "There's no reason to think that cycles have been abolished."

OPEC produces about 40 percent of the world's 85.4 million barrels a day of oil. Despite OPEC's new commitment to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day, the politics of the organization -- such as the traditional rivalry between Iran and Saudi Arabia or the need in populous Venezuela and Nigeria to keep up revenue to contain domestic social pressures -- make it hard for members to agree on how to share the burden of output cuts. So far, international oil traders seem unimpressed by the countries' efforts. Prices remain quiescent.

No major company has yet backed off investment plans announced when oil was $20 a barrel higher.

ConocoPhillips Co. and EnCana Corp. are still planning to spend the $10 billion they announced this month to tap and refine thick Canadian tar sands. Cambridge Energy Research Associates estimates that a new Canadian tar sands project needs oil prices of at least $35 a barrel to be profitable, much more than most conventional oil projects.

Chevron Corp. and its partners are still committed to tapping oil reserves in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, where they paid more than $100 million to drill a single exploratory well. Oil firms are also circling reserves in deep water off Angola, where their investments will pay off if oil costs as little as $20 to $30 a barrel.

DOJ_NMG_0083721

At this point, oil costs are still high enough for these investments to make sense. "This price is the level we had just four or five months ago. This is not a collapse," said Doug Leggate, oil analyst at Citigroup Inc. "A collapse is $20 oil. This is a pullback."

Earlier this year, BP PLC chief executive John P. Browne said that his planners expected prices to drop no lower than $40 a barrel and that the company will therefore continue exploration and investments that would be profitable at that price.

Though experts agree that wide swings will persist in the oil markets, some think the price floors will never reach, say, $20 a barrel, last seen in March 2002. "We have to face the fact that prices are rising," said James R. Schlesinger, former secretary of defense, secretary of energy and CIA director and now head of a Council on Foreign Relations task force that warned this week that oil dependency is compromising U.S. foreign policy. "There is an illusion in the body politic that we can go back to an era of cheap oil, and that's just not feasible."

Some analysts think prices will stay high because there's only a limited amount of oil in the ground and production has peaked. Even those who disagree think much of the "easy oil" is gone. Yergin said oil supplies will keep pace with demand and increase to 110 million barrels a day by 2015. He said that because of high prices, "nontraditional liquids" -- oil sands, ultra-deep water and liquid fuels produced from natural gas -- will be a bigger portion of that total.

Investors in alternative energy supplies have also been lured by high prices. Some of these projects can be profitable at lower price levels. One executive in search of funding claims his firm can turn organic waste into ethanol for less than $1 a gallon. Other projects -- including wind, solar and hydrogen -- depend on continued high prices.

"Fuel prices can slip and put a lot of people out of business," Richard Branson, the British music and airline tycoon, said last Friday in Washington. Branson has said he will invest $3 billion in other fuels, such as ethanol. If oil prices fall, he said, "I have an advantage because I'm in the airline business. At least I can balance the books by saving money for my trains and planes." Others might not be so lucky.

World oil demand can also alter the long-term dynamics of the market -- and it's another unknown factor. After the 1979 spike in oil prices, energy use fell much more than conventional wisdom thought possible. Now analysts are trying to measure the impact of more than a year of high prices. The International Energy Agency says global oil demand will be 84.6 million barrels a day this year, a bit lower than the agency's earlier forecasts but still up 1.2 percent from last year. The increase is driven almost entirely by China and the Middle East; consumption in the developed countries belonging to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development declined. The IEA expects world demand to rise 1.7 percent next year.

"The real change is long term," Yergin said. "When people buy their next car, what do they buy? Fuel economy, which had fallen off the charts, is very much back on the charts now." Yergin notes that after the 1979 spike in oil prices, it took five to seven years for consumer responses to fully show up.

"It comes down to what this does to turnover of the nation's basic capital stock, from cars to factories," he said. "At a certain point, you notice and you start reengineering your factories. I think that's what's happened here."

Raise The Gas Tax (WSJ)

By N. Gregory Mankiw

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

With the midterm election around the corner, here's a wacky idea you won't often hear from our elected leaders: We should raise the tax on gasoline. Not quickly, but substantially. I would like to see Congress increase the gas tax by $1 per gallon, phased in gradually by 10 cents per year over the next decade. Campaign consultants aren't fond of this kind of proposal, but policy wonks keep pushing for it. Here's why:

The environment. The burning of gasoline emits several pollutants. These include carbon dioxide, a cause of global warming. Higher gasoline taxes, perhaps as part of a broader carbon tax, would be the most direct and least invasive policy to address environmental concerns.

Road congestion. Every time I am stuck in traffic, I wish my fellow motorists would drive less, perhaps by living closer to where they work or by taking public transport. A higher gas tax would give all of us the incentive to do just that, reducing congestion on streets and highways.

DOJ_NMG_0083722

Regulatory relief. Congress has tried to reduce energy dependence with corporate average fuel economy standards. These CAFE rules are heavy-handed government regulations replete with unintended consequences: They are partly responsible for the growth of SUVs, because light trucks have laxer standards than cars. In addition, by making the car fleet more fuel-efficient, the regulations encourage people to drive more, offsetting some of the conservation benefits and exacerbating road congestion. A higher gas tax would accomplish everything CAFE standards do, but without the adverse side effects.

The budget. Everyone who has studied the numbers knows that the federal budget is on an unsustainable path. When baby-boomers retire and become eligible for Social Security and Medicare, either benefits for the elderly will have to be cut or taxes raised. The most likely political compromise will include some of each. A $1 per gallon hike in gas tax would bring in $100 billion a year in government revenue and make a dent in the looming fiscal gap.

Tax incidence. A basic principle of tax analysis -- taught in most freshman economics courses -- is that the burden of a tax is shared by consumer and producer. In this case, as a higher gas tax discouraged oil consumption, the price of oil would fall in world markets. As a result, the price of gas to consumers would rise by less than the increase in the tax. Some of the tax would in effect be paid by Saudi Arabia and Venezuela.

Economic growth. Public finance experts have long preached that consumption taxes are better than income taxes for long-run economic growth, because income taxes discourage saving and investment. Gas is a component of consumption. An increased reliance on gas taxes over income taxes would make the tax code more favorable to growth. It would also encourage firms to devote more R&D spending to the search for gasoline substitutes.

National security. Alan Greenspan called for higher gas taxes recently. "It's a national security issue," he said. It is hard to judge how much high oil consumption drives U.S. involvement in Middle Eastern politics. But Mr. Greenspan may well be right that the gas tax is an economic policy with positive spillovers to foreign affairs.

Is it conceivable that the policy wonks will ever win the battle with the campaign consultants? I think it is. Even after a $1 hike, the U.S. gas tax would still be less than half the level in, say, Great Britain, which last I checked is still a democracy. But don't expect those vying for office to come around until the American people recognize that while higher gas taxes are unattractive, the alternatives are even worse.

Mr. Mankiw, a professor at Harvard, was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers from 2003 to 2005.

Police: Motorist Who Struck Officer Is 2nd Circuit Judge (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 20, 2006

A popular city police officer was fighting for his life Thursday after being hit by a sport utility vehicle driven by a federal judge, New Haven, Conn., police said.

Officer Dan Picagli, a 17-year veteran of the force, was hit while working an extra-duty job directing traffic in the rain Tuesday night in a dimly lit section of Chapel Street.

He had on a black raincoat, and Police Chief Francisco Ortiz said Thursday that he was wearing a reflective vest. Ortiz described Picagli's injuries as life-threatening.

City officials identified the driver of the SUV that hit Picagli as John M. Walker Jr., a judge on the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, who lives in Connecticut and maintains court chambers in New Haven. They said he was leaving work when the accident happened.

Ortiz said a long investigation will be required to determine what happened, but police did not feel it was necessary to test Walker for drugs or alcohol.

"He's cooperating," Ortiz said. "He's also very much distraught over what occurred."

Walker, 65, voluntarily stepped down as chief judge Oct. 1 and took the status of senior judge, said spokeswoman Karen Milton, circuit executive for the appeals court.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with the police officer and his family, and we pray for his full recovery," Milton said.

The 2nd Circuit handles federal court appeals from New York, Connecticut and Vermont.

DOJ_NMG_0083723

Picagli, 38, was the school resource officer at Fair Haven Middle School and later spent time with the department's youth-oriented policing unit.

He currently oversees the Board of Young Adult Police Commissioners and the Police Athletic League, where he organizes athletic camps for city children.

Confusion Reigns Over Safety Tester's Approval Of E85 Fuel Station Pumps (USAT)

By Justin Hyde, The Detroit Free Press

USA Today, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Underwriters Laboratories, the product-safety testing group, said on Thursday that it has no timetable for approving E85 systems for filling stations, an issue that's created confusion around the country and could slow the spread of ethanol fuel.

A UL listing is a requirement for filling stations under most fire codes. But on Oct. 5, UL said it was suspending its listings for any fuel system that handles E85, a blend of 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline.

John Drengenberg, UL's manager of consumer affairs, said the group had certified some parts of a fueling system as acceptable for alternative fuels, but it didn't take a close look at E85 until May, when a supplier applied for a UL listing for an entire "dispenser" — the pump and nozzle you park next to for refueling.

The lack of the UL seal for fuel pumps carrying E85 means that most of the roughly 1,000 stations that carry it likely violate fire codes. It also means that in most states, stations that want to install E85 pumps will need waivers from local or state fire marshals.

No safety problems with E85 pumps have been reported. UL's decision applies only to pumps that sell fuels containing more than 15% ethanol.

So far, two E85 stations in Columbus, Ohio, have been closed because of a lack of a UL listing.

Drengenberg said that as UL began to examine the system, it realized it needed more information about how ethanol reacts over long periods of time with parts made from some metals.

"We looked at it very carefully, and we found this issue of the corrosiveness of ethanol," Drengenberg said. "We're going to hold back until we get all the questions that came into our minds answered."

He said UL understands the demand for E85 pumps and is moving quickly.

Nearly all current E85 pumps were converted from gasoline, and while some components had UL listings for ethanol, many companies sold parts that had been UL-listed for gas, then upgraded to handle ethanol.

Robert Renkes of the Petroleum Equipment Institute, which represents 1,600 companies that supply fueling stations, said the UL decision puts pressure on local officials to decide whether to allow new stations.

Ruling Is Due For Justice Who Lobbied For Bush Pick (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 18 — A year after the Bush administration enlisted a Texas Supreme Court justice in its unsuccessful bid to put Harriet E. Miers on the United States Supreme Court, a special state court is to announce Friday whether the judge was guilty of "willful and persistent" violations of judicial ethics for his role in that effort.

The justice, Nathan L. Hecht, 57, the longest-serving member of the Texas high court and a friend of Ms. Miers for 30 years, testified before the State Commission on Judicial Conduct that he had given about 120 interviews to reporters in which he promoted her nomination.

Justice Hecht, a Republican who is running for re-election, also said he had reported back to the White House on questions he was asked about Ms. Miers, President Bush's longtime counsel.

Justice Hecht was widely portrayed in news reports as Ms. Miers's "spokesman." Defending himself before commission members, he said he had been swept up in a "tsunami" of news coverage. "I felt I was drawn kicking and screaming into the process," he testified.

But under questioning, he acknowledged, "Nobody forced me."

DOJ_NMG_0083724

Justice Hecht also told the commission that he had been advancing a public interest in Ms. Miers's nomination, that she was not a candidate for elective office and that he was entitled to free speech.

But the commission, citing rules it said had been devised by Justice Hecht's own court, argued that the judge had improperly lent the prestige of his office to advance someone else's "private interests," illegally used his name to endorse "another candidate" for "public office," and violated the State Constitution by conduct discrediting the judiciary.

Texas judges themselves had asked for the prohibition against political endorsements to fend off requests from fellow party candidates. Judges in Texas run for election on party lines.

The commission decided in May that the justice's actions on behalf of the White House and Ms. Miers merited a public admonition, the lightest form of reprimand, which carries no criminal or civil consequences.

But Justice Hecht sought to overturn the sanction by appealing to a Special Court of Review, which is randomly selected by the Texas Supreme Court, the nine-member bench on which Justice Hecht has served since 1989. The Texas Supreme Court has final authority over civil and juvenile delinquency cases; the Court of Criminal Appeals has ultimate jurisdiction over criminal cases.

In an unusual move, the special court — two state appellate judges from Dallas and one from El Paso — had announced this month that it would release its ruling at a court hearing and news conference in Fort Worth on Oct. 23. But this week it said instead that it would notify the parties by fax on Friday. No explanation was given for the change.

Mark L. Greenwald, a special counsel for the commission, said that if the court dismissed the admonition against the judge, "I would hope the commission would appeal it, to get the United States Supreme Court on board." An appeal from a ruling by a special review court can be made only to the nation's highest court.

Mr. Greenwald said the minimal reprimand sought by the commission translated to "please don't do that again."

Charles L. Babcock, a lawyer representing Justice Hecht, said the judge had an unblemished record and was set on vindication. "He's a candidate for re-election," Mr. Babcock said. Even the admonition, he said, "has a very nasty effect."

The justice's appeal was supported in friend of the court briefs submitted by the Republican Party of Texas and the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation of Texas.

In testimony to the Special Court of Review in August, Justice Hecht traced the start of his involvement in Ms. Miers's nomination to a call from President Bush's senior adviser, Karl Rove, on Oct. 1, 2005, two days before Mr. Bush announced his choice to fill the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Justice Hecht told the court that Mr. Rove had asked him to talk to callers about Ms. Miers's "faith, about her religious background," and that the group included James C. Dobson, a conservative leader and founder of Focus on the Family.

Justice Hecht said he also answered news media queries, which he said were so numerous that he was asked to report back to a White House aide on the nature of the questions.

He conceded to the court that he told one reporter, "I'm a P.R. office for the White House," but he later called that a joke.

Justice Hecht said he had considered the Code of Judicial Conduct during his campaign in support of Ms. Miers's nomination but did not think he was in violation of it. That opinion, he said, was reinforced by two senior appellate judges with whom he conferred.

The evidence Mr. Greenwald presented to the special review court included a television interview in which Justice Hecht vouched for Ms. Miers as an opponent of abortion, citing her attendance at "a church that is — takes an open pro-life stance." He also said of Ms. Miers: "She is very charming, of course. Everybody says gracious, but also very determined."

Mr. Greenwald told the court the case was "Shakespearean." Faulting Justice Hecht, he said, "The very individual who is part of that process of making sure that the rules and canons are in compliance with the law, being charged with violating that canon."

Mr. Babcock, Justice Hecht's lawyer, said he agreed that the case was Shakespearean but for different reasons.

"Imagine the senior-most appellate justice of this state being sanctioned for speaking truthful speech on a matter of public importance that is core speech in our democracy," he said. "Tragedy, true. Comedy tonight, perhaps."

Bush Campaigns For 2 Lawmakers Caught Up In Controversy (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0083725

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa., Oct. 19 — It is not every day that a United States president visits this tiny farm and quarry town of 603 residents, where the "breaking news" story discussed on local radio Thursday was about two men caught breaking deer-hunting laws.

And it is certainly not every day that the current president stumps on behalf of a fellow party member fighting for his political life after recently admitting to an extramarital affair — but denying his mistress's accusation of abuse — in a usually reliable Republican township here in northeastern Pennsylvania. In fact, it can safely be said that this president has never before done so.

But President Bush did come here on Thursday to lend crucial support to Representative Don Sherwood, whose confessed infidelity has put his House seat into jeopardy. And far from seeming to hold his nose, Mr. Bush strongly embraced Mr. Sherwood, firmly shaking his hand as they stood on the stage, smiling for the flashing cameras, and then telling supporters, with gusto, "I'm pleased to be here with Don Sherwood: he is the right man to represent the people of the 10th Congressional District from the state of Pennsylvania."

The president also accompanied Mr. Sherwood; his wife, Carol and his daughter Maria to a local ice cream shop, ushering photographers over to take a picture of him with the Sherwoods, "a little family-style, eating ice cream."

The appearance with Mr. Sherwood, at Keystone College, was the first of two stops that added up to a sort of Double Trouble Tour for Mr. Bush, who went from here to Richmond, Va., to a fund-raiser for Senator George Allen, who has been accused of using racially insensitive language and who has appeared to bristle at the recent revelation that his mother was born Jewish.

Democrats on Thursday cast the presidential visits as signs of anxiety at the White House and among national Republicans in this election year, mockingly calling it part of "Character Counts Week" in e-mail to reporters.

Local liberals, however, found it none too surprising.

"That's how desperate he is to keep this one seat that he would actually support this man," said Chris Darko, 49, who was one of dozens of people who turned out to protest the war in Iraq, and had to take black electrical tape off her mouth to speak. (It was worn to protest the United States' treatment of terrorism suspects, she said.)

But the White House said it was living up to commitments made to candidates who still had the president's support, though Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, declined Thursday to address directly the specific controversies involving Mr. Sherwood and Mr. Allen.

"The president understands it's important to set high standards," Mr. Snow told reporters. "But the other thing the president is doing is he's going to go out and let the candidates speak for themselves on this."

Mr. Bush did not dodge the issue of the Sherwoods' marriage, going so far as to refer to a letter that Carol Sherwood sent to constituents over the weekend — and that easily made its way to local newspapers — chiding her husband's Democratic opponent, Chris Carney, for mentioning the affair in a commercial.

"Private humiliation is one thing to endure," Ms. Sherwood wrote. "But to be repeatedly, publicly humiliated is quite another."

Mr. Bush turned to her on the stage, where she sat smiling, and said, "I read Carol Sherwood's letter to the citizens of this Congressional district. I was deeply moved by her words."

The president moved on to what he said were the two issues that mattered the most this campaign year, taxes and terrorism, beginning what may have been his strongest attack against Democrats so far this campaign season.

"As this campaign gets closer to the stretch," he said, "you will hear a lot of rhetoric and a lot of partisan charges coming from the other side. Their goal is to distract you from the two main issues in this campaign."

The White House did not make it easy for reporters to come here and report on his message. They were offered no directions and no charter plane to get to La Plume — far from Washington. White House officials said that was because the White House Correspondents Association, which organizes press transportation, did not ask for a plane, concluding that even with one, reporters could not catch both events.

Steven Scully, president of the association, said that was true, but he found fault with the scheduling by the White House. "They certainly weren't making it easy for us to get up there; there's no question about that," Mr. Scully said.

DOJ_NMG_0083726

At least this event was open to the press, he noted — unlike many others on Mr. Bush's campaign schedule. And members of the news media were also invited to Mr. Allen's event, to which the White House did offer directions.

At the Virginia event, Mr. Bush did not talk about the problems that have arisen in Mr. Allen's campaign, calling the senator a "good man of strong principles" while focusing most of his remarks on tax cuts and the economy.

Outside the event, several hundred protesters drummed while chanting "Allen is a racist" and "Impeach Bush."

Bush Campaigns For Pa., Va. Candidates (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 20, 2006

President Bush campaigned Thursday for a congressman who has confessed to adultery and a senator accused of racial insensitivity, seeking to boost incumbent Republicans once safe for re-election but now in peril.

Bush's appearances for Rep. Don Sherwood here and for Sen. George Allen in Richmond, Va., found the White House on the defensive over the decision to try to help candidates in such straits as the GOP struggles to keep control of Congress.

"I think the president understands that it's important to set high standards," said spokesman Tony Snow.

Bush, whose low approval ratings and identification with the unpopular war in Iraq has caused some Republicans to see him as a liability, tried to keep the focus on his contentions that Democrats would go soft on the war on terror and raise taxes if handed a majority in the November elections.

But the pictures of the day were of Bush descending from Air Force One in Pennsylvania alongside Sherwood, his wife and one of their daughters, who were secreted onto the plane to set up the photo-op, and of the grinning foursome's appearance later at a local farmer's ice cream store.

Allen opted for a slightly less robust presidential embrace, merely greeting Bush at the bottom of his airplane's stairs and keeping a bit of a distance on their pumpkin-buying stop at a roadside stand. Sticking closely by Allen's side throughout was state Sen. Benjamin Lambert, who is black and a Democrat who has endorsed the GOP senator.

Sherwood has held one of the safest seats in Congress, his conservatism playing well in his heavily Republican, rural district in northeastern Pennsylvania. Democrats didn't even bother fielding a candidate in the past two elections. But last year, Sherwood admitted to a five-year extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior. He settled a lawsuit that claimed he had choked her — he has denied he abused her — and has aired a campaign commercial asking constituents to forgive his infidelity.

Helping to raise more than $300,000 for Sherwood, Bush only obliquely addressed the controversy.

He praised Sherwood as "the right man to represent" his district, because of policy positions ranging from taxes to Iraq to highway money. Bush then offered effusive admiration for Sherwood's wife, Carol, who sat beaming beside her husband on the dais behind the president after mostly staying out of view during the campaign.

Bush called her a "caring and courageous woman" because of a letter she wrote to constituents over the weekend, in which she denounced Sherwood's opponent, Democrat Chris Carney, for airing campaign ads about the affair.

The president's main message at the event was that the Iraq war is part of the broader anti-terrorism effort.

He warned ominously that Democratic control of Congress would result in a chairman of the House tax-writing committee who would cut off funding for troops in Iraq and a House speaker, referring to now-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who voted against a string of bills: renewing the Patriot Act, creating a Homeland Security Department, waging the Iraq war and authorizing a warrantless wiretapping program.

"Given the record of Democrats on our nation's security, I understand why they want to change the subject," Bush said.

Responded Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider: "Clearly, the president is getting desperate to keep his rubber-stamp Republican Congress if all he can do is try to scare the American people with false claims."

Later, scooping about $500,000 into Allen's campaign account, Bush switched his emphasis to the other pillar of his campaign-trail speeches: that Democrats would preside over an economically damaging increase in taxes on American families and businesses.

The president took the unusual tack of using a Democrat from yesteryear to ridicule the Democrats of today, pointing to President Kennedy's proposal upon taking office to cut taxes across the board, including on capital gains.

DOJ_NMG_0083727

"John F. Kennedy was right in 1963 and George Allen and I are right in 2006," Bush said.

The troubles of Sherwood and Allen have made them two of the GOP's more-endangered candidates as the parties head into midterm elections less than three weeks away.

Allen, once considered a potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, is in a now-tightened race with Democratic challenger Jim Webb. Allen has spent weeks battling the fallout from a series of missteps that started when he used what is sometimes regarded as a racial slur against at Webb campaign staffer of Indian descent. Bush made no mention of Allen's troubles.

Webb, gaining ground in polls and on the incumbent's financial advantage, is drawing help from national Democrats. On Thursday, former President Clinton was also in Virginia, raising money for Webb at the home of former Sen. Charles Robb.

Last week, White House press secretary Snow was in the position of defending Sherwood as a sinner who, like everyone else, is in need of forgiveness and Allen as "not a bigot."

On Thursday, Snow said the president had not changed his mind on either of those points — though he declined to repeat them — and insisted there was no downside to campaigning for the two troubled Republicans.

Anti-war protests awaited Bush at both fundraisers, with the larger and more boisterous crowd in Richmond yelling "Impeach Bush" as his limousine pulled up.

Lawmakers Mired In Gaffes, Scandal Get Help From Bush (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa. -- It is a sign of how bad Republicans' problems are that President Bush, this close to the election, had to stump yesterday for two men who should have locked up their re-election months ago but are facing difficult campaigns because of scandal or mistakes.

Mr. Bush first campaigned for a Pennsylvania congressman who admitted to a five-year affair with a staffer half his age, though Rep. Don Sherwood has denied her charges that he tried to strangle her.

The president then flew to Virginia to campaign with Sen. George Allen, whose verbal gaffes have left him fighting for political survival against Democrat James H. Webb Jr.

Mr. Bush didn't refer to Mr. Allen's gaffes, which included using the word "macaca" -- considered a racial slur in some cultures -- to refer to an Indian American staffer from Mr. Webb's campaign. But in Pennsylvania he did refer to Mr. Sherwood's affair.

He noted that Carol Sherwood, the congressman's wife, had written an open letter over the weekend about the campaign and said he "was deeply moved by her words."

In the letter, Mrs. Sherwood said she has decided not to "dwell on" her husband's infidelity, and she accused his opponent, Democrat Chris Carney, of exploiting the issue.

"Perhaps Carney gets some pleasure out of hurting our family, or maybe that's what he thinks will make him a winner," she wrote.

Democrats said Mr. Bush's appearances yesterday were amusing given that last weekend he had proclaimed this as "Character Counts Week."

"It is no surprise that President Bush is celebrating Character Counts Week by campaigning today for two ethically challenged Republican incumbents," said Stacie Paxton, press secretary for the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. Carney said Mr. Bush "chose empty partisan rhetoric instead of addressing the realities facing our nation."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush had no hesitation about campaigning for both men. Mr. Snow said last week that Mr. Bush does not think Mr. Allen is a bigot. Mr. Snow also said the president believes everyone sins, noting that Mr. Sherwood has asked for forgiveness.

In 2004, Mr. Bush captured 60 percent of the vote for president in Mr. Sherwood's district, and he won Virginia by eight percentage points over Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0083728

Yesterday's campaigning was a study in the power of the presidency to sway elections, particularly when in territory friendly to him. He emerged from Air Force One in Pennsylvania with Mr. Sherwood, his wife and their daughter Maria, and all of them paused for photos at the top of the stairway.

Mr. Bush then got maximum exposure in the district, taking a 30-minute motorcade route from the airport to the event and a different route back. Hundreds of supporters turned out to watch the motorcade. Mr. Bush also made a stop at an ice-cream store on the return trip, where he mugged for photos and gathered the Sherwoods around him inside the shop for what he called "family-style" ice-cream eating.

In Virginia, Mr. Bush stopped at a pumpkin patch with Mr. Allen along the motorcade route. Asked by the press during the stop about his campaigning for the two men, Mr. Bush demurred, saying instead that he was focused on getting a pumpkin for his wife, Laura.

Bush Makes House Calls On 2 Ailing GOP Candidates (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Don Sherwood shouldn't have needed President Bush's help in his reelection campaign. Sen. George Allen shouldn't have, either.

But there was Bush on Thursday, first in the small town of La Plume, Pa., and then in Richmond, Va., raising money and rousing the faithful — each appearance illustrating the difficulties Republicans face as they seek to hold on to what in the past have been safe seats.

Sherwood won 92% of the vote in his northeastern Pennsylvania district two years ago, just as he did two years before that, each time with no Democratic opposition. Allen, a former governor of Virginia seeking a second Senate term, only a few weeks ago was anticipating a run for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination.

Now, each presents unique challenges to the Republican Party as it tries to keep its majorities in Congress on Nov. 7: Sherwood is trying to survive a race in which accusations that the long-married lawmaker tried to choke his much younger mistress have become a central focus. Allen has committed a series of miscues that have raised suggestions of racism and efforts to hide his Jewish heritage.

Each race has put Bush in the awkward position of lending the prestige of the presidency to a candidate whose personal or political conduct is difficult to defend.

But that's just what he did, using the symbols of his office — and, in the case of Sherwood, an ice cream parlor — to convey his support.

Sherwood, accompanied by his wife, Carol, and daughter Maria, flew to Pennsylvania with Bush, offering a portrait of family togetherness as they stepped off Air Force One at the Wilkes-Barre-Scranton airport.

After a fundraising reception at Keystone College, they stopped for five minutes at Manning Ice Cream & Milk in Clarks Summit. The president made sure the message was clear; he told photographers to record "a little family-style, eating ice cream," according to a pool report from Bush's motorcade.

In between, the president used the example set by Carol Sherwood to bolster the case for her husband's reelection. Responding to commercials raising the adultery issue by the Democratic candidate, college professor Chris Carney, she wrote in a mass mailing last weekend to district voters: "I am certainly not condoning the mistake Don made, but I am not going to dwell on it either…. We do not believe in flogging dead horses or living in the past. It is time to move on, and that is exactly what we are trying to do."

"I'm glad Carol's here with us today," Bush said at the reception, which the Republican National Committee said raised $375,000. "I read Carol Sherwood's letter…. I was deeply moved by her words. Carol's letter shows what a caring and courageous woman she is."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, who said Oct. 13 that Bush would stick to his commitments to campaign for Sherwood and Allen, was not quite as effusive Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0083729

Asked whether Bush had concerns, "personally and morally" about the controversies swirling about the two candidates, Snow said: "I'm just not going to comment on it."

Democrats gleefully pointed out that Bush was campaigning for Sherwood and Allen in the midst of what he declared Oct. 13 as "National Character Counts Week."

Sherwood's problems became public in May 2005, when the Wilkes-Barre Times Leader newspaper reported that District of Columbia police had responded to a 911 call from his Capitol Hill apartment the previous September. The woman who placed the call initially said Sherwood had choked her but then withdrew the complaint. In November, Sherwood settled a lawsuit she had filed, accusing him of physical abuse, after admitting a five-year affair.

Allen's difficulties emerged over several weeks this summer and autumn: During a rally, he referred to his opponent's dark-skinned campaign worker as "macaca"; he was reported to have repeatedly used a racial slur when referring to African Americans in the late 1970s; and he wrestled awkwardly with the disclosure that his mother's parents were Jewish.

At the Richmond fundraiser, which Republicans said brought in $530,000, Bush did not directly address the issues that have brought Allen into a tight race against former Navy Secretary Jim Webb, for whom former President Clinton was campaigning during the day.

Bush Boosts Allen Campaign, Even As Allen Nuances Pro-war Stance (AP)

By BOB LEWIS And MATTHEW BARAKAT

Associated Press, October 20, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) -- Sen. George Allen welcomed fundraising help Thursday from a visit by President Bush even as the senator distanced himself from Bush's tough stance on an increasingly deadly Iraq.

Allen's Democratic rival, Jim Webb, joined former President Clinton later Thursday at a fundraiser in McLean where they dismissed Bush's hawkish talk as more Republican scare tactics.

With polls showing little support for the war and poor numbers for Bush, even in conservative Virginia, the president is nevertheless campaigning nationally for sustaining American troop strength in Iraq until its fledgling government can control the sectarian carnage that threatens to spread into a civil war.

In Bush's speech to Allen supporters, he said that the best way to protect Americans is to stay on the offensive. He criticized Democrats' opposition to an indefinite military occupation in Iraq.

"That's why they're the party of cut and run," Bush said. "That's why the United States will stand with our allies in Iraq.

"We will give our military leaders the flexibility they need to win this war. We will stay and we will fight and we will win in Iraq," he said as Allen stood beside him, smiling broadly but saying nothing.

Allen has steadfastly backed Bush on the war, but when asked by reporters after Bush departed the fundraiser whether he still shares the president's hard line, Allen was evasive.

"I have my position based on my own assessment of Iraq," Allen said.

"The situation in Iraq is tough. Progress has been too slow. I think we do need to adapt to face this evolving threat that we find from the terrorists," he said.

Allen, over the past two weeks, has nuanced his position closer to that of fellow Virginia Republican Sen. John W. Warner, who returned from Iraq with a bleak assessment of the increasing death toll. Unless Iraq's government can function soon, Warner said in a news conference with Allen, the United States may have to consider changing its course.

"The president has his ideas on Iraq, John Warner has his and I have mine," Allen said Thursday.

Clinton, at a fundraiser for about 375 Webb backers at the home of Democratic former Sen. Chuck Robb in the Washington, D.C., suburbs, said the public is weary of the Iraq politics Bush used successfully in 2004.

Republicans "won two elections by skin-teeth by scaring people and dividing them up. But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times," Clinton said. "It's kind of mangy dog right now."

"Look at Jim Webb. Does he look to you like a cut-and-run kind of guy?" he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083730

Iraq has dominated Webb's candidacy. He warned in 2002, before the invasion, of a protracted military quagmire in Iraq that would destabilize the Middle East. Webb cited the war and other Bush policies for leaving the GOP. Six years ago, Webb not only endorsed Bush and Allen, he called Clinton's two terms "the most corrupt" in modern history.

Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran, said his differences with Clinton were over the Vietnam War, which Clinton opposed as young man.

"On 9/11, that wall came down for me. I lost my anger about Vietnam," Webb said with Clinton at his side.

Earlier Thursday, Webb said he hoped his appearance with Clinton would be viewed as "a measure of reconciliation and understanding."

Clinton joked about Webb's criticism from six years ago.

"If I only supported people who didn't criticize me, I'd have no one to support," Clinton said.

More than 100 anti-Bush protesters gathered across the street from the fundraiser for about 250 people at the Science Museum of Virginia. Most protesters held signs or wore T-shirts against the Iraq war. Some Allen donors walked nervously through the gauntlet of activists.

Both campaigns estimated that their fundraisers would generate at least $500,000 come they approach the home stretch of the race and throttle up their media campaigns to well in excess of $1 million a week.

Allen on Thursday picked up the endorsement of the National Black Farmers Association and its president, John Boyd, who unsuccessfully ran for a Virginia congressional seat as a Democrat in 2000.

Boyd praised Allen for Senate legislation he introduced that would have provided an estimated 72,000 black farmers nationally an opportunity to have their discrimination claims heard in court.

The endorsement has added importance for Allen, who this fall has battled claims he used racist epithets in the 1970s and his use of an obscure ethnic slur against a man of Indian descent in August.

On Wednesday, Allen won the endorsement of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, even though he never served in the military and Webb was a highly decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War.

Allen also picked up the endorsement of The Washington Times in its Thursday editions.

"For Virginians who favor low taxes, strong defense, limited government and traditional values, George Allen is the clear choice," the paper wrote.

Webb, meanwhile, picked up the endorsement Thursday of the Police Benevolent Association and of the Rev. Curtis Harris of Hopewell, a contemporary of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. during the civil rights era and a national officer of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Bush Trip Raises $550,000 (RTD)

By Tyler Whitley

Richmond Times Dispatch, October 20, 2006

President George W. Bush strongly defended the war in Iraq and tax cuts last night at a fundraising reception for U.S. Sen. George Allen in Richmond.

Allen aides said $550,000 was raised for the senator's re-election campaign. At the reception, the president said of the war: "It's tough," but added "we will fight, we will stay and we will win in Iraq."

He stood beside Allen, who has begun to express doubts about the war, in the rotunda of the Science Museum of Virginia.

In two hours and 40 minutes on the ground in Richmond, Bush stopped traffic, drew protesters and even found time to stop at a roadside stand in eastern Henrico County to buy a pumpkin for his wife, Laura.

"Don't tell Laura," he joked as television cameras captured him hefting a large pumpkin at Bill Gaulmyer's farm at Millers Lane and Gay Avenue.

The Bush entourage, which included political adviser Karl Rove, flew into Richmond International Airport aboard Air Force One after Bush spoke at a fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Donald L. Sherwood of Pennsylvania. Like Allen, Sherwood faces a tough re-election battle in a political climate that is hostile to Bush and particularly to the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0083731

The presidential motorcade diverted briefly from Interstate 64 to the pumpkin patch before proceeding on to the twilight reception for Allen.

Outside the Science Museum, protesters chanting anti-Bush and anti-war slogans appeared to outnumber the guests who paid $500 to listen to Bush deliver a 31-minute speech. Other guests paid $5,000 for the chance to mingle briefly with Bush and have their photograph taken with him.

The crowd, dwarfed by the rotunda in the old train station, numbered about 225 people.

"It's a fundraiser, not a rally," said Christopher J. LaCivita, a long-time Allen adviser.

Like the president, Allen put in a pitch for tax cuts, which have become a focal point of his campaign.

Neither Bush nor Allen mentioned Allen's Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, by name, but Bush lambasted Democrats in general for wanting to raise taxes. Allen, seizing on a debate comment when Webb said the government needed more revenues, has sought to tie Webb to tax increases. Webb has said he wants to close corporate tax loopholes and reimpose a tax on wealthier estates.

Bush, hoarse from his campaign rigors, said he and Allen had something in common.

"We both are named George, and we both married smart, beautiful women," he said. Allen's wife, Susan, beamed.

Among those to greet Bush at the airport was state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a Richmond Democrat, who has drawn criticism from fellow African-Americans for backing Allen. Lambert said Allen has promised federal aid for his alma mater, Virginia Union University, and other historically black colleges.

Bush praised Lambert and Allen for reaching across party lines.

Bush credited the tax cuts he began in 2003 with starting an economic surge that has created 6.6 million new jobs in 37 months. Some Democrats fought those tax cuts every step of the way, he said.

"The best way to continue with tax relief is to send George Allen back to the Senate," Bush said.

Bush said Democrats will not be strong enough in fighting terrorists. He said many Democrats voted against reauthorization of the Patriot Act and against giving interrogators more powers to question detainees. Opponents say those powers could include torture and a suspension of constitutional rights.

Speaking of the terrorists, he said, "These people use murder to achieve their political goals, and you cannot negotiate with them."

Bush said America should stand firm in Iraq because Osama Bin Laden "thinks America is weak and that it is just a matter of time before we withdraw."

Bush, Clinton Headline Va. Fundraisers (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, October 20, 2006

President Bush criticized Democrats' opposition to an indefinite military occupation in Iraq during a fundraiser for the Republican Senate candidate Thursday, while President Clinton dismissed the comments as a scare tactic in a stop for the Democratic challenger.

The stops come as polls show the two locked in an even Senate race. Sen. George Allen appeared with Bush at the Science Museum of Virginia, while Democrat Jim Webb joined Clinton at a fundraiser at the home of Democratic former Sen. Chuck Robb.

The race is considered pivotal because a Democratic victory in once reliably Republican Virginia could signal a shift of power from the GOP to the Democrats in the Senate in the Nov. 7 midterm election.

In the speech to Allen supporters, Bush said the best way to protect Americans is to stay on the offensive. "That's why they're the party of cut and run," Bush said. "That's why the United States will stand with our allies in Iraq."

Clinton, speaking later in the evening, said the public is weary of the Iraq politics Bush used successfully in 2004. Republicans "won two elections by skin-teeth by scaring people and dividing them up. But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times," Clinton said. "It's kind of mangy dog right now."

"Look at Jim Webb. Does he look to you like a cut-and-run kind of guy?" he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083732

Allen appeared with Bush even as he has nuanced his position on Iraq in recent weeks. Allen has steadfastly backed Bush on the war, but when asked by reporters after Bush departed the fundraiser whether he still shares the president's hard line, Allen was evasive.

"I have my position based on my own assessment of Iraq," Allen said.

Allen has been campaigning with his Virginia colleague, popular Republican Sen. John Warner, who said after a recent trip to Iraq that the country was "drifting sideways" and that a change in course may be needed if Iraq fails to restore order in two or three months. Allen's spokesman, Dick Wadhams, said this week that Warner and Allen "absolutely agree" on Iraq.

Iraq has dominated Webb's candidacy. He warned before the invasion in 2002 of a protracted military quagmire in Iraq that would destabilize the Middle East. Webb cited the war and other Bush policies for leaving the GOP. Six years ago, Webb not only endorsed Bush and Allen, he called Clinton's two terms "the most corrupt" in modern history.

At an afternoon campaign event in Richmond, Webb — a decorated Vietnam War veteran who was President Reagan's Navy secretary — said his previous criticism of Clinton was rooted in divisions over that war.

"I think 9/11 for me just changed all that," Webb told reporters.

"I see this as a measure of reconciliation and understanding that we need to come together and bring this country forward on issues of national security, on issues of economic fairness. My standing with President Clinton hopefully will be interpreted that way," he said.

Once regarded only as a warm-up race for a presumed 2008 Allen presidential bid, the race became competitive in August after Allen singled out a man of Indian descent before a mostly white crowd at a rally and called him "macaca," which can be considered a racial slur.

A Washington Post poll released Sunday showed Allen favored by 49 percent of voters surveyed last week, while Webb had 47 percent support. The results were within the poll's sampling margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Both campaigns estimated that their fundraisers would generate at least $500,000 come they approach the home stretch of the race and throttle up their media campaigns to well in excess of $1 million a week.

Bush, Clinton Ratchet Up The Drama (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

President Bush added a stern stay-the-course message on the war in Iraq to his buoyant endorsement of Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) yesterday, and the region's high-profile Senate races received special attention not only from the current occupant of the White House but the former one as well.

While Bush raised about $500,000 for Allen (R) at an event in Richmond, former president Bill Clinton raced through Maryland and into Northern Virginia with a similar mission for Democrats in mind.

Clinton headlined a fundraiser for Maryland Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin, rallied die-hard Democrats at a park in Baltimore, raised money for gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley in Montgomery County and ended his evening across the river in McLean, where 375 Democrats ponied up about $500,000 for Democratic Senate candidate James Webb.

Clinton told the Baltimore crowd that his party now has a chance to represent not just progressives but also sensible conservatives. "There's something amazing going on here," Clinton said. "This is not a usual election."

In Richmond, Allen may have gotten a bit more support from the president than he wanted; after Bush departed, Allen seemed to distance himself from some of Bush's tough talk on Iraq.

As he and his wife, Susan, stood next to Bush in front of a huge U.S. flag, the president excoriated Democrats on national security and taxes. "They would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done," Bush said. "That's why they are the party of cut and run. We will fight. We will stay. We will win in Iraq."

After the speech, the senator's aides brought Allen out to meet with reporters, where he softened the tone, saying that "America needs to adjust. Our battlefield commanders need to adjust and adapt to this evolving threat."

DOJ_NMG_0083733

With polls showing that a growing number of Virginia voters are questioning whether the war was worth fighting, Allen has, in recent days, repeatedly sought to align himself with the commonwealth's senior senator, John W. Warner (R), who recently returned from Iraq and has been critical about the war's progress.

"John Warner and I discuss this . . . almost daily," Allen said, adding that a sudden withdrawal would "leave our country much less secure." Asked whether he agreed with Bush's "cut and run" statement, Allen said, "I'm not going to get in an argument here about the president's words versus my words."

He added: "The president has his ideas on Iraq, John Warner has his and I have mine."

In overwhelmingly Democratic Maryland, there was no disagreement with anything Clinton said. The crowd at a waterfront park in Baltimore, many wearing union jerseys, held camera cellphones, waved signs and cheered loudly at every applause line in the president's short speech.

Nostalgia for Clinton's years in office was the theme. Cardin, a congressman, introduced him in a plaintive voice, saying: "Mr. President, we miss you in the White House. It's been a long six years."

Clinton was full of his favorite old lines, saying that Republican attempts to accuse Democrats of not being up to the complicated battle against terrorism was "kind of a mangy old dog they're running out of the kennel one more time, and I don't think it'll hunt."

He said an anti-Washington fervor was something the political foot soldiers in Maryland should exploit.

"You'd be amazed who wants to talk to you," he said. "In the next three weeks, don't give up on anybody."

The entire statewide Democratic ticket shared the stage with Clinton, and Democrats stressed that ousting Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and replacing retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D) with Cardin was a way to send a message to Bush.

"Ehrlich is on his way out. A Democratic House and Senate are on the way in. And Bush is on his way down," Cardin said.

From the Baltimore waterfront, Clinton and the Democratic candidates gathered again at the gated Potomac estate of real estate developer Morton Funger. Party faithful paid from $1,000 to $10,000 to mingle with Clinton and O'Malley over shrimp and mini-Reubens on the expansive veranda, some of the attendees said.

Clinton then headed to former senator Charles S. Robb's McLean estate to prove that there are no permanent friends or permanent enemies in politics.

Irony abounded. In 2000, when he was a Republican, former Navy secretary Webb endorsed Allen over Robb, the incumbent, saying that Robb had become "part of the problem." And at that November event, Webb took one of his many swipes at Clinton, saying his was "the most corrupt administration in modern memory."

Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, has said his feelings were driven by Clinton's avoidance of service in the military, "but I'll say on 9/11 that wall came down for me. I lost my anger over Vietnam." Webb made similar comments during appearances with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who has had at least two fundraisers on Webb's behalf during the campaign.

"I think there have been some obvious questions I have received about issues, issues that divided this particular generation during and after the Vietnam War," said Webb. "And I want to say as emphatically as I can it is very important for all of us to step forward and lead this country in a way it deserves in the areas of foreign policy and economic policy."

Clinton indicated no hard feelings.

"If I only supported those who never criticized me, I would have no one to support. That is part of being president. . . . Those times divided us, and maybe we are finally putting them behind us as a country."

The Allen campaign was not so accepting of the new friendship.

"Bill Clinton and Chuck Robb better enjoy their time with their fellow tax-raiser Webb tonight. His hypocrisy is becoming legendary," Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said. "Webb has a clear pattern of changing who he is and what he stands for with the political winds. Webb could well be calling Bill Clinton 'corrupt' and Chuck Robb a 'problem' again soon."

Both candidates in Virginia had to balance their guests' fundraising abilities with the baggage they bring to the state.

A Washington Post poll last week found that Bush's job approval among likely voters in the November election is at 43 percent in Virginia, about the same as nationally. In addition, 54 percent believe that the war in Iraq was not worth fighting, and 46 percent believe that "strongly."

DOJ_NMG_0083734

The numbers are much higher, and Bush's approval rating much lower, in Northern Virginia, where about 30 percent of the state's voters reside.

At a news conference yesterday morning, Allen appeared reluctant to embrace Bush even as he prepared to welcome him to the state. Allen dodged a question about whether he is proud of his support for Bush -- the Webb campaign repeatedly points out that it is north of 95 percent -- describing his own record without once mentioning the president in his answer.

"I'm proud of my record as governor of Virginia, and I'm proud of my record in the United States Senate," Allen said.

Asked about the purpose for the president's visit, Allen said: "It's a fundraiser. The president's coming in to raise money. We need to raise money because Hillary Rodham Clinton has piled in a million dollars via the Democratic Senate committee."

Staff writers Tim Craig, Ann E. Marimow and Matthew Mosk contributed to this report.

JIM WEBB: Clinton Visit May Net Half-million (RTD)

By Peter Hardin

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 20, 2006

ARLINGTON -- Former President Bill Clinton saluted Democrat Jim Webb yesterday for his service to the nation and his courage in challenging Republican Sen. George Allen.

"I value his service to our country," Clinton told reporters before he moved on to a fundraiser for the decorated Marine veteran, and "the sheer audacity it took for him to make this brave race."

Though they have had different views in the past, Clinton said he and Webb share a Scots-Irish lineage and hardscrabble upbringing, and deep divisions in the nation over the Vietnam War are passing.

"Those times divided us. Maybe we're finally putting it behind us, as a country," Clinton said.

Responding to a question about President Bush's remarks in Richmond earlier, Clinton defended Democrats on the Iraq war, saying, "There isn't anybody that's cut and run."

Last night's event completed a political turnabout for Webb when he aligned himself with Clinton's star-raising power.

Webb hoped a sell-out crowd of 375 guests at the private event with Clinton later in the evening would give his campaign a big boost.

Webb aides estimated the proceeds at between $400,000 and $600,000.

Just six years ago, then-Republican Webb called the Clinton administration "one of the most corrupt" in modern times and backed Allen for election over incumbent Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb.

Not only has Webb become a Democrat and patched things up with Clinton, last night's fundraising event in McLean was held at Robb's stately, brick-columned manor with a bird's-eye view above the Potomac River.

The appearance of Clinton in Northern Virginia on the same day that President Bush campaigned for Allen in Richmond not only underscored the importance of Virginia's vigorously contested Senate race, it mirrored the candidates' geographic strengths.

Webb, an author and former Navy secretary from Falls Church, had a solid lead in Northern Virginia in a recent Washington Post poll, with 56 percent of the vote compared to Allen's 42 percent.

In the rest of the state, Allen topped Webb in the poll by almost 10 points. Allen is a former governor, former House of Representatives member and former state legislator.

The Allen campaign, meanwhile, lambasted Webb with a press statement headlined "Webb Sells out Tonight . . . AGAIN." It cited his differences with Clinton and with Robb in the past.

"Webb has a clear pattern of changing who he is and what he stands for with the political winds. Webb could well be calling Bill Clinton 'corrupt' and Chuck Robb a 'problem' again soon," said Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams.

Senate Race In Va. Draws Biggest Fundraisers (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 20, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. — Locked in a tight race that could help decide control of the U.S. Senate, the two candidates in Virginia's Senate race Thursday brought out their party's big guns: the current and former commanders in chief.

DOJ_NMG_0083735

President Bush raised money for Sen. George Allen, R-Va., while predecessor Bill Clinton campaigned with challenger Jim Webb. While Allen and Webb may hope the Oval Office aura changes voters' minds, political analysts said presidential visits are more about raising money and inspiring turnout by partisans.

"Both of them are the champion fundraisers in their parties," said Bob Holsworth, a political scientist at Virginia Commonwealth University. "It shows you how the attention of the major parties has shifted to Virginia because of the sense it's a competitive race."

Rich Galen, a Republican strategist, said that in non-presidential election years, campaigns need to find ways to energize wavering party members. "Presidents can do that," he said. "Ex-presidents, too."

The Bush-Allen event, at an old railroad station turned science museum, was expected to raise about $530,000. The Webb campaign did not offer an estimate for Clinton's appearance Thursday night at the home of former senator Chuck Robb.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll this month showed Allen with a 3-point lead over Webb, within the poll's margin of error. Allen had once been a heavy favorite in Virginia, but that was before he used the term "macaca" to refer to an Indian-American who had been filming an Allen campaign rally on behalf of the Webb campaign.

After attending a private reception, Bush and Allen were all smiles as they waved to the crowd of a few hundred in the rotunda of the train station.

Bush called the former governor of Virginia "a man who has earned the confidence of the people of this state. … We need him in the United States Senate."

For Bush, it was a full day of helping candidates in trouble. Before jetting to Richmond, he spoke at a fundraiser for incumbent Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Pa., whose re-election bid has been dogged by his admission of an extramarital affair.

Clinton told about 375 Webb backers Thursday that the public is weary of the Iraq politics Bush used successfully in 2004, an issue Webb has focused on in his campaign.

Republicans "won two elections by skin-teeth by scaring people and dividing them up. But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times," Clinton said. "It's kind of a mangy dog right now."

"Look at Jim Webb. Does he look to you like a cut-and-run kind of guy?" he said.

Webb, a secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, also is a novelist and political commentator who in years past has had harsh words for Clinton.

In a 2001 letter to The Wall Street Journal concerning Clinton's end-of-term pardons, Webb, then a Republican, wrote, "It is a pleasurable experience to watch Bill Clinton finally being judged, even by his own party, for the ethical fraudulence that has characterized his entire political career."

Webb's spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd, said Webb's past disputes with Clinton stem from being on opposite sides during the emotional era of the Vietnam War. Todd said Webb changed his outlook after the 9/11 terrorist attacks, and opposes the war in Iraq.

Hastings Wyman, editor of the Southern Political Report, said it's hard to project a winner in Virginia's president-vs.-president faceoff. Wyman said each should "stir up the base a bit," but, "with both of them going there, they'll probably cancel each other out."

Big Names Campaign As Election Day Nears (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

President Bush and former President Bill Clinton, rallying party faithful at swanky fundraisers yesterday, told Virginia voters their choice in next month's U.S. Senate election is crucial.

The Nov. 7 election is about "which party will take the steps necessary to protect the American people and win the war on terror and which party is going to keep your taxes low and keep this economy growing," Mr. Bush said while standing beside Republican Sen. George Allen and his wife, Susan, at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond.

"We just have a different point of view, a different look at the world," Mr. Bush said of Democrats and Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0083736

Mr. Clinton, who endorsed Democrat James H. Webb Jr. in the Senate race, agreed the two parties have clear opposing philosophies.

"We've got a chance to win a victory for America," Mr. Clinton said, casting the upcoming election as a historic opportunity for Democrats.

Before hosting a private fundraiser in McLean for Mr. Webb last night, Mr. Clinton appeared in Maryland where he stumped for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic candidate for governor.

The Republicans have been taken over, Mr. Clinton said at Frederick Douglass-Isaac Myers Maritime Park in Baltimore, "by the most ideological, most extreme wing" of the party, prompting some conservatives to switch parties.

"We represent, now, both strains" of American politics, said Mr. Clinton, who later appeared at a fundraiser for Mr. O'Malley in Potomac. Mr. Clinton was expected to raise $500,000 for Mr. O'Malley.

At a brief stop in Arlington last night, Mr. Clinton told reporters that he admired Mr. Webb's courage for running against Mr. Allen.

"I wanted to express my public support [for Mr. Webb] for some time," Mr. Clinton said of the former Republican who several years ago called Mr. Clinton's presidency "the most corrupt administration in modern memory." Both men mended their relationship after September 11, 2001.

"This is a question of whether we're going to be frozen in ideology that ignores evidence and arguments or whether we are going to look at evidence and arguments and do what's best for our country," Mr. Clinton said.

In Richmond, Mr. Bush told the estimated 300 people who turned out to show their support for Mr. Allen that the senator "has earned the confidence of the people of this state."

"There's no bigger issue than what we're doing with people's money," Mr. Bush said. "The best thing Virginia citizens can do to make sure that taxes stay low is to send George Allen back to the United States Senate."

Mr. Allen has said he wants to make the Bush tax cuts permanent before they expire.

Mr. Bush did not mention Mr. Webb, Navy secretary under President Reagan, by name or criticize him. But he did criticize Democrats as the "party of cut and run."

Mr. Clinton, while in Arlington, responded to Mr. Bush's "party of cut and run" comment.

"They won two elections by their skins' teeth, by scaring people," Mr. Clinton said. "But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times before it doesn't work anymore. And I just kind of think it's a mangy old dog."

Mr. Bush also insisted the U.S. must fight the terrorists in Iraq to keep Americans safe. "We will fight, we will stay and we will win in Iraq," he said.

The rhetoric differs from Mr. Allen's line on the war, which he recently has tempered as its unpopularity grows and its death toll increases.

"I'm not going to get here in an argument over the president's words versus my words," Mr. Allen told reporters after the event when asked whether he agreed with Mr. Bush's statement.

Mr. Allen said he thinks the troops should come home "in victory, not defeat" and that Iraq can't become a safe haven for terrorists.

In McLean, Mr. Clinton was expected to raise between $400,000 and $600,000 for Mr. Webb at the fundraiser held at the home of former Sen. Charles S. Robb, the Democrat Mr. Allen unseated in 2000.

Webb campaign spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said about 375 people were expected to attend the sold-out event.

The White House said the Bush event was expected to raise nearly $600,000 for Mr. Allen, a former Virginia governor who is seeking re-election after one term in the Senate.

Hundreds of anti-war demonstrators lined the streets of downtown Richmond to greet Mr. Bush with handmade signs that said: "Torture is not a family value" and "Impeach Bush."

Democrats, Republicans Both Focus On Bush (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

DOJ_NMG_0083737

Chicago Tribune, October 20, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. -- Well before President Bush stepped on stage here Thursday evening to raise big money for embattled GOP Sen. George Allen of Virginia, the senator's Democratic rival had poured his own campaign cash into a 30-second television spot ridiculing Allen for parroting the president's promise of "staying the course" in Iraq.

Now the president's appearance has armed the campaign of challenger Jim Webb with fresh videotape, as he and Democratic congressional candidates throughout the country attempt to saddle Republicans with the unpopularity of their party's president, deploying Bush as a weapon in their own ads.

Former President Bill Clinton has joined the fray too, making an appearance alongside Webb at another Virginia fundraiser Thursday night - accentuating the debate in a campaign which Democrats are attempting to frame, in part, as a referendum on the Bush administration's policies in Iraq and at home.

"A big issue in this campaign, of course, is Iraq," Bush said in Richmond, praising Allen as a "steadfast" leader.

"Most leading Democrats argue we should pull our troops out of Iraq," he said. "They would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done. That's why they are the party of cut and run."

In the closing weeks of a campaign in which control of Congress is at stake, Bush's face has appeared in campaign ads from coast to coast. But it is Democrats who have dragged Bush into the campaign in a bid to portray Republicans as "rubber-stamps" for the White House and a vote for the GOP as a vote for the Bush agenda. Many Republicans, meanwhile, have sought to distance themselves from the president.

If the Democrats lack a unifying theme - particularly on a war which is foremost on many voters' minds - attempting to make this election more about the president and his policies is a means of capitalizing on two dynamics: Bush has staked an unwavering course on Iraq, and voters overwhelmingly say the country is on the wrong track.

With the president's job approval rating below 40 percent in opinion polls, Democrats are doing their best to rub that off on Republican senators and congressmen. Even in Rhode Island, where Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee has opposed the war and stood as far from Bush as anyone within the GOP, his Democratic foe, Sheldon Whitehouse, has aired a TV ad that opens with Bush.

"Bush needs Chafee to keep Republican control of the Senate," the narrator says. "That's how Bush keeps his agenda alive."

Such ads may play well in places like Rhode Island, where a recent Brown University survey gauged the president's job approval at 22 percent - among the lowest in the nation.

"Across the country, Bush is unpopular," says Darrell West, professor of political science at Brown University. "People don't like the way he has handled Iraq… So Democrats want to run as much against the president as their opponent. It's the Siamese-twin strategy: You tie your opponent to the president."

With a battery of similar TV and radio ads in several contested Senate races and in many congressional campaigns, Democrats are tying Republicans to Bush. And, as Bush closes his campaigning with appearances for endangered Republicans, Democrats are reveling in ties drawn anew {ndash} such as Bush and Allen, who harbored presidential ambitions of his own until his re-election chances slumped after addressing a young man of Indian descent as "macaca" at a campaign rally.

"It comes at a heckuva price," says Democratic strategist Steve Jarding, a campaign consultant for Webb. "These guys are in a hole, and the only tool they have is a shovel - not a ladder. Bush provides the shovel."

The Republicans, acutely aware that the tide of history works against the president's party during any second-term elections, are intent on focusing voters on their commitment to national security and cutting taxes. And the GOP warns that Democrats offer no alternative to the war, will raise taxes and resort to attacking Bush for lack of any true agenda.

"We've heard a lot of talk over the last few months about whether or not the Democrats were going to come up with some kind of agenda for the election, and they haven't," says Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "To beat an incumbent, you have to do two things. You have to give a reason to fire, and a reason to hire. All we are hearing is the reason to fire."

Voters are hearing it, and seeing it, in campaign ads from coast to coast.

DOJ_NMG_0083738

In Virginia, Webb's campaign put enough money behind a recent TV ad to ensure the typical viewer saw it ten times in a week. It pictured Bush saying: "We'll stay the course in Iraq." A price-tag for the war: $318.5 billion. And Allen saying: "I very much agree with the president" and "we need to stay the course."

The war is No. 1 on the minds of Virginia voters, according to a Washington Post poll showing that 54 percent of likely voters say the war was not worth fighting and only 43 percent approve of the job Bush is doing. It also shows Allen and Webb in a virtual tie among likely voters, with 25 percent calling their Senate vote an expression of opposition to Bush.

In five of the six Republican-held Senate seats that Democrats have targeted for takeover, Democrats have run ads connecting the Republican incumbent or candidate with the president.

In Ohio, where Republican Sen. Mike DeWine trails his Democratic rival, Rep. Sherrod Brown, by 7 percentage points in the latest Ohio Poll, the Democrats are airing a rollicking TV ad featuring DeWine and Bush arm-in-arm with hilarious smiles and a soundtrack of children singing a variation on a nursery lyric: "The more we work together, together, together, the more we work together, the happier we'll be. Cause your friends are my friends, cause your friends are my friends…"

Ads such as this play effectively to deep-seated discontent in Ohio about the way things are going at home and nationally, says Eric Rademacher, co-director of the Ohio Poll. His latest survey, showing Brown's lead over DeWine growing in the past month, found that 71 percent of the voters supporting Brown see Ohio as headed on the "wrong track."

In Tennessee, where Democratic Rep. Harold Ford is running a close race with Republican Bob Corker for the seat of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Ford has aired an ad quoting his opponent: "We are in Iraq… Our country is in Iraq. I think we should stay the course." Then Ford says: "I voted for the war. But we shouldn't stay the course as Mr. Corker wants."

Ken Goldstein, professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and seasoned campaign ad analyst, sees an attempt by Democrats in this and other ads to address a war for which the party has no unified strategy.

"In previous elections, the Democrats tried to blur the issue on Iraq and terror and said they were going to talk about issues that are more important," Goldstein says. "Now there is a way to talk about the war… It is: 'We're stuck, and this guy just doesn't understand that we're stuck.' That is something that people can understand."

If Democrats have attempted to blur their differences over the war, some Republicans have sought to blur their own party allegiance in a campaign with a president who has low approval ratings.

In Maryland, camera-friendly Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele has waged a disarmingly personable campaign for an open Senate seat with TV ads featuring a puppy. "Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd," he says in one. "Grainy pictures and spooky music, saying 'Steele hates puppies'… For the record, I love puppies."

His Democratic rival, Rep. Ben Cardin, has struck back with ads warning: "Michael Steele. He likes puppies. But he loves George Bush."

Brad Todd, a partner in On Message, produced Steele's ads. Todd's puppy, a Boston terrier, stars in the ads.

In attempting to snare Steele with Bush, Todd says, Democrats are waging a conventional attack against a candidate with a fresh, new appeal {ndash} he even takes heart in the Bush-based attacks.

"It's clear the Democrats don't really know how to deal with Lt. Gov. Steele's candidacy," Todd said. "They have come back with a very conventional campaign against him. It shows they just don't understand."

Iraq Threatens To Cripple The GOP (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - It always comes back to Iraq.

Regardless of what politicians and the media talk about from week to week - the Foley sex scandal in the House, a nuclear test in North Korea, a soaring stock market - what dominates American politics this fall is Iraq.

It's consuming George Bush's second term, threatening his party's control of Congress and endangering his dream of forging a Republican majority that would rule the country long after he retired to his Texas ranch.

Yet the debate over Iraq won't be settled on Election Day, Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0083739

Even as public skepticism about the war spreads, it's not producing any consensus on what to do about the mess, and thus the elections will offer little direction and no mandate for the U.S. government heading into next year.

Voters split four ways in a recent McClatchy-MSNBC poll - send more troops, keep the same level, start withdrawing, or withdraw them all. They split evenly in another poll over whether to keep troops in Iraq or pull them out.

That helps explain the growing cracks in Republican support for the White House's open-ended, stay-the-course approach to the war. And it makes clear why Democrats don't offer a clear alternative - and why they'd have a hard time reconciling their competing visions of what to do should they win the House of Representatives or the Senate.

"It is THE dominant issue," said Andy Kohut, the director of the Pew Research Center, a non-partisan research group.

"The public is unhappy with the way the war has turned out. They're divided about what to do. But that doesn't mean they don't have a strong political point of view. They give Bush atrocious ratings. This is an unpopular war with his name on it. And that causes collateral damage for the Republican Party."

Bush and the White House continue to talk up the war.

"If you look at the general overall situation, they're doing remarkably well," Vice President Dick Cheney said of the Iraqi government this week.

But they're increasingly alone. More Republicans this fall are openly skeptical, an unthinkable break in party unity from a year ago.

"You can see some movement forward, but a lot of movement back," said Sen. John Warner, R-Va., last week. He's the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We have to rethink all the options, except any option which says we precipitously pull out."

Public confidence in the war effort fell sharply in recent weeks as violence escalated anew. The ranks of Americans who think the war is going well dropped from 47 percent to 37 percent from September to October, a Pew poll found. The biggest drops were registered by conservative Republicans, independents and conservative to moderate Democrats. Liberals had turned sour on the war long ago.

"It's creating a real challenge for Republicans," said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster.

"Not because the Democrats have any good answers, because they don't. But because voters are frustrated and don't see continuing the same course as a viable strategy."

Iraq's impact on this year's elections is evident in states such as Virginia, which features a surprisingly close contest between Republican Sen. George Allen, who supports the war, and Republican-turned-Democrat James Webb, a former Marine and Navy Secretary who opposes the war.

Iraq is the top issue in the state, where 3 out of 5 likely voters disapprove of the Bush administration's handling of the war, according to the McClatchy-MSNBC poll.

Virginia also symbolizes the muddled direction for post-Election Day policy.

"It's a mess now, and I'm not sure what to do about it," said Joel Dexter, a teacher from Richmond who supports Democrat Webb.

"If I had my way, I wish they could come home tomorrow," added Diane Canary, a homemaker from Roanoke who also supports Webb. "But I know that would leave Iraq in turmoil."

For their part, Republicans aren't telling voters much about what they'd do differently in Iraq.

Bush has said that the goal of complete withdrawal is "an objective" that "will be decided by future presidents and future governments of Iraq."

Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., caught in a tough struggle to keep his seat, said this week that Bush had a secret plan to win the war that he couldn't share with the world. There's no evidence of that, however.

At the same time, Republicans criticize Democrats for allegedly wanting to "cut and run" and for offering no alternatives to Bush's war plan.

Many Democrats do want to start withdrawing some troops. But their party leaders refuse to offer an alternative strategy beyond pressuring administration officials at hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0083740

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and other party leaders signed a letter urging Bush to start withdrawing troops by the end of this year, but didn't commit themselves to what they'd do if they took power - which could happen in three months.

One option would be for Congress to cut spending for the war.

"You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?" asked Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., in a newspaper interview. But members of the party's "Out of Iraq" caucus are skeptical they could get such a proposal past their party leaders.

"I understand that there's a range of views within the Democratic Party," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., who stressed the value of congressional oversight of the war. "These are tough, tough issues. We don't have a (formal) position on what your position should be on this particular issue."

But that might not make a difference on Election Day.

"People are not voting FOR the Democrats on this issue," said Kohut. "They're voting AGAINST the Republicans."

GOP's Solidarity On War Is Cracking (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Janet Hook And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Public anxiety over the Iraq war, already reflected in polls and demands from some Democrats to withdraw U.S. troops, is now prompting calls for change from some unlikely quarters: Republican congressional candidates.

Across the country, GOP candidates are breaking with the White House over how long troops should remain in Iraq and who should lead the war effort.

Even some of President Bush's staunchest allies in solidly Republican states are publicly questioning the administration's war policies, while others are scrambling to find new ways to talk about Iraq in the face of rising voter frustration over management of the war.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas), who earlier this year stood by Bush during some of the most damaging sectarian violence, this week said that Iraq was in "chaos" and that it was "worth trying" to partition the country into semiautonomous regions, a proposal that sharply diverged from White House policy.

In Washington state this week, the Republican candidate for the Senate called on Bush to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a position also taken by a Republican congressman from Connecticut and the party's Senate candidate in New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr.

Kean said this week that the Bush administration had made "horrendous mistakes" in Iraq.

In Minnesota and Iowa, congressmen in tough reelection battles have called for withdrawing troops. So, too, has the Republican candidate in the congressional district around Boulder, Colo.

And in Virginia and Tennessee, states that Bush won handily in 2004, Senate candidates have been put on the defensive over their earlier calls to "stay the course" in Iraq, a line Republicans once hoped would demonstrate resolve. Both candidates there are now saying the U.S. must change tactics in Iraq.

"We haven't found one part of the country, even in the South, where it is good to say, 'Stay the course,' " said Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, a group for GOP centrists. But Republicans "don't want to do a major in-your-face with the president. They are trying to work around the issue in their districts."

The rhetorical tap-dancing over the war is a somewhat novel experience for Republicans, who have ridden to victory in the last two national elections with a strong and unified stand on the war. In 2002 and 2004, Bush and other GOP leaders increased the party's congressional majorities by hammering Democratic candidates as weak and indecisive.

As recently as summer, Republicans seemed poised to outmaneuver the minority party again by accusing Democrats pushing for troop withdrawals of wanting to "cut and run."

But in the last several months, strategists and pollsters from both parties say, the public mood has darkened substantially. Mounting body counts and the growing specter of civil war in Iraq have dragged public confidence in the war effort to new lows. A CNN poll over the weekend found support for the war at 34%, compared with 64% who said they opposed it.

DOJ_NMG_0083741

Public dissatisfaction has been further fueled by news reports that U.S. intelligence agencies have concluded the war may be exacerbating the terrorist threat. At the same time, some of the Republican Party's most respected voices on national security, including the powerful chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, John Warner (R-Va.), have increasingly raised questions about the administration's policy in Iraq.

Bush nonetheless is continuing to portray the Democrats as wavering on the war.

"Democrats have been all over the place" in their own Iraq policy, Bush said at a campaign event for Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.) on Thursday.

He said that the "only position in the Democrat Party that everybody seems to agree on: If you want to be a Democrat these days, you can be for almost anything, but victory in Iraq is not an option."

Several GOP lawmakers said they and most of their colleagues had no plans to abandon the president.

"There's no question we're in a challenging moment in Iraq," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee official who represents a district with a heavy military presence. "But I don't think some mood has set in whereby we need to change our position as a party. You can't change it this close to the election. It's not credible. It's better to argue your position with passion than cast about for a new position."

Across the country, a number of Cole's colleagues are trying.

Some of the earliest calls for change came from Republicans with large numbers of Democratic constituents, such as Rep. Jim Leach, whose southeastern Iowa district gave 55% of its vote in 2004 to the Democratic presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry.

Leach called for a withdrawal of U.S. troops two years ago, although he didn't say until this week that American soldiers should come home within a year.

Outside Philadelphia in Pennsylvania's 7th Congressional District, which voted 53% to 46% for Kerry two years ago, Rep. Curt Weldon has said he wants to take authority over troop withdrawal away from Rumsfeld. Weldon, like Leach, is locked in a tough race for reelection.

In Connecticut, Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, who was once one of the strongest supporters of the Iraq war, two weeks ago called for Rumsfeld to resign, months after his Democratic opponent had taken the same position.

It is not only Republicans in Democratic-leaning states who are facing the pressure to recalibrate their positions on Iraq.

In Virginia, Sen. George Allen, once considered one of the strongest adherents of Bush's strategy, has begun emphasizing his alliance with Warner, who has said that a policy change will be necessary in coming weeks if the violence in Iraq continues.

On Wednesday, Allen told a meeting of the Virginia Assn. of Schools Superintendents: "We cannot continue doing the same things and expect different results. We have to adapt our operations, adapt our tactics." Allen's race for reelection against Democrat Jim Webb has grown tighter in recent months.

An Allen spokesman said Thursday that there was nothing inconsistent in Allen's call for change.

In Tennessee, GOP Senate candidate Bob Corker found himself on the defensive after insisting at a debate earlier this month that he had never said the U.S. should "stay the course" in Iraq.

Mocking that claim, Corker's opponent pointed out that he had in fact said it in July and September.

Some Republican candidates who continue to support the war have nonetheless been forced to address the issue in sometimes tortured ways.

In New York's 20th Congressional District in the Hudson River Valley, an area that voted for Bush in 2004, Rep. John E. Sweeney aired a television ad last month featuring the mother of soldier who had died in Iraq. The mother says to the camera: "I don't believe in the war, but I do believe in our soldiers, and John Sweeney."

Sweeney's opponent has run a series of ads criticizing Sweeney's support for the war.

In Montana, Republican Sen. Conrad Burns insisted in a candidate debate this week that the president had a plan for victory — but "he's not going to tell everyone in the world."

When Jon Tester, Burns' Democratic opponent, asserted that Bush had no plan, Burns replied: "We're not going to tell you what our plan is, Jon, because you're just going to go out and blow it."

DOJ_NMG_0083742

Democrats ridiculed Burns' claim, comparing it to the "secret plan" to end the Vietnam War that was attributed to Richard Nixon in his 1968 campaign for president.

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, said Thursday that GOP candidates cannot avoid talking about the war.

"Iraq is the 500-pound gorilla in the room," Kingston said. "And candidates who don't discuss it are probably going to be disappointed on election day."

noam.levey@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Breaking ranks

With sentiment against the war in Iraq growing, more Republican candidates for the U.S. House and Senate are openly criticizing the administration's strategy and distancing themselves from President Bush.

Mike McGavick,

Senate candidate in Washington

"As a show of faith that he is willing to set a new direction, the president should appoint a new secretary of Defense, preferably someone who has demonstrated bipartisanship in the past and someone who knows the value of involving Congress in these strategy decisions."

— Statement on Monday

*

Rep. Curt Weldon

of Pennsylvania

"I don't want Dick Cheney or Don Rumsfeld" deciding on a timetable for troop withdrawal. "We don't need some armchair politician back in Washington, because they want to run for office, to pick a date out of the air."

— During a recent

appearance

*

Thomas H. Kean Jr.,

Senate candidate

in New Jersey

"I've been very clear that I think there have been horrendous mistakes that have been made in the conduct of the war in Iraq. And I said the administration has made these horrendous mistakes. That's why I've called for Secretary Rumsfeld's resignation."

— Statement

in September

*

Rep. Christopher Shays

of Connecticut

"I am losing faith in how we are fighting this war…. I believe we have to motivate the Iraqis to do more."

— Said in August,

after his 14th trip

to Iraq since the war began

*

Sen. George Allen

of Virginia

"We cannot continue doing the same things and expect different results. We have to adapt our operations, adapt our tactics…. The Iraqi people need to show some backbone, some spine. They need to get their heads, their minds and their hearts in control of their own destiny."

DOJ_NMG_0083743

— In address this week to the Virginia Assn. of School
Superintendents
Source: Times research
Los Angeles Times

Bush Campaigns For GOP Candidates Facing Unexpected Troubles (PENNNWSFLSH)

By Jennifer Loven
PennLive.com, October 19, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa. (AP) — In an unusual day of campaigning, President Bush swooped into two races once safe for Republicans but turned perilous by one candidate's affair with a much-younger woman and by accusations of racial insensitivity against the other.

Bush's appearances on Thursday, for Rep. Don Sherwood in Pennsylvania and for Sen. George Allen in Richmond, Va., found the White House on the defensive over the decision to help candidates in such plights.

"I think the president understands that it's important to set high standards," said spokesman Tony Snow when asked about the situation.

Bush tried to keep the focus on his contentions that Democrats would go soft on the war on terror and would raise taxes if handed control of Congress in the November elections.

The pictures of the day from Pennsylvania were of Bush descending the steps of Air Force One followed by Sherwood, his wife, Carol, and one of their daughters, and the foursome's appearance later at a local farmer's ice cream store.

Sherwood has held one of the safest seats in Congress, his conservatism playing well in his heavily Republican, rural district in northeastern Pennsylvania. Democrats didn't even bother fielding a candidate in the past two elections. But last year, Sherwood admitted to a five-year extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior. He settled a lawsuit that claimed he had choked her — he has denied he abused her — and has aired a campaign commercial asking constituents to forgive his infidelity — and re-elect him.

Helping to raise more than $300,000 for Sherwood at Keystone College, Bush only obliquely addressed the controversy.

He praised Sherwood as "the right man to represent" his district, because of policy positions ranging from taxes to Iraq to highway money. Bush then offered effusive admiration for Sherwood's wife, Carol, who sat beaming beside her husband on the dais behind the president after mostly staying out of view during the campaign.

Bush called her a "caring and courageous woman" because of a letter she wrote to constituents over the weekend. In that letter, she denounced Sherwood's opponent, Democrat Chris Carney, for airing campaign ads about the affair and the abuse that Sherwood has denied.

"I was deeply moved by her words," Bush said.

The president's main message at the event was that the Iraq war is part of the broader anti-terrorism effort.

He warned ominously that Democratic control of Congress would result in a chairman of the House tax-writing committee who would cut off funding for troops in Iraq and a speaker, referring to now-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who voted against a string of bills: renewing the Patriot Act, creating a Department of Homeland Security, waging the Iraq war and authorizing a warrantless wiretapping program.

"Given the record of Democrats on our nation's security, I understand why they want to change the subject," Bush said.

Responded Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider: "Clearly, the president is getting desperate to keep his rubber-stamp Republican Congress if all he can do is try to scare the American people with false claims."

Later, at the fundraiser for Allen, Bush was switching to the other pillar of his campaign-trail speeches: that a Democratic-controlled Congress would preside over an economically damaging increase in taxes on American families and businesses.

Sherwood and Allen are two of the GOP's more-endangered candidates as the parties head into midterm elections less than three weeks away that could strip Republicans of their majority in one or both houses of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0083744

Allen, once considered a potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, is in a tightening Senate re-election race with Democrat Jim Webb. Allen has spent weeks rebutting charges of racism and religious insensitivity.

Webb is gaining ground on the incumbent's financial advantage and drawing help from national Democrats, and a recent poll showed the race virtually tied.

On Thursday, former President Clinton was also in Virginia, raising money for Webb at the home of former Sen. Charles Robb.

Last week, White House press secretary Snow was in the position of defending Sherwood as a sinner who, like everyone else, is in need of forgiveness and Allen as "not a bigot."

On Thursday, Snow said the president had not changed his mind on either of those points — though he declined to repeat them — and insisted there was no downside to campaigning for the two troubled Republicans.

Bush Campaigns For Pa. Congressman Enmeshed In Sex Scandal (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 20, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa. - He said she was "a casual acquaintance." She said they were extra-marital lovers, but told police that he tried to choke her. His wife says she forgives him. So does President Bush.

In fact, Bush traveled to northeastern Pennsylvania Thursday to help the wayward husband, Republican Rep. Don Sherwood, keep his seat in Congress. Perhaps it's a measure of the Republicans' plight that the president would throw his prestige behind a candidate whose marital misbehavior conjures memories of Bill Clinton.

Sherwood's five-year fling with a woman half his age has all the elements of a bad soap opera, but voter reaction to his performance could help decide whether Republicans keep control of the House of Representatives. Polls show Sherwood trailing Democratic challenger Chris Carney in a district that had been considered a lock for the GOP.

"It looks like he's in pretty serious trouble," said Jonathan Williamson, chairman of the political science department at Lycoming College in Williamsport, Pa. "If they didn't need the seat so much, the national Republicans would cut Sherwood loose. This may be one of the firewalls - they have to have this one, even though they're not all that thrilled with their guy."

Bush gave Sherwood his wholehearted endorsement as he helped the candidate raise more than $300,000 at a fundraiser at Keystone College. The president addressed Sherwood's adultery head-on by praising the candidate's wife, Carol, for standing by him.

In a letter to voters last weekend, Carol Sherwood accused Carney of exploiting her family's trauma by casting the congressional election as a referendum on moral values.

"Chris Carney might be trying to make himself look squeaky clean, but we have all made mistakes we regret over the years," she wrote. "I am certainly not condoning the mistake Don made, but I'm not going to dwell on it, either."

Bush said he was "deeply moved" by her comments.

"Carol's letter shows what a caring and courageous woman she is," he said as the Sherwoods and one of the couple's three daughters looked on.

The congressman's marital misdeeds have become a frequent topic of discussion in his conservative, rural district, where the mountains are now covered with trees in shades of yellow, orange and red. Sherwood's problems started in September 2004, when Cynthia Ore called police to the congressman's Capitol Hill apartment claiming that he'd choked her for no apparent reason.

She was 29 at the time; he was 63.

Sherwood was never charged, and the matter attracted little attention until the following spring, when Ore threatened legal action and provided details of a relationship that Sherwood had initially denied. The two met in 1999 at a gathering for young Republicans.

"We had such good chemistry," Ore told the Wilkes-Barre Times Leader. "I saw Don as a small-town all-American. He has that pink, rosy skin. When I first met him, he had those big glasses."

DOJ_NMG_0083745

Sherwood, a wealthy car dealer, settled Ore's $5.5 million civil suit for an undisclosed sum, but his indiscretion continues to haunt him. Carney's efforts to exploit the scandal and the furor over former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit Internet messages to congressional pages have added fuel to the issue.

Sherwood has all but pleaded for voters to forgive him.

"I made a mistake that nearly cost me the love of my wife, Carol, and our daughters. As a family, we've worked through this," he said in one of his television ads. "Should you forgive me, you can count on me to continue to fight for you and your family."

But some Republicans aren't ready to forget or forgive. Former Sherwood supporter Joseph Lech of Tunkhannock, Pa., Sherwood's hometown, vented his anger in an ad for Carney.

"This incident with Don Sherwood just cuts right at the core values of our district. I've spoken to my daughter about that incident, and she's disgusted by it," Lech says in the ad. "I love my daughter tremendously. How can I tell her that I support Don Sherwood and feel good about myself?"

Carney's efforts to benefit from his opponent's failings mirror Bush's references to Clinton's infidelity during the 2000 presidential campaign. Bush presented himself as a morally upright alternative to the outgoing president by repeatedly assuring voters that he would "uphold the dignity of the office."

Sherwood admittedly fell short of Bush's pledge, but White House spokesman Tony Snow noted the congressman's contrition in explaining the president's decision to campaign for him.

"Mr. Sherwood has certainly admitted to what has gone on, and the president believes that we're all sinners, we all seek forgiveness," Snow said last week.

Pressed on the issue again Thursday, Snow seemed eager to change the topic. He defended the president's visit, then said: "I'm not going to go any further."

President Bush Visits The Area (TR)

The Times-Tribune, October 20, 2006

PITTSTON TOWNSHIP -- With a wave, President Bush walked down the steps of Air Force One at Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport, stopping briefly to greet supporters, including a Scranton literacy volunteer. Naomi Alamar, a volunteer for almost two decades with Scranton Council of Literacy Advance, met the president on the tarmac with Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Tunkhannock Township before a motorcade of five SUVs, a black box truck, two state police cruisers and a dozen police motorcycles whisked Mr. Bush to his speech at Keystone College in LaPlume. "I'm numb," Mrs. Alamar said, glancing back at Air Force One. The massive jet's 198-foot wingspan was too much for the airport's 150-foot-wide runway, sending crews out early to remove some runway lights to make room. After the president left for Keystone, about a dozen onlookers were treated to a tour of Air Force One, including 5-year-old Nathan Bakunas of Plains and his father, Rob. "It's really fun to know that we're going to see the inside of the plane," Nathan said, snapping photos of his father. About 125 protestors were waiting for Mr. Bush as he arrived at the college and made his way to the Gambal Athletic Center, where he told a cheering crowd that Republicans like Mr. Sherwood were better defenders of national security than "cut-and-run" Democrats. He also praised Mr. Sherwood's wife, Carol, for standing by her husband despite his admitted five-year affair with a woman 35 years his junior.

After the speech, Mr. Bush made a brief stop for ice cream at the Manning's Farm Dairy store on Grove Street in Clarks Summit. He was back at the airport by 3:20 p.m. Air Force One took off about 10 minutes later. Log back on to thetimes-tribune.com for updates throughout the president's visit

Presidential Visit To Lackawanna County (WNEP)

WNEP's website, October 20, 2006

President Bush spoke before a crowd at Keystone College. The president came to northeast Pennsylvania to help raise money for Congressman Don Sherwood's campaign.

The president stopped at Manning's Ice Cream in Clarks Summit after his speech at Keystone College.

Thursday, October 19, UDPATED: 3:22 p.m.

President George Bush has wrapped up his visit to Keystone College in Lackawanna County.

Air Force One took off from the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport around 3:30 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0083746

The president and his entourage arrived at the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport just before 12:45 p.m.

The president was joined on Air Force One with Congressman Don Sherwood and his wife, Carol. After spending a few minutes together aboard, they descended the steps to be greeted by other dignitaries waiting at the bottom of the steps.

The president also greeted Naomi Alamar of Scranton. She was presented with the Presidential Volunteer Service Award. Alamar is a volunteer with SCOLA Volunteers with Literacy.

There are state troopers all along Interstate 81 from the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport north and along sections of Routes 6 and 11 leading to Keystone College in La Plume.

The president was here to stump for Republican Congressman Don Sherwood. He spoke at a luncheon at the college. Tickets for the event went for $350 a plate. For people who wanted their photo taken with the president, the price tag was $2,500. It doubled for couples.

During his speech at Keystone, President Bush talked about what Sherwood has accomplished while serving in Congress and he used the opportunity of a Republican audience to make a few pointed jabs at the Democratic party.

On campus, security was very tight. There were state and local police along with secret service agents keeping a close eye on all activity on and surrounding the Keystone College campus.

The president was met with protestors and supporters as he approached the Keystone campus. The president was in our area about three hours.

After leaving Keystone, the president's entourage stopped at Manning's Ice Cream along Routes 6 and 11 in Clarks Summit for a surprise stop and a quick ice cream cone.

Newswatch 16 will bring you live team coverage of the visit beginning at 5 p.m.

More from Newswatch 16 . . .

Awaiting the President

Search for Missing Man

Secret Service Investigates Perceived Presidential Threat

New Vending Machine Promotes Healthy Eating, PA Products

A school in Columbia County has been selected to be the first to try a new state program aimed at getting students to eat healthier food made in the Keystone state.

Burglaries in Monroe County.

Republican Woes Lead To Feuding By Conservatives (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Tax-cutters are calling evangelicals bullies. Christian conservatives say Republicans in Congress have let them down. Hawks say President Bush is bungling the war in Iraq. And many conservatives blame Representative Mark Foley's sexual messages to teenage pages.

With polls showing Republican control of Congress in jeopardy, conservative leaders are pointing fingers at one other in an increasingly testy circle of blame for potential Republican losses this fall.

"It is one of those rare defeats that will have many fathers," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, expressing the gloomy view of many conservatives about the outcome on Election Day. "And they will all be somebody else."

Whether the election will bear out their pessimism remains to be seen, and the factors that contribute to an electoral defeat are often complex and even contradictory. But the post-mortem recriminations can influence politics and policy for years after the fact. After 1992, Republicans shunned tax increases. After 1994, Democrats avoided gun control and health care reform. And 2004 led some Democrats to start quoting Scripture and rethinking abortion rights, while others opened an intraparty debate about the national security that is not yet resolved.

In the case of the Republican Party this year, the skirmish among conservatives over what is going wrong has begun unusually early and turned unusually personal.

DOJ_NMG_0083747

But almost regardless of the outcome on Nov. 7, many conservatives express frustration that the party has lost its ideological focus. And after six years of nearly continuous control over the White House and Congress, conservatives are having a hard time finding anyone but one another to blame.

"It is pre-criminations," said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review, the conservative magazine. "If a party looks like it is going to take a real pounding, this sort of debate is healthy. What is unusual is that it is happening beforehand."

Some conservative leaders have often been quicker in the past to turn on Republican officials and one another than their rank-and-file supporters. But this year polls show broad disaffection at the grass roots, prompting some Republicans — including former Speaker Newt Gingrich — to worry that the public sparring could dampen turnout.

This year's antagonists also include some new critics, including Mr. Gingrich's one-time lieutenant, Dick Armey, the former House Republican majority leader.

In recent weeks, Mr. Armey has stepped up a public campaign against the influence of Dr. James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family and an influential voice among evangelical protestants. In an interview published last month in "The Elephant in the Room," a book by Ryan Sager about splits among conservatives, Mr. Armey accused Congressional Republicans of "blatant pandering to James Dobson" and "his gang of thugs," whom Mr. Armey called "real nasty bullies" — arguments he reprised on the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal and in an open letter on the Web site organization FreedomWorks.

In an interview this week, Mr. Armey said catering to Dr. Dobson and his allies had led the party to abandon budget-cutting. And he said Christian conservatives could cost Republicans seats around the country, especially in Ohio.

"The Republicans are talking about things like gay marriage and so forth, and the Democrats are talking about the things people care about, like how do I pay my bills?" he said.

Mr. Armey also pinned some of the blame on Tom DeLay, the former Republican House majority leader, who "was always more comfortable with the social conservatives, the evangelical wing of the party, than he was with the business wing."

Mr. Armey, who identifies himself as an evangelical, said he was tired of Christian conservative leaders threatening that their supporters would stay away from the ballot box unless they got what they wanted.

"Economic conservatives," he argued, were emerging as the swing voters in need of attention, in part because they had become more likely to vote Democratic in the years since President Bill Clinton was in office. "A lot of people believe he brought us from deficits to surpluses, and there is a certain empirical evidence there," Mr. Armey acknowledged.

In a statement on Thursday, Dr. Dobson said Mr. Armey was "still ticked" over a long-ago House leadership race in which Dr. Dobson endorsed someone else, and he restated his warnings to Republicans that social conservative voters "would abandon them if they forgot the promises they had made."

In a recent newsletter from Dr. Dobson's organization, Representative Mark Souder, an Indiana Republican counting on Christian conservatives to turn out for his re-election, called Mr. Armey's comments "disgusting" and insulting to "the many Christians around the United States who devoutly hold conservative moral beliefs."

Christian conservatives began complaining last year that the Republicans had put proposed Social Security changes and tax changes ahead of issues like abortion and same-sex marriage, risking the support of social-issue voters.

Over the summer, Congress held a rush of votes on just those issues — an election-year ritual intended to motivate those voters — and in an interview last week Tony Perkins, president of the Christian conservative Family Research Council, said he believed it had begun to revive some grass-roots enthusiasm.

"But the Foley scandal just let the air out of the tires," Mr. Perkins said.

Others dismissed the Foley scandal as largely irrelevant outside of Mr. Foley's district. Several conservatives said Republican incumbents were using it as a scapegoat.

"It will make you feel better to say, I didn't lose the election; Foley lost it for me," said Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform. "Your wife and kids will believe it."

Mr. Norquist said the Iraq war was the biggest drag on Republican candidates even before their big wins in 2004.

"Some people think we did it just to prove we could do it, like people who go running with weights on their ankles," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083748

Many blame neoconservatives who argued most vocally for the invasion of Iraq. “The principal sin of the neoconservatives is overbearing arrogance,” Mr. Keene said. Neoconservatives, in turn, blamed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld’s insistence on holding down troop levels for the fouling up of the war

“There is a bit of a battle between people who say, Hey, your tax cuts wrecked our war and people who say, Hey, your war wrecked our tax cuts,” said David Frum, a former Bush speechwriter who was among the war’s proponents.

Mr. Frum argued that the problem with the Iraq war was in its execution, not in the idea behind it. “The war has to be seen through the prism of Hurricane Katrina,” he argued, “because conservatives will support a tough war if they are confident in the war’s management.”

William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard and another prominent advocate of the invasion, said he doubted that soaring spending was turning off as many voters as tax-cutters like Mr. Norquist or Mr. Armey suggested.

“The spending bill that was supposedly going to destroy the Republican Party was the Medicare drug bill,” he said. “I have heard almost no one talk about it one way or the other.”

Mr. Kristol argued that the Bush administration was suffering politically for applying too little force, not too much. “I am struck that people have the sense in North Korea and Iran that things are spinning out of control,” he said.

Mr. Frum and others blamed the Republican Senate’s support for the president’s guest-worker immigration proposal for angering the grass-roots talk-radio crowd. But Mr. Norquist, who favored the immigration proposal, argued that the election would provide a verdict on “restrictionism” in the fate of Randy Graf, a Republican candidate in Arizona running on calls for tighter borders. Polls show Mr. Graf faces long odds.

Mr. Gingrich, for his part, made the best of the fray, saying, “I would rather have a movement active enough to bite itself rather than a movement so moribund it didn’t realize it was irritated.”

Conservatives Hit For 'Whining' Over Turnout (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

Top Republican Party supporters yesterday accused fellow conservatives of "whining" in response to complaints from activists worried that grass-roots Republican voters are disillusioned and will stay home on Nov. 7.

Grover Norquist, a close associate of White House political strategist Karl Rove, dismissed concerns about voter turnout as empty threats.

"There are always in every election cycle self-appointed conservative leaders who announce, 'You haven't done enough for me, so my troops are staying home,' " Mr. Norquist said.

"The National Rifle Association, Americans for Tax Reform, the [National] Right to Life Committee -- the groups that actually put lead on the target and who do stuff all the time, they're not unhappy," Mr. Norquist said. "The people who are whining are the guys that don't have grass roots that they can actually move. So they are frustrated, and they don't have anything to do other than threaten not to participate."

Mr. Norquist was not alone in criticizing remarks in yesterday's edition of The Washington Times by Family Research Council President Tony Perkins and Republican pollsters and consultants, who expressed concern about lack of enthusiasm among conservative voters.

On his top-rated radio talk show, Rush Limbaugh yesterday denounced disillusioned Republican voters as "cut-and-run conservatives" and said those worried about turnout were just trying "to make a name for themselves."

"I think a lot of people want to matter," Mr. Limbaugh told his millions of national listeners. "They want to have power. They feel powerless, and if they think they can [mess] it up for somebody else by getting noticed and doing that, then they feel like they've got some power, so there could be all kinds of things at play here."

Conservative leaders told The Times that, while they have heard complaints from voters dismayed by a range of issues from runaway spending to immigration, they have become more concerned since Rep. Mark Foley of Florida resigned in a sex scandal, which they say has discouraged many "values voters" who helped push President Bush to victory in the 2004 election.

DOJ_NMG_0083749

But Mr. Limbaugh said those worries were "conventional wisdom" inspired by liberals urging conservatives to "stay home and give the election to the Democrats."

"Have you noticed the conventional wisdom has spread, and now it's become commonplace in everybody's thinking? It is so pervasive a theme: Republicans staying home, conservatives fed up, not going to the polls because of Foley and whatever else."

The finger-pointing among conservatives is an ill omen, said Republican media consultant Craig Shirley.

"You know things are bad when the members of the leper colony start fighting with each other," Mr. Shirley said.

Mr. Norquist's description of "whining" conservative leaders telling their "troops" to stay home on Election Day prompted a puzzled response from Mr. Perkins.

"I've not heard anyone say that," the FRC president said. "He should wait until someone says it to break out the talking points."

In fact, social-conservative groups are continuing efforts to mobilize voters.

"Stand and be counted," was the subject line on an e-mail that Concerned Women for America sent yesterday to its supporters.

"Will you vote your values this election, or will you remain silent?" the CWA e-mail said, telling conservatives: "Don't stay home on Election Day. Forfeiting your right to vote -- no matter how disenchanted you are -- is no way to protest moral corruption."

Mr. Perkins said his own group has worked hard to motivate social conservatives, citing last month's "Value Voters Summit" in Washington and a "Justice Sunday" event last weekend in Boston that was co-sponsored by Colorado-based Focus on the Family and televised via satellite by churches nationwide.

But Merrill Matthews, policy analyst at the Institute for Policy Innovation, a free-market think tank, said Republicans are also worried about complaints from economic conservatives.

"It's ironic that social conservatives seem to be so upset with the administration," said Mr. Matthews, noting that the Republican Party's "libertarian faction is complaining that the president hasn't focused enough on the bread-and-butter economic issues."

Those concerns were echoed by David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute and author of a new study on libertarian voters.

"The war looks like a mistake, and Republicans have been spending worse than Democrats," Mr. Boaz said. "Both libertarians and social conservatives are disgusted with the Cunningham, Abramoff and Foley scandals. They're thinking that maybe the Republicans have been in power too long and don't deserve another term."

Republican campaign pollster Rick Shaftan said Mr. Norquist's criticisms were misdirected.

"Grover's answer is to blame conservatives for the GOP's problems," Mr. Shaftan said. "This is exactly why people are disillusioned. Those of us not on the [Republican National Committee] payroll do not feel the same obligation to spout the party line."

Despite such complaints, Mr. Matthews said, the Republican Party's election turnout machinery may yet save the day on Nov. 7.

"One never wants to underestimate the ability of Karl Rove and his team to turn out the vote," he said.

Democrats Make Big Gains In Fund-Raising, But G.O.P. Has More Cash On Hand (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Democrats raised $34 million in September and began whittling down the Republicans' financial advantage, according to finance reports to be filed on Friday. Yet Republicans still have more cash at their disposal as the midterm election campaign advances from television advertising wars to a battle of getting out the vote.

As optimism among Democrats has grown in recent weeks, the generosity of party contributors has followed suit, with the party's House campaign committee raising $14.4 million last month and the party's Senate committee raising $13.6 million. With the addition of the tally of the Democratic National Committee, the party's three main groups have outraised their Republican rivals by $3.5 million for the month.

DOJ_NMG_0083750

"If you would have told me a year ago that the three Democratic committees would have raised more money than the three Republican committees, I would have said you're on a different planet," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "People are feeling a real reason for change."

Still, the three Republican committees reported having cash-on-hand balances of $77.2 million at the end of September, compared with $67.3 million for Democrats. And the Republican National Committee raised $13 million in September compared with $5.6 million by the Democratic National Committee.

"September was the best financial month we've had this cycle," Ken Mehlman, the Republican chairman, said in an interview Thursday evening. "But they are going to outspend us. That's the whole reason why it is so important to build the turnout operation."

Republican and Democratic committees are required to file their September fund-raising reports with the Federal Election Commission on Friday. While cash-on-hand tallies are viewed as critical indicators of the resources the parties can draw upon in the final weeks of the campaign, party officials concede that much of the money has already been spent on buying television commercials in competitive districts across the country.

As Election Day approaches, the parties are also investing their money on mailings, telephone banks on behalf of their candidates and a final barrage of television advertisements as the number of competitive House and Senate races expands in the final three weeks of the campaign.

To win control of Congress, Democrats must win 15 seats in the House and 6 in the Senate. Party strategists believe that more than 20 House races and at least seven Senate seats remain up for grabs in the final dash.

Throughout the midterm cycle, Democrats feared that their fund-raising efforts would be dwarfed in the closing month of the race. The electoral climate, particularly the low approval rating for Congress and President Bush, has accounted for stronger-than-expected fund-raising that Democrats say will allow them to be competitive in every race they need to be, particularly in the Senate.

On the Senate side, Democrats raised $13.6 million in September compared with $5.1 million for Republicans. On the House side, Democrats raised $14.4 million last month compared with $12 million for Republicans.

There is greater disparity in the national party committees, which concentrate on get-out-the-vote operations and larger message campaigns, with the Republican National Committee's $13 million versus the $5.6 million raised by the Democratic National Committee.

The disparity is in part caused because the Democratic chairman, Howard Dean, has taken a longer view of turning around the party by trying to rebuild state Democratic organizations across the country. The approach has been controversial inside the party.

Still, the Democratic National Committee reported a cash-on-hand balance of $8.2 million, which party officials say is twice as much as they had during the midterm race of 2002.

To close the gap, the Democratic National Committee is taking a loan of up to $10 million to finance turnout operations, half of which will be devoted to Senate races and half to increasing the turnout of minority voters.

Asked to comment on the fund-raising reports, Mr. Dean responded in a statement on Thursday evening that, "We're pleased that we nearly doubled what the D.N.C. raised in the last midterm election, but we're going to keep working hard to ensure that our candidates have the resources to win."

Democrats Close Fundraising Gap With GOP (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 20, 2006

The national Democratic Party raised $33.6 million in September, outpacing the Republican Party and setting the stage for an expensive and brawling finish to the 2006 campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0083751

Overall, Republicans still held a financial advantage going into the final days of the campaign. The GOP's three national party committees reported having $77.2 million in hand. The Democratic committees reported a total of $67.3 million in the bank. But the numbers show a closing trend for Democrats who have been trailing overall Republican fundraising and were $20 million behind in cash on hand a month ago.

The committees must file detailed reports of their September financial activity with the Federal Election Commission on Friday.

_The Democratic National Committee reported raising $5.6 million and had $8.2 million in hand.

_The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said it raised $13.6 million and had $23.1 million in the bank.

_The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the House organization, reported $14.4 million raised and $36 million cash on hand.

_The Republican National Committee was the top GOP fundraiser, collecting $13 million. It reported $26 million in hand.

_The National Republican Congressional Committee, the House organization, reported raising $12 million and had $39.2 million in hand.

_The National Republican Senatorial Committee said it raised $5.15 million and had $12 million in the bank.

"The fact that the Senate Democrats beat the Michael Jordan of political fundraising speaks to the fact that there is an enormous appetite for change in the Senate and in America," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the chairman of the senatorial campaign.

But Republicans were also cheering their numbers. The Republican National Committee raised $13 million in September, the party's biggest fundraising month of this campaign season.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party was not only raising money successfully, it also was reaching out to voters. "This is clear evidence that Republicans all across the country are committed to maintaining our majorities in Congress and electing Republicans this November," he said.

Even with those sizable bank accounts, the Democrats were already borrowing money to address an expanding field of competitive races and the Republicans could follow suit. The Democratic National Committee this month took out a loan of up to $10 million and distributed $5 million of that to the DSCC to spend on Senate races. The balance, party officials said, was to be spent on turnout efforts targeted to minorities.

Since Sept. 1, the parties have spent more than $1 million in 25 congressional races, according to an analysis by the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. At the same time, the candidates have been raising and spending significant amounts of cash. According to the finance group, 39 challengers to House incumbents had raised $1 million by the end of September. In previous elections, $500,000 was considered a significant amount to run a credible campaign.

Republicans' Cash Advantage Ebbs As Vote Nears (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

The Democratic Party's three major campaign committees raised more money last month than their Republican counterparts, slicing deep into a financial edge Republicans hoped would provide an advantage in the final weeks of the bruising campaign for the midterm elections.

According to the reports -- among the final tallies filed before Election Day -- the three Democratic committees collectively raised $33.6 million, compared with $30 million by the Republicans. The strong showing cut the cash-on-hand advantage Republicans had a month ago to about $10 million, or nearly half. That is money the committees can use to buy television and radio ads for candidates.

ELECTION-YEAR LEDGER

See a chart showing how Democrats have saved money for campaigns by containing overhead costs.

Plus, see more spending data from PoliticalMoneyLine.org: • Democratic National Committee1

• Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee2

• Republican National Committee3

DOJ_NMG_0083752

• National Republican Congressional Committee4

"If one party has fund-raising momentum, it's very helpful at this stage," said Michael Malbin, of the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan organization that tracks political money.

According to figures released yesterday, both the House and the Senate Democratic campaign committees raised more in September than the Republican National Committee, the party's fund-raising powerhouse.

House Democrats were the top money raisers, collecting $14.4 million, much of it through donations from incumbent members who aren't facing tough re-elections. Senate Democrats raised $13.6 million, through a mix of incumbent giving and a surge of individual donations. Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) said the committee received $900,000 in direct-mail checks in a single day.

The two Democratic committees reported that at the end of September they had $36 million in cash for House races and $23 million for Senate campaigns. "We've always been worried they'd throw a lot of money into some blue [Democratic-dominated] states in the end. This gives us the ability to defend our blue states and go hard in the red [Republican] states," Mr. Schumer said.

The Democratic National Committee, which has lagged behind the congressional committees in fund raising, reported $5.6 million in donations and $8.2 million in cash. Beyond that, the DNC has taken out a loan for as much as $10 million, which essentially puts the party's cash position at parity with the Republicans in the final weeks of campaigning.

The RNC reported raising $13 million, a sum Chairman Ken Mehlman said is "evidence" that Republicans are willing to fight for their majorities. The RNC had $26 million in cash, officials said.

House Republicans also showed strength, raising $12 million and reporting $39 million in cash on hand. The Republican Senate committee raised $5 million and had $12 million in the bank.

Overall, Republicans have raised more money in the 2005-2006 campaign cycle than Democrats, with totals of $408 million and $304 million, respectively. But Democrats have managed to stay within reach of their adversaries in cash on hand for the critical home stretch by containing overhead costs.

A look at spending by the national and House committees between January 2005 and Aug. 30 shows areas where Republicans spent significantly more on operations than the Democrats. Senate committee spending data weren't available.

In the run-up to Election Day, the RNC has spent nearly $8 million on consultants thus far this cycle, compared with $4 million by the DNC. Travel and event costs for the RNC approached $15 million, compared with $4 million for its Democratic counterpart. Some of that disparity is attributable to the higher cost of presidential trips, but Republicans also spend significantly more for trinkets for donors, such as lithographs and $93,500 for books about the inauguration.

All the Republican committees spend much more on fund raising, primarily through telemarketing and direct mail. The approach generates lists of supporters who can be contacted during voter-turnout operations and subsequent fund-raising programs.

The costs give the Democrats, who rely more on less-expensive Internet-based fund raising, an opportunity to narrow the cash differential at the end of each quarter.

The RNC spent nearly $15 million on telemarketing and $56 million on direct mail through Aug. 30. The DNC spent $3 million on telemarketing and nearly $30 million on direct-mail pitches. Meanwhile, the Democrats invested $5.6 million in Web programming, compared with less than $1 million by Republicans, records indicate.

At the congressional level, the differences are even more pronounced. The Republican House committee has spent nearly $45 million on fund-raising calls and processing data generated by them since January of 2005, compared with $7 million by House Democrats. Meanwhile, the Democrats invested nearly $2 million in Web-based programs, the data show.

Democrats Approach Nov. 7 With A Surge In Fundraising (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Democratic fundraising for the midterm elections is ending with a surge.

DOJ_NMG_0083753

In September, the Democratic campaign committees for the House and the Senate outraised their counterpart Republican committees, reversing historical trends.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised $14.4 million and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee collected $13.6 million last month, they said. In contrast, the National Republican Congressional Committee raised $12 million and the National Republican Senatorial Committee collected $5.2 million.

The Republican National Committee, however, continued to outpace the Democratic National Committee. In September, the RNC raised $13.1 million and reported total receipts of $14.3 million, while the DNC said it collected $5.6 million.

The GOP committees maintained an overall advantage of about $10 million in funds available to be spent. At the end of September, the Democratic committees had $67.3 million on hand; the Republican committees had $77.4 million.

"The Republicans' extra $10 million is better than being behind," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. "But it may not be enough if you're playing defense, which Republicans are."

The institute reported that 30 Democratic challengers had raised $1 million or more by Sept. 30, which compares with 12 Democratic contenders who exceeded the million-dollar threshold in 2004.

All three Democratic campaign committees raised more in the current election cycle than they did for the previous midterm elections four years ago; the House and Senate committees collected substantially more. Of the three Republican committees, only the House committee collected more this year than in 2002.

Over the past 21 months, the Republican committees raised a total of $408.4 million, while the Democratic committees raised $313.3 million, the Campaign Finance Institute calculated. The Republican total is about 10 percent lower than four years ago, while the Democratic total is 27 percent higher.

At the end of September, the DCCC had $36 million on hand and the NRCC had $39.2 million. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee had $23.1 million in the bank, while the National Republican Senatorial Committee had $12.1 million on hand.

The Republican National Committee had $26 million available, three times the amount the Democratic National Committee had.

"We're comfortable that we've brought in the resources we need," said the RNC's Tracey Schmitt.

Voters Over 50 Favor Democrats (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

OLDER VOTERS FLOCK to Democrats as midterm elections approach.

Voters over 50, traditionally more likely to show up on Election Day than younger counterparts, favor Democrats for control of Congress by 20 percentage points in new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. As Republicans brace for renewed Democratic campaign attacks on Social Security, older voters favor Bush's adversaries on the issue by more than 30 percentage points.

The poll represents "a vote of no confidence" in the Republican Party, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC survey with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. The survey of 1,006 registered voters, conducted Oct. 13-16, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Voters 65 and over give Republicans a solid edge on handling terrorism, but rate Iraq and Social Security more important to their voting decisions.

Republicans do best, trailing by five percentage points in race for Congress, among those ages 35-49.

REPUBLICAN TURNOUT MACHINE faces steep challenge.

The left displays greater fervor. Six in 10 liberals express highest possible interest in elections, compared with five in 10 moderates and conservatives. A 46% plurality of those earning less than $30,000 calls themselves "more enthusiastic" than usual about voting, outpacing the 42% among those earning more than $75,000.

DOJ_NMG_0083754

"The GOP's ground game is really going to get a stress test," one Bush adviser frets. Worries about Election Day challenges to voters' legal status diminish after Ohio and Florida ban the practice. But minority voter advocates scrutinize Michigan, which still allows them.

BUSH LOSES second-term backing from key constituencies.

Defections among past allies undercut president's clout as his overall job approval drops to 38% from 48% just before the 2004 elections. Among white men, he receives a net negative rating by seven percentage points.

Among blue-collar workers, his performance is rated negatively by 19 percentage points. Bush draws 53% disapproval from small town and rural voters, up from 39% two years ago.

Bush retains approval of eight in 10 Republicans, down from nine in 10 as he won re-election.

NOTORIOUS: House page scandal brings Republican Rep. Foley national name recognition. Seven in 10 Americans rate him negatively, comparable with past assessments of Yasser Arafat and Michael Jackson.

TEAM BUSH seeks more credit for economic news despite expected softness in third-quarter numbers next week. "Wages are growing in real terms," says Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. But among voters who call the economy most important to their election decision, Democrats hold a 30 percentage point lead.

COMMON GROUND? A 36% plurality of Republicans echoes view of Democrats and independents that Iraq is in civil war. Some 50% of persuadable voters say Bush hasn't given good reasons for U.S. troops to remain there, while 44% say he has.

BETTER OUTCOME: Despite recent difficulties, war in Afghanistan is called successful by 51% of voters; 47% say it has been unsuccessful. Men and Southerners are most likely to express positive views of the battle there against the Taliban and al Qaeda; women and Northeasterners are most negative.

SUPPORT EBBS for hitting North Korea militarily after its nuclear test.

Just 32% of voters say the U.S. should use force to stop that country's nuclear program, down from 42% in July. Opposition rises to 57% from 47% amid increasing concerns about violence in Iraq.

Attention to the issue marginally benefits Republicans. By 33% to 31%, voters say North Korea's test blast makes them more likely to support Bush's party for Congress; 31% say it makes no difference.

By two-to-one ratio, voters say the U.S. couldn't have prevented the North Korean test.

MINOR MEMOS: Foley scandal pushes Speaker Hastert's negative rating to 32%, higher than House Democratic leader Pelosi's 25%. ... By 56% to 39%, voters say capturing or killing Osama bin Laden isn't necessary for successful conclusion of Afghanistan military campaign.

GOP Aims To Scare Up Big Voter Turnout (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

With top Republican strategists now privately predicting substantial House losses, President Bush and top GOP officials plan to spend the final days of the 2006 campaign attempting to rally partisans and limit conservative defections with dire warnings about the consequences of a Democratic Congress.

Amid predictions that demoralized conservative voters might sit out the election, Bush and other senior Republicans will escalate charges that Democrats will raise taxes, weaken national security and liberalize social policies. Bush struck those themes in campaign appearances yesterday in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and White House senior adviser Karl Rove said he "will consistently refresh that message" between now and Election Day.

Beyond the White House, however, there is increasing anxiety among Republicans about whether new efforts to frame the party's message can be effective in turning a tide that seems to be running powerfully against them as a result of the Iraq war and the Mark Foley page scandal.

For months, Republican leaders have sought to reassure candidates and activists with a succession of strategies. These included efforts to transcend the national environment by focusing House and Senate races on local issues, as well as high-profile speeches by Bush casting Iraq as just one theater in a larger war against terrorists. But none of these approaches has succeeded over a sustained time in reversing polls showing deep voter unrest and willingness to punish Republicans for the performance of Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0083755

The mood among most GOP strategists -- with the exception of Rove and a few others -- is decidedly downbeat heading into the final 18 days. They see poll after poll showing a growing number of GOP House incumbents in serious danger, including many who just weeks ago were considered relatively safe for reelection. The list of most-imperiled incumbents now includes Reps. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.) and Curt Weldon (Pa.), a top GOP strategist said.

By this reckoning, roughly a dozen GOP-controlled House seats are "gone, no ifs, ands or buts about it," said the strategist, who discussed internal party deliberations on the condition of anonymity.

A number of GOP operatives said privately yesterday that they now see minimum losses of perhaps 18 seats, with 25 to 30 a more likely outcome. Democrats need 15 to take control of the House.

Republicans are slightly more optimistic about the Senate but nonetheless are worried about prospects for maintaining control. At this point, they see four seats likely to tip to the Democrats: Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Montana and Ohio. Democrats need six seats to take control. That means the battle could come down to Republican-held seats in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, all of which are considered too close to call now. Republicans see New Jersey as their best chance to gain a seat.

"If the vote were today, we would not hold the House," said Rep. Mark Edward Souder (R-Ind.), one of several Republicans in relatively safe districts running ads and sending mailings to voters to protect their seats. Souder, who easily won two years ago with 69 percent of the vote, said that if Democrats are successful in knocking off the three Indiana GOP lawmakers who are currently trailing in the polls, he could be washed away, too. "This is going to be for me an all-time Republican low in this district," he said.

Still, Souder said the primary factor preventing a Democratic landslide has been the failure of Democrats to a present a clear alternative. Souder, who first won his seat in 1994, said he spent the past few days studying the run-up to the election 12 years ago and found that Republicans are in a slightly better position. But "right now, it is not closing right," he said.

Mike Franc, a senior analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the GOP warnings of Democratic policies might be a hard sell with conservatives upset over recent decisions on spending and other policies.

"Republicans did a lot to soften up their own base to make it very easy for rank-and-file, conservative-minded voters to say there is not a whole lot of difference between the two parties," he said. "That has become a cancerous development on the Republican biosystem." He said even the true believers at his think tank are so fed up with GOP governance that many do not seem overly worried about the consequences of losing the House.

A series of polls show that evangelical Christians, a key component of the GOP, are turning against the Republican Congress and are less likely to vote for GOP candidates this time around.

Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey -- one of the key architects of the GOP takeover in 1994 -- agreed that Republicans have ample reason to be concerned about fiscal conservatives sitting the election out. Armey said the GOP's plan to take advantage of low unemployment and a soaring stock market was destroyed by the Foley page scandal.

"The fact of the matter is, right now people are embarrassed by Republicans, and the economic base is still angry" because of high government spending over the past six years, Armey said. Consequently, he predicted, Democrats will take control of the House in three weeks.

Mark McKinnon, who was Bush's chief media adviser in 2000 and 2004, said the campaign may look better in a few weeks if Republicans can refocus the electorate on what a Democratic takeover might mean in terms of policy.

"I think Republicans wish the election were three weeks ago and the Democrats wish it were today," he said. "The fact is, it is three weeks from now. Whatever is going on right now is not the endgame; it's the middle game."

Rove, who believes that Republicans will hold both the House and Senate, said Democrats have failed to capitalize on events because they lack a clear message that presents a compelling alternative to the Republicans. "Generally when you're trying to nationalize something and you're the out party, you have a consistent message," he said. "I'm not sure what that consistent message is on the other side. Is there unanimity on Iraq? I don't think so."

DOJ_NMG_0083756

Rove, speaking by telephone while on a campaign swing with the president, discounted polls and other indicators suggesting that Democratic voters are far more energized than Republicans. He said the GOP's get-out-the-vote operation, which proved more effective than the Democrats' in the past two elections, will be as strong or stronger this year.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said that for the past six weeks, a voter mobilization effort in competitive House and Senate districts has produced more contacts than during an equivalent time in 2004.

"Conservatives are cranky but not self-destructive," said GOP adviser Mary Matalin, a former aide to Vice President Cheney. "A thing we could do, have time to do and will do in the remaining time will be to hammer home what a Pelosi-Rangel-Conyers House would really mean." She was referring to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who would become House speaker if Democrats win, and fellow liberals Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.) and John Conyers Jr. (Mich.), who are in line for committee chairmanships.

"That hasn't reached penetration levels yet," Matalin said.

GOP To Air Ad Warning Of Terror Attacks (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 20, 2006

The Republican Party will begin airing a hard-hitting ad this weekend that warns of more cataclysmic terror attacks against the U.S. homeland.

The ad portrays Osama bin Laden and quotes his threats against America dating to February 1998. "These are the stakes," the ad concludes. "Vote November 7."

Brian Jones, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said the ad would run on national cable beginning Sunday, but he declined to discuss specifics of the buy.

The commercial tracks with Republican Party strategy to make the war on terrorism a central theme of this election. It will air as recent polls show Republicans losing ground as the party best able to combat terrorism.

Last month, President Bush made the war against terrorism a recurrent topic in public appearances. But his message was drowned out by the e-mail sex scandal involving former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida and by increasing fatalities in Iraq.

The ad displays an array of quotes from bin Laden and his top lieutenant, Ayman al-Zawahri, that include bin Laden's Dec. 26, 2001 vow that "what is yet to come will be even greater."

The ad also cites al-Zawahri's claim to have obtained "some suitcase bombs," followed by a scene that appears to show a nuclear explosion.

Despite al-Zawahri's claim, portable nuclear devices are believed to be particularly difficult to produce and elusive to rogue regimes and terror groups.

The ad is also featured on the RNC's Web site. The party said the ad, called "The Stakes," will be e-mailed to millions of GOP supporters, activists and the state parties.

Democrats denounced the ad as scaremongering.

"This is a pathetic move by an increasingly desperate GOP," said Democratic National Committee Communications Director Karen Finney. "Clearly Republicans are so afraid of their abysmal record they can't offer one example of what they've done to keep America safe."

Former U.S. Navy Vice Admiral Joe Sestak, a Democratic congressional candidate running against incumbent Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., said the war in Iraq has made Americans less safe. "It's disturbing that the Republicans in Washington are trying to reinvent history with this latest message of fear," he said.

Dems To Use Moderation If They Win House (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- They're mostly a liberal bunch. Yet the would-be chairmen in a House under Democratic control promise to rule from the center. They'd have little choice, given the likely balance of power they would confront if elected.

DOJ_NMG_0083757

George W. Bush would still occupy the Oval Office, and no one thinks Democrats could win control of the House by more than a few seats next month. And that would include three dozen or more moderate "blue dog" Democrats.

The dynamics ensure that despite the overwhelmingly liberal cast of the chairmen-to-be _ as measured by liberal interest groups such as Americans for Democratic Action _ the early agenda would consist of bills that could garner Republican support.

Those include legislation to raise the minimum wage, empower the government to negotiate lower prescription prices from drug companies for the Medicare program and end tax breaks for companies that move U.S. jobs overseas.

"If we do take back the House, there will certainly be a Republican president and there may well be a Republican Senate, so we're well aware of the constraints," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. "But I think there are some things that we can put out that will put some pressure on: minimum wage, negotiating with drug companies."

What won't be seen is any serious move to impeach Bush, even though the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, has introduced a bill calling on Congress to determine whether there are grounds for impeachment over the government's warrantless wiretapping program.

Conyers already has been overruled by Democratic leaders including would-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, who dismiss any talk of impeachment.

And there's no talk of gun control measures _ anathema to the 40 or so pro-gun Democrats in the House _ nor even much speculation about steps to curb greenhouse gas emissions thought responsible for global warming. For starters, would-be Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich., is a staunch supporter of his state's automobile manufacturers.

Instead, the Democrats' "Six for '06" agenda is studded with items designed to attract broad support from Democrats and also win over plenty of Republicans. Besides the minimum wage, they include: making college tuition tax deductible, boosting production of biofuels and improving military readiness.

Democrats do promise to use committee posts to step up oversight of the Bush administration. They would be likely to hold hearings into the conduct of the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's wiretapping program, Hurricane Katrina contracting abuses and the influence of industry lobbyists on environmental rulemaking.

"When President Clinton was in office, congressional committees were themselves on steroids and investigated every possible allegation of wrongdoing, no matter how small," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., who stands to assume the chairmanship of the Government Reform Committee. "But when President Bush took over, oversight virtually ceased. No matter how big the issue, Congress now often looks away."

The Democratic chairmen deposed in 1994 were a sometimes imperious group, often uninterested in the opinions of junior lawmakers, even those of fellow Democrats. But the arrogance is gone after 12 demoralizing years in the minority.

"The biggest job is to see whether (Republicans) want to talk," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., poised to grab the helm of the Ways and Means Committee, with its broad portfolio that includes taxes, trade, Social Security, Medicare and welfare. "If we win, it's only for two years and we should be able to say what we have accomplished in two years. We really need their input and the bipartisanship if we're going to succeed."

Republicans say that giving Rangel the gavel of the tax-writing committee would lead to tax hikes. Most of Bush's tax cuts would expire at the end of the decade unless renewed by Congress.

"If Charlie Rangel were to be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he would put at risk ... some of the best economic policy this nation has seen in a long time," said Vice President Cheney in an interview with Time magazine.

Rangel said the White House would have to show flexibility on reforming Social Security and simplifying the tax code if Democrats were to try to address those issues.

Frank stands to take over the Financial Services Committee, a panel that claims jurisdiction over federal housing programs, which Democrats argue have been shortchanged under GOP rule.

"We'll be getting back into building affordable housing," Frank said.

Moderate Democrat Collin Peterson of Minnesota, who would take over the Agriculture Committee, said he would resist what he characterized as Bush administration efforts to "gut the farm bill." Farm subsidy programs are up for renewal next year.

"If I'm chairman, that's not going to work," Peterson said.

DOJ_NMG_0083758

Some Democrats, such as George Miller of California _ potential chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee _ refuse to comment since it's far from a sure bet who will control the House.

Right now, Republicans hold 230 of the 435 seats, with 201 Democrats and one independent. Three seats are vacant.

Pelosi No Shoo-in For Job As Speaker (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's prospects for becoming the nation's first female House speaker depend not only on a Democratic victory in November but also on her ability to prevent any Democrats from voting against her -- primarily centrists opposed to her liberal stances.

At least one Democratic House candidate has pledged not to support Mrs. Pelosi, and others in conservative districts have refused to commit their support -- potentially leaving Mrs. Pelosi shy of the 218 votes required for the chamber's top post.

Democrat Charlie Stuart, who hopes to unseat Republican Rep. Ric Keller in Florida, already has said he opposes Mrs. Pelosi and would prefer Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the more conservative No. 2 Democrat in the House whose strained relations with Mrs. Pelosi have been well-chronicled on Capitol Hill.

"He's a centrist," Stuart spokeswoman Sultana Ali said of the Florida Democrat. "His values really are more in line with Steny Hoyer than Nancy Pelosi."

At least three other Democrats contacted by The Washington Times refused to commit their support to Mrs. Pelosi, whose San Francisco district is far more liberal than the districts that are up for grabs in this election.

Ordinarily, a party's leadership structure is set by the caucus in advance, and all members are expected go along with the decision. In the eight years Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, has been speaker, he's never had a protest vote cast against him.

Mrs. Pelosi, whose voting record is considerably more liberal than many of her fellow Democrats, has never enjoyed that luxury. In last year's election for speaker, one Democrat opposed her for the top post. Four Democrats opposed her in 2003, with three of them simply voting "present" as a protest.

Such protest votes are a sign of dissension within a party. But in the upcoming Congress -- where Democrats could hold the majority by just one or two seats -- any members who vote for someone other than Mrs. Pelosi or simply decide not to vote could trigger parliamentary mayhem.

If Mrs. Pelosi were to fail to win, the speakership would go to the highest vote-getter, most likely Mr. Hastert. Democrats would later win it back by settling on a leader after an intraparty showdown that could pit Mrs. Pelosi against Mr. Hoyer.

But many insiders say Mrs. Pelosi has already moved to protect herself from Mr. Hoyer by privately encouraging another conservative Democrat -- Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania -- to announce earlier this year he will run for the party's No. 2 position if Democrats gain control of the chamber. Mr. Murtha, who is conservative on many issues but has lately become a hero of the left for demanding that troops be withdrawn from Iraq, is considered a formidable challenger.

One of those who opposed Mrs. Pelosi in 2003 was former Rep. Ken Lucas, Kentucky Democrat, who retired the following year. Now he is trying to regain his seat from the Republican who replaced him, and Democrats list the race as among one of their most promising chances to pick up a seat in November.

The Lucas campaign did not return several phone messages inquiring whether he would support Mrs. Pelosi for speaker.

Rep. Gene Taylor, a conservative Democrat from Mississippi, refused to support Mrs. Pelosi in both past leadership elections. Each time, he has cast his protest vote for Mr. Murtha.

Next year, however, Mr. Taylor said he would support Mrs. Pelosi, at least if his was the deciding vote.

"If it comes down to Hastert or Pelosi, then I'm certainly not going to vote for Hastert," he said. "I'm not going to vote against my own self-interest."

Mr. Taylor said that voters in his district -- which went 66 percent for President Bush in 2000 -- don't have much in common with Mrs. Pelosi, who visited recently to survey the damage left by Hurricane Katrina.

"People were very nice to her," Mr. Taylor said.

DOJ_NMG_0083759

Heath Shuler, the former Washington Redskins quarterback who is challenging Rep. Charles H. Taylor in North Carolina, is another Democrat running in a conservative district who refuses to say whether he would support Mrs. Pelosi for speaker.

"He will support whoever he thinks will best represent this district," Shuler spokesman Andrew Whalen said.

Mr. Taylor's campaign -- like vulnerable Republican campaigns in conservative districts across the country -- has gone to some effort to smear the Democratic candidate by association to Mrs. Pelosi.

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said it's a campaign that won't work.

"Republicans are without a single winning issue, so it's no wonder they are desperately trying to falsely smear a churchgoing grandmother who has made fiscal responsibility, bipartisanship and middle-class tax cuts a priority," she said.

In some races, such as Democrat Brad Ellsworth's effort to unseat Republican Rep. John Hostettler in Indiana, the charge has become so heavy that the Democrat ran a television commercial pleading with voters that the election "isn't about Nancy Pelosi." Mr. Ellsworth also refuses to say he will support Mrs. Pelosi for speaker.

Said Gene Taylor of Mississippi: "I still wish Jack Murtha would run for speaker. He's pro-gun, pro-life, a real conservative."

Confident Democrats Draft Broad Health Care Agenda (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Expecting to gain seats in Congress, Democrats are drafting an ambitious health care agenda to carry out their campaign promises with legislation to lower drug costs for older Americans, provide more money for children's health insurance and expand research using embryonic stem cells.

Many Democrats in the House and the Senate say they want federal officials to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies to obtain lower prices for Medicare beneficiaries. The 2003 Medicare law explicitly prohibits such negotiations.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, said that if Democrats were in control, they would try to repeal that ban in the first 100 hours after the House convenes.

Private insurers already negotiate drug discounts for Medicare beneficiaries, but Democrats say the government could get a better deal.

"I don't know that we could undo all the private plans," said Representative Pete Stark of California, who would be chairman of an important health subcommittee if Democrats were in the majority. "But at least we could offer a government-administered drug benefit. Under the existing program, we virtually guarantee the insurance companies against loss, which is a ludicrous position for us to be in."

For 12 years, House Democrats have felt powerless to shape the health care agenda. Now they sense a major opportunity. Not only are they using health care as an issue in the midterm elections, but they also plan to use it to set the stage for the 2008 presidential campaign.

Chris Murphy, the Democrat challenging Representative Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut, has attacked her role in writing the 2003 Medicare law, while Mrs. Johnson takes credit for helping "millions of seniors."

In Ohio, the Democratic candidate for the Senate, Representative Sherrod Brown, repeatedly points out that the number of uninsured has increased by more than five million since President Bush took office.

Embryonic stem cell research has been a defining issue in Senate races in Arizona, Maryland and Minnesota.

But Republicans are not ceding those issues to Democrats.

In a recent television commercial, Representative John E. Sweeney, a four-term Republican from upstate New York, boasts that he has "come through for every hospital in this part of New York — every one." Senator Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, and Representative Deborah Pryce, Republican of Ohio, boast that they split with Mr. Bush and voted for research using embryonic stem cells.

On Capitol Hill, the Democratic agenda faces three significant constraints: Mr. Bush, fiscal reality and industry resistance.

Any move to allow direct federal negotiation of drug prices would be opposed by the White House, most Congressional Republicans and drug companies, which stand to lose more than any other industry if Democrats take control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0083760

Drug companies worked closely with Republicans to pass the 2003 Medicare law, and drug makers have overwhelmingly favored Republicans over Democrats in their campaign contributions.

Democrats are not naïve about their ability to write laws over White House objections. "The Democratic agenda on health care will be somewhat limited by the fact that George Bush is still president," said Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, who has been working on health legislation for more than three decades.

After the demise of President Bill Clinton's plan for universal coverage, Mr. Waxman said, he concluded that "the health care system can be fundamentally changed only when there's strong public support for a specific proposal." Democrats will use the next two years to build such support before the 2008 presidential election, he said.

Democrats do not say exactly how they would pay for their proposals, but they have said they would consider tax increases.

A Democratic priority is to renew and expand the Children's Health Insurance Program, created with bipartisan support in 1997. Democrats say Congress must provide more money just to preserve coverage for the four million children already enrolled.

Federal officials say that two-thirds of uninsured children are eligible for Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program. Democrats want to help states find those children.

The Congressional Budget Office assumes that the budget for the child health program will continue at its current level of $5 billion a year, but Democrats say that would threaten recent gains in coverage. The number of uninsured children fell to 7.9 million in 2004, from 11 million in 1998, but grew last year by 361,000.

Democrats also vow to step up spending at the National Institutes of Health. The agency's budget had doubled over five years, reaching $27 billion in 2003, but has risen less than 6 percent since then.

With additional seats in the House and the Senate, Democrats say, they would overturn restrictions that Mr. Bush imposed on research involving embryonic stem cells. Congress passed such legislation this year, but Mr. Bush vetoed it.

Democrats have a long list of federal agencies, programs and industries they want to investigate. Many are eager to look into drug prices and marketing practices. They also want to investigate whether Medicare overpays managed care plans, compared with spending for similar beneficiaries in the traditional Medicare program.

Mr. Stark, the senior Democrat on the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, said his priority was to stop what he called "the Republican drive to privatize Medicare."

The new drug benefit is delivered by private insurance companies, subsidized by the government. Under a bill drafted by Mr. Stark and other Democrats, Medicare would offer an additional option: one or more government-operated prescription drug plans. The government would "negotiate with pharmaceutical manufacturers with respect to the purchase price" of drugs covered by its plans.

The Congressional Budget Office says that lifting the ban on federal negotiation with drug companies "would have a negligible effect on federal spending" because federal officials could probably not negotiate prices much lower than those obtained by insurers in a highly competitive private market.

Democrats insist that government negotiations could save large sums for Medicare. They would like to use the money to improve the drug benefit — by closing a gap in coverage, sometimes known as a doughnut hole, or by making it easier for low-income people to qualify for extra assistance.

Fla. Official Appeals Foley Sign Ruling (AP-Y)

By Bill Kaczor

AP, October 20, 2006

Florida's secretary of state on Thursday appealed a ruling that prohibits the posting of signs to tell voters in the district of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley that his votes will go to another Republican.

Circuit Judge Janet Ferris ruled Wednesday that state law did not permit such signs to be posted in polling places.

Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb, an appointee of Republican Gov. Jeb Bush, asked the 1st District Court of Appeal to reverse the ruling. The court agreed to expedite the case. Early voting for the Nov. 7 election begins Monday.

"A confused voter should not be compelled to guess," said Cobb spokeswoman Jenny Nash.

Cobb has until noon Monday to file written arguments, and the Democratic Party has until noon Wednesday to reply.

DOJ_NMG_0083761

Foley resigned Sept. 29 after the disclosure of suggestive electronic messages he had sent to male teenage congressional pages. The Republican Party chose state Rep. Joe Negron to replace Foley as its candidate against Democrat Tim Mahoney in the south Florida district.

But the resignation came too late to change the ballots, so Republicans wanted signs posted telling voters Foley's votes would go to Negron instead. The Democrats sued Cobb and supervisors of elections in eight counties, claiming the signs would favor Republicans.

Cobb's appeal triggered an automatic stay of the injunction banning the signs. But Ferris lifted it later in the day, saying posting the signs would cause "irreparable injury" to the Florida Democratic Party, which also had a substantial likelihood of winning its lawsuit.

Dems Look To Rancher To Win Neb. Race (AP-Y)

By Kevin O'hanlon

AP, October 20, 2006

A Yale-educated rancher — and a Democrat to boot — could rope in a House seat in the most Republican state in the nation.

Scott Kleeb, 31, has raised his party's hopes in Nebraska's 3rd Congressional District, which gave President Bush his best numbers in the deep red state in 2004 — 75 percent — and heartily embraced football icon and Republican Rep. Tom Osborne in three elections.

Osborne made an unsuccessful bid for governor, creating an open seat in the expansive district that stretches from Scottsbluff on the Wyoming border, north to South Dakota and south to Kansas.

In another year, the open seat would be a gimme for the Republicans, but Kleeb has turned heads — even conservative ones. The great-great-grandson of an 1870s homesteader near Broken Bow, Neb., Kleeb is appealing to the district's rural voters, many of whom are part of Nebraska's $6 billion beef industry.

One television ad shows Kleeb at work on the McGinn Ranch in Nebraska's storied Sandhills region: "This is pioneer country. You don't punch cows and not put in a full day's work," the narrator says. "And that's what he does. His word is his bond. That's cattle talk, but that's the way it is. His word is his bond."

Kleeb says his years as a rancher counts with voters.

"People want to know that you've experienced the same things they've experienced — that when you are writing federal policy that has real-life consequences to people who work in production agriculture, that it's not just words on a piece of paper," he said.

Kleeb faces Republican state Sen. Adrian Smith, a real estate agent and owner of a mini-storage unit who has served in the legislature since 1998. Smith is counting on prevailing in a district that is 59 percent Republican and 28 percent Democratic.

"I have a lot of folks out in cattle country who appreciate my down-to-earth and authentic approach," Smith said.

The Republican primary in May left some hard feelings as Smith defeated four other candidates. He also has received contributions from the Club for Growth, which advocates ending all farm subsidies — hardly a popular stand in Nebraska.

No surprise then that "Republicans for Kleeb" have held meetings in five cities.

Better yet for the Democrat, Kleeb recently secured the endorsement of the conservative Omaha World-Herald, the state's largest newspaper.

"When pressed aggressively, Kleeb's opponent ... falls back on sound bites and slogans. When pressed under the same conditions, Kleeb draws on different resources — mental focus, breadth of analytical ability and an unshakable internal steadiness," the newspaper said.

Kleeb's chiseled good looks and charisma remind many voters of a young Bob Kerrey, who as an unknown Democrat emerged from nowhere to unseat Republican Gov. Charles Thone in 1982 and later served two terms in the Senate.

"I wish I was tall and good looking," Kerrey joked when reminded of the comparisons. "I've heard more than one person say — accurately — that he is much better than I was in 1982."

DOJ_NMG_0083762

Born in Adana, Turkey, Kleeb is the son of two teachers who worked on U.S. military bases He did his undergraduate work in history and political science at the University of Colorado and has a master's degree in international relations and a doctorate in history from Yale University.

He lists the reauthorization of the farm bill, maintaining partly subsidized rural airline service and alternative energy sources as important. Smith touts making President Bush's tax cuts permanent and reducing the number of government mandates for farmers and ranchers.

Neither candidate has received much financial help from their respective parties. The Nebraska Democratic Party has given Kleeb $10,000 plus paid for $28,000 in ads. Smith has received just $5,000 each from the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Heading into the last month of the campaign, Smith had $319,000 on hand and Kleeb had $255,000.

If the Democrat wins, it would be one for the history books. The last time a Democrat held the House seat was 1961.

Clinton Stumps For Cardin (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Former President Bill Clinton yesterday came to Maryland to boost a state Democratic Party struggling to connect with black voters.

"This is not a usual election," Mr. Clinton told an enthusiastic crowd of several hundred at Frederick Douglass Isaac Myers Maritime Park.

He urged people to recruit as many voters for the Democrats as possible, something he acknowledged "you don't usually have to do in Maryland."

Mr. Clinton spoke at a rally for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who is running for governor, and for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who is running for the U.S. Senate.

Basking in the crowd's cheers as he stood on an outdoor stage near the Inner Harbor, Mr. Clinton described Mr. Cardin as an "old-fashioned politician."

"He actually thinks you're going to give him a job if you elect him," Mr. Clinton said, chiding Republicans for being ideological and divisive.

After the rally, Mr. Clinton attended a fundraiser in Potomac for Mr. O'Malley.

O'Malley officials said they planned to raise about $500,000 from the event.

Mr. Clinton was the latest in a string of national Democrats to stump for Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Cardin. Mr. Clinton's wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, came last month, as did Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

The appearances by Mr. Obama, the fifth black senator in U.S. history, and Mr. Clinton have been aimed at bolstering Democrats' standing among black voters, traditionally the party's most loyal voting bloc.

Race and minority representation have played large roles during this campaign season, in which Mr. Cardin defeated a black candidate, Kweisi Mfume, in the primary and now faces in the general election Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the first black to win a statewide election.

The Democratic nominees for the state's four top races -- Senate, governor, attorney general and comptroller -- are all white men. Mr. O'Malley's running mate, Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, is black.

Maryland's 10 black state senators last month met with Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Cardin to express concern about the lack of diversity at the top of the Democratic ticket, the Baltimore Sun reported.

In addition, black business and religious leaders have said there is grass-roots discontent among black Democrats over the lack of minority representation at the top of the party's ticket.

And during a visit to Maryland this month, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said that "there should be more diversity on this ticket" but added that the national party is not at fault.

Democrats have called Mr. Steele a "unique threat" to their hold on black voters.

Maryland's Senate Race (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0083763

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

ONE CANDIDATE in Maryland's U.S. Senate race, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin , would be a natural leader in the Senate by dint of his command of issues, proven integrity, formidable intellect and unstinting work ethic. The other candidate, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, deploys platitudes and gauzy rhetoric to disguise a tissue-thin grasp of policy. Mr. Cardin would give Maryland legislative clout from Day One; in Annapolis and on Capitol Hill, he has been an effective, knowledgeable, serious lawmaker. Mr. Steele is hard-pressed to claim a significant achievement in public service.

Slightly frumpy and occasionally professorial, Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, is sometimes stereotyped as a drab policy wonk. In fact he is fervent about ideas, chief among them that government should be effective, accountable and proactive. No one who has heard Mr. Cardin on the subject of health insurance, Social Security, or tax and trade policy will conclude that he lacks passion -- or an impressive mastery of detail. It is that passion and attention to the mechanics of government that have earned him such respect for pragmatism and problem-solving.

To a degree rare among Democrats, Mr. Cardin has broken through the barriers of partisanship and minority-party impotence in Congress, enabling him to craft major bills to help senior citizens and reform the Internal Revenue Service. He forged strategic partnerships with key congressional Republicans, notably former Ohio representative Rob Portman, who is now the White House budget director. Such alliances could help Mr. Cardin play a key role in the Senate on a range of issues, no matter who is in the majority.

Mr. Cardin is well known to Marylanders. While still in his 30s, he was the youngest-ever speaker of the state's House of Delegates. In that role and in Congress, he has been sensible, tough-minded and independent. He broke with many Democrats and labor unions to back the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Steele, a Republican, deserves credit for helping move Maryland's Republican Party in a centrist and more appealing direction. But during the campaign he has done everything in his power to sidestep questions of substance while positioning himself mainly as a friendly guy. At times he has bristled when pressed on, say, abortion, as if it were somehow unfair to delve deeper into his thinking. His economic prescription is tax cuts and more spending -- a recipe for budgetary disaster. As lieutenant governor, he promised a study on Maryland's death penalty, but he waited three years to produce a report that the governor did not see fit to make public.

Mr. Steele recently said on talk radio that the race is "not about the issues so much as it is about the style of leadership that we need to elect in Washington." We're old-fashioned enough to believe that leadership arises from a mastery of policy and a commitment to positive change. Mr. Cardin has both, and as a senator he would be an asset to the state of Maryland.

Too Late For Lame Attempts To Win The Black Vote (WT)

By Adrienne Washington

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

"That's the guy I don't like," said my hairstylist, pointing to yet another slick commercial that popped up featuring Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, in his bid to win a U.S. Senate seat.

Another friend is more amused. She refers to Mr. Steele's "we're in this together" campaign theme as the "EHarmony ads."

My hairstylist is not "feelin' the love." And she is just the type of black, middle-class homeowner to whom Mr. Steele is pandering, hoping to get them to cross party lines to cast a vote for his historic candidacy.

Guess again. His is no cakewalk. It is going to take more than a few fighting words from has-been boxer (Mike Tyson) or hip-hop mogul (Russell Simmons) or the black version of P.T. Barnum (Don King) to woo suddenly coveted black voters.

"What I don't like is how they're always talking, talking about the other guy and why you shouldn't vote" for their opponent," said a Largo mother of three who is distrustful of most politicians. "But they don't tell you why you should vote for them." And, "I really don't like black Republicans because they do all these things to get there, and then they forget where they come from," she said. "That's what I think when I see" Mr. Steele.

Like it or not, wrong or right, hers is the typically intractable anti-Republican sentiment that still runs high among black voters, many of whom lob far worse slurs at black conservatives than any white Democrat can dish out.

DOJ_NMG_0083764

But the tide may be shifting, slightly. Another die-hard Democrat from Prince George's County told me that publicly, he is supporting the party ticket, but privately, he is going to vote for Mr. Steele.

Why? "Just to make the Democrats crazy," he said.

He suggested that Mr. Steele should have taken his message to black voters sooner. Still, he doesn't think the black crossover vote will determine Mr. Steele's fate. A loss would rest more with the number of white Republican voters who "just can't bring themselves to vote for a black man." The Washington Times reported earlier this week that Republicans, particularly in rural areas of the state, said they will vote instead for the Democratic candidate, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Ronald Walters, a political-science professor at the University of Maryland, agreed with the Prince George's man, predicting that whatever gains Mr. Steele makes among black votes will be canceled by whites who will not vote for him as happened in Virginia with L. Douglas Wilder and in New York with David Dinkins, black Democrats who won by slim margins.

He also said he expects few black voters to cast ballots in favor of Mr. Steele, despite the historic aspects of his success.

Too bad. Too late. I know it was wishful thinking to want former Rep. Kweisi Mfume as Mr. Steele's Democratic opponent.

We missed the rare and welcome opportunity to witness an election campaign that might not have deteriorated into name calling and race baiting on both sides.

No matter how hard we try, we simply cannot escape the age-old issues stemming from racial injustice and division in this country.

Even when the dueling candidates are of an apparently similar ethnic background, hurtful words still sully the debate and detract from common concerns.

Just when the brouhaha over the use of the "N-word" seems to have subsided in the Old Dominion, we cross the Woodrow Wilson Bridge to the Free State to hear words like "Oreo," "Uncle Tom" and "slavishly" shamelessly thrown into the campaign dialogue, predictably followed by weak excuses and mea culpas.

Wasn't it E.B. White who said to choose your words wisely and "make every word tell"? Sorry, but I'm not buying the I-didn't-mean-any-offense line from Rep. Steny H. Hoyer.

For his part, Mr. Steele trots out black celebrities, slips into street dialect, spends most of his time in the 'hood and chastises his benefactors for forgetting folks who still haven't made it up the ladder as he has. But he pretends to have thin skin whenever the opposition alludes to its color.

Not surprisingly, a fair number of black Maryland voters resent politicians on both sides of the aisle who show up only to shower empty campaign promises when the margin for victory gets slim. The old-boy network in the Maryland Democrats' cabal couldn't reward its loyal black constituency by backing a single black candidate in a bid for a powerful statewide office. Then, they feared backlash from black Democrats, as they should, now that the folks they have traditionally taken for granted have a viable alternative.

The Republicans upped the ante by fielding a more attractive, articulate foe than the Democrats' pedestrian Mr. Cardin.

In response, the white Democratic Party leaders have done their best to paint Mr. Steele as a puppet for the Republicans whom they suggest are determined to return their water boy and his people to those bygone Southern Maryland farms to harvest tobacco.

Talk about a picture speaking a thousand words. Should all Maryland voters be offended by the spectacle of a lineup of suited white men preaching fire and brimstone to a black audience about why they should stick with the very people who passed them over? At the eleventh hour to add "hope" to the mix of fear, they serve up "the first black president," Bill Clinton, or the future first black vice-presidential candidate, Sen. Barack Obama.

"Give us free," says the frustrated slave in "Amistad."

No "EHarmony" here. Clearly politicians of every hue and stripe must think voters can't see through their thinly veiled, self-serving divisive rhetoric.

VP Bill? Depends On Meaning Of 'Elected' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083765

The prospective presidential candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton has given rise to plenty of speculation about the notion of Bill Clinton as the nation's first gentleman. But what about another role? How about, say, vice president?

Politically, of course, the idea is a non-starter for all sorts of reasons. But that doesn't stop the parlor games, especially on the Internet. The issue came up last week during a chat on washingtonpost.com: What if Hillary picked Bill as her running mate? A Post reporter rashly dismissed the idea as unconstitutional. But that only proved the dangers of unedited journalism. The answer, it turns out, is not so simple.

A subsequent sampling of opinion from professors of constitutional law, former White House lawyers and even a couple of federal judges reveals a simmering disagreement on whether a president who has already served two terms can be vice president. Some agree with the conclusion that the presidential term limit embedded in the Constitution bars someone such as Clinton from returning to the White House even in the No. 2 slot. Others, though, call that a misreading of the literal language of the law.

As the former president might say, it all depends on the meaning of the word "elected." Under Article II of the Constitution, a person is "eligible to the Office of President" as long as he or she is a natural-born U.S. citizen, at least 35 years old and a resident of the United States for 14 years. The 12th Amendment says "no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President."

Okay, so that means if you're not eligible to be president, you're not eligible to be vice president. Makes sense. What would be the point of electing a vice president who can't succeed the president in case of death, incapacity or vacancy?

But then Congress and the states added the 22nd Amendment in 1951 to prevent anyone from following the example of Franklin D. Roosevelt, who won four terms. That's where things get dicey. "No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice," the 22nd Amendment says.

On its face, that seems to suggest that Clinton could be vice president because he is only barred from being elected president a third time, not from serving as president. That's the argument of Scott E. Gant, a partner at Boies, Schiller & Flexner in Washington, and Bruce G. Peabody, an assistant professor of political science at Fairleigh Dickinson University in New Jersey. The two wrote a law review article in 1999 called "The Twice and Future President" and reprised the argument this summer in the Christian Science Monitor.

"In preventing individuals from being elected to the presidency more than twice, the amendment does not preclude a former president from again assuming the presidency by means other than election, including succession from the vice presidency," they wrote. "If this view is correct, then Clinton is not 'constitutionally ineligible to the office of president,' and is not barred by the 12th Amendment from being elected vice president."

Others share that opinion. Three former White House lawyers consulted by The Washington Post (two who served President Bush and one who served Clinton) agreed that the amendment would not bar Clinton from the vice presidency. A federal judge, who noted that he has "no views on the matter," said the plain language of the amendment would seem to allow Clinton to "become president through succession."

Kathleen M. Sullivan, director of the Stanford Constitutional Law Center, said the 22nd Amendment, "as I read it, does not preclude a Clinton-Clinton ticket." She added: "Bill, if elected VP, could become president in the event that President Hillary became incapacitated; he just could not run for reelection from that successor post."

Still, that view is not universal. Judge Richard A. Posner of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit said by e-mail that "read literally, the 22nd Amendment does not apply" and therefore Clinton could be vice president. "But one could argue that since the vice president is elected . . . should he take office he would be in effect elected president. Electing a vice president means electing a vice president and contingently electing him as president. That interpretation, though a little bold, would honor the intention behind the 22nd Amendment."

Bruce Ackerman, a constitutional scholar at Yale Law School, also pointed to original intent in addressing the issue in his book this year, "Before the Next Attack: Preserving Civil Liberties in the Age of Terrorism." The amendment, he wrote, "represents a considered judgment by the American People, after Franklin Roosevelt's lengthy stay in the White House, which deserves continuing respect" and "should not be eroded" by a narrow interpretation allowing someone to manipulate his way to a third term.

DOJ_NMG_0083766

Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California at Los Angeles who was a clerk for Sandra Day O'Connor when she was on the Supreme Court, focused on the broader meaning of the language in the amendment in reaching the same conclusion. "My tentative answer is that 'eligible' roughly means 'elected,' " he wrote on his Web site, the Volokh Conspiracy, this summer, meaning that if Clinton cannot be elected president, he is no longer eligible at all.

One constitutional lawyer not heard from on the issue is William Jefferson Clinton, Yale Law class of 1973. But he has offered thoughts on the 22nd Amendment. Before leaving office and again in 2003, he suggested amending the amendment to let a two-term president leave office and then run again: "Since people are living much longer . . . the 22nd Amendment should probably be modified to say two consecutive terms instead of two terms for a lifetime."

Now, who might he have had in mind?

Ehrlich Vows To Spend $338 Million Next Year (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. pledged yesterday to spend at least $338 million on school construction in the next fiscal year, matching what the state is spending this year.

The Republican incumbent's announcement, made at a school in the Frederick area, comes during a heated reelection campaign against a Democratic challenger who has made a big issue of school construction.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley has pledged to spend $400 million next fiscal year to make up for what he has characterized as insufficient funding during the early part of Ehrlich's term, resulting in too many "temporary learning shacks" on school grounds across the state.

Aides to Ehrlich said yesterday that the governor's announcement, less than three weeks before Election Day, was driven not by the political calendar but by the law. Ehrlich spokesman Henry Fawell said the law required the governor to provide a preliminary estimate of funding to legislative leaders by mid-October.

Ehrlich said this year's funding level is the highest in 30 years.

But O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese said Ehrlich's announcement was more evidence of "the two Bob Ehrlichs."

"Three weeks before the election, he says he's going to fund school construction. But when he has the power, he cuts funding," Abbruzzese said.

He was referring to the first part of Ehrlich's term, when, grappling with projected state budget deficits, the governor proposed significantly cutting school construction money from levels granted under his Democratic predecessor.

During Ehrlich's first two budget years, the state authorized $106.5 million and $116.6 million, respectively, on school construction.

A state commission has recommended that Maryland spend at least $250 million a year.

"We will continue making substantial investments in school construction so that every child learns in a safe and modernized school," Ehrlich said during his appearance at the groundbreaking for Oakdale High School for 1,600 students.

Young Republicans Now Flourishing At Liberal Berkeley (WSJ)

By Pui-wing Tam

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

BERKELEY, Calif. -- The University of California at Berkeley has been notable for firebrand leftist students like Mario Savio. The 1960s leader of the Free Speech Movement staged sit-ins on campus to demand students' rights to academic freedom and free speech. On a recent Thursday, one of the university's new generation of student leaders was playing with a life-size cardboard cutout of Ronald Reagan.

"Elect Ronald Reagan," called out Josiah Prendergast, before unfolding the cutout on a grassy field on the Berkeley campus. After propping up the late Republican president, the 21-year-old reached into a bag and pulled out stickers and buttons featuring the slogans "Support Our Troops" and "Schwarzenegger: Protecting the California Dream."

A political-science major, Mr. Prendergast, a college senior, is serving his second term as president of the Berkeley College Republicans. Faculty, administrators and student-government officials all say the conservative organization, which has about 650 members, has become one of the campus's biggest student groups, outstripping its main rival, the Cal Berkeley Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0083767

On this day, Mr. Prendergast was busy recruiting college freshmen. He and some friends were attending "Calapalooza," an annual event at which new students sign up to join campus organizations. He figures the new blood could potentially help California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, and other Republican politicians.

"Don't be scared," Mr. Prendergast yelled out, as college kids walked by. "We don't bite."

The growth of the Berkeley College Republicans at one of the nation's most liberal campuses echoes some broader political trends. At Berkeley, while leftist students still dominate and outnumber conservatives, the liberal groups have splintered and are now spread across factions from the Cal Democrats to the International Socialist Organization to groups formed to oppose the war in Iraq. At the same time, several faculty members say, there are more conservative-leaning students than in the past, propelled by swells of patriotic feeling after events like Sept. 11 and an increase in the number of religious student groups.

The modus operandi of the Berkeley Republicans over the past few years has been to be provocative. In 2003, its members opposed affirmative action with an "Affirmative Action Bake Sale," where students paid for pastries on a sliding scale: White students were charged more, while Hispanics and African-Americans paid less. Under Mr. Prendergast's presidency, the group this year protested the People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, by giving away hot dogs and encouraging students to eat meat. Mr. Prendergast also held an "Anti Antiwar Rally" in nearby San Francisco, and staged a "Dunk a Republican" contest. The group gets several thousand dollars a year from the Berkeley student government. It also does its own fund raising and will sometimes get donations from local Republicans and others.

The splashy tactics have sometimes aroused the ire of campus liberals. Scott Lucas, president of the Cal Democrats through last May, says the Republican club cheats on membership numbers because it doesn't charge dues as other student groups do. But Mr. Lucas acknowledges that the Cal Dems are now "a hair" smaller than the Republican club.

For Republicans, the ascendant Berkeley group is a cause for celebration. Dan Schnur, communications director for John McCain's 2000 presidential run and now a lecturer at Berkeley, often speaks to Republican groups around the state and talks about how the Berkeley Republican students have become a big student club on the liberal campus. "At first, the audiences are surprised, and then they're inspired," Mr. Schnur says. "It has a tremendous motivating effect" in mobilizing Republican voters.

The strength of the Berkeley Republican students is surprising given that the club barely existed in the late 1990s. A revival began in 2000, when several new students restructured the group to hold social activities as well as engage in political debates and attend Republican conventions. They also founded a conservative publication called the Patriot. To spread the conservative gospel, the club has set up a Web site, created an alumni database, regularly brings speakers to campus and holds weekly meetings.

When Mr. Prendergast enrolled at Berkeley in 2003, he quickly became active in the group and was elected its president in 2005. A grandson of the late Spalding G. Wathen, a land developer in California's Central Valley, Mr. Prendergast grew up in Fresno, in what he calls a "gospel family." The family was conservative -- Mr. Wathen helped break a local plumbers union in the 1980s -- and Mr. Prendergast followed the same ideology. He decided to go to Berkeley when he was rejected by his first-choice college, the U.S. Naval Academy. "I thought it'd be a fun challenge," he says.

Mr. Prendergast, who hopes to go to law school, has grand ideas for the club in his final year at Berkeley. Over the summer, he held an offsite retreat with his executive board to sketch out plans, including campaigning door-to-door and showing up at rallies for conservative politicians for the November elections. To raise funds, he is organizing an Oct. 28 golf outing. And to raise student awareness and beef up membership, the group recently staged a "Conservative Coming Out Parade."

Such tactics have helped Mr. Prendergast recruit students like Kevin Ligutom, who transferred to UC Berkeley from a junior college in nearby Hayward, Calif., in August. Mr. Ligutom, 21, isn't a Republican (he's registered as an independent voter) but was intrigued to find the conservative club on campus. After attending several of the club's meetings, he says he was impressed by the guest speakers the group brought in and how the group's members rallied to attend state Republican meetings.

"At their first meeting, they had a local Republican politician talk," says Mr. Ligutom. "And Josiah isn't just sitting around in a circle with everyone and complaining about things." Mr. Ligutom, who has since worked the phones for some Republican politicians along with the group, says he plans to remain active in the club.

DOJ_NMG_0083768

Being a Republican at a liberal college isn't easy. Andrea Rasmussen, 22, an integrative biology and anthropology major who is a vice president of the club, says some fellow students once threatened to shoot her for her conservative beliefs. Mr. Prendergast, who also works as a local restaurant waiter, says some of his friends have been spat on and called fascists.

At the Calapalooza event, meanwhile, more freshmen were wandering by and picking up the club's fliers, which exhorted them to "Come Out of the Political Closet." Mr. Prendergast and Ms. Rasmussen, along with group treasurer Ben Chapman, answered questions and pitched the club as "a social outlet with conservative students." An hour into the event, they had signed up around 35 students. But they ultimately fell short of their goal of 150, netting around 100 registrations by the end of the three-hour event, with an additional 20 or so signups online.

During Calapalooza, held in late August, UC Berkeley Chancellor Robert Birgeneau walked by. When he saw President Reagan's cardboard figure, the chancellor chuckled and stopped to talk.

"I gave an interview to a British newspaper recently, and the journalist asked me about Berkeley's liberalism," said Mr. Birgeneau to the group. "I had to tell him that the largest student political group on campus is Republican. You should've seen him: He was so disappointed."

Joe Lieberman Rediscovers Belief In Connecticut (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

We see where the Democrats are laying in cases of champagne to celebrate their Nov. 7 victory in the congressional elections. If as seems possible control of the Senate turns on a single seat, attention will return to one probable winner who likely won't be in the Democratic clubhouse spraying bubbly that night -- Joe Lieberman.

Sen. Lieberman is going to defeat the Ned Lamont "insurgency" from the Democratic left. Now what?

His lead in the most recent polls runs between 8 and 13 points. It is safe to assume that if the Democrats win next month, they won't be urging reporters to focus on the Lieberman victory in Connecticut. This wasn't supposed to happen.

What was supposed to happen is that Joe Lieberman was supposed to go away. After Ned Lamont defeated Mr. Lieberman in the primary, a procession of his Senate friends traveled ostentatiously to Connecticut to recreate the scene in "Godfather II" where Tom Hagen tells Frank Pentangeli about how marked guys went away in the time of the Roman Empire. "Yeah," said Frankie, "and their families were taken care of." Hagen: "A nice deal."

That was a movie. Instead of a political corpse, the Democratic Party is about to get its own version of John McCain -- a shrewd and independent maverick. By the accounts of friends and associates, Joe Lieberman feels "liberated" and "unshackled."

Back in 2000, as Al Gore's running mate, Joe Lieberman did what the party asked him to do. He threw over some of his core beliefs, as on affirmative action and school vouchers, and swept left in a way that made his bipartisan admirers cringe. After the Lamont defeat, he could have slicked together a campaign that threw sops to Greenwich's liberals and held his Democratic base (he got 48% in the primary).

Didn't happen. In terms of what comes next for Mr. Lieberman and his party, the signal event in this campaign is his Sept. 25 speech to the Veterans of Foreign War in East Hampton. It's about Iraq. This speech could serve as a template for Democratic Party policy on Iraq after the election -- but it won't.

In August, just weeks before the Lamont antiwar frenzy crested, 12 Democrats led by Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi sent President Bush a letter urging the start of withdrawal from Iraq by the end of 2006 and a reduced mission there. That's the party's current business model. It was the energy source that the progressive blogosphere took into Connecticut. Sen. Lieberman is running straight at it.

His East Hampton VFW speech describes bringing the troops home prematurely as a "formula for defeat and disaster." He restates his support for Saddam's overthrow, criticizes rank partisanship in a time of war, praises Iraq's democratic progress and ends by offering an alternative strategy for avoiding defeat.

It includes resolving the crucial issue of sharing Iraq's oil revenues, ending the out-rotation of the U.S.'s best military commanders, accelerating the logistical support system for Iraq's army and, most interestingly, increasing the overall force structure of the Army and Marine Corps to face future threats.

DOJ_NMG_0083769

Sen. Lieberman says the troops he has spoken to want to see the job finished in a way that honors their service and sacrifice: "We owe it to them not to give up and walk off the battlefield before the job is done."

He proposes forming a "bipartisan Iraq working group" when Congress reconvenes in January made up of senior members of the relevant committees who would meet regularly with the president. It could happen. If the Democrats take the Senate, Sen. Lieberman is in line to chair the committee on homeland security.

There is talk of the ever-present Democratic "insurgency" on the left organizing to prevent Mr. Lieberman from gaining the committee chairmanship. That will happen if the Republicans are lucky, leaving Sen. Lieberman as a cherished but ignored party eccentric. But it could be back luck for the GOP if the Democrats take a close look at what is winning in Connecticut.

Sen. Lieberman is probably going to carry the Democratic vote in places like the Naugatuck Valley around Waterbury -- blue-collar, culturally conservative Reagan Democrats deeply discomfited by the war but unwilling to truck with a Vietnam-like pullout. He is pulling well in the suburbs around New Haven, home to knowledge-based industries in the biosciences, information and health. In the Republican stronghold of Fairfield County, where incumbent GOP Congressman Chris Shays may lose, a new internal Lieberman poll puts him up 15 points.

A diverse in-migration of Republicans is helping Mr. Lieberman. Maine Sen. Susan Collins, a moderate, will be in the state today for him. Jack Kemp arrives next week for stops in New London and Mystic. Most intriguing, New York City's nominally Republican mayor Mike Bloomberg is about to hold his third fund-raiser for Sen. Lieberman.

For fans of political irony, this is a wonderful race. The blog-based Democratic insurgents created the Lamont movement. But after receiving investiture from party elders Kennedy, Dodd and Kerry, Mr. Lamont was the candidate of the Washington establishment. Driven from the compound, Joe Lieberman was now the man not "of" politics-as-usual.

Unlike in 2000, Joe Lieberman is running this time on his beliefs, something he probably thought a lot about while pulling the knives out in August. The Democratic Party lost in 2000 and 2004 by running liberals who couldn't get across the goal line. The 2008 party desperately needs a belief-based centrist, with national name recognition, to hold off McCain, Romney or Giuliani. If perchance Hillary falters . . . It won't happen, but for a reborn winner, even the dreams are sweet solace.

Massachusetts, Back In The Game (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

BOSTON -- Massachusetts is often down in presidential politics, but never out.

The state that gave the United States two of its first six presidents has not had a presidential winner since John F. Kennedy in 1960. The most recent entries, Michael Dukakis and John Kerry, were dispatched by different

Bushes.

But in a state where, as the late Mary McGrory once noted, every baby is born with a campaign manager's gene, the political players are as resilient as Red Sox fans.

Astonishingly, the hottest 2008 presidential contender from this very Democratic state is a Republican, Gov. Mitt Romney. He insists, as the scripture might have it, that he may be in Massachusetts but he's surely not of it.

In an interview with Elizabeth Mehren of the Los Angeles Times earlier this month, Romney admitted that, had he known he would go into national politics, he would have been "a lot smarter to stay in Michigan," where his father, George Romney, was governor in the 1960s. He regularly excoriates the legalization of same-sex marriage by "activist judges" in his current home state who "struck a blow to the foundation of civilization, the family."

With Romney leaving the statehouse to go national, his designated successor is Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, a down-the-line loyalist -- until this year. Now, as Romney moves to the right, Healey moves the other way. After keeping mum about her differences with Romney for most of his term, she has split with his more conservative stances on a whole range of social issues, including stem cell research, abortion and same-sex civil unions.

"The poor woman has been forced to discover that she disagrees with him on all these issues," said Rep. Barney Frank, the state's most entertaining Democrat. "She should run her ads on the Discovery Channel."

DOJ_NMG_0083770

But another national political player looms in Deval Patrick, Healey's Democratic opponent. Patrick, who was in charge of the Justice Department's civil rights division under President Bill Clinton, has unleashed a sense of excitement among Massachusetts Democrats, who have had a lot to be glum about in recent years.

"I haven't seen anybody else since the Kennedys who had that way of energizing people," says Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, a tough-minded pro not given to extravagant expression. "They'd march through a wall for him."

In a state famed in the 1970s for bitter racial conflict over mandatory school busing, Patrick is an African American with cross-racial appeal. Frank describes Patrick as "bright and thoughtful and extremely competent and in command," and adds: "It's hard to attack this guy as a radical leftist."

But that's what Healey is trying to do with a series of brutal soft-on-crime attacks that bring to mind the ones that helped sink Dukakis's presidential candidacy in 1988. Healey has gone after Patrick for his efforts to seek a DNA test for a convicted rapist in the 1980s. Patrick has a strong defense, saying he dropped his support for the man when the DNA test was positive -- but he initially fumbled his explanation. Healey has also attacked Patrick for serving as a defense lawyer for a convicted killer of a police officer. "While lawyers have a right to defend admitted cop killers," the announcer on one ad intones, "do we really want one as our governor?"

Healey's assaults cut Patrick's advantage in the polls, though he still leads by double digits, and the ads have invited an anti-Healey backlash. "That's what defense lawyers do," says Menino, a Democrat, referring to the murder case. "I'm lucky I'm not a lawyer."

Patrick is commonly compared to another talented African American, Sen. Barack Obama, but many Massachusetts Democrats think the best analogy is between Patrick and Clinton, who campaigned for his former appointee this week and plans to visit again.

A Boston Globe reporter recently read Patrick a politician's long riff about "hope" vs. "fear." Patrick couldn't tell whether the words were his or Clinton's. (They were Clinton's.)

If Healey wins, Romney will claim credit for ensuring his succession in an ideologically unfriendly state, even if Healey did have to toss Romney's social conservatism over the side. But Menino's money is on Patrick for an interesting reason. "We're void of passion," Menino says of politics generally and of his Democratic Party in particular, and Patrick has it. "You see it in his face."

Imagine: A state famous for producing hard-core political pros, practical precinct captains and worldly wise consultants may be on the verge of creating two new export commodities: an attractive central-casting conservative governor and a young passionate idealist. Anything to keep Massachusetts in the game.

Black Candidates, A Welcome Norm (USAT)

Commentary By Joyce King

USA Today, October 20, 2006

An older black woman once told me: “You drive a Volvo and talk proper. You must be a black Republican.” She likely didn't know that latte-drinking Volvo owners are more closely associated with Democrats.

These days, you can't look at black people and assume anything. While most blacks are Democrats, Republicans are gradually finding converts. Yet, no matter which party blacks favor on Nov. 7, this trend is good news for the political process: A record number of black candidates are posing serious bids for high-level offices never held by blacks:

•Governor. Democrat Deval Patrick is leading in the Massachusetts race. If he wins, he will become the first black to hold that office. Another black, former NFL star Lynn Swann, is running as a Republican in Pennsylvania. In Ohio, it's Republican Kenneth Blackwell. These men are prime examples of what should matter most: qualifications, not color. Only one black has been elected governor: Virginia's Douglas Wilder in 1989.

•Lieutenant governor. Black candidates are running strong campaigns in New York, where state senator David Paterson is expected to win, and in Maryland, where Democrat Anthony Brown, on the ticket with gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley, is favored. Paterson would become the first black lieutenant governor for his state; Brown would be the second in Maryland, succeeding Michael Steele, an African-American running for U.S. Senate. Daryl Jones is Florida's first black nominee for the office, but he is trailing.

DOJ_NMG_0083771

•Senate. Another closely watched race is in Tennessee, where Democratic Rep. Harold Ford narrowly leads his GOP opponent. If Ford wins, he'll be the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction.

David Bositis of the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies says Democrats Ford and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama are from a new generation of black leaders: Ivy Leaguers who focus less on opening new doors for blacks and more on taking advantage of those already opened. On the GOP side, Bositis says, Steele and Blackwell are candidates who won statewide office by advocating policies not generally popular with blacks, such as tax cuts, deregulation and limiting social services.

This year, 51 black candidates — 43 Democrats and eight Republicans — are running for House seats.

"We the people" don't all drive Volvos or espouse the same political values. Neither do black candidates. With more and more African-American candidates moving into the mainstream, voters can focus more on qualifications and less on hue; just as it should be.

It's Voter-Fooling Time In America (NYT)

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

The homestretch of the campaign season historically puts treacherous distortions of the truth before the voters, none more so this year than a mysterious California letter informing thousands of Latino-Americans that immigrants have no right to vote. "You are advised," begins the Spanish-language letter, dripping with authority, that if "you're an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration." It now appears that someone in a Republican Congressional campaign conjured a contemporary spin on a classic scare tactic from torchlight politics.

Comparable outrages surface daily now, with an ad for black voters in six states misrepresenting the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s politics in a staged chat between two black women: "Dr. King was a real man," says one actress. "You know he was a Republican," the other chimes in.

Democrats are no less tempted to flash bare-knuckle mischief. In a prime example, Representative Nancy Johnson, a Connecticut Republican, is being portrayed by Chris Murphy, the Democrat, as heartlessly unresponsive to a woman whose child needed insurance coverage for a cleft lip and palate. Of course, Ms. Johnson has represented Mr. Murphy as being opposed to the surveillance of terrorists.

So it goes, with some ethically challenged spinners creating false news clippings and tucking them knifelike into campaign videos of real stories. Even Lincoln is being falsely quoted by defenders of the Iraq war. The 16th president never said that Congressional critics who damage wartime morale "should be arrested, exiled or hanged."

One of the more widespread canards is rooted in the divisive and fruitless immigration debate. Democrats in more than two dozen races are being falsely accused of wanting to give Social Security benefits to illegal immigrants — a distortion of a proposal to actually block immigrants from being credited for benefit days worked before they had legal status. One Web site coated with obvious racism and xenophobia is MuchasGraciasDebbie.com, which skewers Senator Debbie Stabenow, Democrat of Michigan, dressing her digitally in a sombrero, grinning and declaring, "No problema!"

What to do, beyond celebrating the continuing pungency of free speech across the nation? The most obvious answer is that voters need to pay ever closer attention to what the candidates say in this world of mixed media and mixed messages. The Internet is a powerful ally.

The head of Google, Eric Schmidt, is cautioning politicians stuck in the sound-bite era that "truth predictor" software is in the works so that computer-wise voters will be instantaneously able to check on the probability, if not the certainty, of what candidates claim as fact. Actually, careful parsing of egregiously misleading campaign ads is already available on the Web at factcheck.org, a nonprofit service that thinks voters should be treated as intelligent consumers entitled to the plain facts. If only the candidates saw it that way.

Tax Cut Convert (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

In an otherwise bad year for Republicans, one GOP incumbent doing well is Alabama Governor Bob Riley, in large part for the ironic reason that he failed to raise taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0083772

Three years ago Mr. Riley told voters it was their "Christian duty" to approve a $1.2 billion tax hike he wanted to plug a $675 million deficit. His crusade briefly became a national story, as the press played up a GOP tax-raiser. We chimed in that this seemed like a bad idea and were chided by all sorts of Alabama Republicans who said we didn't understand the state. However, voters -- many of them even Christian -- opposed the tax hike by two-to-one in a special election, forcing lawmakers to restrain spending instead.

Mr. Riley is now running for re-election and it seems he has converted to supply-side economics. Sitting on a $1 billion budget surplus and faced with an opportunity to hand his party control of the legislature for the first time in more than 130 years, the Governor is preaching tax cuts like a true believer. He has already pushed through an income tax cut that will kick in come January. And if given a second term, he promises another round of income and property tax cuts that would eventually save residents about $250 million a year.

With the economy booming -- the unemployment rate is near a record low at 3.5% -- even some Democrats are starting to believe. Mr. Riley's Democratic opponent, Lieutenant Governor Lucy Baxley, has her own property tax cut on the table and hopes voters will have more faith in her promises than a Governor who wavered on taxes once before.

Mr. Riley has given himself a little wiggle room by also proposing "triggers" to delay his tax cuts if revenue dedicated to education doesn't increase by at least 3% a year (it's up by more than 10% this year). But should he win next month -- and he is running ahead -- it will be the second time Alabama voters have rejected higher taxes in three years. In politics, that's enough to make a believer out of anyone.

Charities Tackle Accountability (WSJ)

By Sally Beatty

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

As charity and foundation heads gather for their annual meeting in Minneapolis this weekend, a key issue will be accountability -- and whether the $3.37 trillion nonprofit sector is capable of policing itself.

Two years ago, the Senate Finance Committee told nonprofit leaders it was considering "comprehensive reforms to protect charities from bad actors and strengthen their accountability to donors." The warning followed public outrage over disclosures about costly perks being reaped by private foundations and questions about governance practices at the Nature Conservancy, the American Red Cross and other nonprofit organizations.

In response, Independent Sector, the leading umbrella organization representing charities and foundations, organized a blue-ribbon panel to discuss overhauls and make recommendations, including a redesign of the tax form charities file to the Internal Revenue Service.

Since then, Congress has focused on reining in abuses by donor-advised funds (which allow donors to take a tax deduction for gifts to a charitable fund that may be distributed later) and by nonprofit hospitals. It also cracked down on charities flouting the strict limits placed on political activity. Still unresolved are concerns about the patchwork of financial reporting made by nonprofits.

Despite headlines over Warren Buffett's $31 billion pledge to the foundation of his good friend Bill Gates in June, much of the growth in the nonprofit sector in recent years has come from much smaller charities. Today there are at least one million U.S. charities and foundations, excluding religious groups, up nearly 60% in the past decade. But only about a third of tax-exempt organizations file IRS returns. Under IRS rules, only organizations with annual revenue of $25,000 or more are required to file a detailed financial statement annually.

Facing the threat of stricter regulation, Independent Sector asked Congress last year to require any charitable organization with $1 million or more in annual revenue, including donations and earnings on assets, to have its financial statements audited each year. But it believes it is "too onerous" to require all charities to do so.

Currently, the IRS statement required of charities, called Form 990, offers the public the best look at individual charity finances. But nonprofit officials say many groups routinely leave out important details required by the form, such as addresses of recipients of charity dollars. The IRS is preparing to overhaul Form 990 to make it easier for the public to understand it. It also is planning to require that the form be filed electronically, which could make it easier for the agency to spot abuses by nonprofits. ***

DOJ_NMG_0083773

GIFT OF THE WEEK / From Jeans to African Studies

WHO GAVE IT: Thomas W. and Pauline Tusher

HOW MUCH: $10 million over five years

WHO GOT IT: California Academy of Sciences, San Francisco

BY REQUEST: The funds will help rebuild the academy's African Hall as part of a $429 million reconstruction of the entire institution.

YOUR NAME HERE: Tusher African Center, which will house the rebuilt African Hall, and the Pauline Tusher Education Facility

HOW IT HAPPENED: Tom Tusher, former president of Levi Strass & Co., was playing tennis at a country club in Ross, Calif., about five years ago when he ran into John W. Larsen, a trustee of the California Academy of Sciences. The two got to talking about the academy, and Mr. Larsen invited the Tushers to several academy benefit dinners. Mr. Tusher had retired from Levi in 1997 and was thinking more seriously about philanthropy.

In 2000, the academy hired architect Renzo Piano to design a new structure, which will include "environmentally sensitive materials" such as insulation made of recycled fiber from bluejeans -- though not necessarily Levi's brand -- and sustainably harvested wood. Mr. Larsen and Mr. Tusher subsequently spoke about Mrs. Tusher's upbringing in Africa (she was born in the U.S. to English parents and moved to Nairobi at age 6), and whether the couple would be interested in supporting the new African center, which will include dioramas about African wildlife and a live penguin exhibit. Since then, other Tusher family members have become involved in the academy, where Mr. Tusher is a trustee. In 2005, son Gregory Tusher joined the academy's investment committee and daughter-in-law Virginia Tusher, a scientist, joined the academy's education committee.

Mr. Tusher, 65 years old, says this is his family's largest single gift to date.

Calif. Ballot Battle Over Big Oil May Be Costliest In U.S. History (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 19 -- Call it the battle of Big Oil vs. Silicon Valley with a whole lot of Hollywood funding thrown in. Oil companies are squaring off against venture capitalists in a fight over a California proposition that would tax oil production in the state to fund alternative energy.

To date, $107 million has been raised in the fight. If it is all spent, it will make Proposition 87 the most expensive proposition in the nation's history, dwarfing the $93 million epic, also in California, to legalize Las Vegas-style casinos on Indian reservations in 1998. Oil companies, including Chevron; Aera Energy, a partnership of Shell Oil and Exxon Mobil; and Occidental Petroleum have given more than $60 million to oppose the measure. On the other side is a coalition of environmentalists and venture capitalists led by John Doerr, a partner at the Silicon Valley venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, and former partners Vinod Khosla and William Randolph Hearst III. The 800-pound gorilla in that camp is Hollywood mogul Stephen Bing, who has donated $40 million.

"This is a huge amount of money," said John Matsusaka, the director of the Initiative and Referendum Institute at the University of Southern California. "Bush and Kerry spent $250 million for a national election. This measure is costing nearly half that for a local issue in one state."

The idea behind Proposition 87, formally known as the Clean Alternative Energy Act, is simple. Oil companies, the proposition's backers charge, have not spent enough on alternative energy in the state that consumes the most oil and has the dirtiest air. So it's time that the government forced them to do so.

Prop. 87 would impose a tax of 1.5 to 6 percent per barrel of oil extracted from California, generating $225 million to $485 million a year in new tax revenue. California provides 12 percent of the U.S. oil supply and 40 percent of the state's supply. This money would create a $4 billion fund that would be used to develop alternative energy, with the goal of cutting petroleum consumption by 25 percent in 10 years. The measure also prohibits oil companies from passing the tax on to consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0083774

In addition to strong financial backing from Silicon Valley and Hollywood, several political, business and entertainment luminaries have rallied to the measure's cause. Among them are former president Bill Clinton, who addressed a rally on Oct. 14 of 5,000 in Los Angeles in favor of Prop. 87; former vice president Al Gore, who cut his first political commercial since the 2000 presidential campaign in favor of Prop. 87; Richard Branson, the British entrepreneur; and actress Julia Roberts.

Yes on 87's campaign strategy has been to demonize the oil companies and to raise the specter of foreign oil imports and global warming. "We buy their oil, they burn our flag," intoned the announcer on one ad that featured a photograph of King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and a Middle East mob. And in a state where Big Oil is as popular as earthquakes and even the Republican governor's Hummer is a hybrid, that strategy might seem like a winner. But support for Prop. 87, which had been in the double digits in July, is slipping. A Field Poll released earlier this month showed voters nearly evenly split on the measure.

One reason is the onslaught of ads funded by oil company money. As with any measure focused against multinational corporations, Matsusaka said, Big Oil "is trying to signal to anyone else contemplating similar measures that if you're going to take on the industry, you are going to have to spend a ton of money." The No on 87 campaign ads say that gas prices will rise and that the measure will actually increase, not lessen, California's dependence on foreign oil by forcing producers to stop pumping oil from their wells in the state. Independent economists have challenged that logic, saying energy prices are set globally, not locally.

There is also growing concern, expressed by economists and editorialists, about the state agency the measure would create and how the $4 billion would be distributed. The Los Angeles Times called the formation of a whole new government bureaucracy to fund alternative energy, already a prime target of venture capital, a "spectacularly bad idea." Indeed, of the 24 papers in California that have editorialized on the issue, only two have supported it.

Taxpayer groups have lambasted the measure, saying the new bureaucracy would be unfettered by normal checks and balances. And even energy economists worry that the proposition would simply create a taxpayer-funded piggy bank to subsidize the investments of Silicon Valley's richest venture capitalists, such as Doerr and Khosla, who are backing the measure.

Responding to those criticisms, Leslie Miller, a spokeswoman for the Yes on 87 campaign, acknowledged that firms associated with the measure's supporters could benefit but said that others would, too.

"It's going to be kids driving in clean-energy school buses," she said.

Although she acknowledged that alternative energy is already attracting millions in investment, Miller contended the program is necessary because "at a certain point you need government investment in order to propel implementation."

"This is not corporate welfare, this is venture-capitalist welfare, and that bothers me," countered James Sweeney, an economist at Stanford University who is starting a new institute that could profit from the energy fund. "I think they've chosen a bad instrument for a good goal."

Rice Presses S. Korea To Pursue Full Sanctions (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

SEOUL, Oct. 19 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed the South Korean government on Thursday to fully implement U.N.-authorized sanctions against North Korea for its nuclear test, but she encountered reluctance among officials in Seoul, who fear that tough action could lead to increased tensions and even war.

South Korean officials said they had deferred decisions on whether to suspend two cross-border business projects with North Korea -- the Mount Kumgang tourist resort and the Kaesong Industrial Park.

Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon said the government would evaluate its participation in light of the new U.N. Security Council resolution that punishes North Korea by halting trade in weapons, luxury goods and other items. He noted that the Kumgang resort, which provides about $13 million a year in hard currency for North Korea, is a "very symbolic project" for the two countries, separated since World War II.

Before Rice landed in Seoul, one of the government's top officials was quoted in local newspapers as saying South Korea could not be left at the whims of the United States, given that the United States "has fought more wars than any other nation." Song Min Soon, chief presidential secretary for security, later softened his remarks in a telephone interview, explaining that while the "United States has global interests," it was also important for the U.S. government "to accept our interests" and "harmonize our needs in the U.S. global policy." He said the U.N. resolution would be implemented through "our view and our interpretation."

DOJ_NMG_0083775

Rice arrived here as the Chinese government announced that State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan had led a high-level delegation to Pyongyang and met with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il. A Chinese government spokesman said it was a "very significant" meeting but declined to provide details.

A senior State Department official traveling with Rice said China has taken a "rather dramatic shift" in its policy toward North Korea since the Stalinist country announced it had conducted a nuclear test on Oct. 9.

[At least four Chinese banks in recent days have halted transactions with North Korea, cutting off a major conduit for the isolated country to move its money to and from the outside world, the Wall Street Journal reported in Friday's editions.]

"I'm pretty convinced that the Chinese will have a very strong message about future tests," the official said, referring to intelligence reports that suggest preparation for a second test is underway. He spoke to reporters on Rice's plane under condition of anonymity, citing rules set by the State Department.

Tang, who as state councilor outranks the foreign minister in the Chinese system, visited Washington last week and then flew to Moscow before arriving in Pyongyang. He is scheduled to meet with Rice when she visits Beijing on Friday, but the official cautioned against any breakthrough. "Our understanding is that the North Koreans have not been in the mood to return" to negotiations, the U.S. official said. "If anything, they are looking to escalate the crisis further."

Throughout her tour of Asia, Rice has battled the perception that the United States is eager for an escalation. News media reports here have suggested that the United States wants to use the U.N. resolution to spur a dramatic confrontation with North Korea, such as a blockage or quarantine.

Asian officials have repeatedly cautioned against relying only on sanctions. Ban said that "sanctions are not made for the sake of sanctions," but as a way to draw North Korea back to negotiations. In Beijing, Rice's next stop, a Chinese government spokesman told reporters that "sanctions are a signal, not the goal."

At the news conference with Ban, Rice emphasized: "We want to leave open the path of negotiation. We don't want the crisis to escalate."

She added: "I did not come to South Korea, nor will I go anyplace else, to try and dictate to governments what they ought to do." But she urged other nations to "take stock of the leverage we have to get North Korea to return to the six-party talks" involving Russia and Japan in addition to the United States, China and the two Koreas.

Rice held lengthy talks with Ban, who was recently selected as the next U.N. secretary general, and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun. She then held a dinner with Ban and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso, which was intended to show trilateral solidarity after several years of bickering between South Korea and Japan -- and a worsening U.S.-South Korean relationship.

U.S. officials want South Korea to join the administration's Proliferation Security Initiative, a maritime exercise designed to thwart trade in weapons of mass destruction. South Korea was deliberately not invited when the program was started during President Bush's first term. The official traveling with Rice acknowledged that South Korea previously felt that joining it would be seen as a "provocative act" that would undermine its ability to influence North Korea.

Rice said that "there is a lot of misunderstanding" about the initiative, stressing that it is based on current legal authority and relies on intelligence, not "constant random inspection of ships." Rice said that while the United States wants to pay close attention to North Korean cargo, "there are many different ways in which this can be achieved," such as "container security initiatives" to detect potentially radioactive materials.

The senior U.S. official suggested there is concern about the stability of North Korea, a tightly controlled dictatorship. "A lot of us are wondering what is going on," the official said, adding it did not make sense for North Korea to test a weapon in defiance of China, its main benefactor.

"There should never be a second nuclear test, as it would further aggravate the current situation," Ban said. The United States and South Korea "shared an understanding that if it happened, there would be more grave consequences."

South Korea Tells Rice It Won't Abandon Industrial And Tourist Ventures With North (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0083776

By Thom Shanker And Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 19 — The government of South Korea told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday that it had no intention of pulling out of an industrial zone and a tourist resort in North Korea, even though the operations put hard currency into the pocket of its government.

During a news conference with Ms. Rice, the South Korean foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, said he had explained "the positive aspects" of the industrial park at Kaesong and described how the tourism zone around Mount Kumgang was "a very symbolic project" for reconciliation between the Koreas.

At the end of a dinner here on Thursday that united Ms. Rice with her South Korean and Japanese counterparts, a senior State Department official, speaking on the customary condition of anonymity when traveling with the secretary, said the South Korean government had said it would review its support for the industrial and tourist projects — in particular the subsidies for the Mount Kumgang zone.

"We never expected them to announce steps today," the official said.

In her public comments, at least, Ms. Rice only emphasized the importance of the United States alliance with South Korea. The goal is not to elevate tensions on the peninsula, but to put into effect sanctions under a United Nations Security Council resolution as a multinational effort to press North Korea to return to six-party negotiations and end its nuclear program, she said.

"I did not come to South Korea, nor will I go anyplace else, to try and dictate to governments what they ought to do in response to Resolution 1718," Ms. Rice said after meetings with President Roh Moo-hyun and Mr. Ban, who will be the next United Nations secretary general.

"What I do think is very important is that everyone take stock of the leverage that we have to get North Korea to return to the six-party talks and negotiate seriously the dismantlement of its nuclear weapons programs," she said.

Ms. Rice is in the region to press for strict enforcement of the Security Council's sanctions against North Korea for its nuclear test last week. Her toughest job will be persuading South Korea and China, which differ with the United States on how to engage North Korea's reclusive Communist government.

The senior State Department official said after the dinner that the South Koreans had said they would "have a full program in place" to carry out the resolution in about three weeks, and would not want to announce new steps while Ms. Rice was in town for fear of appearing to bow to American pressure.

South Korea and China hold the key to the effectiveness of the sanctions, which were passed Saturday after intense negotiations, because they share the longest borders with North Korea, and are by far its biggest economic partners. South Korea's trade with North Korea reached $1.06 billion last year.

Ms. Rice said that she had received no official Chinese report on a visit on Thursday by State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan to the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-il, but expressed certainty that he had delivered a strong message that North Korea's "behavior is unacceptable."

She is to fly to Beijing on Friday.

While the United States has long called for further isolating North Korea to discourage its nuclear ambitions, South Korea has taken a different course. Its decade-old policy of engagement has aimed to ensure peace on the peninsula by opening North Korea to trade, investment and economic interdependence.

The nuclear test raised calls in South Korea to re-examine the policy. But officials here have said the United Nations sanctions will not end broad economic and trade contacts with North Korea, a stand backed by South Korean public opinion.

State Department officials describe the tourism zone in particular as a conduit for cash for North Korean leaders. The project, which opens a revered mountain site and hot springs to foreign visitors, has earned North Korea more than $456.9 million in precious hard currency, said its South Korean developers, Hyundai Asan.

On Wednesday, Song Min-soon, a security adviser for President Roh, replied that the project "is not a policy to be changed following somebody's order to do this or that."

"We are not deviating from the international community only because we differ with a certain country," he told reporters. "I'm not going to name that country," he added, though the context made it clear he was referring to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0083777

In his comments beside Ms. Rice on Thursday, Mr. Ban said South Korea was awaiting more specific guidelines from a United Nations sanctions committee working on details of carrying out the resolution.

But many in South Korea see the United States as trying to drive a wedge between the Koreas, fueling resentment. In a show of support for the engagement policy, Kim Geun-tae, the chairman of South Korea's governing Uri Party, said he planned to visit the industrial park on Friday "to show symbolically that the inter-Korean economic cooperation projects must continue," the JoongAng Daily newspaper reported.

The Security Council sanctions bar the sale or transfer of material that could be used to make nuclear, biological and chemical weapons or ballistic missiles. They also forbid international travel and freeze overseas assets of people associated with North Korea's nuclear program.

Rice In China On Trickiest Leg Of NKorea Crisis Tour (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 20, 2006

BEIJING - US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has landed in China on the most delicate -- but potentially most promising -- leg of a tour to turn the screw on North Korea after its first atom bomb test.

Rice, who flew in from Seoul, landed just before 10:00 am (0200 GMT) for a hectic round of meetings with China's leaders, including President Hu Jintao, Premier Wen Jiabao and Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing.

On the eve of her visit to China, North Korea's closest ally and long-time protector, a Chinese presidential envoy met North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il in a bid to pull his Stalinist regime back from the nuclear brink.

No details emerged from Thursday's meeting between Kim and Tang Jiaxuan, who according to the Chinese foreign ministry delivered a message from Hu during what was described as a "significant" visit aimed at resolving the crisis.

A senior US official travelling with Rice said her talks in Beijing would focus on Tang's meeting with Kim, with the aim of finding out what came out of it and whether there were any signs of movement from Pyongyang.

US officials said Thursday that Tang was believed to have delivered "a very strong message" to North Korea not to carry out further weapons tests -- something Western intelligence services say is a real possibility.

The October 9 announcement of the impoverished nation's first nuclear test triggered global outrage and sweeping UN sanctions which China has promised to "faithfully implement," despite earlier reluctance.

China is North Korea's biggest trade and aid partner and holds the key to enforcing the UN embargo on shipments in and out of the country of weapons of mass destruction or related materials, as well as trade in luxury goods.

Tang's meeting in Pyongyang was all the more important in that the former Chinese foreign minister had met US President George W. Bush and Russian leaders days earlier.

Washington has long insisted that Chinese pressure is crucial to convincing Pyongyang to return to stalled six-party negotiations on ending its nuclear program.

Those talks reached a deal a year ago under which the North agreed to give up its nuclear arms in exchange for security guarantees and massive aid, but Pyongyang backed out in November to protest at US sanctions against a bank in Macau accused of counterfeiting and laundering money for the regime.

Beijing is reluctant to put too much pressure on the unstable and isolated nation, fearing its collapse would lead to South Korea, a key US ally, holding land all the way to its border and raising a specter of millions of starving refugees flooding the country.

Nevertheless, there have been signs this week along China's 1,400-kilometer (880-mile) border with North Korea that Chinese officials had begun inspecting cargo vehicles.

In Seoul, where Rice held three-way talks with her counterparts from South Korea and Japan, she expressed hope the Chinese envoy would convince the North Koreans to disarm and return to negotiations.

But a senior aide to the US secretary of state said "no breakthrough" was expected to be announced Friday, and revealed that Kim had kept Tang waiting 24 hours before finally meeting him.

DOJ_NMG_0083778

"Our understanding is the North Koreans have not been in a mood to return to the talks and if anything the North Koreans are looking to escalate the crisis further," the official said.

Rice is also expected to reassure the Chinese that neither South Korea or Japan will seek to arm themselves with nuclear weapons in response to North Korea's provocations.

In both Tokyo and Seoul, Rice this week repeated that Washington would "fully" honor defense agreements obliging it to defend both allies -- with nuclear weapons if needed -- in case either is attacked.

The UN resolution bans trade with North Korea related to its development of nuclear arms, ballistic missiles and other weapons of mass destruction, and imposes financial controls to starve the North Korean military of funds.

The most controversial measure calls for the inspection of cargo to and from North Korea, aimed at preventing its cash-strapped government selling material for an atomic bomb or other illicit weapons to terrorists.

Rice: Won't Coerce Allies On N. Korea (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 20, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday she would not try to dictate how U.S. allies enforce sanctions on North Korea for its nuclear program, and there were signs South Korea wouldn't quickly embrace Washington's approach.

"The key is to live up to the obligation that all of us undertook" to bar North Korea from exporting nuclear technology or receiving overseas help for its nuclear program, Rice said after meetings with South Korea's president and top diplomat.

South Korea and China are the communist North's closest neighbors and trading partners, accounting for two-thirds of its foreign commerce.

Both nations are pledged to carry out U.N. restrictions approved after North Korea's Oct. 9 test explosion of a small nuclear device, but they have hedged on details. Rice visits Chinese leaders Friday in Beijing.

In China, officials with four commercial banks said they have stopped moving funds in and out of North Korea, The Wall Street Journal Asia reported on its Web site Thursday, and one of the officials cited a ban ordered by Chinese regulators.

A senior U.S. official confirmed that the Chinese were taking "unusual measures" against the North Koreans in their banking system but would not elaborate. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice had not yet discussed the issue with her Chinese counterparts.

Rice is on a crisis mission to Asia to reinforce the sanctions and reassure jittery allies of U.S. support. But she played down differences over how to confront Pyongyang, and left U.S. expectations vague.

"I did not come to South Korea nor will I go anyplace else to try to dictate to governments what they ought to do," to enforce the U.N. mandate, Rice said at a news conference with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon.

Ban said Seoul will review the terms of economic projects it has undertaken with the North "in harmony and in line with the U.N. Security Council resolution and international demands," but he made no promises.

The United States is skeptical about a pair of landmark inter-Korean projects — a tourism venture and joint economic zone in North Korea — that are symbols of hopes for the peninsula's reunification. U.S. officials have suggested the tourism project in particular serves to funnel badly needed hard currency to the North Korean regime.

A senior State Department official traveling with Rice said Seoul is likely to announce changes to the projects or other means of meeting the sanctions requirement after Rice has left the region, so as not to appear to have caved to U.S. demands. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice's consultations were private.

South Korea has said it would fully comply with the sanctions but has also indicated it does not plan to halt key economic projects with the North.

North Korean Gen. Ri Chan Bok told ABC News that his country's nuclear weapons were "to defend our country and our people" and would not be sold for profit. He also said President Bush wants Pyongyang to "kneel."

At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow denied that Bush wanted North Korea to "kneel down," and said the U.S. was seeking a diplomatic accord with North Korea over its nuclear weapons. Snow said that included a "better economy, more security, better relations with their neighbors, integration into the global community, as opposed to isolation."

DOJ_NMG_0083779

Meanwhile, a Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, delivered North Korean leader Kim Jong Il a personal message from China's president on Thursday in the highest-level Chinese visit to its isolated ally since the nuclear test.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said Kim and the diplomat had "in-depth discussions" about the nuclear dispute.

"This is a very significant visit against the backdrop of major changes on the Korean Peninsula," Liu said at a news briefing. "We hope China's diplomatic efforts ... will bear fruit."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the Chinese diplomat was "carrying a very strong message from the Chinese government about the need for the North Koreans not to engage in additional nuclear tests and to move forward in terms of stopping their negative behavior."

But in a sign of the hurdles Rice faces in Beijing, Liu said that while China will "implement in earnest" the sanctions, they are "the means to an end, which is to solve the nuclear issue on the Korean Peninsula in a peaceful way."

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council with power to veto U.N. actions, is traditionally reluctant to punish the North. Besides ideological parallels between the Asian communist nations, Beijing fears that coming down too hard could topple the fragile government of Kim Jong Il and send hundreds of thousands of hungry refugees flooding across the border.

China signed on to the U.N. sanctions partly to rebuke North Korea for ignoring repeated Chinese warnings not to test-fire missiles or conduct a nuclear test. Beijing has since warned its neighbor against taking any further steps, such as a second nuclear test, that would heighten tensions.

Beijing's U.N. ambassador has indicated that inspectors will not board ships to search for equipment or material that can be used to make nuclear, chemical and biological weapons or ballistic missiles. China and South Korea worry that the North would consider the action provocative.

Cracks Appear In US-Korea Front (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

The US and South Korea tried to present a united front on the North Korean nuclear crisis on Thursday, again warning of "grave consequences" if there were a second test. But they remained at odds over how to punish Kim Jong-il's regime.

As China sent a special envoy to Pyongyang to speak directly to Mr Kim about last week's nuclear test, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, arrived in Seoul amid stern domestic criticism of Washington's apparent attempts to pressure the South Korean government to stop economic engagement with the North.

The South Korean government says it may "improve", rather than suspend its joint tourism and commercial projects with North Korea but US officials have made clear they view the Mount Kumgang tourist resort as a cash cow for the North. South Korea has sent about $950m (€758m, £508m) to North Korea since tours began in 1998.

Ms Rice told a news conference on Thursday, after meeting Roh Moo-hyun, South Korea's president, and Ban Ki-moon, foreign minister: "I did not come to South Korea, nor will I go anywhere else, to try to dictate to governments what they ought to do in response to [United Nations] resolution 1718.

"What I do think is very important is that everyone takes stock of the leverage we have to get North Korea to return to the six-party talks and to negotiate the serious dismantlement of its nuclear weapons programme."

The day before the talks, Song Min-soon, the president's chief security adviser, suggested at a conference that the US needed to pay more attention to South Korea's unique security situation, adding that the US "has fought more wars than any other nation in the history of its establishment and survival".

In addition to the inter-Korean co-operation projects, the two parties are at odds over South Korea's involvement in the proliferation security initiative aimed at interdicting ships carrying weapons of mass des-truction technology. But Seoul is reluctant to join, again for fear of upsetting the fragile security balance.

However, Ms Rice and Mr Ban insisted the US-South Korean alliance "could not be stronger", with Ms Rice saying they were now discussing how inspections and interdiction at sea might work. She said: "The US has no desire to do anything to escalate this. The key is to live up to the obligations that all of us undertook that North Korea should not be able to traffic in weapons or weapons technology, nor should they be able to receive help, assistance, financing for their nuclear weapons programmes."

DOJ_NMG_0083780

Meanwhile, Mr Ban warned North Korea that a second test would "aggravate" the situation. "We agreed that, in case it happens, there should be more grave consequences."

In Beijing, the Chinese foreign ministry said Tang Jianxuan, the state councillor, had been sent to Pyong-yang as a special envoy for President Hu Jiantao and had met Kim Jong-il on Thursday. The foreign ministry said the visit was "very meaningful to the relations between the two countries".

Ms Rice said she had not yet received a "read out" on the meeting.

For Rice, Seoul Proves A Cautious Ally (CSM)

By Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, October 20, 2006

SEOUL

As she whirls through the capitals of northeast Asia this week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is conveying messages tailored to the sensitivities of leaders united in their concern over North Korea's nuclear test but wavering in their responses.

Nowhere is Ms. Rice's message more carefully modulated than in South Korea.

There, the government yearns to rescue its policy of reconciliation with North Korea against US pressure for strong measures to combat what Rice says is "trafficking" in weapons of mass destruction.

The hard-line view of Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, contrasts with China's clearly defined wish to avoid an armed clash with North Korea. But Seoul's view of its alliance with the United States and its relationship with North Korea is more complex than that of any other regional stakeholder.

Anxious to restore historic ties with its northern neighbor, South Korea has pursued a policy of engagement with North Korea that increasingly conflicts with its alliance with the US - and leaves Koreans in sharp disagreement with each other.

"She did very well in Japan where she was assured the US-Japan alliance is in solid shape," says Shim Jae-hoon, a columnist and political commentator here. "But in Korea we have lost the legitimacy of the US alliance and just don't know where we belong."

It was to brace the frayed alliance, and persuade South Korea of the need for real firmness toward North Korea, that Rice spent twice the originally scheduled 30 minutes in a meeting with President Roh Moo Hyun before emerging with a finely tuned view of what the US was doing - and not doing.

She had not come to South Korea "to try to dictate" what the government should do, she said, seated beside Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon. The US, Rice wanted Koreans to understand, has "no desire" to see an escalation in tensions.

That said, Rice was firm about the need for "all of us" to "live up to the obligations we undertook that North Korea should not traffic in these materials" - that is, the military hardware covered in the UN resolution banning their movement in and out of the North and on financial dealings that might aid the weapons program.

Rice was careful not to demand that South Korea should join the Proliferation Security Initiative - a US-backed scheme in which some 70 nations have agreed to work together to try to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

She did, however, attempt what appeared to be an effort at diplomatic salesmanship, hoping to alleviate high-level Korean concerns that the interdiction of North Korean vessels might lead to armed conflict.

The Proliferation Security Initiative, she said, was "based on intelligence" - and not the constant inspection of ships.

"Scrutiny of North Korean cargoes," she noted, "can be achieved in many ways" - ranging from "port security" to "detection of radioactive materials."

Whether she sold South Koreans on this perspective, though, was far from clear. Kim Byungki, visiting scholar at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, predicts she'll only "partially succeed" in convincing skeptical South Koreans leaders to endorse US policy. Our policies are 'under review'

Throughout the meetings, a favorite phrase of South Korean officials, including Foreign Minister Ban, was that policies, including what to do about the Proliferation Security Initiative, were under review.

DOJ_NMG_0083781

Ban, in what is likely to be his last meeting with Rice before he steps down to become UN secretary-general, was equally circumspect when it came to US pressure to stop tours to the North Korean resort region of Mount Kumkang. That was also "under review," he said, parrying US criticism that payment for the tours goes directly into North Korean nuclear and missile programs in violation of the UN sanctions. (See related story.) Next stop: Beijing

Rice may have an easier time when she gets to Beijing, whose emissaries were in North Korea's capital city of Pyongyang Thursday delivering what is assumed to be a firm message of warning against conducting a second nuclear test.

At the very least, US officials hope to learn what State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, who led the Chinese team to Pyongyang, said in a message described by a Chinese official as "very significant" and "in-depth discussions on China-North Korea relations as well as the prevailing situation on the Korean peninsula."

Rice is expected to use much the same diplomatic verbiage in Beijing as in Seoul, where she said everyone was taking stock "of the leverage" each country wields over North Korea and how "much we can do cooperatively."

In Beijing, unlike Seoul, Rice won't have to deal with the whole issue of widely differing views about either an alliance with the US or the future of the government - a question that hangs over all discussions here about North Korea.

"I have no idea where President Roh is trying to lead this country," says political commentator Mr. Shim. "This issue is spotlighted by Rice's visit. We need to make a decision - whether to support the sanctions or not. I just don't know where this government is leading us."

Report: N. Korean Leader Regrets Test (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il expressed regret about his country's nuclear test to a Chinese delegation and said Pyongyang would return to international nuclear talks if Washington backs off a campaign to financially isolate the country, a South Korean newspaper reported Friday.

"If the U.S. makes a concession to some degree, we will also make a concession to some degree, whether it be bilateral talks or six-party talks," Kim was quoted as telling a Chinese envoy, the mass-circulation Chosun Ilbo reported, citing a diplomatic source in China.

Kim told the Chinese delegation that "he is sorry about the nuclear test," the newspaper reported.

The delegation led by State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan met Kim on Thursday and returned to Beijing later that day — ahead of U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's arrival in the Chinese capital Friday. China is viewed as a key nation in efforts to persuade the North to disarm, as it is the isolated communist nation's main trading partner.

North Korea has long insisted that the U.S. desist from a campaign to sever its ties to the international financial system. Washington accuses Pyongyang of complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering to sell weapons of mass destruction.

The North has refused since last November to return to the nuclear talks, which also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea. Pyongyang has sought bolster its negotiating position by a series of provocative actions, test-firing a barrage of missiles in July and performing its first-ever nuclear test Oct. 9.

China May Press North Koreans (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 19 — China is prepared to step up pressure on North Korea in coming weeks by reducing oil shipments, among other measures, if the country refuses to return to negotiations or conducts more nuclear tests, Chinese government advisers and scholars who have discussed the matter with the leadership say.

If Beijing does take a tougher line on its neighbor and longtime ally, the action is likely to bolster its relationship with the United States. Washington has urged Chinese leaders to use all the tools at their disposal to put additional pressure on Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader.

Among the most potent of those tools is oil. China provides an estimated 80 to 90 percent of North Korea's oil imports, shipped by pipeline at undisclosed prices that Chinese officials say represent a steep discount from the world market price. Any reduction in that aid could severely hamper North Korea's already faltering economy.

DOJ_NMG_0083782

Several leading Chinese experts said senior officials had indicated in the past week that they planned to slap new penalties on North Korea going beyond the ban on sales of military equipment imposed by the United Nations. But they would be likely to hold off if Mr. Kim agreed to return soon to multilateral talks North Korea has boycotted since September 2005. Years of talks have produced meager results.

Discussions about how to respond to the nuclear test, which was described by one expert as a "political earthquake" for Chinese leaders, come amid a flurry of diplomacy aimed at ironing out enforcement of United Nations sanctions and luring Mr. Kim back to negotiations.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to arrive here Friday to meet with Chinese officials. On Thursday in Pyongyang, Mr. Kim met a delegation sent by President Hu Jintao of China, the first diplomatic contact with the North Korean leader since the nuclear test on Oct. 9.

There was no immediate word on what Mr. Kim told the Chinese, but Beijing experts said he would most likely have declined to meet with the delegation, headed by a cabinet-level official, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, unless he hoped to head off additional penalties by promising to resume negotiations.

"China is going to have to make some crucial choices in the coming days," said one senior international relations specialist who has participated in top-level discussions of the matter but asked to remain anonymous. "I think Chinese leaders are prepared to take a hard line, but Kim may be smart enough to try to divide China and the U.S."

China and the United States already have some differences over how to enforce the United Nations sanctions that they and the rest of the Security Council voted for last Saturday. Beijing says it will not interdict North Korean cargo ships at sea, as the United States and Japan have recommended, and has warned against seeking to use the sanctions to provoke a confrontation.

"All sides need to consider how to implement Resolution 1718 in a balanced way and not devise ways to willfully expand the sanctions," Liu Jianchao, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, said Thursday, referring to the Security Council resolution banning the sale or transfer of missile- or nuclear-weapons-related goods to North Korea. "Sanctions are the signal, not the goal."

But Chinese experts who have taken part in discussions about how to manage the situation said that after North Korea's missile tests in July, Chinese leaders concluded that Mr. Kim might not negotiate a way out of the impasse unless he had no other choice. Officials felt badly stung by the nuclear test and have dug in their heels on ending the nuclear program there, the experts said.

China has opposed military action or an embargo to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to its Korean War ally and has subsidized Mr. Kim's its government despite gross human rights violations. But it is also wary that Mr. Kim may set off an arms race in Northeast Asia and prompt Japan and South Korea, and even Taiwan, to seek nuclear weapons.

Beijing's relations with North Korea have been strained for many years, and some Chinese officials argue that Mr. Kim wants a nuclear trump card to intimidate China as much as the United States.

In the wake of the test, President Hu renewed his government's commitment to "a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula," and ruled out recognizing North Korea, as a fellow nuclear power, they said.

"I believe that Chinese leaders are firmly resolved to roll back the nuclear program and not accept it as an accomplished fact," said Zhang Liangui, a Korea expert at the Communist Party's Central Party School in Beijing who has favored taking a tougher line.

"I do not think that the resolve of the Chinese leadership is going to be less than the resolve of the American leadership," he said.

Others agreed, arguing that as long as the Bush administration kept its focus on a diplomatic solution, China would work to maintain solidarity with the United States.

"The only issue that they do not agree on is interdiction at sea," said Xu Guangyu, a retired general who is now a member of the Chinese Arms Control and Disarmament Association, a government-sponsored institute. "For the most part the United States has responded to this with the right tone, so I don't see a major obstacle to cooperation."

Mr. Xu said the question now was not whether China and the United States could maintain common ground, but rather how Mr. Kim would respond to the universal condemnation of his test. "The matter is in his hands," Mr. Xu said. "If he returns to negotiating, the pressure will ease. If he conducts another test, that would be very reckless."

DOJ_NMG_0083783

Chinese officials have already begun carrying out measures intended to increase the pressure.

Customs officers have begun inspecting cargo passing through Dandong, a major trading post with North Korea. China Southern Airlines, the only Chinese carrier that flies to Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, announced that it had suspended service to the city.

Chinese banks, fearing possible freezes on assets, have restricted some forms of transactions involving North Korean interests while expanding a crackdown on suspected laundering of drug money and counterfeiting by individuals and front companies associated with North Korea, according to Chinese officials and local news reports.

More important, Chinese officials have discussed staged reductions in oil shipments if North Korea ignores international pressure, scholars who have been told about the leadership's planning said.

Beijing is also North Korea's leading provider of grain, but is not likely to suspend food shipments. North Korea suffers severe food shortages, with about a third of the population depending on imported grain.

China has not threatened publicly to cut off oil supplies, and it has resisted imposing economic sanctions. Instead, it has emphasized reviving the six-nation nuclear talks that collapsed a year ago. At least superficially, that puts China on the same page as the United States, which has called for a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

China has put much more emphasis on the process of negotiating than has the United States, which has expressed interest only in the results. Beijing argues that resuming talks would de-escalate the crisis, giving Mr. Kim an incentive to freeze his nuclear activities and making it possible to find a peaceful way out.

Some Chinese experts speculate that Mr. Kim, having proved that he has mastered at least the basics of manufacturing atomic bombs, may now be willing to return to the table, feeling he can demand a higher price for agreeing to discontinue the program.

"Kim has done nothing but anger China for the last few months," said Shi Yinhong, a foreign policy expert at People's University in Beijing. "But he could be smart enough to make a concession now, just before Rice visits, to create some trouble for the United States."

After Mr. Kim twice ignored China's stern warnings — first when he tested ballistic missiles in July, and then when he exploded a nuclear device close to the Chinese border — many officials here felt chagrined about having sheltered him, people who discussed the situation with the leadership said.

"The people who were the most critical of Kim in the past were a minority," said one scholar. "But they have a bigger voice now. The people who had the most favorable interpretations of Kim's actions are for now keeping quiet."

China Steps Up Diplomacy With N. Korea (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

China stepped up its diplomatic efforts with North Korea on Thursday, sending a personal message and a gift from the Chinese president to the North's leader Kim Jong Il as Washington appealed for cooperation by Asian powers on U.N. sanctions for Pyongyang's nuclear test.

The trip by State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan was the highest-level Chinese visit to its isolated ally since its Oct. 9 atomic test.

The visit came as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice stopped in South Korea and Japan as part of a tour of Asia to solidify support for the U.N. sanctions amid reports of a possible second atomic test by Pyongyang. She was to arrive in Beijing on Friday.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said he had no details of the message from President Hu Jintao conveyed by Tang in Pyongyang, but said Kim and the diplomat had "in-depth discussions" about the nuclear dispute. North Korea's official Korean Central News Agency said Tang also brought a gift for Kim but did not say what it was.

"This is a very significant visit against the backdrop of major changes on the Korean Peninsula," Liu said at a regular news briefing. "We hope China's diplomatic efforts ... will bear fruit."

Japanese state broadcaster NHK reported late Thursday that Tang returned to Beijing but China's Foreign Ministry could not confirm the report.

DOJ_NMG_0083784

Tang's trip might be a way for Beijing to express frustration at last week's test and warn against conducting any more while wooing it back to six-party talks on the North's nuclear program.

But relations between North Korea and China, the main source of food and fuel aid to Pyongyang's decrepit economy, have deteriorated in recent years, and Beijing's sway over North Korea appears to be eroding.

China's North Korean experts expressed skepticism that Tang's diplomatic mission would yield significant results. Pyongyang has ignored Chinese pleas for negotiations for months, they said, and having proven that it has nuclear-weapons capabilities, North Korea is unlikely to be open to bargaining.

"North Korea has abused China's good intentions to de-escalate this matter," said Zhang Liangui of the Central Party School, a training academy for the communist leadership. "Instead, it has dragged out the time for dialogue in order to develop nuclear weapons."

Piao Jianyi, executive director for the Center for Korean Studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, said the isolated North "doesn't care about the pressure from outside."

"It is beyond hope," he said. "It doesn't care about any consequences. It doesn't want dialogue."

Tang, a former foreign minister whose Cabinet post ranks above minister, was accompanied by Vice Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo and Wu Dawei, the Chinese envoy to the six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

Discussions have been stalled for a year because of a boycott by the North over U.S. financial sanctions. They involve the United States, host China, the two Koreas, Japan and Russia.

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council with power to veto U.N. actions, is traditionally reluctant to punish the North. But it voted last weekend for the resolution imposing sanctions in response to the nuclear test.

The measures ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used by its ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs. They also call for inspections of all cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea.

Beijing has since warned its neighbor against taking any steps that would heighten tensions.

However, Beijing's U.N. ambassador has indicated that inspectors will not board ships. China and South Korea worry that the North would consider the action provocative.

The U.N. resolution "is a balanced resolution and the spirit must also be reflected in its implementation," Liu said.

Liu said that while China will "implement in earnest" the sanctions, they are not an end in themselves.

"They are rather the means to an end, which is to solve the nuclear issue on the Korean Peninsula in a peaceful way," he said.

China Banks To Halt Dealings With North Korea (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Chinese banks are moving to halt transactions with North Korea as Beijing looks for ways to pressure its recalcitrant ally to abandon any further atomic-weapons tests and return to multilateral disarmament talks.

Meanwhile, a high-ranking Chinese envoy met yesterday with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il in Pyongyang, China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said. He offered no details on what he termed a "very significant visit" at a time of "major changes on the Korean peninsula."

The flurry of Chinese activity came amid fears that Pyongyang is readying for a second nuclear test as U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice toured Asian capitals to rally support for tough sanctions in the wake of the North's Oct. 9 test. But Ms. Rice, who was due to arrive in Beijing this morning, appeared to make little progress to that end during her talks yesterday in South Korea.

China's financial system has long served as a major conduit for isolated North Korea to move money to and from the outside world. China also is North Korea's major supplier of food and oil and its largest trading partner. How strictly it enforces United Nations-imposed economic sanctions on North Korea and what additional measures it chooses to take will be critical in determining the amount of pressure brought to bear on Pyongyang.

DOJ_NMG_0083785

In China, officials at four commercial banks said that in recent days they have stopped moving funds into or out of North Korea -- a ban that could deliver a serious blow to Pyongyang's finances if it remains in force. Since the U.S. threatened sanctions against a Macau bank that allegedly helped Pyongyang launder money, other lenders outside China have shied away from North Korean customers.

One of the officials said regulators ordered the ban; the others said they weren't sure what had prompted the cutoff.

"All transactions are blocked, whether it's company-to-company or person-to-person," said an employee at a Bank of China Ltd. branch in Dandong, China, on the border with North Korea. "We don't know how long it will last."

It isn't clear how widespread the crackdown is. The People's Bank of China, the central bank, declined to comment. But officials at Shanghai Pudong Development Bank Co., China Construction Bank Corp. and China Citic Bank also said they are shutting off business with North Korea.

Since the U.N. Security Council passed the sanctions resolution Oct. 14, China also has visibly stepped up inspections of trucks bound for North Korea. The U.N. has barred North Korea from importing military equipment and materials that can be used in its nuclear program, as well as luxury goods.

Beijing's steps may be part of a short-term campaign aimed at dissuading Pyongyang from going ahead with a second test, or they may be part of a broader shift by China toward using its economic leverage to force Mr. Kim to give up his nuclear weapons.

China has long been reluctant to apply the kind of tough measures sought by Washington, in large part because it fears destabilizing or toppling the communist regime. A collapse of North Korea and its absorption by the capitalist South would put a U.S. ally right on China's northeast border. It also could cause serious economic dislocation.

"They're trying to come up with a balance between punishing North Korea for what it's done, but not squeezing hard enough to break it, because they don't want to fix it," one senior U.S. official said.

South Korea has been noticeably more reluctant to take any decisive steps that might upset Pyongyang in the wake of its nuclear test, and the U.S. approach has been to coax Seoul gently and in private. An aide traveling with Ms. Rice said en route to Seoul that the secretary of state would avoid calling for any specific steps on border inspections or on the South's economic cooperation with the North. The South Koreans, the aide said, "don't like to be seen as being pushed to make specific steps."

Ms. Rice told reporters in Seoul that she didn't come to South Korea to tell the government how it should implement the U.N. sanctions. And in remarks after their meetings, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon defended the value of two joint economic projects the South has with North Korea, while giving no indication that Seoul plans to join an international effort to crack down on trafficking in nuclear materials from North Korea and other states.

In her one nudging comment during a media briefing with Mr. Ban, Ms. Rice said "everyone should take stock of the leverage we have to get North Korea to return" to the negotiations over its nuclear program, which fell apart last year.

Ms. Rice later joined Mr. Ban and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso in a dinner that U.S. officials portrayed as a significant sign of warming relations between Japan and South Korea, brought about in large part by shared jitters over North Korea's nuclear program. The three countries hadn't met formally at such a level since the late 1990s.

--Evan Ramstad in Seoul and Tang Hanting in Shanghai contributed to this article.

North Korean Ploy Masks Ships Under Other Flags (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

HONG KONG, Oct. 19 — When helicopter-borne Australian commandos stormed a freighter three years ago after it was spotted unloading 110 pounds of high-grade heroin, the ship proved to be registered in Tuvalu, a tiny island nation in the South Pacific.

When a Spanish warship stopped a freighter carrying cement to Yemen four years ago, the cargo vessel turned out to be carrying 15 Scud missiles as well and was registered in Cambodia.

The two freighters had something in common: although registered elsewhere, both were owned by North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0083786

The incidents illustrated North Korea's adroit use of so-called flags of convenience to camouflage the movement of its cargo vessels as they engage in tasks that sometimes violate international laws.

The North Korean ploy could both simplify and complicate the efforts to carry out the United Nations Security Council's resolution authorizing countries to inspect cargo entering or leaving North Korea to see if it includes illicit weapons, say shipping executives, lawyers and security experts.

The use of flags of convenience could also weaken moves like Australia's on Monday to ban North Korean-flagged vessels from its ports to protest the nuclear test.

But if Western nations suspect that a North Korean-owned vessel flying another country's flag is carrying illicit weapons, boarding the vessel could be simpler than if it carried North Korea's flag, said Jonathan D. Pollack, professor of Asian and Pacific studies at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I.

A Western nation could ask the country that registered the vessel for permission to board it even if the vessel was not entering or leaving North Korean waters. Practically any country would be more cooperative about giving permission for a search than North Korea, Mr. Pollack noted.

A North Korean crew might still resist boarding, however. The crew of the Tuvalu-registered freighter, the Pong Su, did so when chased by Australian forces for four days in 2003 before it was finally boarded and captured by the commandos.

But Mr. Pollack and other experts said that flags of convenience could still prove useful to North Korea in maintaining its arms trade despite the Security Council resolution.

One possibility would be for North Korea to try to smuggle out weapons or weapons components across its land borders with China or Russia, and then to a Chinese or Russian port. The weapons could then be loaded on a vessel secretly owned by North Korea but flying another country's flag — and perhaps not be closely watched by Western intelligence services as a result.

Or weapons could be loaded on a North Korean ship flying its own flag, and the registration of the ship could be altered after it left port. "In the middle of the night, they could change the name and change the flag," said Gary Wolfe, a maritime lawyer at Seward & Kissel, a New York law firm.

Still another possibility, shipping and security experts said, would be for a North Korean-flagged ship to transfer cargo to a North Korean ship carrying another flag, either in port or in midocean if it were a calm day and the cargo small enough.

Changing the registration of a ship — and therefore its flag — is fairly simple. A ship owner simply sends the necessary paperwork to a country's ship registry, along with a fee of as little as $1,000. The vessel is not required to visit the country where it is registered, or even go to port.

Ship registries do require basic information about a vessel's length and tonnage. So if a ship of a certain size and displacement disappears from one ship's registry and a vessel of equal size and displacement pops up with a different name on another registry at the same time, they may be the same ship and could be identified with careful sleuthing, Mr. Wolfe said.

The Pong Su sailed from North Korea to Singapore in 2003 under a North Korean flag. The vessel then switched its registration to Tuvalu and sailed on to Australia, where witnesses saw a dinghy coming ashore with what proved to be the shipment of heroin.

The freighter was seized and later used as a bombing target by the Australian armed forces as a warning to drug traffickers. The North Korean government denied that it had been involved.

Without specifically mentioning flags of convenience, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld warned on Wednesday of the difficulty of monitoring North Korea's trade. "There's so much moving around the world by land, sea and air that it is practically impossible — not impossible, but certainly it would take a lot of countries cooperating with a high degree of cohesion," and cohesion has been lacking, he said during a question-and-answer period at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base in Alabama.

Until 2002, North Korea tended to register its ships as Cambodian, using a registration office that the Cambodian government had authorized in Singapore. Marcus Hand, the Asia editor for Lloyd's List, a shipping industry newspaper, said dozens of North Korean ships used to carry the Cambodian flag.

He cautioned, however, that it is often difficult to know with certainty who owns a ship, since ships are often held through various companies registered all over the world. No one outside North Korea really knows for sure how many cargo vessels the country has registered under other flags.

DOJ_NMG_0083787

Cambodia canceled the right of its Singapore agents to register ships in 2002 after finding that Cambodian-registered ships were in such poor condition that ports were reluctant to let them berth, and after France accused a Cambodian-registered ship and its crew of transporting cocaine. The government of Cambodia ended up authorizing representatives in Pusan, South Korea, to manage the country's ship registry.

Charlie Bach, the managing director of the overhauled International Ship Registry of Cambodia, said in an e-mail message that there were no longer any North Korean ships carrying the Cambodian flag.

The mystery lies in where North Korea's ships are registered instead.

According to reports in the shipping press in 2003, some of the shipping agents in Singapore who represented Cambodia switched to representing Tuvalu and landlocked Mongolia instead, and encouraged their clients to change their ships' registration to those countries.

Several shipping executives said they believed that North Korean ships were sailing under Mongolian and Tuvaluan flags now.

World War II Is Over (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The first stop on Condoleezza Rice's post-detonation, nuclear reassurance tour was Tokyo. There she dutifully unfurled the American nuclear umbrella, pledging in person that the United States would meet any North Korean attack on Japan with massive American retaliation, nuclear if necessary.

An important message, to be sure, for the short run, lest Kim Jong Il imbibe a little too much cognac and be teased by one of his "pleasure squad" lovelies into launching a missile or two into Japan.

But Rice's declaration had another and obvious longer-run intent: to quell any thought Japan might have of going nuclear to counter and deter North Korea's bomb.

The Japanese understood this purpose well. Thus, at a joint news conference with Rice, Foreign Minister Taro Aso offered the boilerplate denial of even thinking of going nuclear: "The government of Japan has no position at all to consider going nuclear."

The impeccably polite Japanese were not about to contradict the secretary of state in her presence. Nonetheless, the very same Aso had earlier the very same day told a parliamentary committee that Japan should begin debating the issue: "The reality is that it is only Japan that has not discussed possessing nuclear weapons, and all other countries have been discussing it."

Just three days earlier, another high-ranking member of the ruling party had transgressed the same taboo and called for open debate about Japan's acquiring nuclear weapons.

The American reaction to such talk is knee-jerk opposition. Like those imperial Japanese soldiers discovered holed up on some godforsaken Pacific island decades after World War II, we continue to act as if we, too, never received news of the Japanese surrender. We applaud the Japanese for continuing their adherence to the MacArthur constitution that forever denies Japan the status of Great Power replete with commensurate military force.

Of course Japan has in recent decades skirted that proscription, building a small but serious conventional military. Nuclear weapons, however, have remained off the table.

As the only country ever to suffer nuclear attack, Japan obviously has its own reasons to resist the very thought. But now that the lunatic regime next door, which has already overflown Japan with its missiles, has officially gone nuclear, some rethinking is warranted.

Japan is a true anomaly. All the other Great Powers went nuclear decades ago -- even the once-and-no-longer great, such as France; the wannabe great, such as India; and the never-will-be great, such as North Korea. There are nukes in the hands of Pakistan, which overnight could turn into an al-Qaeda state, and North Korea, a country so cosmically deranged that it reports that the "Dear Leader" shot five holes-in-one in his first time playing golf and also wrote six operas. Yet we are plagued by doubts about Japan's joining this club.

DOJ_NMG_0083788

Japan is not just a model international citizen -- dynamic economy, stable democracy, self-effacing foreign policy -- it is also the most important and reliable U.S. ally after only Britain. One of the quieter success stories of recent American foreign policy has been the intensification of the U.S.-Japanese alliance. Tokyo has joined with the United States in the development and deployment of missile defenses and aligned itself with the United States on the solidarity should there ever be a confrontation.

neuralgic issue of Taiwan, pledging

The immediate effect of Japan's considering going nuclear would be to concentrate China's mind on denuclearizing North Korea. China calculates that North Korea is a convenient buffer between it and a dynamic, capitalist South Korea bolstered by American troops. China is quite content with a client regime that is a thorn in our side, keeping us tied down while it pursues its ambitions in the rest of Asia. Pyongyang's nukes, after all, are pointed not west but east.

Japan's threatening to go nuclear would alter that calculation. It might even persuade China to squeeze Kim Jong Il as a way to prevent Japan from going nuclear. The Japan card remains the only one that carries even the remote possibility of reversing North Korea's nuclear program.

Japan's response to the North Korean threat has been very strong and very insistent on serious sanctions. This is, of course, out of self-interest, not altruism. But that is the point. Japan's natural interests parallel America's in the Pacific Rim -- maintaining military and political stability, peacefully containing an inexorably expanding China, opposing the gangster regime in Pyongyang, and spreading the liberal democratic model throughout Asia.

Why are we so intent on denying this stable, reliable, democratic ally the means to help us shoulder the burden in a world where so many other allies -- the inveterately appeasing South Koreans most notoriously -- insist on the free ride?

Olmert Warns Iran About Its Nuke Program (AP)

By Amy Teibel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

Israel's prime minister delivered his strongest comments yet on Iran's nuclear program, warning Thursday that Tehran would have "a price to pay" if it does not back down from its atomic ambitions and hinting that Israel might be forced to take action.

Ehud Olmert did not specifically threaten to cripple Iran's nuclear program in a military strike, as it did 25 years ago in Iraq when it bombed an unfinished nuclear reactor there. But he repeated what he said a day earlier after meeting Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow — the Iranians "have to be afraid" of the consequences of their intransigence.

"They have to understand that if they object to every compromise, there will be a price to pay," Olmert said on a flight back to Israel after a three-day trip to Moscow.

Israel rejects Tehran's claim that its nuclear program is peaceful, designed solely to produce energy. In the past, Israel has said it would not lead a campaign against Iran's nuclear program, but would act in concert with world powers that are similarly worried.

But with Iran rejecting various compromise proposals and insisting on enriching uranium — a process key to developing nuclear weapons — Olmert been raising the stakes. He said Israel cannot reconcile itself to a nuclear Iran.

"There comes a time when you have to do damage control," he said. "A red line must be drawn that cannot be crossed," Olmert added, without elaborating. "Time isn't standing still," he said "and perhaps there will be a need to do something in the future."

Some Israeli officials have made specific threats to hit Iran. But military experts have questioned Israel's ability to destroy Iran's nuclear facilities, which unlike Iraq's in 1981 are scattered among installations, some hidden underground. But they have said Israel could set the program back years by striking several of the sites.

Israel considers Iran to be the greatest threat to its survival. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for the Jewish state's destruction, and Iran already has missiles capable of carrying payloads to Israel.

Ahmadinejad shrugged off the threat of U.N. sanctions Thursday, saying his nation would not give up any of its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0083789

"The Iranian nation will not cede one iota of its rights," Ahmadinejad told thousands of cheering supporters in the town of Islamshahr, about 25 miles south of the capital Tehran.

"Our nation achieved proficiency in nuclear energy at a time when you imposed economic, scientific and technological sanctions against us," he said, addressing the U.S. and its allies and referring to sanctions imposed on Iran after the 1979 Islamic revolution and hostage-taking at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The crowd interrupted his speech with the chant: "Nuclear energy is our right!"

France said Wednesday that a resolution calling for sanctions against Iran would likely be circulated at the U.N. Security Council by the end of the week. Support for sanctions has grown among council members after weeks of talks between the EU and Iran failed to persuade Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment and start broader negotiations.

At a meeting in Luxembourg on Tuesday, European Union foreign ministers endorsed a decision by the U.N.'s five permanent Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany to pursue limited sanctions on Tehran while keeping the door open to future talks.

Iran has stalled on a package of economic incentives and political rewards that the six countries offered in June, on the condition that Tehran agree to consider a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment.

Britain Says U.N. Iran Resolution Coming (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

Britain said Thursday it expects a draft U.N. resolution on Iran to be introduced in the Security Council early next week and diplomats said it will seek sanctions on Tehran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere had said Tuesday he hoped to circulate a draft by the end of the week. But France, Britain and Germany, who have led negotiations with Iran on its nuclear program, were still discussing the text with the United States on Thursday, and had not yet shown it to Russia and China.

"My expectation is that sometime early next week we'll put a resolution down," Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry told reporters.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said "we're consulting on it and I expect within a day or two we'll have something to circulate more broadly in the council."

European Union foreign ministers said after a meeting in Luxembourg on Tuesday that they have no choice but to back diplomatic talks at the United Nations about sanctions on Iran.

The ministers backed a decision by the U.N.'s five permanent Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany to pursue limited sanctions on Tehran while keeping the door open to future talks.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said earlier this month that they would seek measures under Article 41 of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows nonmilitary sanctions.

The six countries offered Iran a package of economic incentives and political rewards in June if it agreed to consider a long-term moratorium on enrichment and commit to a freeze on uranium enrichment before talks to discuss details of their package.

But Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly and defiantly said his country would continue enrichment, and is not intimidated by the possibility of sanctions.

The United States has called for broad sanctions, such as a total ban on missile and nuclear technology sales, while the Russians and Chinese back prohibitions of selected items as a first step.

The Black Box Of Tehran (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Here's a real-life international mystery: What happened in Tehran in September that torpedoed the prospect of negotiations with the United States over Iran's nuclear program? Were Western hopes of Iranian pragmatism simply an illusion? Are there other channels open for discussion with Tehran if the nuclear route is blocked?

DOJ_NMG_0083790

U.S. and European intelligence analysts are debating these questions, and for now they don't seem to have good answers. The process of decision making in Tehran remains a "black box." Analysts can see the decisions that emerge from the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and they can hear the competing arguments of pragmatists and hard-liners. But how consensus is reached remains a puzzle. My fear is that at its core, the Islamic republic disdains compromise as a sign of weakness.

Hopes for a breakthrough on the nuclear issue were raised last summer by discussions between Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief. Both men are at the pragmatic, deal-making ends of their respective political spectrums, and that may have been part of the problem. But as the discussions continued, the Iranians appeared ready to offer a two-month suspension of uranium enrichment once talks with the Europeans resumed -- thereby meeting the U.S. precondition for joining the talks. It looked like a classic bit of face-saving bargaining.

The background music seemed right as well. President Bush told me in an interview on Sept. 13 that the United States respected Iran's legitimate interests, including its right to a civilian nuclear program. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, while taking a defiant line on many issues, told me and Lally Weymouth of Newsweek on Sept. 19 that Iran would be willing to resume diplomatic relations with the United States "under appropriate conditions." And he said in other meetings that Iran might accept suspension of enrichment as a byproduct of negotiations, although not as a precondition. The sense that a deal was possible was reinforced by a back-channel exchange in which a European intermediary and an Iranian former official prepared a joint paper outlining a compromise formula on the nuclear issue.

But by late September, State Department officials concluded that the Iranians were backing away. Pessimistic private signals were confirmed when Khamenei, the only Iranian who speaks authoritatively on foreign policy, explained last week that Iran had already tried suspension of enrichment, in its earlier negotiations with the Europeans, and wouldn't do so again. "If we had not experienced that path [a two-year suspension of uranium enrichment], perhaps we would have criticized ourselves today. But now we will pursue with a strong heart."

So what's next? Bush administration officials rightly argue that Iran must pay some price for continuing its nuclear program in defiance of warnings from the International Atomic Energy Agency. Russia and China have promised to support some penalties for Iran, and my sense is that maintaining their support -- and international solidarity on Iran -- matters more than the details of sanctions. Failure to penalize Tehran would, among other things, undermine the Iranian pragmatists who favored negotiations. It would show that Tehran can defy the West and get away with it, which has been one of Ahmadinejad's implicit themes.

While the Bush administration wants to draw a clear red line for Tehran, it also appears ready to keep the door open for dialogue. An important gesture was the announcement this month that the United States will lift sanctions to allow an American company to provide spare parts to repair Iranian civilian aircraft. Another signal came from Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, who said last week in an otherwise hard-line speech that the U.S.-European package of incentives for Iran to halt enrichment will remain on the table, despite Tehran's refusal to join negotiations.

Burns called for "a dramatic increase in our exchanges with Iran -- in business, in academia, in athletics, in the arts." That amplified a comment Bush had made to me in our interview. (If the administration is serious about exchanges, however, it ought to quash an absurd investigation by the Treasury Department into whether American basketball players playing for Iranian teams are violating U.S. sanctions. Good grief!)

America, meanwhile, has a foreign policy mystery of its own -- rivaling that black box of decision making in Tehran. Just what was former secretary of state James A. Baker III up to, in his contacts last month with Iranian and Syrian diplomats about how to stabilize Iraq? Is Baker opening a back channel for the Bush administration? Is America quietly seeking Iranian help as Iraq spins out of control? We'll leave that puzzle to pundits in Tehran.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://www.washingtonpost.com.

UN 'poses No Threat To Israeli Aircraft' (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083791

The United Nations on Thursday night moved rapidly to dispel suggestions by Alain Pellegrini, the UN force commander in Lebanon, that it would consider shooting down Israeli aircraft if they continued illegal incursions into Lebanese airspace.

Major-General Pellegrini told a news conference in New York that Israeli violations were “a major concern . . . not to be accepted”. While Unifil was currently using diplomatic channels to persuade Israel to stop its flights, in the future “other ways” could be considered, including force.

He added that French troops were armed with anti-aircraft missiles, although under the current rules they could only be fired in self-defence. Were its positions to be attacked, however, Unifil would “respond with these missiles”. Any more proactive action would require a change to the UN’s rules of engagement.

Barely had Maj-Gen Pellegrini spoken than the UN spokesman sought to play down any suggestion of a threat. One French diplomat said its UN mission was perplexed by the comments, and officials in the Italian-led strategic cell in New York said no change to the rules of engagement were on the table.

An Israeli diplomat suggested it was not the first time Mr Pellegrini had made curious statements; and one diplomat suggested it was time for him to move on.

Unifil officials said there was no appetite to end up in an armed conflict with Israel. But they added that the air violations were in contravention of UN resolution 1701, and could be considered a violent act, by spreading fear among Lebanese civilians.

Maj-Gen Pellegrini noted that the number of air violations had declined recently. He also said the 7,200-strong force had seen no evidence of illegal arms in the hands of Hizbollah or any other militias in the zone under his control.

He added that there were continued efforts to convince Israel to withdraw from the town of Ghajar, on the border between Lebanon and occupied Syria.

Hamas Charities Thrive Despite U.S.-led Fund Freeze (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- A U.S.-led funding squeeze, which has paralyzed the Hamas-led Palestinian government, has had the unintended effect of bolstering the militant group's network of schools, hospitals and alms societies.

Foreign donations, often consisting of cash in suitcases smuggled across the border, have permitted Hamas' vast social-welfare network to thrive, say officials and analysts.

"All charitable organizations affiliated with Hamas are still functioning," said Sheik Yazeeb Khader, an editor of Hamas' West Bank newspaper. He said the charities in Gaza have especially benefited from money "brought across the border and not checked."

For years, while Hamas' military wing dispatched suicide bombers to Israeli cities, the group's civilian wing quietly built up a grass-roots following with its network of Islamic social-welfare organizations.

The charities went far beyond anything established by the secular government of Yasser Arafat and helped give Hamas the support needed to oust Arafat loyalists in January elections and take power in March.

Unable to pay for supplies, government ministries have since ceased to function, and without salaries, civil servants have gone on strike.

The charities, however, openly boast that they continue to get money from Muslim communities in the Persian Gulf, Europe and the United States.

"These organizations are living in a golden age, where they are badly needed. There is no other way to take care of those people," said Basem Ezbidi, a political science professor at Birzeit University.

The links between Hamas and its social affiliates are kept deliberately murky.

None of the charities bear the Hamas name. Ask the managers about support from Hamas, and they are quick to deny any political affiliation.

Amid continuing economic hardship, the charities are coming under fire from some who charge that Hamas is protecting its own.

DOJ_NMG_0083792

"There is a lot of money in Hamas," said Abdel Nasser Najjar, a columnist for Al Ayyam, a newspaper of the opposition Fatah party.

"The problem now, is that Hamas is only giving to their own people, or people who are close to the movement."

At one Islamic charity in Ramallah, the Al Farah society, questions about Hamas make relief workers and clients -- a group of women in head scarves or veils -- go stiff.

Israeli soldiers raided the organization's offices several months ago, confiscating computers, welfare records, and eventually arresting director Teiysur Arure.

Recently released from jail, the director denies any political affiliation.

The same goes for Mohammad Tanbura, who heads the Gaza-based El-Salah society, which distributes school supplies and helps destitute families survive.

"We have nothing to do with the government, we are a Palestinian organization that works for the social sector rather than the political sector," Mr. Tanbura said. "This is not a Hamas charity work. Our money is legal."

Birzeit University's Mr. Ezbidi said most Islamic charities have some connection with Hamas, even if it's a 10 percent stake in the operations.

"To really draw a line between what is considered Hamas and what is not is a difficult thing because Hamas has a broad constituency," he said. "It's general knowledge that Hamas is running health care clinics, hospitals and subsidizing tuition. But it's done in an unpublicized forum."

In recent months, the case load at Al Farah's alms house has more than doubled under the weight of an aid boycott that has left some 140,000 civil servants without pay and the poor without welfare checks.

"If the government isn't providing for us, then Islamic institutions are providing for us," said Mr. Arure, the director. "People have crossed the red line, they have no money whatsoever."

Russia Suspends Scores Of Foreign Groups (NYT)

By C.J. Chivers

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 19 — Scores of foreign private organizations were forced to cease their operations in Russia on Thursday while the government considered whether to register them under a new law that has received sharp international criticism.

Among the suspended organizations were some of those most critical of the Kremlin, including Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, and others, like the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute, that have been accused by Russian officials of instigating or assisting revolutions against other former Soviet republics.

The Justice Ministry, which is responsible for registering foreign private organizations, insisted that the suspensions were neither retaliatory nor permanent.

It issued a statement saying the suspended organizations had not properly filed new registration materials or had submitted the required materials on the last day before the registration deadline, which was midnight on Wednesday. It said it was rushing to review the applications it had received.

“It is important to note that lack of re-registration does not entail the liquidation of the organization,” the statement said. “The talk here is only that these organizations cannot carry out the activity envisaged by their charters before they are brought into the register.”

The number of suspended organizations is not entirely clear. The statement said the ministry had received applications from 185 organizations, approved 108 of them and continued to review the 77 others.

But the suspensions marked the latest chapter in Russia’s pressure on many foreign organizations that have offices on its soil. They occurred in a climate of deepening worry about the Kremlin’s crackdown on civil society here, and just days ahead of a planned visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has expressed concerns about the law regulating foreign private organizations, known as nongovernmental organizations, or N.G.O.’s, which was passed earlier this year.

Some Russian officials, including Nikolai P. Patrushev, the chief of the domestic intelligence service, have accused the groups of interfering with state affairs or even harboring spies.

DOJ_NMG_0083793

The new law, strongly backed by President Vladimir V. Putin, created extensive new filing requirements, which in some cases the organizations said have been so tedious and lengthy as to be almost impossible to fulfill. The groups have also expressed fears that the rules were written vaguely enough to allow any group to be audited, and perhaps closed, on a pretext.

The groups and their supporters have said that the way the law was carried out would be a test of whether Russia would allow foreign organizations that it disliked to continue to work in the country. The first deadline, and its effects on Thursday, were accompanied by a strong sense of concern, even fear.

"My fear is that their intention is to shut us down," Josh Rubenstein, a director at Amnesty International, said by telephone. Amnesty International has had an office in Russia since the days of Mikhail S. Gorbachev, he said.

The Justice Ministry posted a list of 73 organizations that were not yet approved, and thus suspended. At least 38 of these were either listed by the ministry as American or had a clear American affiliation, including the American Bar Association, the American-Russian Business Council, the American Trade Chamber and an office of Johns Hopkins University.

The suspended Western organizations also included the Danish Refugee Council and the French and Belgian offices of Doctors without Borders.

News organizations reported that nearly 100 groups had been suspended, but did not provide a list. The Associated Press quoted one justice ministry official saying that 96 groups were suspended, while the ITAR-Tass news agency later quoted the same officials saying that the number was 93.

While the ministry said it had approved 108 organizations for registration, it provided a list of only 80.

Forty-one of those were American, including the Ford Foundation, the Nuclear Threat Initiative and the Moscow office of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Among the 41, there appeared to be 33 child-adoption agencies.

As the day passed with offices idled, some of the affected groups declined to comment, saying they worried about antagonizing Russia while their registration documents were under review.

Others described a new posture their offices had assumed on the workday on Thursday: they had abruptly stopped their work and programs, but left their lights on and offices staffed.

Carroll Bogert, an associate director at Human Rights Watch, said by telephone from New York that the employees in Russia were still being paid "but otherwise we are not operating in Russia."

She said, however, that she expected that the office would be registered once its documents were reviewed, and that the organization did not feel that it was a specific target. The new law, she said "is a weapon of broad usage."

She added that even if the government approves the registration of the Human Rights Watch office in Russia, the organization would be required to file an annual work plan by Oct. 31. This was another onerous task, she said. Such requirements, she said, "are affecting our ability to do substantive work."

The cessation of activities for some organizations was decried by their partners in the country.

Elena Panfilova, director of the Russian chapter of Transparency International, an anticorruption organization, said her office was registered as a domestic organization, and not a foreign one, so it was not directly affected by the new registration procedures.

But she said she had work planned with other groups, which now are unable to meet with her. "It is appalling," she said. "It is a total disgrace."

With such statements circulating, the Justice Ministry said it was working to expedite the registrations and placed blame on the organizations for not providing the required documentation.

"Very often," it said, "the terms of re-registration depend only on the desire of the representatives of an N.G.O. and their accuracy when filling out the documents."

Russia Halts Activities Of Many Groups From Abroad (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083794

MOSCOW, Oct. 19 -- Russia on Thursday suspended the activities of Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, the International Republican Institute and more than 90 other foreign nongovernmental organizations, saying they failed to meet the registration requirements of a controversial new law designed to bring activists here under much closer government scrutiny.

Across the country, foreign grass-roots organizations that investigate human rights abuses, promote democracy and work with refugees folded their tents until further notice, informing staff that all operations must cease immediately. The only work officially authorized was the paying of staff and bills.

The law, signed by President Vladimir Putin at the start of the year, drew broad criticism as part of a general rollback of democratic freedoms in Russia. Activists said it was intended to rein in one of the last areas of independent civic life here; Putin called it necessary to prevent foreigners from interfering in the country's political process.

On Thursday, officials said the suspensions resulted simply from the failure of private groups to meet the law's requirements, not from a political decision on the part of the state. The groups would be allowed to resume work once their registrations are completed, they said.

"No political order has been given . . . to tighten the screws," said Vladimir Lukin, Russia's federal ombudsman, speaking at a Moscow forum hosted by the Council of Europe, a 46-country human rights organization based in Strasbourg, France. "Colleagues from international NGOs are not in the habit of keeping their affairs and documents in order."

Many nongovernmental organizations fear that the current bureaucratic tangle might be the beginning of a larger crackdown on activism that is not controlled by the Kremlin. They note too that successful registration would not end their dealings with the Justice Ministry. After that, they would have to report on planned activities for the year, and they worry that officials could reject their plans or penalize the groups if they deviate from the plans because of unexpected events.

Many of the suspended organizations are American, including adoption agencies, the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute. The latter two are funded by the U.S. Congress but act independently to promote democracy.

Other suspended groups include two branches of Doctors Without Borders, the Danish Refugee Council and the Netherlands-based Russian Justice Initiative, which helps Russians bring cases to the European Court of Human Rights.

Under the law, Russian nongovernmental organizations are also subject to new regulation. But a Wednesday deadline to meet the paperwork requirements or stop operation applied only to foreign groups.

Russian officials stressed that the suspensions, which went into effect at midnight Wednesday, are temporary. "We are not speaking about closing organizations; that is out of the question," said a senior Justice Ministry official, Natalia Vishnyakova, in a telephone interview. Concerning the registration process, she said: "We are working properly, and put all our efforts into making it even faster. It is not at all complicated, believe me, absolutely not. It's really their own headache. On our part, we provided all necessary conditions."

Activists complained, however, that the requirements of the law are so vague and cumbersome that meeting the deadline was extremely difficult. Russian officials, they said, nitpicked their way through the submitted documents.

The local Human Rights Watch operation, for instance, called itself the "Representative Office of the Non-Governmental Organization Human Rights Watch in the Russian Federation." Officials at the registration office rejected that description and said the group should call itself the "Representative Office of the Corporation Human Rights Watch Inc. (USA) in the Russian Federation."

That change, among others, required Human Rights Watch to send its submission back to its headquarters in New York to have the document revised and re-notarized, then retranslated into Russian and re-notarized in Russia.

Officials at the Human Rights Watch office in Moscow said they could not speak on the record to a reporter because they interpreted the strictures of the suspension to extend to news media interviews. The law says that suspended groups can do nothing that would advance the aims and goals of their offices in Russia.

"We are registering, and we are complying with the law," said Carroll Bogert, associate director of Human Rights Watch, in a telephone interview from New York. "But we have been really distracted from our work by the onerous burdens that this law imposes. But this is not particular to us. It's a hassle for everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0083795

Other groups, however, said they found the registration office helpful. The American Chamber of Commerce, for instance, said Russian officials there pointed out errors before the organization formally submitted its documents, allowing it to correct them and expedite the registration. In all, the office accepted the registrations of 99 foreign organizations, freeing them to continue their work, officials at the Justice Ministry said. The American groups included the chamber, the Ford Foundation and the Carnegie Moscow Center.

Amnesty International said it was exploring whether it could continue field research in Russia by flying in researchers from its London headquarters. "We are seeking clarification," said Lydia Aroyo, a spokeswoman based in London. "But we are very unhappy. There were no clear guidelines as to what documents were required or how to fill them out. The process was very cumbersome and very time-consuming."

Foreign Groups Suspend Work In Russia Pending Registration (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

MOSCOW — Dozens of foreign nongovernmental organizations suspended work in Russia on Thursday after failing to complete a re-registration process by the deadline imposed under a controversial new law.

Those suspending their activities included Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

Human rights organizations have said that the new law contains burdensome requirements and appears aimed at tightening control over their work in Russia, and perhaps at shutting some down.

Russian authorities have said the law is needed to ensure that nongovernmental organizations are not used as fronts for terrorist activities and to prevent foreign organizations from illegally interfering in Russian politics.

The law requires groups to submit extensive documentation on their boards and founders, even if the founders no longer have ties to the groups. The Carnegie Moscow Center, established by the Washington-based Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, was re-registered only after it provided proof of the death of its founder, Andrew Carnegie, who died in 1919.

The Russian Justice Ministry said that 108 branches of foreign NGOs had been re-registered by the Wednesday deadline, and that 77 applications were still being processed.

Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, two organizations that frequently criticize the Kremlin, were among the groups whose documents were still being processed.

"The Russian authorities go through the documents down to the last comma," Sergei Nikitin, head of Amnesty International's Russian resource center, told the Russian news agency Interfax. "They will most likely send our documents back to us and tell us to correct some mistakes they uncover."

Allison Gill, head of the Moscow office of Human Rights Watch, told Interfax that a package of documents for re-registration had been submitted to authorities in late September, and that she hoped the office would restart work soon.

Organizations that suspended their work can still pay their staff and keep their offices, but must discontinue research and publicity activities until their re-registration is official.

Many organizations have expressed even greater concern about an Oct. 31 deadline for them to report on activities they plan next year. Some groups have expressed fear this could lead to government monitoring, bans on programs, or to punishment for holding unlisted events.

Venezuela Opposition Confident Of Victory (WT)

By Sacha Feinman

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chavez faces voters in fewer than two months with a credible opposition candidate, who says he can overcome a double-digit lead in public-opinion polls.

One of the most respected pollsters in Venezuela, Alfredo Keller, recently released his newest survey, which concludes that Mr. Chavez enjoys 50 percent support to Manuel Rosales' 37 percent.

The lead makes the task daunting but not impossible, analysts say, because Mr. Keller's poll also found increasing dissatisfaction with the current government among potential voters.

DOJ_NMG_0083796

Polls have consistently shown that the Chavez government gets poor marks on security, as the country's violent-crime rate has steadily increased during Mr. Chavez's seven years in power.

"Rosales is a very intuitional person; he doesn't follow polls or politics," said Ivo Hernandez, a professor of political science at Venezuela's Simon Bolivar University.

"I think that Rosales absolutely has a chance to carry the elections. People are really scared of what is going on here.

"Mr. Chavez is getting more and more radical, and no one wants to return to the instability of the 2002 coup. He still has about two months; in Venezuela, two months is enough for everything to change," he said.

In 2002, a military coup removed Mr. Chavez from office for 48 hours.

Mr. Rosales, the governor of the oil-rich state Zulia, held a rally in the heart of Caracas Saturday that attracted an estimated 10,000 supporters.

It was the largest gathering of opposition forces in Venezuela since an effort to recall Mr. Chavez failed in August 2004.

Mr. Rosales is running with the unified support of the country's often splintered and squabbling opposition.

In August, he emerged from a crowded field of potential contenders as the sole opposition candidate when Julio Borges and Teodoro Petkoff withdrew their candidacies.

Mr. Petkoff, now Mr. Rosales' campaign manager, thinks the opposition's bid to unseat Mr. Chavez is within its grasp.

"We are about to witness a close competition," he told Agence France-Presse earlier this month. "We like to think of Rosales's campaign as one of 'national unity' ... as an attempt to restore civility to the political process."

In both his initial and re-election campaigns for the Zulia governorship, Mr. Rosales defeated the hand-picked candidates of the Venezuelan president.

For his part, Mr. Chavez has frequently tried to portray the election as a choice between himself and President Bush, describing Mr. Rosales as nothing more than a stalking-horse for the CIA.

In late September, Mr. Chavez charged that his security forces had foiled an assassination plot while he campaigned in Zulia.

He said the would-be assassins were members of the Zulia police and part of a larger campaign by Mr. Bush to assassinate Mr. Chavez before the U.S. president leaves office in 2009.

The U.S. State Department has dismissed as "absurd" Mr. Chavez's frequent charges that he is the target of a U.S. assassination plot.

U.N. Losers (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

¿QUIEN ES MAS MACHO, Hugo Chavez or George W. Bush? Or more to the point, which of the two is the biggest loser in the eyes of the world?

It seems that the United Nations General Assembly finds both pretty objectionable. Chavez's Venezuela looks like it's heading toward defeat in its bid for a nonpermanent seat on the 15-member Security Council, a heavy blow for its fiery president. But Venezuela's loss is hardly a ringing endorsement for the Bush administration, which has thrown its diplomatic weight behind Guatemala. After 35 rounds of balloting from Monday to Thursday, neither Latin American country could come close to the two-thirds vote needed to win.

Deadlocks can be resolved in one of two ways. Either the country with the least votes — in this case Venezuela — concedes, or they both agree to drop out in favor of a third candidate. Chavez has said he has no intention of quitting, and neither does Guatemala, meaning this could go on for a long time indeed. The U.N. record is 155 rounds of voting in a battle between Cuba and U.S.-backed Colombia in 1979. The seat ended up going to Mexico.

The election is a referendum of sorts between Chavez, who in a notorious rant before the General Assembly in September referred to Bush as "the devil," and the White House. If Venezuela prevails, Chavez intends to personally attend Security Council meetings to "defend dignity and truth" — meaning oppose the United States at nearly every turn.

DOJ_NMG_0083797

Chavez stands to lose the most if, as expected, neither Guatemala nor Venezuela wins. Obtaining the Security Council seat has been the single-minded goal in what passes for his foreign policy agenda, and it was the focus of a recent globe-trotting tour of such nations as Iran, Russia and China.

The U.S. has far less to lose because, even if Guatemala fails, pretty much any Latin American or Caribbean country except Cuba would be less harmful to U.S. interests.

Still, Venezuela's continued support from a large portion of the developing world, even after Chavez's clownish antics last month, is a discouraging indicator of international anger toward the United States. Many argue that White House arm-twisting on behalf of Guatemala may have actually harmed the country's chances, though it's likely that the pressure pushed at least as many countries to vote yes as no.

More troubling is a recent report from the State Department showing that just 25% of U.N. member states voted in line with the U.S. last year, down from 50% a decade earlier. Bush may win this battle, but he's giving ground in the larger diplomatic war.

Population Control: In Estonia, Paying Women To Have Babies Is Paying Off (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- Pia Kurro sat cross-legged on her bed in a drab, Soviet-era maternity ward that smelled of detergent and old linoleum and breast-fed her two-day-old daughter, Syria, who owes her existence to state subsidies.

In return for having the child, Ms. Kurro will receive the equivalent of $1,560 a month from her government for over a year, a lot of money in a country where the average monthly salary is $650.

"I would not have had a baby without the support," said the 39-year-old business consultant.

Ms. Kurro embodies an increasingly urgent question: Can government policies aimed at raising a nation's birthrate actually work? The answer is vital to the future of the global economy. Like most developed countries around the world, Estonia has a critical shortfall of children that, if not reversed, will lead to a sharply aging and shrinking population. That will undermine economic growth and public finances as a dwindling work force struggles to support a growing pool of retirees who are living longer.

A handful of developed countries, including the Nordic nations and France, have stable populations thanks to a long tradition of financial support for families. But for other countries in Europe and Asia that have already seen steep falls in birthrates, demographers have doubted there was much that could be done. Governments agreed, making little serious attempt to boost their birthrates. Estonia stands out because it has made a dramatic shift, from laissez-faire to aggressive activism, in an attempt to alter its future. And as other nations slowly start to address the risk of declining birthrates, the effort there is being closely watched around the world.

Estonia's wake-up call came in 2001, when the United Nations' annual world-population report showed that Estonia was one of the fastest-shrinking nations on earth, at risk of losing nearly half its 1.4 million people by mid-century. Estonia's fertility rate -- the average number of children a woman bears -- had collapsed to 1.3 in the late 1990s, down from 2.2 under communism only a decade earlier.

In an attempt to stop that downward spiral, Estonia took a bold step: In 2004 it began paying women to have babies. Working women who take time off after giving birth get their entire monthly income for up to 15 months, up to a ceiling of $1,560. Non-wage-earners get $200 a month. The welfare perk -- known locally as the "mother's salary" -- was a sharp about-face for the radically free-market government.

"Step by step, [the declining birthrate] became a danger to the survival of the nation, so we had to do something," says Paul-Eerik Rummo, minister for population affairs and a member of the Reform Party in Estonia's ruling coalition.

Tentative Results

Now, two years into the program, the government is seeing some of the first tentative results. Since the adoption of the new benefits, Estonia's fertility rate has improved to 1.5. That's still below the 2.1 children needed to stop the population from shrinking (one child to replace each parent, plus some room to allow for child mortality). And it will take years to see the full impact of the mother's salary. But the apparent early success has inspired the government to look at other ways of getting people to have more children -- everything from subsidies for nannies to linking pension payments to the number of children one has.

DOJ_NMG_0083798

Many countries once loath to meddle in matters of fertility are looking at their numbers and concluding that they must take similar steps. "Governments may not achieve their aim, but the competing risk of doing nothing is too great for many countries -- their future young labor supplies are going to be decimated," says Peter McDonald, professor of demography at the Australian National University in Canberra.

The fertility rate in the 30 countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the club of the world's leading industrialized democracies, was only 1.6 in 2005, down from 2.4 in 1970. Mexico, at 2.4, is the highest, with South Korea the lowest at 1.1. Demographers say the decline is due to fundamental changes in society. They include: greater economic opportunities for women; advances in birth control that have made reproduction a matter of choice rather than accident; and the spread of ideas about individual freedom and happiness that are hard to reconcile with caring for a large family.

Some European countries are experimenting with monthly cash compensation to women who leave work to have babies, including Lithuania, Austria and Slovenia. Starting next year, Germany and Bulgaria plan to pay new mothers benefits linked to their previous earnings. Russian President Vladimir Putin, who bemoaned his country's lack of children in his last state-of-the-nation speech in May, has also promised more aid to parents.

Elsewhere, Australia introduced in 2004 a one-time bonus per baby, currently worth about $3,000. The fertility rate is believed to have risen slightly thanks to a combination of the incentive and a booming economy, but is still around 1.8. Australia's finance minister has even exhorted parents to "do your patriotic duty tonight," echoing similar campaigns in the city-state of Singapore, which is still struggling with a fertility rate that hovers barely above 1.2. South Korea has introduced several policies this year, including more financial aid for day care and for fertility treatment.

Payments such as Estonia's are predictably controversial. Some demographers argue that paying people to have a baby simply makes them have one earlier; it doesn't necessarily make them have more. That point is tough to prove for now: Only after the current generation of young women passes menopause will it be clear whether they had more children in their fertile years than women of an earlier age group.

But the experience in places such as France and the Nordic countries suggests that incentives can have an impact. For example, women in Sweden and Norway, which support families with generous benefits, labor laws and child care, have close to two children on average. "Where there are consistent family-oriented policies in place for a long time, people have more children," says Tomas Sobotka of the Vienna Institute of Demography.

The main exception to the rule is the U.S., where the average woman has two children, despite only modest public support for families, largely via tax breaks. Demographers say America's tradition of mass immigration and its large minority populations make it unusual among developed nations. Hispanics, in particular, boost national fertility, with more than three children per woman. The U.S.'s population passed 300 million this week, according to the Census Bureau's estimate. About 55% of America's population growth is due to legal and illegal immigrants and their children, according to the Population Reference Bureau in Washington.

Estonia's experience shows what may lie ahead for many countries. Since it regained its independence from the Soviet Union in 1991, the small Baltic country has emerged as one of the fastest-growing economies in the world and is now a member of the European Union. Along the way, family dynamics in Estonia raced through a transformation in 15 years that took a century in many other countries.

For many, a spartan but stable lifestyle under communism preserved traditional family customs longer than in the West. Estonians tended to marry young and have two or more children despite hardship and little help from the state.

Different World

The world looked very different to many young, educated Estonians only a few years later. Miina Puusepp and Aive Levandi, both age 36 now, were 21 when Estonia broke from the Soviet Union, offering up new opportunities that pushed having children into the background. "After independence, the world was suddenly open," said Ms. Puusepp, sitting with her friend in a Tallinn cafe.

DOJ_NMG_0083799

The two young women worked and studied around Europe during the 1990s, eventually building careers in marketing and tourism. Ms. Levandi has had one boyfriend for the past 12 years. They didn't want to start a family because it would have cramped the couple's lifestyle. "We are living a full life, traveling a lot," Ms. Levandi said.

Meanwhile, many working-class Estonians were putting off thoughts of childbearing, too, but for different reasons: They saw their real incomes and job security eroded.

The Estonian government had dismantled welfare provisions -- even closing many kindergartens -- and pursued some of the most radically free-market policies in Europe. The country became a model for light business regulation. It encouraged investment and entrepreneurship with flat-rate income taxes and no tax on reinvested corporate profits. Economic growth soared, topping 10% in 1997. But the benefits flowed more to newer service industries and entrepreneurs -- and less to the old-line heavy industries that nonskilled workers relied on.

The U.N.'s 2001 warning that Estonia's population would almost halve by mid-century was widely publicized, pushing the plunging birthrate to the center of national politics. When the country held elections in 2003, fertility was the main issue along with tax cuts. Every party promised generous financial aid for families. The Reform Party, previously known for championing small government, proposed the mother's salary, arguing that in a country where most women work, women needed to have their income protected if they were to have children.

Now, Estonia's government is debating other measures, such as subsidizing nannies and private day care. Currently in Tallinn, there are waiting lists of as much as three years for day-care centers. Only the relatively wealthy can afford a nanny to bridge the time between the mother's salary and kindergarten.

Advisers to the population minister are also studying different ways to link people's pension entitlements to the number of children they had. And the government is expanding pre-abortion counseling, in the hope of giving more women confidence that they can cope with a baby, and of reducing the country's high abortion rate.

"Estonia should be a test site for the rest of Europe," says Kristina Täht, who advises the population minister on family policies.

Many Estonians say the mother's salary is contributing to a change in climate. Indeed, for the capital of a country that's critically short of children, pregnant women and mothers pushing strollers are a surprisingly common sight in Tallinn -- a new trend many locals are quick to comment on.

At the Merimetsa mall near Tallinn's Baltic seafront recently, Leila Niidas pushed her five-month-old daughter Annaliisa in a stroller. "In the past I didn't see little children in the streets. Now it's crazy how many children you see here," she said.

Now 41, Ms. Niidas decided last year to have a third child, 15 years after her second child was born. She wouldn't have had Annaliisa, she said, if the government hadn't ponied up, replacing the income from her marketing job at Hansabank, the country's largest bank.

"My husband's salary would not have been enough," Ms. Niidas said. "We spend all that we earn." In addition to paying loans on the family's large four-room apartment and upmarket Audi station wagon, she has a 19-year-old son who wants to go to college in Florida, where he recently spent his last year of high school.

Not surprisingly, the mother's salary has had the biggest impact on the birthrate of affluent, career-oriented women, because the amount is linked to the mother's previous wages. Researchers at Tallinn think tank Praxis say the biggest statistical change is that more high-salaried women are having second and third children. While Ms. Niidas's higher income qualifies her for the maximum $1,560 monthly benefit, less well-off Estonians get less help.

"To me it seems an unfair way to divide the government's money," says Hanna Kaptein, 25, who gets the minimum rate of $200 a month because she had a baby right after graduating from university and wasn't working yet. Her husband, Veljo, a church pastor, earns only $650 a month.

He jokes that if the family's washing machine breaks down once more, they will need another baby to get more benefits to pay for the repair.

DOJ_NMG_0083800

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Court Told It Lacks Power In Detainee Cases (WP) 4
ICRC Concerned Over New US Terror Law (FT) 4
Terrorism Law Faces Challenges (SCRIPPS) 5
Padilla Was Drugged, Threatened By Authorities, His Lawyers Say (BLOOM) 6
U.S. Questioned About Arar Torture Case (AP) 6
Court Filing Defends NSA Spy Program (CLPD) 8
Mideast Conflict Plays Out In Terrorism Funding Trial (CHIT) 8
Terror Suspect Says CIA Recruited Him (AP-Y) 9
Trial Begins For 2 Charged With Aiding Terror Group (NYT) 10
Jordanian Immigrant Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (AP) 10
Suspect Pleads Guilty To Fraud Schemes (SLT) 11
Terror Case Accountant Will Agree To Plea Deal (TOLB) 11
Italy Arrests Seven In Push To Curb Laundering Of Drug Cash (FT) 12

Homeland Response:

Football Stadium Threat A Hoax, FBI Says (AP) 13
Threat On Stadiums Is Found To Be A Hoax (WP) 13
Football Threat Is Said To Be Hoax (NYT) 14
Wal-Mart Limits Prepaid Cell Phones To 2 (WP/AP) 14
Remains From WTC Site Found In Manhole (AP-Y) 15
Porthole Security (WSJ) 15
Democrats Outline Reform Plan For Federal Emergency Response (MCT) 16

War News:

General: U.S. Rethinking Strategy To Secure Baghdad (AP) 17
General Says Mission In Baghdad Falls Short (WP) 17
U.S. Says Violence In Baghdad Rises, Foiling Campaign (NYT) 18
Security Operation Yields No Reduction In Baghdad Violence (LAT) 20
US Army Concedes Failure In Baghdad (FT) 21
U.S. Faces Iraq Crossroads (WSJ) 22
Surge In Military Deaths Weighs On Families (USAT) 23
Major Change Expected In Strategy For Iraq War (WP) 24
Bush Faces A Battery Of Ugly Choices On War (NYT) 26
White House Nixes Partitioning Iraq (AP) 27
White House Rejects Iraq Partition Plan (WT) 28
Plan B (WSJ) 28
Top US General Says Rumsfeld Is Inspired By God (AFP) 30
Inside The Ring (WT) 30
Planted News Reports Were Legal, Report Says (USAT/AP) 32
Pentagon Audit Clears Propaganda Effort (NYT) 32
Judge: American Can Be Transferred To Iraq For Execution (NYT/AP) 33
Judge Dismisses Bid To Elude Iraq (WT) 33
General's Comment No Help To Blair (WT) 34
Our Small Defense Budget (WSJ) 35

Corporate Scandals:

Rambus Says Misdated Options Will Result In Large Charge (WSJ) 36
How Did UnitedHealth's McGuire Get Same Options Twice? (WSJ) 36
Companies Backdating Stock Options Likely To Share Directors (AP) 38
N.Y. Judge Orders Grasso To Pay Back Up To $100M From Compensation Package (AP) 39
Grasso Is Ordered To Repay Millions In Compensation (WSJ) .. 39
Ex-Stock Exchange Chief Told To Return Up To $100 Million (NYT) 41
Court Tells Grasso To Repay Tens Of Millions (USAT) 43
Grasso Breached Duty To NYSE, N.Y. Judge Rules (WP) 43
Grasso To Repay Millions To NYSE (FT) 44
SKILLING'S LAST STAND (WP) 45
Senate Committees Probe SEC's Pequot Investigation (WSJ) ... 46
Favata Settles SEC Civil Charges (WSJ) 47
Ex-Athlete To Plead Guilty In Ponzi Case (LAT) 47
SEC Suits Could Influence Delphi Ownership Talks (WSJ) 48
Closing In On Hedge Funds (NYT) 49

Criminal Law:

Boehner, Former House Clerk Testify In Foley Investigation (CHIT/AP) 50
Former Clerk Tells Panel He Alerted Speaker's Office To Foley Concerns (NYT) 51
Boehner And Ex-Clerk Of House Testify (WP) 52
Priest Denies Having Sex With Foley (CHIT/AP) 53
Priest Says He Had Close Contact With Foley (NYT) 54
Retired Priest Admits Encounters With Foley (WP) 55
Priest Admits 'Fondling' Foley, Denies Rape (WT) 56
Folier Than Thou (WP) 57
Gun Collector Once Held In Prosecutor's Death To Help Grand Jury (AP) 58

Gun Collector To Cooperate In Wales Case (SEATIMES) 59
Anschutz Gesture To Deputy Prime Minister Equals Complaint (AP) 59
Officials Probing Possible Theft Of Voting Software In Md. (WP)60
Texas Inmate Kills Self Day Of Execution (FINDLAW/AP) 61
Blagojevich Fundraiser Pleads Not Guilty In Two Cases (CHIT) 61
Governor's Fundraiser Says He's Not Guilty Of Seeking Kickbacks (BVND) 62
Warning Letter Lands Candidate In Hot Seat (USAT)..... 63
Liberti Gets 18 Months For Pocketing $66,000 (PALMBEACHP)64
Ex-WPB Official Sentenced To 18 Months In Federal Corruption Case (AP) 65
Accountant Probed In Embezzlement At Drug Trade Group (WT) 65
Prosecution Traces Smuggled Venus' Steps (WP/AP) 66
Five People Accused Of Stealing Katrina Relief Money (SDUT/AP) 67
'God Was Right Here' During Restaurant Siege (WP) 67
Witness Says He Stood By As Cousin Beat Reporter (WP) 69
FBI Investigates Boeing Scientist In L.A. (SDUT/AP)..... 70
FBI Investigates Boeing Scientist's Handling Of Data (BLOOM) 70
L.A. Scientist For Boeing Is Focus Of Probe (LAT) 70
Thefts Solved By DNA Analysis (USAT)..... 71
Retired Clarksburg Policeman Headed For Federal Prison. (WVSJ)..... 72
Plea Deal Resolves DUI Charge In Ferrari Crash Case (LAT) ... 72

Civil Law:

Returning Vets Can Face New Fight (MINNST)..... 72
IT, Intranets Would Improve FOIA Processes, Attorney General Says (FCW) 74

Civil Rights:

Calif. Candidate Urged To Exit Race (AP)..... 75
State Investigates Allegations Of Voter Intimidation In California (MCT)..... 76
O.C. Candidate Is Disowned (LAT) 77
Calif. Campaign In Turmoil Over Letters (WP) 79
County G.O.P. Asks Candidate To Withdraw Over Letter Threat (NYT) 80
Monitors Sought At Polling Places In Pa. (AP-Y) 80
Bill Could Bring Justice In Old Civil Rights Murder Cases (MH).. 81
Dakota Divided As Abortion Vote Tests US Opinion (FT) 81
Court: Groups Must Offer Contraceptives (AP-Y) 82
Sharing The Health Bills (NYT)..... 83

Antitrust:

Avery Dennison Says DOJ Closes Probe (AP) 85
U.S. Closes Probe, Avery Says (LAT)..... 85
AmSouth To Sell 52 Branches In Antitrust Agreement (AP) 85
AmSouth Identifies Branches To Be Sold In Merger With Regions Financial (BIRMBIZ) 85
Kidney Dialysis Center Deal With Amgen Blocks Roche (NYT).. 86
Russians Sue To Stop Malkin From Playing (AP) 87
Tata Steel Nears Deal To Buy U.K.'s Corus For $8.6 Billion (WSJ) 87
Corus Expected To Agree To Tata Bid (FT)..... 88

Environment:

Colorado Water Wars Include Spy Campaign (FINDLAW/AP)... 89

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

'Fire In The Hole!' ATF Shows Off Site For Gonzales (FFLS)..... 90
Jury Indicts 38 In Inquiry Into Multistate Drug Trade (WT)..... 90
Denver Investigators Smash Lucrative Drug Ring (AP) 91
Dozens Arrested In Drug Investigation (DENP)..... 91
38 Indicted In Alleged Drug Ring (RMN) 92
Massive Drug Trafficking Ring Shut Down (KMGH)..... 93
26 Arrested In Money-laundering Scheme (WT/UPI)..... 93
Escapee Linked To Drug Cartel (PR) 94
Newspaper Held In Contempt In Bonds Case (AP)..... 95
Where Do Felons Get Their Guns? (HERNTDY)..... 95

Immigration:

California City Bars Renting Housing To Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP) 96

Tax:

Loftier Limits For Retirement Savers (WP)..... 97

Congress-Administration:

Bush Appoints Mine Safety Administrator (NYT/AP)..... 97
U.S. Judge Orders White House To Release Cheney Visitor Logs (WSJ/AP) 98
Medicare Drug Aid No Longer Automatic (WP)..... 98
House Intel Chair Suspends Staff Member (AP-Y) 99
House Committee Dismisses Bulk Of Investigative Division (USAT)..... 99
Capitol Hill Eats Own Pork (LAT)..... 100

Other News:

Home Run: Dow's First Close At 12000 (WSJ) 100
Dow Closes Above 12,000 For The First Time (NYT)..... 102
Dow Notches First Close Above 12,000 (WP/AP)..... 102
Dow Breaks 12,000 (USAT)..... 103
Economic Index Suggests Continued Slowing (WSJ)..... 104
Opec Set To Defend $60 Global Minimum (FT)..... 104
OPEC Signals Resolve With Cutback (WSJ) 105
OPEC Says It Will Cut 1.2 Million Barrels A Day (WP) 106
The Petroleum Paradox (WP)..... 107
Raise The Gas Tax (WSJ)..... 108
Police: Motorist Who Struck Officer Is 2nd Circuit Judge (LAW/AP)..... 109
Confusion Reigns Over Safety Tester's Approval Of E85 Fuel Station Pumps (USAT) 110
Ruling Is Due For Justice Who Lobbied For Bush Pick (NYT).. 110
Bush Campaigns For 2 Lawmakers Caught Up In Controversy (NYT) 111
Bush Campaigns For Pa., Va. Candidates (AP-Y)..... 112
Lawmakers Mired In Gaffes, Scandal Get Help From Bush (WT)113
Bush Makes House Calls On 2 Ailing GOP Candidates (LAT) . 114
Bush Boosts Allen Campaign, Even As Allen Nuances Pro-war Stance (AP)..... 115

DOJ_NMG_0083802

Bush Trip Raises $550,000 (RTD) ... 116
Bush, Clinton Headline Va. Fundraisers (AP-Y) ... 117
Bush, Clinton Ratchet Up The Drama (WP) ... 118
JIM WEBB: Clinton Visit May Net Half-million (RTD) ... 119
Senate Race In Va. Draws Biggest Fundraisers (USAT) ... 120
Big Names Campaign As Election Day Nears (WT) ... 121
Democrats, Republicans Both Focus On Bush (CHIT) ... 122
Iraq Threatens To Cripple The GOP (MCT) ... 123
GOP's Solidarity On War Is Cracking (LAT) ... 125
Bush Campaigns For GOP Candidates Facing Unexpected Troubles (PENNNWSFLSH) ... 127
Bush Campaigns For Pa. Congressman Enmeshed In Sex Scandal (MCT) ... 128
President Bush Visits The Area (TR) ... 129
Presidential Visit To Lackawanna County (WNEP) ... 129
Republican Woes Lead To Feuding By Conservatives (NYT) ... 130
Conservatives Hit For 'Whining' Over Turnout (WT) ... 132
Democrats Make Big Gains In Fund-Raising, But G.O.P. Has More Cash On Hand (NYT) ... 133
Democrats Close Fundraising Gap With GOP (AP-Y) ... 134
Republicans' Cash Advantage Ebbs As Vote Nears (WSJ) ... 134
Democrats Approach Nov. 7 With A Surge In Fundraising (WP) 136
Voters Over 50 Favor Democrats (WSJ) ... 136
GOP Aims To Scare Up Big Voter Turnout (WP) ... 137
GOP To Air Ad Warning Of Terror Attacks (AP-Y) ... 138
Dems To Use Moderation If They Win House (AP) ... 139
Pelosi No Shoo-in For Job As Speaker (WT) ... 140
Confident Democrats Draft Broad Health Care Agenda (NYT) ... 141
Fla. Official Appeals Foley Sign Ruling (AP-Y) ... 142
Dems Look To Rancher To Win Neb. Race (AP-Y) ... 143
Clinton Stumps For Cardin (WT) ... 144
Maryland's Senate Race (WP) ... 144
Too Late For Lame Attempts To Win The Black Vote (WT) ... 145
VP Bill? Depends On Meaning Of 'Elected' (WP) ... 146
Ehrlich Vows To Spend $338 Million Next Year (WP) ... 147
Young Republicans Now Flourishing At Liberal Berkeley (WSJ) 148
Joe Lieberman Rediscovers Belief In Connecticut (WSJ) ... 149
Massachusetts, Back In The Game (WP) ... 150
Black Candidates, A Welcome Norm (USAT) ... 151
It's Voter-Fooling Time In America (NYT) ... 151
Tax Cut Convert (WSJ) ... 152
Charities Tackle Accountability (WSJ) ... 152
Calif. Ballot Battle Over Big Oil May Be Costliest In U.S. History (WP) ... 153
Rice Presses S. Korea To Pursue Full Sanctions (WP) ... 154
South Korea Tells Rice It Won't Abandon Industrial And Tourist Ventures With North (NYT) ... 156
Rice In China On Trickiest Leg Of NKorea Crisis Tour (AFP) ... 157
Rice: Won't Coerce Allies On N. Korea (AP) ... 158
Cracks Appear In US-Korea Front (FT) ... 159
For Rice, Seoul Proves A Cautious Ally (CSM) ... 159
Report: N. Korean Leader Regrets Test (AP) ... 160
China May Press North Koreans (NYT) ... 161
China Steps Up Diplomacy With N. Korea (AP) ... 162
China Banks To Halt Dealings With North Korea (WSJ) ... 163
North Korean Ploy Masks Ships Under Other Flags (NYT) ... 164
World War II Is Over (WP) ... 166
Olmert Warns Iran About Its Nuke Program (AP) ... 167
Britain Says U.N. Iran Resolution Coming (AP) ... 167
The Black Box Of Tehran (WP) ... 168
UN 'poses No Threat To Israeli Aircraft' (FT) ... 169
Hamas Charities Thrive Despite U.S.-led Fund Freeze (WT) ... 169
Russia Suspends Scores Of Foreign Groups (NYT) ... 170
Russia Halts Activities Of Many Groups From Abroad (WP) ... 171
Foreign Groups Suspend Work In Russia Pending Registration (LAT) ... 172
Venezuela Opposition Confident Of Victory (WT) ... 173
U.N. Losers (LAT) ... 174
Population Control: In Estonia, Paying Women To Have Babies Is Paying Off (WSJ) ... 174

DOJ_NMG_0083803

TERRORISM NEWS:

Court Told It Lacks Power In Detainee Cases (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Moving quickly to implement the bill signed by President Bush this week that authorizes military trials of enemy combatants, the administration has formally notified the U.S. District Court here that it no longer has jurisdiction to consider hundreds of habeas corpus petitions filed by inmates at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba.

In a notice dated Wednesday, the Justice Department listed 196 pending habeas cases, some of which cover groups of detainees. The new Military Commissions Act (MCA), it said, provides that "no court, justice, or judge" can consider those petitions or other actions related to treatment or imprisonment filed by anyone designated as an enemy combatant, now or in the future.

Beyond those already imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay or elsewhere, the law applies to all non-U.S. citizens, including permanent U.S. residents.

The new law already has been challenged as unconstitutional by lawyers representing the petitioners. The issue of detainee rights is likely to reach the Supreme Court for a third time.

Habeas corpus, a Latin term meaning "you have the body," is one of the oldest principles of English and American law. It requires the government to show a legal basis for holding a prisoner. A series of unresolved federal court cases brought against the administration over the last several years by lawyers representing the detainees had left the question in limbo.

Two years ago, in Rasul v. Bush, which gave Guantanamo detainees the right to challenge their detention before a U.S. court, and in this year's Hamdan v. Rumsfeld , the Supreme Court appeared to settle the issue in favor of the detainees. But the new legislation approved by Congress last month, which gives Bush the authority to try detainees before military commissions, included a provision removing judicial review for all habeas claims.

Immediately after Bush signed the act into law Tuesday, the Justice Department sent a letter to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit asserting the new authorities and informing the court that it no longer had jurisdiction over a combined habeas case that had been under consideration since 2004. The U.S. District Court cases, which had been stayed pending the appeals court decision, were similarly invalid, the administration informed that court on Wednesday.

A number of legal scholars and members of Congress, including Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), have said that the habeas provision of the new law violates a clause of the Constitution that says the right to challenge detention "shall not be suspended" except in cases of "rebellion or invasion." Historically, the Constitution has been interpreted to apply equally to citizens and noncitizens under U.S. jurisdiction.

The administration's persistence on the issue "demonstrates how difficult it is for the courts to enforce [the clause] in the face of a resolute executive branch that is bound and determined to resist it," said Joseph Margulies, a Northwestern University law professor involved in the detainee cases.

On Tuesday, the appeals court granted a petition by lawyers for the detainees to argue against the new law. Vincent Warren, the executive director of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, said yesterday that he expected the administration to file a motion for dismissal of all the cases before the defense challenge is heard.

"We and other habeas counsel are going to vigorously oppose dismissal of these cases," Warren said. "We are going to challenge that law as violating the Constitution on several grounds." Whichever side loses in the upcoming court battles, he said, will then appeal to the Supreme Court.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

ICRC Concerned Over New US Terror Law (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

The International Committee of the Red Cross raised concerns on Thursday about recent US legislation that creates military commissions to try prisoners at Guantánamo Bay and redefines American obligations under the Geneva conventions.

DOJ_NMG_0083804

President George W. Bush signed the Military Commissions Act this week. Among other controversial provisions it permits the admission of evidence gained through coercion, and prevents detainees at Guantánamo from challenging their detention in US courts.

Jakob Kellenberger, the ICRC president, said the legislation "raises certain concerns and questions".

"The very broad definition of who is an 'unlawful enemy combatant' and the fact that there is not an explicit prohibition of the admission of evidence attained by coercion are examples," he said, in comments posted on the ICRC website following a speech at Georgetown University.

The administration hammered out agreement on the law with key Republican senators after the Supreme Court ruled this year that the previous military commissions created to try prisoners at Guantánamo violated US law and the Geneva conventions.

Republicans, and a few Democrats, have argued that the law will help the US prosecute the "war on terror" but the American Civil Liberties Union called it one of the "worst civil liberties measures ever enacted".

Mr Kellenberger said the legislation was also problematic because it had created "two tiers of prohibitions" out of those listed under common article three of the Geneva conventions.

"[The law] omits certain violations from the list of acts that are war crimes under US domestic law. These included the prohibition of outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, and the prohibition of the denial of the right to a fair trial . . . This distinction between the different violations disrupts the integrity of common article three."

Mr Kellenberger raised concerns about the use of secret detentions, which he said were "contrary to a range of safeguards provided for under the relevant international standards". The ICRC has also asked the US to provide the names of people who were previously held in the secret CIA detention programme.

John Bellinger, the US State Department legal adviser, on Thursday told reporters that Washington was "not required" to provide the ICRC with access to any prisoners that entered the system in the future.

He added that Washington also believed there was "no requirement" to provide the ICRC with the identities of previously held prisoners.

European politicians have responded angrily to Mr Bush's admission the CIA has operated secret prisons.

Terrorism Law Faces Challenges (SCRIPPS)

By DAN K. THOMASSON, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The news photos of President Bush signing the latest anti-terrorist measure show a line up of dignitaries whose unsmiling countenances were properly grim for witnessing the execution of the American notion of justice.

Obviously some in the gathering, like Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Vice President Cheney, don't see it that way. For them the potential shredding of civil liberties is necessary to save the nation from the terrorist hordes waiting to destroy us. One doesn't smile in triumph when the president is saving the lives of millions of Americans.

Despite the violence it does to our constitutional principles, without this latest authorization to conduct questionable interrogations, strip detainees of their right to examine the evidence against them, exclude evidence gained through coercion and challenge their incarceration, another Sept. 11, 2001, could be just around the corner. Or so we are led to believe.

"It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said. "I have that privilege this morning."

But one would hope that the somberness of some of those in attendance, like Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., may have stemmed from an uncomfortable realization that their earlier fight against passage of a bill they considered dangerously excessive was in the end futile and unrewarding. There was little compromise when all was said and done, a fact certified by the noticeable absence of the third member of the initial Senate opposition, John McCain, who skipped the signing ostensibly to campaign in Wisconsin for a GOP House candidate.

McCain, a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, is one of the few members of Congress who truly understands the need to protect the rights of even one's enemies lest it happen to you. His long and brutal incarceration by the North Vietnamese has left him with an appreciation of the value of constitutional safeguards for all. His decision to skip this important ceremony for "campaign" reasons speaks volumes about how he truly feels about this act whether he admits it or not.

How long this law will stay in place is the subject of much speculation. Civil libertarians already are talking about a new challenge in the federal courts on constitutional grounds because it strips suspects of habeas corpus rights. The Democrats who strenuously opposed it may want to challenge it next January if the November election gives them control of one or both houses of Congress as the signs now indicate.

DOJ_NMG_0083805

The bill is the result of a Supreme Court ruling outlawing the system of military commissions the president had set up to try suspected terrorists. The court said the system was invalid without congressional authorization. In their ruling the justices also required suspects to be treated in accordance with the Geneva Conventions' prohibition against inhumane treatment, including "outrages upon personal dignity." Bush then acknowledged the existence of secret prisons, transferred 14 top al Qaeda suspects to Guantanamo and asked Congress to approve the military commissions and provisions to permit the CIA to continue its interrogations of terrorists.

The president's action was seen by longtime observers as an attempt to turn the nation's focus away from Iraq and toward terrorism in advance of next month's important midterm elections. For a time it seemed to work but gains in the president's approval ratings during that time have since slipped back.

No one expects those clearly identified as hardnosed terrorists to be treated with kid gloves. But denying even the worst of them the justice Americans cherish, it seems to me, is doing the terrorists' job for them. The end never justifies the means in these cases and while the president may believe he is saving lives, in the long run he may be paying a price far more damaging. In many ways, this scary action erodes the basics of our system about as badly as anything the terrorists are plotting.

Of course we must guard ourselves from the maniacs and that requires strong medicine. But should we torch the Constitution and international agreements to do so? Who shall guard against the guardians? Plato's question is never more relevant than now. That is not a statement reflecting a tolerance for terrorism. It is only an expression of concern about how much of our own freedom is lost to accomplish this job.

This is grim business.

(Dan K. Thomasson is former editor of the Scripps Howard News Service.)

Padilla Was Drugged, Threatened By Authorities, His Lawyers Say (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss And Jeff St.onge

Bloomberg, October 20, 2006

Oct. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Lawyers for accused terrorism supporter Jose Padilla say U.S. authorities drugged him with LSD or PCP, filled his cell with ``noxious fumes'' and threatened to slash him with a knife while he was being held without charges.

In court papers seeking dismissal of charges against Padilla, his lawyers said the abuse occurred after President George W. Bush declared him an ``enemy combatant'' following his arrest in 2002. The designation allowed Padilla, a U.S. citizen, to be held without being charged with a crime for three years and five months.

``The torture took myriad forms, each designed to cause pain, anguish, depression and, ultimately, the loss of will to live,'' according to the court document filed Oct. 4 in federal court in Miami.

A call and e-mail seeking comment from the U.S. Justice Department weren't immediately returned.

The government initially accused Padilla, who was arrested in Chicago, of plotting to explode a radioactive ``dirty bomb'' in the U.S. The government later said the al-Qaeda terrorist group trained him to blow up U.S. apartment buildings.

In November 2005, Padilla and four co-defendants were indicted on charges of conspiring to provide material support to terrorists. He is awaiting trial.

The government is appealing a judge's decision to dismiss one charge against Padilla of conspiracy to ``murder, kidnap and maim'' people. Padilla is asking the judge to throw out the entire case against him on the grounds his right to a speedy trial was denied.

For almost two years, Padilla was kept in isolation in a 9- foot-by-7-foot cell with no view of the outside world, said the court papers filed by his lawyers. Prison authorities also deprived Padilla of sleep and shackled him in uncomfortable positions for hours, his lawyers said.

``Noxious fumes would be introduced to his room causing his eyes and nose to run,'' according to the filing.

Prison officials gave Padilla ``drugs against his will, believed to be some form of lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD) or phencyclidine (PCP), to act as a sort of truth serum during his interrogations,'' according to the filing by his lawyers.

Padilla's interrogators told him he might be sent to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where prisoners caught during the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan are being kept, his lawyers said.

``He was threatened with being cut with a knife and having alcohol poured on his wounds,'' the filing said.

The case is U.S. v. Hassoun et al., 04cr60001, U.S. District Court in Miami.

U.S. Questioned About Arar Torture Case (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083806

WASHINGTON - Days before the Bush administration put Canadian citizen Maher Arar on a plane for Syria, Canadian law enforcement officials advised their U.S. counterparts that evidence of terrorist links by Arar was not definitive.

Why the Bush administration still shipped Arar to Syria - where he was tortured - and whether he remains on the United States' terror watch list are still unknown. Administration officials refuse to talk about the case.

It has been a month since a Canadian commission cleared Syrian-born Arar of all suspicion of terrorist activity, yet Arar still can't get into the United States, one of his lawyers, Michael Ratner, said Thursday.

John Cavanagh, director of the Institute for Policy Studies, asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to clear Arar's name and let him come into the United States this week to receive a human rights award.

Gonzales did not reply, Cavanagh said. At the Justice Department, a spokesman said he was unaware of the letter and could not comment.

It is not the Justice Department that keeps track of terrorist watch lists, but rather the Homeland Security Department, where spokesman Russ Knocke said in an e-mail, "We do not disclose names on watch lists."

Arar is a software engineer who was traveling on a Canadian passport in 2002 when he was detained at New York's Kennedy Airport because of what the Canadian government now says was faulty intelligence. Without informing Canada, the U.S. government turned Arar over to Syria where he was tortured, tossed in a small cell and finally released after nearly a year of confinement.

"How long is it going to take to get him off the watch list, remove the bar on re-entry to the United States and exonerate him?" asked Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights.

Sending Arar to Syria "appears to be part of a Bush administration policy of using suspicion to send people to countries where they are tortured," added Ratner, whose group has been representing Arar in a lawsuit against the Bush administration.

Immediately after Arar's release from Syria in 2003, the White House summoned Canada's ambassador to a private meeting, according to an exhaustive, 1,000-page-plus report on Arar released last month by a Canadian government commission.

At the meeting, White House official Frances Fragos Townsend "indicated that senior administration officials were irritated" that the Canadian prime minister was saying publicly that the decision to remove Arar was made unilaterally by U.S. officials, says the Canadian report.

The Canadian commission concluded there was no evidence Canadian officials participated in or agreed to the decision to send Arar to Syria.

On Thursday, Deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino declined to comment, citing the fact that Arar plans to sue the U.S. government.

The Canadian inquiry found the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in 2002 wrongly described Arar to American law enforcement officials as "an Islamic extremist suspected of being linked to the al-Qaida terrorist network."

Raising additional questions about why the U.S. government sent Arar to Syria, the Canadian inquiry also found that in the days before the U.S. government sent him, Canadian law enforcement officials advised their U.S. counterparts at the FBI that evidence of terrorist links by Arar was not definitive.

"A link analysis has yet to be completed on Arar, and while he has had contact with many individuals of interest to this project we are unable to indicate links to al-Qaida," the Canadians stated in one communication. It added that a detailed investigation into Arar had not yet been completed.

Questions raised by the Canadian report about the Arar case have drawn only brief comment at the State Department and the Justice Department.

Regarding Arar being turned over to Syria, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said last month that the determination of U.S. government officials at the time was that Arar posed a threat to the United States and that officials had the reasonable expectation that he would not be "maltreated." At the Justice Department, Gonzales has said simply that "I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the commission report."

Speaking from Canada this week, Arar said a representative of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service was present when he was put on the plane for Syria in 2002. Arar said he told the INS representative that the Syrians would torture him.

"She said something like: 'The INS is not the body or the agency that signed the Geneva Convention convention against torture.' For me what that really meant is, 'We will send you to torture, and we don't care.'"

"Even when the Canadian commission exonerated, the U.S. was totally unapologetic; the man deserves an apology," said Joanne Mariner of Human Rights Watch, where she is the organization's terrorism and counterterrorism director.

ON THE NET

http://www.ararcommission.ca/eng/Vol_I_English.pdf

DOJ_NMG_0083807

Court Filing Defends NSA Spy Program (CLPD)

By Bill Sloat, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, October 20, 2006

Cincinnati - President Bush's lawyers contend Congress broadened his power to conduct warrantless surveillance on "those associated with al-Qaida" when it allowed American military action against terrorists shortly after the 9/11 attacks.

Justice Department lawyers repeatedly invoke Bush's war powers - and his duties as the nation's commander-in-chief - in a 48-page legal brief that defends a National Security Agency program which secretly monitors international communications.

Because of the classified program's wide sweep, U.S. citizens may be the subject of warrantless eavesdropping by the spy agency. That possibility led to a lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union and others challenging the program as a violation of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against search and seizure without a warrant.

The legal brief says Bush acted properly because Congress put the nation on a wartime footing.

"This specific authorization, focusing directly on those whom the president determined were responsible for the 9/11 attacks, represents a targeted expansion of the president's statutory authority to address al-Qaida's extraordinary threat," Justice Department lawyers wrote.

They cited a 2001 congressional resolution, the Authorization for Use of Military Force, adopted around the time the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan overthrew the Taliban regime that sheltered Osama bin Laden.

The brief, filed Thursday in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, is part of the administration's appeal of a Detroit federal judge's ruling that the spying program is unconstitutional.

While portions of the brief were kept secret on national security grounds, the administration's legal team makes clear that the White House believes U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's decision would aid al-Qaida.

The court filing contends her decision "dismantles a vital tool that already has helped detect and disrupt al-Qaida plots," although no details about those plots were made public.

Mideast Conflict Plays Out In Terrorism Funding Trial (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush

Chicago Tribune, October 20, 2006

In an overflowing courtroom guarded by a metal detector and bomb-sniffing dog, the intractable conflict between Palestinians and Israelis became the backdrop Thursday for the trial of two men accused of supporting terrorism.

Federal prosecutors charge that Muhammad Salah of Bridgeview and Abdelhaleem Ashqar of suburban Washington, D.C., aided terrorism from the United States as active members of the Palestinian extremist group Hamas.

The defense responded that neither man has ever supported violence and any assistance they provided was legal and came from a desire to help their own people as they struggled under a stifling occupation.

Assistant U.S Atty. Carrie Hamilton was the first to address the jury.

She began her statement by recalling the May 13, 1996, murder of David Boim, a 17-year-old American student shot to death in Israel by members of Hamas.

"Neither of these defendants was in that car on May 13 when David Boim was gunned down, but Muhammad Salah and Abdelhaleem Ashqar are just as responsible for the murder," she said.

She noted that for years, Israeli civilians have lived under the threat of suicide bombings and other terrorist attacks carried out by Hamas.

"Since at least 1989, these two defendants have supported and aided Hamas from right here in the United States," Hamilton said.

Hamilton detailed a conversation federal agents recorded between Ashqar and a top Hamas member in which they allegedly discussed a suicide bomber who blew himself up before reaching his final destination.

She told jurors that agents seized thousands of documents related to Hamas from Ashqar's previous home in Oxford, Miss.

The defense, meanwhile, focused in part on the desperate and sometimes deadly conditions Palestinians face under Israeli occupation.

Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, told jurors that resistance to occupation was inevitable.

Salah's intent was not violence, however, it was "helping people survive," he said.

"He is not a member of Hamas. He's never been a member of Hamas," Deutsch said.

Ashqar's attorney, William Moffitt, insisted the government is punishing his client not because he did anything wrong but because he turned down attempts by the FBI and CIA to recruit him as an informant and spy.

DOJ_NMG_0083808

Moffitt displayed a January 1996 CIA recruitment letter that requested Ashqar, a business professor educated in the U.S., consider applying to the agency's clandestine services.

"They wanted him to betray himself, his people, his ideals," Moffitt said. "He is an intelligent, non-violent person, and they wanted him on their side."

Moffitt compared Ashqar to American Revolutionary hero Nathan Hale and the legendary anti-apartheid champion Nelson Mandela.

Deutsch took a similar line, comparing the Palestinian resistance to the American Revolution and the French resistance against Nazi Germany.

Deutsch derided the idea that his client, who spent most of his adult life in the U.S., could be a Hamas leader, much less act as head of the group's military wing as prosecutors charge.

The only evidence that Salah was a Hamas leader comes from a statement he gave while in Israeli custody in 1993, Deutsch said.

The statement was the product of physical and psychological torture Salah endured for more than 50 days and should not be considered as evidence in a U.S. court, he said.

Hamilton said that Salah provided the statement voluntarily and that it included damning corroborating evidence, including Salah's knowledge of the burial site of an Israeli soldier kidnapped and murdered by members of Hamas.

Salah spent four years in an Israeli prison after confessing to being a leader of Hamas. He returned to the U.S. in 1997 and was immediately put under federal surveillance.

Prosecutors intend to call former New York Times reporter Judith Miller to testify that Salah was not under duress when he spoke to Israeli agents in 1993.

Miller observed one question-and-answer session between Salah and an Israeli agent and reported that Salah appeared calm and comfortable as he provided information about his role in Hamas.

Deutsch said Miller saw a staged interview of a broken man who was willing to do whatever it took to get along with his interrogators.

Hamilton told jurors Salah's confession is further corroborated by bank records that show he delivered to the West Bank and Gaza hundreds of thousands of dollars he received from top Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook.

Deutsch acknowledged Salah took money to the West Bank and Gaza, but said it was intended to provide humanitarian aid.

Testimony in the trial began late Thursday afternoon, with prosecutors calling to the stand Matthew Levitt, a high-ranking official at the U.S. Treasury Department and an expert on Hamas.

Terror Suspect Says CIA Recruited Him (AP-Y)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

A former university professor charged with plotting to bankroll Hamas terrorists was once asked by the CIA whether he wanted a job as a spy, his attorney told a jury Thursday.

Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, apparently never pursued the idea. But his defense attorneys say the offer shows federal agents were eager to recruit him to spy on fellow Palestinians before doing an about-face and indicting him.

Attorney William Moffitt showed jurors a June 17, 1996, letter on CIA stationary telling Ashqar, then a post-graduate business student at the University of Mississippi, that he might want a clandestine services job.

"Operations officers serve overseas as collectors of information," the letter said. It told him to "tick the box below" to pursue such a job.

But Moffitt said that when the job was suggested, federal agents already had searched his house, found the documents and tapped his phone.

Ashqar, of Alexandria, Va., and suburban Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, are charged in a four-count racketeering indictment with furnishing thousands of dollars and fresh recruits to the Palestinian militant organization Hamas, which has been officially designated a terrorist group by the federal government.

The indictment was announced in August 2004 in Washington by John Ashcroft, attorney general at the time, who called the men prime movers in "a U.S.-based terrorism recruiting and financing cell." The trial is expected to take three months, and expected witnesses include Israeli security agents.

Also charged in the indictment but absent and classified as a fugitive is Mousa Abu Marzook, described by federal officials as the deputy chief of the political section of Hamas — which since winning an election last January has controlled the government of the Palestinian territories.

DOJ_NMG_0083809

Ashqar is accused of funneling money destined for Hamas fighters in Israel in the Palestinian territories through his U.S. bank accounts and making his home an archive of Hamas documents.

Moffitt and Salah's attorney, Michael E. Deutsch, portrayed the two defendants as men who funneled money not to terrorists but to the poor and the downtrodden of the West Bank and Gaza Strip suffering under Israeli occupation.

Trial Begins For 2 Charged With Aiding Terror Group (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 19 — Muhammad Salah spent four and a half years in an Israeli prison in the mid-1990's after admitting that he had provided money and other aid to the Palestinian organization Hamas for use in attacks against Israel.

Now, nearly a decade after Mr. Salah's release, his lawyers are trying to convince a federal jury here that that confession, on which a federal racketeering case against him is based, was obtained through torture.

"What they want you to do is buy into Israeli torture," Mr. Salah's lawyer, Michael E. Deutsch, told jurors on Thursday in the trial's opening statements. "You don't have to accept a case based on torture."

Mr. Salah, 53, a former grocer from suburban Chicago who now drives vans that transport dialysis patients for treatments, and his co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former university professor from suburban Washington, are charged with supplying financial support to Hamas's military leaders. Prosecutors say they have evidence that the two men used United States bank accounts to funnel money to the group.

The indictment was announced in 2004 with much fanfare by the attorney general at the time, John D. Ashcroft, as part of the federal government's response to terrorism.

Carrie E. Hamilton, an assistant United States attorney, told jurors in a packed courtroom that during the trial, which is expected to last three to four months, the government would show how Mr. Salah and Dr. Ashqar channeled money to Hamas's military leaders during the early 1990's. Because of their financial support for Hamas, Ms. Hamilton said, the two men were responsible for the group's violent tactics against Israel.

"They're on the outside," she said, "helping people on the inside with Hamas's terror."

Mr. Salah, who was born in a Palestinian refugee camp on the West Bank and later became a United States citizen, has maintained that his involvement with Hamas was for humanitarian reasons only. When he was arrested in Israel in 1993, the organization, which was founded in 1987, existed mainly to provide social services to impoverished Palestinians, his lawyer, Mr. Deutsch, told the jury. The United States government did not label Hamas a terrorist organization until 1997, he said.

A "giving person" driven by a commitment to his Palestinian roots, Mr. Salah felt strongly about providing humanitarian aid to Palestinians, Mr. Deutsch said. And as a United States citizen, it was easy for him to travel to Israel and the occupied territories. All financial transactions related to Mr. Salah's dealings with Hamas were done openly in his name and in his own checking account, he said.

Mr. Salah was arrested at an Israeli checkpoint in the Gaza Strip in 1993, where the police found $97,000 in his hotel room in Jerusalem. He later confessed to meeting with Hamas military leaders and giving them money, but defense lawyers said the confession was false and obtained only after Israeli secret police tortured Mr. Salah for more than 50 days.

"This is the Israeli secret police," Mr. Deutsch told jurors. "They are notorious throughout the world for getting information through coercion and torture."

Prosecutors, however, pointed to Mr. Salah's confession as evidence that he was plugged into the highest levels of Hamas's military organization, and Ms. Hamilton spoke of a different kind of interrogation. She called accusations of torture "outrageous" and said that a former New York Times reporter, Judith Miller, who witnessed part of Mr. Salah's interrogation, would testify that she did not see any mistreatment. Two Israeli security agents, disguised and using aliases, are also expected to testify for the government in a courtroom cleared of public spectators.

Prosecutors said Dr. Ashqar, like Mr. Salah, was also part of an extended United States network that supported Hamas. Federal agents found a "treasure trove" of Hamas-related documents and minutes of high-level Hamas meetings in Dr. Ashqar's home in Oxford, Miss., Ms. Hamilton said. Wiretaps of Dr. Ashqar's telephones revealed that he was aware of Hamas's violent tactics and that he gave money and support to the family of a suicide bomber, she said.

Dr. Ashqar's lawyer, William Moffitt, portrayed his client, who came to the United States on an academic fellowship, as an intellectual who kept current on Palestinian issues. Enjoying the free speech afforded to him in this country, he met openly with others concerned about Palestinian issues, Mr. Moffitt told jurors.

Jordanian Immigrant Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083810

SALT LAKE CITY A relative of a man under investigation for ties to al-Qaida in Iraq pleaded guilty Thursday to numerous fraud charges, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in Utah.

Alaa "Alex" Ramadan, 29, pleaded guilty in federal court to numerous violations in four criminal indictments stemming from mortgage, loan, credit card, wire and mail fraud and money laundering schemes.

Ramadan pleaded guilty to one charge each of mortgage fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud; two counts of use of a false social security number; three counts each of conspiracy to commit money laundering, bank fraud and receiving money by fraud, and four counts of money laundering.

Under the terms of the plea agreement Ramadan will serve a sentence of three years and five months in federal prison, subject to approval by U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball.

Ramadan is scheduled to be sentenced by Kimball on Jan. 4.

Ramadan along with his uncle Sharif Omar and three others were accused of defrauding Utah banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars through bad mortgages and car loans.

The cases against Omar and the others are still pending.

Some of the money wound up in Jordan with Omar's relatives, Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Salt Lake City, said Thursday. He said investigators are trying to determine if any of that money was used to finance terrorism.

Sharif Omar, 37, is the brother of suspected senior al-Qaida operative Shawqi Omar, who is still being held by the U.S. military in Iraq, Bretzing said.

When he was arrested in Baghdad in 2004, the U.S. government said Shawqi Omar had bomb-making materials and was harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian fighters.

Suspect Pleads Guilty To Fraud Schemes (SLT)

By Jason Bergreen, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 20, 2006

Alaa Ramadan, the accused leader of a fraud and money laundering ring that allegedly involved at least six relatives of a former Utahn suspected of aiding terrorists in Iraq, pleaded guilty Thursday to federal violations involving mortgage, loan, credit card and other money laundering schemes that generated thousands of dollars.

Ramadan, a 29-year-old Jordanian, who lived in Salt Lake City, also pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of failing to file federal income tax returns between 2000 and 2005, U.S. Attorney's Office spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch stated in a press release.

Ramadan's guilty pleas were related to four separate federal indictments returned in October and December of 2005.

Ramadan and Bassam Omar were indicted in October 2005 with mortgage fraud involving homes in Sandy and Bountiful, attempting to defraud at least two Utah banks of more than $120,000, falsifying bank loan applications, participating in financial transactions designed to disguise a crime, as well as wire and mail fraud and money laundering, the press release states.

The case against Omar is pending.

Though the case was investigated by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force, none of the charges relate to terrorism, and prosecutors had downplayed the significance of the counter terrorist agents' involvement.

The FBI's investigation into the alleged fraud appears to have been triggered by the arrest of Shawqi Omar in Baghdad in October 2004. The former Salt Lake City resident is being held without charge in a U.S. prison in southern Iraq. He is accused by military officers of being a close aide of former al-Qaida leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Advertisement

Ramadan faces up to 41 months in prison. Restitution in the case is pending. Ramadan will remain in custody until sentencing.

Terror Case Accountant Will Agree To Plea Deal (TOLB)

By Mark Reiter, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), October 20, 2006

A Michigan accountant who is charged with lying to investigators in the federal government's case against three terrorist suspects will enter into a plea agreement in U.S. District Court in Toledo.

Jihad Hekmat Dahabi, 47, of Dearborn, is accused of making false, fictitious, and fraudulent statements in the investigation of Marwan Othman El-Hindi, one of three Toledo-area terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0083811

Mr. Dahabi allegedly met with Mr. El-Hindi in Dearborn to prepare paperwork for a nonprofit organization that would divert government grants for education services to jihadist paramilitaries.

Information was filed last month in federal court in Detroit against Mr. Dahabi. He agreed last week to have the case transferred to Toledo. Documents in the case were sent Tuesday to U.S. District Court in Toledo. Judge Jack Zouhary will accept his plea and sentence him. No court date has been scheduled.

Mr. El-Hindi and Mohammad Zaki Amawi, both of Toledo, and Wassim I. Mazloum of Sylvania were charged in February with conspiring to kill or injure U.S. troops serving in Iraq and others in the Middle East, and providing material support to terrorists.

They have pleaded not guilty; Judge James Carr has scheduled their trial for May.

The charge against Mr. Dahabi stems from statements he made in February to federal authorities who were investigating the three suspects.

Three days before the indictment against the men was unsealed, investigators said the accountant denied preparing documents to register the corporation in April, 2005, when he met with Mr. El-Hindi because he didn't have all the information he needed.

But in a second interview in June, Mr. Dahabi said he prepared paperwork to create a corporation for Mr. El-Hindi and an associate, and used the names of Mr. El-Hindi's children as incorporators so they could pay themselves with government grant funds.

According to court records, Mr. Dahabi was last employed by Expert Accounting Tax Services in Dearborn.

In an unrelated development in the terrorism case, a hearing will be held today before Judge Carr on a request from Mr. Amawi's attorney, Dennis Terez, to withdraw from the case.

Mr. Terez, of the federal public defender's office in Cleveland, would not comment on why he wants to be removed.

Italy Arrests Seven In Push To Curb Laundering Of Drug Cash (FT)

By Adrian Michaels In Milan And Jimmy Burns In London

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

Italian authorities arrested seven people yesterday as part of an international operation to crack down on the laundering of drug money through an informal banking system used by immigrant workers.

The authorities also said the banking system, known as Hawala, could be being used as a conduit for terror finances. Marcello Musso, an Italian investigator, said: "That this involves a group of radical Islamic people is . . . not fantasy."

Hawala uses a legal network of informal dealers to help millions of immigrants in the west send remittances back to their home countries. But authorities have focused recently on the system's illegal use.

One Italian official said recently: "The underground banking system used all over the world by different ethnic groups is also used to launder an enormous quantity of serious crime money."

Other operations against money laundering, involving the UK and other jurisdictions, remain shrouded in secrecy as they touch on political sensitivities in countries with large Muslim communities and highly sophisticated criminal networks.

But Italian police revealed yesterday what they believe is some of the strongest evidence yet that the Hawala system is being used to carry millions of dollars made from the sale of cocaine and heroin.

In a sign of growing international co-operation, Italian investigators have been working closely with the US's Drug Enforcement Agency and the UK's Serious Organised Crime Agency (Soca), an FBI-style law enforcement body. They also cited co-operation with officials in the Netherlands, Dubai, Spain, Germany, South America and Australia.

In July Soca officials attended an international summit in the United Arab Emirates, a Hawala hub, as part of efforts to strengthen anti-money laundering operations there.

It is suspected that the Hawala system is exploited by al-Qaeda in the UAE and other countries in the Middle East to finance its operations. Investigators have also identified the involvement of Afghanistan and neighbouring countries.

Aside from the seven arrests, a list of charges was approved by a judge in Milan against 13 other people, some of whom are already in jail accused of lesser offences. People close to the investigations stressed that the probes continued and that further arrests were possible.

Italian authorities started their investigations in November 2004 by looking into the drug trafficking activities of Albanians in northern Italy. They soon made a connection with a group of Pakistanis near Modena, northern Italy, who were helping immigrants move money internationally.

DOJ_NMG_0083812

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Football Stadium Threat A Hoax, FBI Says (AP)

By Emily Fredrix

AP, October 20, 2006

Football Stadium Threat Is a Hoax, FBI Says After Interviewing Milwaukee Man

MILWAUKEE Oct 19, 2006 (AP)— Internet threats of "dirty bomb" attacks at NFL stadiums this weekend were a hoax inspired by a writing competition between two men trying to come up with scary threats, a law enforcement official said Thursday.

The threats, which were posted on a Web site last week and mentioned stadiums in seven U.S. cities, were deemed to be false by the FBI on Thursday after agents questioned a 20-year-old Milwaukee man.

"This is a hoax," said Special Agent Richard Kolko, a spokesman at the FBI's Washington headquarters. A joint statement from the FBI and Homeland Security said fans "should be reassured of their security as they continue to attend sporting events this weekend."

An FBI official in Washington, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is still under investigation, said the Milwaukee man acknowledged posting the phony stadium threat as part of a "writing duel" with a man from the Brownsville, Texas, area to see who could post the scariest threat.

The Texas man corroborated the story during questioning Thursday by FBI agents, the official said. Investigators also searched the Milwaukee man's computer, the official added.

No decision has been made yet on whether charges will be filed, the official said. In Houston, FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap said officials are not investigating any connections to the NFL scare in that jurisdiction.

Milwaukee police contacted the FBI about the 20-year-old man Wednesday night.

"From the information we have, we believe he was involved to some extent, but we don't know at what level," said FBI agent Douglas E. Porrini. He added, "That person was released, but we're not saying that he won't be charged."

The threat, dated Oct. 12, appeared on a Web site, The Friend Society, that links to various online forums and off-color cartoons. Its author, identified in the message as "javness," said trucks would deliver radiological bombs Sunday to stadiums in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Cleveland and Oakland, Calif., and that Osama bin Laden would claim responsibility.

Threat On Stadiums Is Found To Be A Hoax (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

An Internet threat that said terrorist attacks were planned on seven NFL stadiums this weekend was determined by investigators to be "a hoax," the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security announced yesterday.

"The investigation has determined that this is a hoax," the two agencies said in a joint written statement. "The public should be reassured of their security as they continue to attend sporting events this weekend."

FBI agents yesterday questioned a 20-year-old Milwaukee man thought to be involved in the threat, which was made Oct. 12 on a Web site that links to multiple online conversations and cartoons. The man was released, but authorities left open the possibility that he could be charged with a crime.

A message on the Web site said the seven stadiums would be hit by bombs containing radiological material. The stadiums mentioned were in New York, Miami, Houston, Cleveland, Seattle, Atlanta and Oakland, Calif. The posting said the bombs would be delivered to the stadiums in trucks and that Osama bin Laden later would claim responsibility.

The Associated Press reported that the man in Milwaukee told the FBI he posted the threat as part of a writing duel with a man in Brownsville, Tex., to see who could post the scariest threat.Bears Put Brown on IR

The Chicago Bears placed safety Mike Brown on the injured reserve list, ending his season.

Brown underwent surgery Wednesday to repair a torn ligament in his foot. He was injured in Monday night's comeback victory at Arizona.

The veteran is one of the Bears' top players and leaders, and Coach Lovie Smith acknowledged Wednesday that the loss was a severe blow to his unbeaten team. The Bears have some time to pick a replacement, given that they're on their bye week. Possibilities include Todd Johnson, who replaced Brown on Monday, and Chris Harris, who was unavailable for the Arizona game because of a quadriceps injury. . . .

DOJ_NMG_0083813

Seldom-used cornerback Reggie Howard left the Carolina Panthers for what the team said were personal reasons. Panthers officials said they had received a roster exemption to replace Howard, a former starter stuck this season behind Chris Gamble and Ken Lucas and top reserve Richard Marshall. . . .

San Diego Chargers defensive end Igor Olshansky will be out three to four weeks after undergoing knee surgery Wednesday. . . . Ed Hartwell is scheduled to return to the Atlanta Falcons' lineup this weekend at middle linebacker. Hartwell, who is coming off knee surgery, will make his season debut. . . .

The two teams involved in the most acrimonious dealings of the offseason square off this weekend in Seattle. The Seahawks are scheduled to host the Minnesota Vikings on Sunday. The two clubs were involved in a bitter offseason tussle over free agent contracts.

The Vikings signed Pro Bowl guard Steve Hutchinson away from the Seahawks. The Seahawks had used their transition player tag on Hutchinson, enabling them to retain him by matching any contract offer he might receive from another club in free agency. But the Vikings used a contract containing a provision the Seahawks couldn't afford to match, known as a "poison pill," to land Hutchinson. Hutchinson's seven-year, $49 million contract would have become fully guaranteed if he wasn't the highest-paid offensive lineman on his team, and in Seattle he would have been making less than left tackle Walter Jones.

The Seahawks retaliated by using a poison pill to sign wide receiver Nate Burleson, a restricted free agent, away from the Vikings. Paul Tagliabue, then the NFL commissioner, and owners of other teams denounced the tactics and vowed to change the rules governing such transactions. But the league and the NFL Players Association have been unable to reach an agreement on a rule to eliminate or limit such tactics.

Football Threat Is Said To Be Hoax (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

After questioning a 20-year old Milwaukee man, federal law-enforcement officials said that a threat posted on the Internet last week about plans to detonate radiological bombs at football stadiums on Sunday was a hoax. A Federal Bureau of Investigation spokesman said the F.B.I. believed that the man, whose name was not released, was involved in the Internet posting, which led to a warning Tuesday to the National Football League and others in seven cities. Richard J. Kolko, an F.B.I. spokesman, said no decision had been made on whether to file charges against the Milwaukee man.

Wal-Mart Limits Prepaid Cell Phones To 2 (WP/AP)

By Bruce Meyerson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- Wal-Mart Stores Inc. plans to limit each customer to two prepaid cell phones per purchase amid complaints that entrepreneurs are buying the subsidized handsets by the hundreds to resell at a profit, according to people familiar with the matter.

The new limit on the phones, effective last week, was disclosed to The Associated Press by persons at two national cell carriers. They spoke on condition of anonymity because Wal-Mart's policy hasn't been announced.

Wal-Mart declined to confirm the change from its prior limit of three prepaid phones per customer.

The phones in question, sold under brands including TracFone and GoPhone from Cingular Wireless, are priced as low as $20 and $30 per handset. The phones are called "prepaid" because users buy minutes of air time in advance for calls rather than signing up for a monthly plan with recurring charges.

Limits on their purchase aren't new among major retailers. But phone makers and service providers are pressing retailers to tighten restrictions, which can be easy to skirt by going to multiple cashiers or coming back at different times of day. Law enforcement, meanwhile, worries the anonymity of prepaid phones makes them appealing tools for criminal and terrorist activity.

Wireless service providers willingly lose money or make no profit on the devices in hopes that purchasers will make up for it by using the service, buying additional air time for calls. But there's no profit if the phones are never used for their intended purpose.

Those who buy in bulk at stores can double their investment by reselling the phones to entrepreneurs who deactivate a software lock on the devices. The phones can then be used on other cellular networks, often in Asia and Latin America, though sometimes in the United States.

Purchasing phones in bulk is not in itself illegal, and authorities haven't had much luck trying to prosecute those engaged in the trade. But wireless companies have sued them, alleging the reconfiguration and repackaging violate trademark and copyright protections.

DOJ_NMG_0083814

The change in Wal-Mart's policy follows high-profile arrests two months ago in Ohio and Michigan of men who had purchased bulk quantities of the phones.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation and Department of Homeland Security issued bulletins earlier this year warning police to look out for bulk phone purchases. Authorities said they were worried the devices might be used as bomb detonators or that profits from their resale might fund a terrorist attack.

But in the Ohio and Michigan cases, early hints of possible terrorism links by authorities never resulted in related charges. The men arrested in Ohio pled no contest last month to a low-level charge of giving misleading information to police. In the Michigan case, a federal judge threw out charges of trafficking in counterfeited goods.

Remains From WTC Site Found In Manhole (AP-Y)

By Marcus Franklin

AP, October 20, 2006

Human remains that appear to be from World Trade Center victims were found by utility workers in a manhole at the northern edge of the site, a Port Authority official said Thursday.

A Consolidated Edison crew doing excavation of the manhole at street level found the remains, some as big as arm or leg bones, said Steve Coleman, a spokesman for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site.

Con Ed said it entered the site Wednesday to remove material from two manholes that had been damaged and abandoned after the 2001 collapse of the twin towers.

Crews hauled the excavated materials Wednesday to a work center more than a mile away, as is customary, Con Edison said. On Thursday morning, a contractor working for the Port Authority realized the materials contained remains, Con Edison spokesman Chris Olert said, and the medical examiner's office was contacted.

Five years after 2,749 people died in the Sept. 11 World Trade Center attacks, families of about 1,150 victims still do not know whether their loved ones' remains were recovered.

During the excavation of the 110-story twin towers, which began the evening of the attacks and lasted for nine months, about 20,000 pieces of human remains were found. The DNA in thousands of those pieces, many small enough to slip into a test tube, was too damaged by heat, humidity and time to yield matches in the many tests forensic scientists have tried over the years.

The city told victims' families last year that it was putting the project of making identifications on hold, possibly for years, until new DNA technology was developed. Last month, the company contracted to work on the bone fragments said advances had been made and new identifications would be forthcoming.

Besides the new remains found by the utility workers, the lab also has recently received hundreds of bone fragments discovered on the roof of a building just south of where the trade center had stood. The building had been condemned since the attacks and was about to be torn down when workers found the bone pieces.

Charles Wolf, whose wife Katherine's remains were never recovered, said he wants an independent party to take over the remains search. He showed up at the Con Edison site after being contacted by television stations Thursday.

"We've got a problem right now," Wolf said. "Where else are we going to find them next?"

Porthole Security (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

President Bush signed the SAFE Ports Act into law last week, and the longshoremen's union is finding reasons to celebrate. You don't find that reassuring? Neither do we.

The October newsletter of the International Longshore and Warehouse Union is trumpeting the "major gains" the union was able to achieve, via its Democratic Congressional allies, as the final version of the bill was haggled out in conference. Among its triumphs: "An amendment by Sen. John Kerry (D., Mass.) that required a port security training and exercise program for longshore workers." Mr. Kerry made sure the ILWU was "eligible for grant money for such training," a thoughtful bequest for a union that almost invariably endorses Democrats.

But the real ILWU "victory" was its success in stripping from the final version of the bill a provision that would have barred a broad class of former felons -- including those convicted of "dishonesty, fraud and misrepresentation" -- from obtaining a port security clearance for at least seven years after their conviction. The ILWU's International President Robert McEllrath denounced the list of disqualifying offenses as "overly broad" in a response, posted on the union's Web site, to our previous editorials on this subject. He also dismisses as "an incredible leap of logic" the suggestion that such felons might be dangerously prone to colluding with terrorists trying to gain access to our ports.

DOJ_NMG_0083815

In fact, links between terrorism and organized crime are the norm everywhere from Colombia to Afghanistan. Nor does it seem especially onerous to demand that American port workers meet the same basic background requirements the government imposes on airport screeners. You would think the Democratic Party would get this, seeing as its been screaming the loudest about the holes in port security. The ILWU's priorities being otherwise, however, so are theirs.

Democrats Outline Reform Plan For Federal Emergency Response (MCT)

By Maria Recio

McClatchy Newspapers, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congressional Democrats, trying to draw a stark contrast to the Bush administration's response to Hurricane Katrina, laid out recommendations Thursday for a legislative agenda that would radically change the federal response to emergencies.

Rep. Gene Taylor of Mississippi, who chairs the Democratic leadership-created Katrina Task Force and who lost his home in the hurricane last year, presented the findings, hitting hard on what he described as a need to overhaul the insurance industry.

"Number one, we have to take the antitrust exemption of the insurance industry away," Taylor said at a news conference. "No one should be above the law."

Insurers can set prices under the exemption, which dates to the 1940s.

The second priority, Taylor said as he released the report, "Katrina and Beyond," is all-perils insurance.

With private insurers saying the hurricane damage was caused by water - which federal insurance covers - not wind - which the private insurers cover - most claims are being dismissed, Taylor said.

He said his third priority was to have some form of federal oversight. Insurers are regulated by the states. Taylor said one of his greatest frustrations as a congressman was constituents coming to him "with their policies and tears in their eyes and not be able to do anything."

The insurance companies maintain that they've paid what was owed under their polices. They say they can't be expected to cover damage for which no premiums were collected.

The task force, which Taylor chaired with Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-La., as the vice chairman, was formed to develop proposals that the Democrats hope will become a blueprint for action, especially if they take back control of the House of Representatives.

When Taylor started his remarks, he said he'd been asked to chair the task force by "Speaker Pelosi," then corrected himself to refer to "Minority Leader" Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. He said later that a Democratic majority was something "I'd like to see happen."

"I know we'd have a better chance of passing these reforms with a Democratic majority," the Mississippi lawmaker said.

Asked how quickly legislation could move, Taylor said, "I'm a realist. On the insurance thing, we're planting the seed."

At the news conference, Taylor focused on insurance - a central issue to his constituency - but the recommendations propose radical changes in the federal response to emergencies. He stressed that they had far-reaching consequences: Fifty-three percent of Americans live in coastal communities.

The task force recommends diminishing the role of the Federal Emergency Management Agency by redirecting its responsibility for disaster recovery to agencies directly responsible for housing, transportation, education and economic development. Other recommendations include rebuilding levees to withstand a Category 5 hurricane - New Orleans' were built only for a Category 3 - and re-equipping National Guard units, which have been strained by the war in Iraq.

The report's first recommendation is that the relationship between the insurance companies and the National Flood Insurance Program be investigated. The national-flood policies are sold by the insurance companies, which determine how to resolve claims - and, Taylor charged, invariably decide to make payments from the taxpayer-backed flood-insurance plan.

The result has been a "wind vs. water" debate, in which the insurance companies decide, in the absence of eyewitness accounts, that water - not wind - caused the damage.

"Insurance company adjusters have an obvious conflict of interest when deciding whether claims should be billed to the federal flood insurance program or to the insurance companies that employ them," the report said.

The insurance companies say they've handled claims fairly and investigated each one individually.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., inserted language into the homeland security appropriations legislation just signed by President Bush that calls on the inspector general of the Homeland Security Department to investigate the conduct of insurers in deciding Katrina claims and report to Congress by April 1. Taylor had a similar version of the amendment in a different bill and supports Lott's move.

Lott also lost his coastal home in the hurricane. He and Taylor are part of the same lawsuit against State Farm Insurance Co. brought by Lott's brother-in-law, well-known lawyer Richard Scruggs, whose home also was destroyed by Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0083816

Melancon later spoke to reporters in Taylor's office via conference call.

"This is a beginning," the Louisiana lawmaker said of the findings. Like Taylor, he's looking forward to the 110th Congress, which begins Jan. 3. "What we've got here is the beginning of a way America responds to disasters."

WAR NEWS:

General: U.S. Rethinking Strategy To Secure Baghdad (AP)

The Associated Press, October 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military acknowledged Thursday that its two-month drive to crush insurgent and militia violence in the Iraqi capital had fallen short.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, called the raging bloodshed disheartening and said the United States is rethinking its strategy to rein in gunmen, torturers and bombers.

Caldwell's remarks came as car bombs, mortar fire and shootings around the country killed at least 66 people and wounded 175. The dead included the Anbar province police commander, slain by gunmen who burst into his home.

The military announced the deaths of three U.S. servicemembers in fighting, raising the death toll for October to 74. The month is on course to be the deadliest for U.S. forces in nearly two years.

The high death tolls this month for both Americans and Iraqis have pushed the war back into the public eye in the USA, forcing the Bush administration and the military to address difficult questions in the final weeks of the campaign season before elections Nov. 7.

Vice President Cheney said the United States is not looking for a way out of Iraq. “I know what the president thinks. I know what I think. And we're not looking for an exit strategy. We're looking for victory,” he said in an interview posted on Time magazine's website.

Caldwell told reporters the U.S.-Iraqi bid to crush violence in Baghdad had not delivered the desired results. He said attacks in the capital had risen 22% in the first three weeks of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, compared with the three previous weeks.

“Operation Together Forward has made a difference in the focus areas but has not met our overall expectations in sustaining a reduction in the level of violence,” Caldwell said. He was referring to the security sweep, which began on Aug. 7 with the introduction of an additional 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops into Baghdad.

“The violence is indeed disheartening,” he said.

Caldwell said security plans were being reviewed for the sprawling city of 6 million people, where rival Shiite and Sunni Muslims live in uneasy proximity to each other.

His assessment came amid tensions between the United States and the nearly 5-month-old government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The prime minister ordered U.S. troops to release Mazin al-Sa'edi, a top organizer in western Baghdad for radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Caldwell said al-Sa'edi was freed after being detained Wednesday with five aides for suspected involvement in Shiite violence. Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army has been blamed for attacks and for inspiring groups to kidnap and kill Sunnis.

The newly reported U.S. deaths were a Marine and a soldier killed in Anbar province in the Sunni heartland west of Baghdad and another soldier who died in a roadside bombing near Balad.

“When there's more presence (of U.S. troops), there's more chance” of casualties, said Maj. Ken Slover of the 172nd Stryker Brigade, operating in Baghdad.

General Says Mission In Baghdad Falls Short (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 19 -- A two-month U.S.-Iraqi military operation to stem sectarian bloodshed and insurgent attacks in Baghdad has failed to reduce the violence, which has surged 22 percent in the capital in the last three weeks, much of it in areas where the military has focused its efforts, a senior U.S. military spokesman said Thursday.

The assessment by Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV followed a 43 percent spike in attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital since midsummer that has pushed U.S. military fatalities to their highest rates in more than a year. The military reported that three soldiers were killed in Anbar province west of Baghdad on Wednesday, bringing the number of U.S troops killed so far this month to 74.

DOJ_NMG_0083817

Caldwell's appraisal of the Baghdad campaign known as Operation Together Forward was in stark contrast to reviews during the opening weeks. At that time, U.S. military leaders said the deployment of 12,000 additional U.S. troops in Baghdad's most violent neighborhoods was significantly improving security for residents.

The operation "has not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence," Caldwell said Thursday at a weekly news briefing. Violence has risen in the areas where the U.S.-Iraqi operation has focused, because of counterattacks, he said.

"We're finding insurgent elements, the extremists, are pushing back hard. They're trying to get back into those areas" where Iraqi and U.S. forces have targeted them, he said. "We're constantly going back in and doing clearing operations."

Under the program, joint U.S.-Iraqi teams of soldiers and police entered dangerous Baghdad neighborhoods and used aggressive tactics to try to secure them, engaging with fighters, searching door-to-door and patrolling the streets. Teams then moved on to the next sector, leaving behind a fixed force that attempted to ensure gunmen would not return. The goal of the program was also to restore basic services such as trash collection.

Now, Caldwell said, "we are working very closely with the government of Iraq to determine how best to refocus our efforts. . . . It's clear that the conditions under which we started are probably not the same today. And so it does require some modifications of the plan."

Attacks on police and military units continued in many parts of Iraq on Thursday. Coordinated suicide car and truck bombings and mortar attacks on several police facilities and two U.S. patrols in the northern city of Mosul killed at least 12 Iraqis and wounded 30, local police and hospital officials said. There were no reports of U.S. casualties.

Later in Kirkuk, about 150 miles north of Baghdad, a suicide car bomber targeted a group of soldiers and civilians lined up outside a bank to cash their paychecks before the start of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr this week. The explosion killed 12 people and injured about 70. Three people were killed in a suicide car blast at a checkpoint west of Kirkuk early Thursday night.

In Baghdad, at least 19 people were killed and 31 injured in mortar attacks, suicide bombings and roadside bombings. News services reported at least 23 other killings Thursday in violence scattered around the country.

There are about 68,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad, and about 15,400 troops are taking part in Operation Together Forward. The campaign was launched in early August in response to attacks that were claiming as many as 100 lives a day in the capital. In September, 2,667 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad, according to the Iraqi Health Ministry.

Without providing exact statistics, Caldwell said attacks had surged during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. The four weeks of fasting end in a few days with the beginning of the three-day festival of Eid al-Fitr. But Caldwell said the increase in attacks on U.S. forces also reflected the fact that more forces are patrolling Baghdad because of Operation Together Forward. The timing of the violence was also linked to the upcoming midterm elections in the United States, he said.

"The enemy knows that killing innocent people and Americans will garner headlines and create a sense of frustration," he said.

Caldwell said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has adopted Operation Together Forward as "the model which he is trying to take to clear the city of the violence and extremism." But the campaign is under intense counterattack, he said, because "if you want to in fact discredit the government and show they have an inability to bring security and safety to the city, you would in fact target the focus areas. We think that's exactly why it's occurring."

Maliki, who heads a government led by Shiite Muslim religious parties, has come under criticism recently for not doing enough to curb sectarian violence, particularly reining in the Mahdi Army, the militia controlled by popular Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The force has been accused of slaughtering Sunni Arabs and forcing tens of thousand of them to flee their homes.

Caldwell also said that on Wednesday, at Maliki's behest, the U.S. military freed a Sadr official, Mazin al-Saidy, who had been detained the day before by U.S. forces in Baghdad on suspicion of being a member of the Mahdi Army and involvement in the killings of numerous Sunnis.

Caldwell said he did not know why Maliki had intervened to have Saidy released, but said it was not for the United States to "second-guess him."

"He is the prime minister of this nation, and . . . if he makes that decision, he has a lot of other information which we probably are not privy to," Caldwell said.

He said that as a condition of his release, Saidy signed a statement "promising to support the government of Iraq and disavow future acts of violence."

Washington Post correspondents in Mosul, Kirkuk and Baqubah contributed to this report.

U.S. Says Violence In Baghdad Rises, Foiling Campaign (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083818

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Oct. 19 — The United States military command in Iraq acknowledged on Thursday that its 12-week-old campaign to win back control of Baghdad from sectarian death squads and insurgents had failed to reduce violence across the city. A spokesman for the command said intensive discussions were under way between American and Iraqi officials on ways to "refocus" the effort, which American officials have placed at the heart of their war strategy.

In one of the most somber assessments of the war by American commanders, a statement read by the spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said the campaign had been marked by increasing attacks on American troops and a spike in combat deaths. Attacks soared by 22 percent, he said, during the first three weeks of Ramadan, the holy month now nearing its end. With three new combat deaths announced on Thursday, the number of American troops who have lost their lives in October rose to 73, representing one of the sharpest surges in military casualties in the past two years.

General Caldwell said American troops were being forced to return to neighborhoods, like Dora in southwestern Baghdad, that they had sealed off and cleared as part of the security campaign because "extremists" fighting back had sent sectarian violence soaring there. The security plan sent heavy deployments of American troops into troubled neighborhoods, reversing the previous policy, which was to allow Iraqi troops to police the capital.

"The violence is indeed disheartening," General Caldwell said. While the sweeps have contained violence in some areas, over all, he said, the campaign to gain control of the city "has not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence." As a result, he said, "We are working very closely with the government of Iraq to determine how to best refocus our efforts."

President Bush, who ordered the rearrangement of troops to begin the campaign, is now left with only a handful of tough and politically unattractive options. [News analysis, Page A10.]

The general's remarks, unusual for their candor and unvarnished portrayal of bad news, appeared to mark a new setback for the American military effort. Stark new videotape broadcast on Thursday by Al Jazeera from Ramadi, an insurgent stronghold 80 miles west of Baghdad, showed heavily armed insurgents taking over a busy city street in broad daylight to celebrate the proclamation by their leaders of an Islamic state in wide areas of Iraq's Sunni heartland. There was no sign of any attempt to intervene by the heavy concentration of American and Iraqi troops in the city. The Iraqi government said the demonstrators fled after 15 minutes.

The insurgents' ability to strike across wide areas of the country was demonstrated anew on Thursday in the northern oil city of Mosul, when suicide bombers attacked a police station and an American convoy, killing at least 22 people and wounding dozens more, mostly civilians, a hospital official said.

In the city of Diyala, 40 miles north of Baghdad, a bomb near a market killed 10 people and injured 20 others, an Interior Ministry official said. In Baghdad, the police reported the discovery of 27 bodies on Thursday.

The American command's statement on the faltering campaign signified a new and jarring stage in 18 months of efforts to bring peace to Baghdad, with one military plan succeeding another, and none achieving more than a temporary decline in the violence that has made Baghdad the most bloody theater of the war. Senior officers have spoken of the campaign in "make or break" terms, saying that there would be little hope of prevailing in the wider war if the bid to retake Baghdad's streets failed.

General Caldwell gave little hint of what changes the American command might make in the Baghdad operation. Other senior American military officials who have discussed the Baghdad operation with reporters in recent days have suggested that they have no fundamental reworking of the plan in mind; rather, they say, they plan to continue with it for many months, adjusting as conditions dictate.

Across Baghdad, as in other troubled areas of Iraq that American forces have tried to "clear and hold," military officials have struggled to deal with insurgents simply melting away, only to return stronger after the offensives wound down. Commanders say the challenge will be not only to clear and hold, but also to "build," meaning that the cleared areas, with Iraqi policing after the troops withdraw, will benefit from infrastructure investment as part of a plan to cut the militants' support.

General Caldwell suggested that the increased American troop presence had acted as a spur to the surge in attacks. The general said the Iraq insurgents were aiming at affecting American public opinion in an election year.

"It's no coincidence that the surge in attacks against coalition forces and the subsequent increase in U.S. casualties coincide with our increased presence in the streets of Baghdad and the run-up to the American midterm elections," the general said. "The enemy knows that killing innocent people and Americans will garner headlines and create a sense of frustration."

A hint that changes in the Baghdad operation were afoot came three weeks ago, when the neighborhood sweeps were halted with large areas of the city untouched, including strongholds of Sunni and Shiite militants like Mansour, in western Baghdad, and Sadr City in the east. Last week, Mr. Bush told reporters he was open to modifying the approach in Iraq "if it's not working." Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, made similar comments.

The American military has said that it has committed 15,600 troops to the operation — compared with 9,600 from the Iraqi Army — with 30,000 Iraqi policemen serving in support roles. American troops have led the 95,000 house searches conducted in the campaign, and General Caldwell said that their visibility had been accompanied by a shift in the pattern of insurgent attacks, with a sharp rise in strikes against American troops and attacks on civilian targets staying more or less constant.

DOJ_NMG_0083819

"We find the insurgent elements, the extremists, are in fact punching back hard," he said. "They're trying to get back into those areas," the general said. "We're constantly going back in and doing clearing operations again."

Perhaps the most striking element in the news conference was General Caldwell's candor. Although American commanders have struck a generally sober tone in the past year, they have been careful not to hint in public at the increasingly gloomy view that some, at least, have taken in private. In recent weeks, some senior officers have voiced growing exasperation at background briefings for reporters, particularly when discussing the ineffectiveness, dithering and corruption, as they have termed it, in the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and the prime minister's failure to act effectively on his pledge to rein in the Shiite militias that American commanders now see as the main source of instability.

General Caldwell came to the Baghdad spokesman's job after commanding the 82nd Airborne Division in its relief efforts after Hurricane Katrina last year, and he has struck a generally upbeat tone in his briefings since arriving here this spring. But on Thursday, he appeared unusually subdued. He waved off a question suggesting that the situation in Baghdad had similarities to the period of the 1968 Tet offensive in Vietnam, saying, "We're getting far beyond my realm to start making analogies to the Vietnam War."

Then he added: "But I can tell you that we're obviously very concerned about what we're seeing in the city. We're taking a lot of time to go back and look at the whole Baghdad security plan."

He went on: "Everything stays very dynamic in this type of environment, and it's clear that the conditions under which we started are probably not the same today. And so it does require some modifications of the plan."

American commanders who have discussed the Baghdad operation with reporters in recent days have spoken of having limited options as they seek for ways to make the campaign more effective. One is to increase the number of Iraqi troops deployed to the sweeps. Of six Iraqi battalions that were promised when the operation began, these commanders said, only two have been deployed. The commanders also noted that assessments of the operation might improve after November, when a phase of the plan involving economic reconstruction in the "cleared" areas would begin.

The strategy known as "clear, hold and build" is loosely patterned on a similar effort in Vietnam after the Tet offensive, which was credited with helping turn the tide in that war against the Communist insurgents in the early 1970's, before the withdrawal of American troops and a cutoff in Congressional financing for the war hastened the final Communist victory. American commanders in Iraq say that the Baghdad campaign has so far covered only the "clear" and "hold" phases, and that the rebuilding of infrastructure in cleared Baghdad neighborhoods, especially restoring electricity, sewage and clinics, could help win popular support that would aid in tracking down the death squads and insurgents.

Security Operation Yields No Reduction In Baghdad Violence (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq acknowledged Thursday that a much-touted security crackdown by American and Iraqi forces had failed to reduce violence in the Iraqi capital and called the results "disheartening."

With attacks in Baghdad having increased by 22 percent during the past three weeks, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said military planners might have to go back to the drawing board.

"We're obviously very concerned about what we're seeing in the city," Caldwell said. "We're taking a lot of time to go back and look at the whole Baghdad security plan. We're asking ourselves if the conditions under which it was first devised and planned still exist today, or have the conditions changed and therefore a modification to that plan needs to be made."

Despite the joint operation, launched in June, sectarian violence between Sunni Arabs and Shiites continues unabated, Caldwell said, and insurgents are targeting American troops.

Caldwell said at least 73 U.S. troops have been killed so far this month, putting October on track to be the bloodiest month for American forces since the battle of Fallujah in 2004.

The U.S. military announced the death of a Marine on Thursday and two American soldiers Wednesday. Tuesday, 10 American troops were killed.

Seven suicide attackers struck across northern Iraq on Thursday, targeting American and Iraqi troops as well as civilians. The attacks killed at least 20 Iraqis and wounded 80 others. Elsewhere, at least 16 other Iraqis died in various attacks.

Most of the U.S. deaths this month have taken place in the capital, where troops had stepped up patrols as part of Operation Together Forward.

DOJ_NMG_0083820

In August, Gen. George W. Casey ordered the extended deployment of about 4,000 troops from the 172nd Stryker Brigade, moving a total of about 12,000 additional Iraqi and American troops on to the streets to conduct house-to-house searches and disarm Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias.

That month, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the offensive would "go a long ways toward determining the future of Iraq and the future of the Middle East."

Despite the thousands of heavily armored American troops, the bloodshed has continued unabated

In September alone, the Iraqi Health Ministry reported that more than 2,660 civilians were killed in Baghdad.

Privately, U.S. officers say Shiite militias -- some affiliated with Iraqi government security forces -- are responsible for most of the attacks against U.S. troops as well as on Sunni civilians. But commanders on the ground often find themselves stymied when going after Shiite militias, especially those affiliated with anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose political bloc controls 30 seats in parliament.

Earlier in the week, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, ordered the release of Sheikh Mazen Saedi, a leading member of al-Sadr's organization, who had been arrested by U.S. troops on suspicion of "illegal activity," Caldwell confirmed Thursday. He did not specify what crimes Saedi was suspected of committing.

Al-Maliki relies on al-Sadr's support and has on other occasions stepped in to protect al-Sadr's group.

Adding to the problem is that the Shiite-dominated Iraqi security forces have been riddled with problems ranging from militia infiltration to a heavy casualty rate. Of 312,000 trained Iraqi security forces, 8,000 have been illed and an additional 16,000 wounded.

While Baghdad is the center of violence, rebels continue to attack across the nation.

In Mosul on Thursday, six car bombers blew themselves up near U.S. convoys and Iraqi police stations in a barrage of coordinated attacks that killed at least 10 Iraqis and wounded 20 others, officials said. In response to the flare-up of violence, local authorities closed all entrances to the city and imposed a curfew.

In the ethnically mixed city of Kirkuk, a suicide car bomber detonated a load of explosives outside a bank, killing 10 people and wounding 60 others, according to local authorities. Another bomb exploded close to a convoy carrying a local police commander, who survived the attack. A third bomb in the city hit a police patrol, injuring three officers, authorities said.

Three people were killed in various assassinations in Basra, and rockets were fired at British bases in the southern city as well as its airport, according to police. Black-clad Shiite militiamen swarmed the oil-rich city of Amara, all but taking over the town amid clashes spurred by the killing of the provincial head of intelligence a day earlier and the retaliatory kidnapping of a militia's leader's brother.

In Baghdad, at least nine people were killed or found dead in various bombings and assassinations Thursday. Just south of the capital, gunmen opened fire on former oil minister and Washington insider Ahmed Chalabi's motorcade as he returned from a funeral in Najaf. One of his bodyguards was injured, police said.

US Army Concedes Failure In Baghdad (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Steve Negus

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

American and Iraqi efforts to improve security in Baghdad have failed to reduce bloodshed in the increasingly violent Iraqi capital, the senior US military spokesman in Iraq acknowledged on Thursday.

In an uncharacteristically gloomy admission, Major General William Caldwell said the recent surge in violence was “disheartening”. He said US and Iraqi forces would have to “refocus” security measures. The review was demanded by General George Casey, who commands the 140,000 US troops in Iraq.

Gen Caldwell did not specify how security methods might be refocused, but the unusually grim assessment seems in part intended to put pressure on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take political steps that US officers have long said need to accompany military operations.

“In Baghdad, Operation Together Forward [launched in August to curb violence in the capital] has made a difference in the focus areas but has not met our overall expectations in sustaining a reduction in the level of violence,” Gen Caldwell told reporters.

At its launch, Operation Together Forward was to deploy more than 20,000 Iraqi security forces – including army and police – plus more than 7,000 coalition forces to tighten security in the capital. In July, General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, told US senators that reducing violence in Baghdad was the key to avoiding a full-scale civil war. Since those comments, the level of violence in Iraq, and Baghdad in particular, has continued to rise.

DOJ_NMG_0083821

So far in October, 72 US troops – including a soldier killed in fighting near Balad on Thursday – and hundreds of Iraqis have been killed. Gen Caldwell said attacks on US and Iraqi forces in Baghdad shot up 22 per cent in the first three weeks of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month.

The increasingly pessimistic assessments from Iraq come as Republicans in Congress grow anxious that the Iraq war is going to cost them control of one, or both, houses of Congress in next month's elections.

While the Bush administration insists that progress is being made in Iraq, privately they are frustrated with the apparent inability of the government of Mr Maliki to help clamp down on some of the sectarian killing perpetrated by death squads and Shia militias associated with members of the governing coalition.

Mr Bush on Wednesday made a comparison between Iraq and the Vietnam War when he said Thomas Friedman, a New York Times columnist, "could be right" in writing that the violent situation in Iraq was the "jihadist equivalent" of the Tet offensive, which helped increase public opposition to that war. But a White House spokeswoman said Mr Bush was only trying to make the point that "the enemy is trying to affect the psyche of Americans".

The US military wants Mr Maliki to stop protecting radical Shia groups such as the Mahdi Army militia loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. In a virtually unprecedented criticism of the Iraqi leadership, Gen Caldwell said US forces had been forced to release Sadrist organiser Mazin al-Sa'edi on Wednesday, one day after his arrest on suspicion of involvement in violence, at the prime minister's request.

Mr Maliki told USA Today that he had blocked a US proposal to conduct a large-scale operation against the Mahdi Army, saying the government did not intend to disarm militias until the end of this year.

U.S. Faces Iraq Crossroads (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

In yet another effort to secure Baghdad, President Bush stood next to visiting Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in July and announced plans to shift thousands of additional American forces to Iraq's capital.

With American and Iraqi deaths rising since then, the strategy's apparent failure to stem the violence is forcing the Bush administration to weigh a host of unpalatable choices -- and leaving the White House and Pentagon with a dwindling amount of time to decide what to do next.

Shortly after next month's U.S. midterm elections, a bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III will present the administration with recommendations for altering U.S. policy in Iraq. If the administration opts to maintain U.S. troop levels, it will have to decide early next year whether to change longstanding Pentagon policy to allow deployment of National Guard and Army Reserve troops for a second stint in Iraq.

The military is also in the midst of a re-evaluation of its Iraq strategy. Earlier this month, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, asked each of the armed services to send their best commanders with Iraq experience to the Pentagon for 60 days to generate options for how the U.S. might shift its counterinsurgency strategy.

The pressure to change course in Iraq will grow stronger if Democrats regain one or both chambers of Congress. More than 60% of Americans regard the war in Iraq as a mistake, and Democrats have promised to subpoena the Pentagon for clearer statistics about the situation in Iraq if they retake either the House or Senate. They say they would use control of the nation's purse strings to force the administration to re-evaluate its Iraq policy.

The upshot is the administration's vow to maintain its course of action in Iraq appears untenable in the face of the rising death toll and the war's mounting unpopularity among Americans.

"It's just not enough to say 'stay the course,'" says Rep. Bob Inglis, a South Carolina Republican. "It's very important to lean on the Iraqi leadership and get them to establish reasonable security so we can give them their country back. The longer they take, the more they risk losing American public support and congressional support."

Mr. Inglis, who visited Iraq in mid-August, said American policy makers also have to rethink their definition of victory. "The main objective has to be American security, not whether we're accomplishing something for the Iraqi people," he says.

Rep. Chris Shays, a Connecticut Republican locked in a re-election battle, says the strategy "is failing," and the White House should set a time line for U.S. withdrawal as a way of spurring the Maliki government to make the political compromises that could help stem sectarian violence.

"The president is sending the wrong message; there have to be deadlines," Mr. Shays says.

Senior military officials, such as Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the Middle East, until recently have said the U.S. wouldn't know until December whether the strategy to secure Baghdad is working. But commanders are now acknowledging the approach is failing to make much of an impact.

DOJ_NMG_0083822

In a briefing to reporters yesterday, the U.S. command in Iraq said attacks in Baghdad had risen 22% during the first weeks of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan despite thousands more U.S. and Iraqi forces in the city. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief U.S. military spokesman there, said commanders are working with the Iraqi government to "refocus" security measures. October has been an especially bloody month for U.S. forces, with 10 soldiers killed Tuesday -- the most single-day fatalities since January 2005 -- and 73 American troops killed overall.

One of the most wrenching questions for the military is how long it can keep 140,000 troops in Iraq and an additional 20,000 in Afghanistan. The repeated deployments of active-duty personnel have put them under such pressure that senior military officials say they will likely have to make even greater use of the National Guard and Army Reserve to sustain the force levels.

At their peak, about 50,000 Guard and Reserve forces were in Iraq, accounting for about 40% of the total force at that time, military officials say. Guard and Reserve forces now account for about 12% of U.S. troops in Iraq, according a Pentagon spokeswoman. Senior Army officers have already begun asking the Bush administration to consider changing policy to let them call up larger numbers of Guardsmen and Reservists.

At issue are Pentagon policies that limit Reserve and Guard forces to 24 months of cumulative active duty. Most Guardsmen and Reservists who have served in Iraq and Afghanistan already have spent 18 months on active duty and can't be called up again for either of those two conflicts unless the rules are changed, because a deployment lasts more than six months.

Any move to send reserve forces involuntarily back to either Iraq or Afghanistan would be deeply unpopular politically.

Elected officials from both parties also say it is dangerous for states to have so many of their Guard troops -- traditionally used in disaster-response and homeland-security roles -- deployed to the war zones.

Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski, a Democrat, says having so many of his state's forces overseas is limiting his ability to respond to natural disasters. "We need our National Guard home in case of an emergency," he says.

Surge In Military Deaths Weighs On Families (USAT)

By Dan Reed And Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, October 20, 2006

FORT HOOD, Texas — The memorial service here Thursday included a ceremonial roll call for those killed in action during September and the first few days of October. Sgt. Maj. Michael Gartland called out 18 names of the dead.

The only response was the weeping of families and friends who came to the chapel to honor the loved ones they lost.

Ten more soldiers based here died this month during fighting in which U.S. forces have joined Iraqi soldiers to try to quell sectarian violence in and around Baghdad.

Their names will be read in a roll call in November.

The surge in combat deaths this week has left military families dreading more bad news. Perhaps nowhere is this more keenly felt than here, at the nation's largest Army installation.

“It's not about the total numbers,” Army Col. Richard Francey, said after the ceremony Thursday. “It's about each and every one of these soldiers. These are real people, not numbers.”

The 4th Infantry Division based here is close to coming home after a year in Iraq. A small number have already returned. But as most continue to fight insurgents and sectarian death squads, casualties mount.

“I can cry at the thought that it's so close to him coming home that it's just ripping my heart to pieces,” says Diann Dunne, whose son, Staff Sgt. Kevin Dunne, 26, is with the 4th Infantry in Baghdad.

Each new loss leaves families wondering whether a casualty officer will come knocking.

“This community is emotionally exhausted,” says Joyce Raezer, an executive with the National Military Family Association who has been visiting the base.

The division has lost 119 soldiers this tour, exceeding the 81 deaths incurred during the unit's first tour in Iraq in 2003-04.

One woman leaving the memorial service Thursday is the wife of Capt. Jonathan Bodenhamer, who is still serving in Iraq.

“To be honest with you, we're just hanging on now,” said Gailo Bodenhamer. “(We're) just hoping no one else is hurt in these last weeks before they get home.”

As 4th Infantry Division families pray for safe returns, Fort Hood's other unit — the 1st Armored Cavalry Division — is beginning to deploy to Iraq.

“It's been a rough week here,” Raezer says. “My sense is that families here are very tired and that the stress is wearing on them.”

She says the deaths in Iraq have been the “topic of conversation” at Fort Hood.

Says Francey, “I'll never be able to bring their stress levels down until we bring their family members home.”

DOJ_NMG_0083823

The anxiety isn't unique to Fort Hood. It's felt across the USA, among families with loved ones in the National Guard and Reserves, and at military bases from coast to coast. Those who often feel it most are the children whose mothers or fathers are deployed.

"There can be increased irritability, sleep problems and more pronounced separation anxiety" among the children of soldiers, says William Saltzman, a clinical psychologist who has worked with Marine Corps families at Camp Pendleton in California.

Adding to the strain, Raezer says, are fears that the demands of war will suddenly require deployments to be extended. That's happened to two Army brigades this month, including the 172nd Stryker Brigade based in Alaska.

Families of soldiers in that unit were preparing welcome-home celebrations for early August when word arrived that the unit was going to Baghdad for four more months of combat. Five soldiers have since died.

"They've been through a tremendous amount. The Army asks some extraordinary things of these soldiers and their families. But the Army's also doing extraordinary things to help them," says Maj. Kirk Gohlke, a spokesman for the brigade. "The spike in violence? Yes, they're aware of it. But for crying out loud, they're used to shocks."

Preparations are again underway for a homecoming. Still, Tamara Bell — whose husband, Staff Sgt. Edward Bell, is with the brigade — is skeptical.

"I'm kind of going, 'Yeah, whatever,' " she says. "I don't believe the military. I don't believe the generals, I don't believe the political leaders."

Major Change Expected In Strategy For Iraq War (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The growing doubts among GOP lawmakers about the administration's Iraq strategy, coupled with the prospect of Democratic wins in next month's midterm elections, will soon force the Bush administration to abandon its open-ended commitment to the war, according to lawmakers in both parties, foreign policy experts and others involved in policymaking.

Senior figures in both parties are coming to the conclusion that the Bush administration will be unable to achieve its goal of a stable, democratic Iraq within a politically feasible time frame. Agitation is growing in Congress for alternatives to the administration's strategy of keeping Iraq in one piece and getting its security forces up and running while 140,000 U.S. troops try to keep a lid on rapidly spreading sectarian violence.

On the campaign trail, Democratic candidates are hammering Republican candidates for backing a failed Iraq policy, and GOP defense of the war is growing muted. A new NBC-Wall Street Journal poll released this week showed that voters are more confident in Democrats' ability to handle the Iraq war than the Republicans' -- a reversal from the last election.

Few officials in either party are talking about an immediate pullout of U.S. combat troops. But interest appears to be growing in several broad ideas. One would be some kind of effort to divide the country along regional lines. Another, favored by many Democrats, is a gradual withdrawal of troops over a set period of time. A third would be a dramatic scaling-back of U.S. ambitions in Iraq, giving up on democracy and focusing only on stability.

Many senior Republicans with close ties to the administration also believe that essential to a successful strategy in Iraq are an aggressive new diplomatic initiative to secure a Middle East peace settlement and a new effort to engage Iraq's neighbors, such as Syria and Iran, in helping stabilize the country -- perhaps through an international conference.

One point on which adherents of these sharply different approaches appear to agree is that "staying the course" is fast becoming a dead letter. "I don't believe that we can continue based on an open-ended, unconditional presence," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, a centrist Maine Republican. "I don't think there's any question about that, that there will be a change" in the U.S. strategy in Iraq after next month's elections.

Richard N. Haass, a former Bush administration foreign policy official, told reporters yesterday that the situation is reaching a "tipping point" both in Iraq and in U.S. politics. "More of essentially the same is going to be a policy that very few people are going to be able to support," said Haass, now the president of the Council on Foreign Relations. He added that the administration's current Iraq strategy "has virtually no chance of succeeding" and predicted that "change will come."

Many Senate Republicans are waiting for the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton, a Democrat. Both Baker and Hamilton have made it clear that they do not see the administration's current Iraq policy as working -- though they do not plan to issue recommendations until well after the midterm elections, probably in early January.

Many foreign policy experts believe that the commission could sway President Bush more than most such study groups because of Baker's close ties to the Bush family.

DOJ_NMG_0083824

In an interview this week, Hamilton said there is no "silver bullet" to turning the situation around in Iraq but noted that frustration is clearly rising over the current course. "I can't walk out the door without someone handing me a recommendation," he said.

Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.), a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he is open to "significant changes" in the U.S. approach and is hoping the Iraq Study Group can supply them. "I don't think anyone in the administration is pleased about the current state of affairs," he said. "I would hope that members of the administration are willing to learn from past mistakes . . . and choose a different path that would allow us to meet our objectives."

How open Bush will be to a change in course is unclear, even as the violence escalates -- this week has been one of the bloodiest for Americans in Baghdad in months. In recent remarks about Iraq, Bush has sounded a more flexible tone, saying he is open to suggestions for changes and emphasizing that his commanders adjust tactics constantly. He has repeatedly made it clear that U.S. patience with the new Iraqi government is not open-ended.

White House officials describe the current turmoil over Iraq policy in Washington as an expected byproduct of the upsurge in violence. Press secretary Tony Snow yesterday dismissed a dramatic about-face in policy -- such as a division of the country or phased withdrawal -- as a "non-starter" and called the idea that the White House will seek a course correction in Iraq "a bunch of hooey."

Bush has been adamant that the United States will not withdraw its troops until the Iraqi government can defend itself.

Like many who have met with the president in recent months to discuss Iraq policy, author and military expert Robert Kaplan said he detected clear limits to Bush's flexibility. "He seemed genuinely to enjoy the challenges to his policy that we threw at him," Kaplan said, describing a session Bush held with several outside strategists at Camp David in June. "He wasn't at all defensive. He appeared open to any new direction or tactic, except withdrawal, and yet that is what he might be faced with after November."

Along with the political debate, there also is growing frustration inside the U.S. military over Iraq, with some officers debating privately whether the situation there is salvageable. In recent weeks, senior military officers have offered a torrent of negative comments, a sharp contrast to the official optimism of the past three years.

"We're obviously very concerned about what we're seeing" in Baghdad, Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said yesterday. He indicated that changes to a plan to restore security to the capital are being considered. "We find the insurgent elements, the extremists, are in fact punching back hard," Caldwell said.

In recent days, the demand for change on Iraq has been especially notable from inside the president's party: Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, returned from a trip to Iraq saying that country was adrift and all options should be considered. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a conservative Republican from Texas, said this week that she is willing to consider the wisdom of somehow breaking up Iraq.

Until now, Democrats' calls for withdrawing troops have been largely irrelevant, but if Democrats take one or both houses of Congress next month, their views could become significant in shaping strategy.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), who would take over the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee, said he favors beginning a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops that "gives the Iraqis notice that they're going to be looking into the abyss" unless they make necessary changes.

One version of this option was presented to House Democrats last month by former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, who outlined a four-step plan that would include a joint declaration by the U.S. and Iraqi governments on a timeline for the departure of U.S. troops, a follow-up international conference on stabilizing Iraq and a greater focus on economic reconstruction.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who is campaigning to become the new majority leader should Democrats take power, said many in his caucus like the idea behind the Brzezinski plan, though perhaps not all the specifics. "The Iraqis have to understand that there is a time frame," he said. "Our commitment is substantial, but it is not unending."

People familiar with the work of the Iraq Study Group say it is also mulling a variant of the gradual withdrawal idea that would move U.S. troops out of Iraq but leave a residual force in the region to keep the violence from spreading and Iraq's neighbors from meddling.

Another idea getting a closer look is a new power-sharing agreement that would give more power to autonomous regions -- Kurdish in the north, Sunni in the middle and Shiite in the south -- while weakening the central government. This idea is most closely identified with Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, and Leslie H. Gelb, a former president of the Council on Foreign Relations. Because there is no oil in what would be the Sunni-controlled area, Biden and Gelb envision some sort of scheme to share oil revenue with the Sunnis to get them to agree to such a plan.

Biden said yesterday that if the Democrats win big in next month's elections, "You have a lot of Republicans who are going to openly join Democrats and will push back hard against the president."

DOJ_NMG_0083825

Bush Faces A Battery Of Ugly Choices On War (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — The acknowledgment by the United States Army spokesman in Iraq that the latest plan to secure Baghdad has faltered leaves President Bush with some of the ugliest choices he has yet faced in the war.

He can once again order a rearrangement of American forces inside the country, as he did in August, when American commanders declared that newly trained Iraqi forces would "clear and hold" neighborhoods with backup support from redeployed American forces. That strategy collapsed within a month, frequently forcing the Americans to take the lead, making them prime targets.

There is no assurance, though, that another redeployment of those forces will reduce the casualty rate, which has been unusually high in recent weeks, senior military and administration officials say. The toll comes just before midterm elections, in which even many of his own party have given up arguing that progress is being made or that the killing will soon slow.

Or Mr. Bush can reassess the strategy itself, perhaps listening to those advisers — including some members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, the advisory commission charged with coming up with new strategies for Iraq — who say that he needs to redefine the "victory" that he again on Thursday declared was his goal.

One official providing advice to the president noted on Thursday that while Mr. Bush still insists his goal is an Iraq that "can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself," he has already dropped most references to creating a flourishing democracy in the heart of the Middle East.

Or, he could take the advice of Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who is expected to run to replace him in two years, who argues in favor of pouring more troops into Iraq, an option one senior administration official said recently might make sense but could "cause the bottom to fall out" of public support.

But whatever choices he makes — probably not until after the Nov. 7 election, and perhaps not until the bipartisan group issues its report — they will be forced by a series of events, in Iraq and at home, that now seems largely out of Mr. Bush's control, in Iraq and at home.

Every day, administration and Pentagon officials fume — privately, to avoid the ire of the White House — about frustrations with Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, for not confronting the country's Shiite militias, meaning that there is no end to the daily cycle of attack and reprisals. Mr. Bush finds himself increasingly unable to make a convincing argument that, behind the daily toll in American lives, the Maliki government is making measurable progress, or even that the problems in Iraq are subject to a military solution.

It is a vexing quandary that military experts say they doubt that any study group — even the blue-ribbon group assembled under former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana — can cut its way through.

At the Pentagon, several examinations of the current approach in Iraq are under way, including an effort ordered by Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He has asked the Army and the other services to identify officers who have recently returned from Iraq and to ask them to offer their views to the joint staff about whether adjustments in tactics or strategy are necessary, two military officials said.

"We are not able to project sufficient coalition and Iraqi forces to properly execute the strategy" of clearing, holding and rebuilding Baghdad and other areas of insurgents and hostile militias, said another veteran, retired Gen. Jack Keane, a former Army vice chief of staff. "General Pace is doing the right thing by reassessing our entire strategy."

Mr. Bush says his resolve to win is unshaken. But a few of his aides were wondering aloud why Mr. Bush, asked to respond to a column by Thomas L. Friedman in The New York Times that compared the Ramadan attacks in Iraq to the 1968 Tet offensive, said the comparison "could be right."

"There's certainly a stepped up level of violence, and we're heading into an election," he told George Stephanopoulos of ABC News on Wednesday. "George, my gut tells me that they have all along been trying to inflict enough damage that we would leave."

For now there is no talk of leaving. But there is plenty of talk about pulling back.

"The Iraq situation is not winnable in any real sense of the word 'winnable,' " Richard N. Haass, the former chief of the policy planning operations in the State Department during Mr. Bush's first term, told reporters on Thursday. Privately, Pentagon strategists and some administration officials note that President Bush has talked often in recent months of changing his tactics, but not his strategy.

"Tactics are something you can turn on a dime," said Richard L. Armitage, the former deputy secretary of state, and an Army veteran with close ties to the military. "Strategy takes time, and that's the question. Do we have time for a new strategy?"

DOJ_NMG_0083826

While members of the Iraq Strategy Group are cagey about the recommendations they are drafting, several say that Mr. Baker — who is in regular contact with Mr. Bush — is seeking to move away from Mr. Bush's strategy of withdrawing Americans when the Iraqis are ready to replace them and toward one that sets a schedule.

"Jim's problem is that he wants a way to make clear to Maliki that we're leaving, but without signaling to the Shia and the Sunni that if they bide their time, they can battle it out for Iraq," said one longtime national security expert who recently testified in front of the study group. "How do you do that? Got me."

Then there is the recurring question whether a new strategy requires the exit of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Privately some Republicans say that the combination of a poor showing in next month's midterm elections and the worsening violence could ultimately force Mr. Rumsfeld's departure. Pentagon aides say Mr. Rumsfeld is not planning on going anywhere. "He serves at the pleasure of the president and has no intention to step down," said Eric Ruff, the Pentagon press secretary. And, officially, the White House says it has no intention of changing its strategy, either. Only its tactics.

White House Nixes Partitioning Iraq (AP)

By Terence Hunt

The Associated Press, October 19, 2006

Awaiting the recommendations of a commission exploring U.S. options in Iraq, the White House on Thursday emphatically ruled out some proposals to end the long and unpopular war.

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow said a suggestion to divide Iraq into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish regions, each with high degrees of autonomy, was a "nonstarter." Similarly, he said a phased withdrawal of American troops — perhaps by 5 percent every two months — also was a "nonstarter."

"You withdraw when you win," Snow said. "Phased withdrawal is a way of saying, `Regardless of what the conditions are on the ground, we're going to get out of Dodge.' "

Vice President Dick Cheney said the United States was not looking for a way out of Iraq. "I know what the president thinks. I know what I think. And we're not looking for an exit strategy. We're looking for victory," Cheney said in an interview posted on Time magazine's Web site Thursday.

The notions of partitioning Iraq and withdrawing troops have been floated recently as a blue-ribbon commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III searches for a bipartisan approach. Baker has said there are alternatives other than "stay the course and cut and run."

Among other ideas, the panel is considering whether to set a timetable for withdrawal and whether to solicit help from Iran and Syria to stop the fighting, according to Leon Panetta, a member of the advisory group and one-time chief of staff for former President Clinton. Panetta says no decisions have been made.

The commission's work has been portrayed by some as a way of providing political cover for Bush to change course and scale down the U.S. role, which has cost the lives of at least 2,785 members of the U.S. military since the beginning of the war in March 2003. In October alone, more than 70 American troops have been killed, putting the month on course to be the bloodiest for U.S. forces in nearly two years.

Cheney, in the interview, acknowledged he was mistaken when he said nearly 17 months ago that the insurgency in Iraq was in its last throes. "I thought we were over the hump in terms of violence — I think that was premature," he said. He said he thought Iraq's elections would have created a different environment. "And it hasn't happened yet."

Snow said Bush would take the commission's recommendations seriously but that they were simply advisory suggestions. The White House has said Bush would not feel bound by the group's proposals, which are not due to be released until after the November elections.

The White House also tried to clarify Bush's remarks Wednesday when he said the surge of violence in Iraq "could be" comparable to the 1968 Tet offensive that prompted Americans to lose support for the Vietnam War.

"The president was making a point that he's made before, which is that terrorists try to exploit pictures and try to use the media as conduits for influencing public opinion in the United States," Snow said.

Acknowledging that the Tet offensive "was successful from a propaganda point of view," Snow said the violence in Iraq would not have the same result.

"The important thing to remember is, the president's determined it's not going to happen with Iraq because you have a president who is determined to win," he said. "And the strategy is a threefold strategy that involves security, economics and political reconciliation, working with the Iraqis. And we'll continue to make adjustments as necessary to pursue victory."

"But the one thing that nobody should have any doubt about is that we're going win," Snow said.

He agreed that the Tet offensive had become shorthand for the point at which the Vietnam War changed course but, again, said there was no parallel with Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0083827

"We do not think that there's been a flipover point," Snow said. "But more importantly, from the standpoint of the government and the standpoint of this administration, we are going to continue pursuing victory aggressively."

White House Rejects Iraq Partition Plan (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

The White House yesterday rejected partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and took issue with reports that President Bush now views the 3-1/2-year-old Iraq war as similar to the war in Vietnam.

With leaks from the Iraq Study Group (ISG), headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, swirling around Washington, press secretary Tony Snow moved to distance Mr. Bush from a few alternative proposals.

"We've thought about partition, for a series of reasons," but Mr. Bush has categorically rejected the idea of breaking Iraq into regions, Mr. Snow said in reply to questions about an article in The Washington Times.

Under such a plan, the nation would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying near autonomy, with a central government handling defense, foreign policy and oil production.

Still, the spokesman left some wiggle room.

"Ideas like partition had been studied. What you're talking now about are tactical adjustments that may be made along the way. And I'm not saying yes and I'm not saying no because I don't know. What you end up doing, again, is you respond to the people on the ground," he said.

While the ISG's report on recommendations is not expected until after the Nov. 7 elections, leaks show that several proposals have been discussed, including partitioning and a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops.

But Mr. Snow yesterday dismissed an article in The Washington Times about a coming "course correction" on war strategy in Iraq.

"That's a bunch of hooey. I mean, it seems to be a collection of actually old hooey brought into a piece of new hooey. So, I mean, you get -- I don't know where that came from, but it didn't come from the White House," he said.

The article in fact quoted several administration members and supporters describing the present situation in Iraq as unsatisfactory and then identified some alternative approaches, listing their pros and cons.

Among them was the idea of partitioning Iraq, which the spokesman described as a "non-starter."

Another proposal that has been floated in advance of the ISG's report is a phased withdrawal, pulling 5 percent of U.S. troops out every two months. Mr. Snow also rejected that notion.

"You don't -- you withdraw when you win. Phased withdrawal is a way of saying, regardless of what the conditions are on the ground, we're going to get out of Dodge," he said.

The White House also took issue with reports that Mr. Bush now views Iraq as another Vietnam, saying his answer during an ABC News interview was narrowly tailored and referred only to propaganda efforts by insurgents.

The president was asked by George Stephanopoulos on Wednesday if he agreed with an opinion piece by New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman that the violence in Iraq is "the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive."

"He could be right," Mr. Bush said. "There's certainly a stepped-up level of violence, and we're heading into an election."

But after news outlets reported that the president had compared Iraq to Vietnam, the White House sought to set the record straight.

"The president was making a point that he's made before, which is that terrorists try to exploit pictures and try to use the media as conduits for influencing public opinion in the United States," Mr. Snow said.

"It is possible, although we don't have a clear pathway into the minds of terrorists, it is possible that they are trying to use violence right now as a way of influencing the elections."

The Tet Offensive, which began Jan. 30, 1968, is widely considered the turning point of the Vietnam War. Although U.S. and South Vietnamese forces repulsed the Northern troops with huge losses, the breadth and power of the offensive caused deep doubts in the American public about the prospects for eventual victory.

Support for the war quickly deteriorated, and President Johnson, who saw his popularity plummet, withdrew as a candidate for re-election in March of 1968.

Plan B (WSJ)

By Eliot A. Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

That the Iraq war is, if not a failure, failing, requires little demonstration. By all measures -- but above all, the sheer insecurity of daily life in Baghdad -- things have been getting worse, not better. Yes, there are islands of security and stability, particularly in the Kurdish north; but the communal violence between Sunni and Shia has gotten worse. The Iraqi army has improved, but the police, consigned to secondary relevance by the U.S., are penetrated by militias. Iranian influence spreads, and Iranian-designed and -manufactured improvised explosive devices inflict higher tolls on American troops. With an eye to the forthcoming American elections, the enemy is ratcheting up the violence, and successfully.

DOJ_NMG_0083828

It will be important in future years to settle whether the Iraq war was the right idea badly executed, an enterprise doomed to disappoint, or simply folly. There will be individuals to be held accountable (not all of whom have been in the crosshairs of journalists and partisans), and institutions whose shortcomings require not only soul-searching but reform. That's for later. The question now is, what should we do?

The current course -- Plan A -- involves an open-ended commitment of some 130,000 or 140,000 soldiers, with temporary surges during periods of crisis. Its theory of victory seems to be that American support, nagging and cajoling can eventually bring the Iraqi security forces to maturity and gradually hand over responsibility to a democratically constituted, unitary Iraqi government. It is difficult to believe that the U.S. Army and Marine Corps -- filled with soldiers now doing their second or third tour in Iraq, including soldiers whose participation is enforced by "stop-loss" orders that keep them beyond their enlistments -- can sustain this indefinitely. The hairline cracks in the armed forces are there, and growing for those willing to see them. Public support for the war is dwindling, and most importantly, we are not only making no progress: Things are actively getting worse. So what are the alternatives?

· Getting by with help from your enemies. It is bruited about in Washington that the Iraq Study Group, a collection of worthies commissioned by Congress that has spent several days in Iraq, chiefly in the Green Zone, will recommend turning to Iran and Syria to, in effect, bail out the U.S. To think that either state, with remarkable records of violence, duplicity and hostility to the U.S., will rescue us bespeaks a certain willful blindness. And to think that the Sunni states of the Arab world, much less Iraq's Sunni population, would welcome such a deal is more incredible yet. Syria is, as the Lebanon war and its earlier defense treaty with Iran demonstrated, now a client state of Iran. This option would in effect mean conceding dominance in the northern Gulf to that country; it would pave the way for more wars, and in no way guarantee us a clean exit.

· Wash your hands. Simple withdrawal, with or without a timetable and surely under fire -- although American forces could probably cope with that -- would have the disadvantages of the first option, without the putative benefits. Iraq would almost surely become even more violent, with massacres of scores or even hundreds being replaced by massacres of thousands, and various regional powers straining to secure their own buffers and clients.

· Double your bets. Conversely, the U.S. could react by reasserting its strength in Iraq -- sending an additional 30,000 or 40,000 troops to secure Baghdad and its environs, and making a far more strenuous effort than it has thus far to take control of the civilian ministries that are now merely fronts for political parties and their militias. But could American public opinion sustain this? More importantly, where would the soldiers come from? And has the strain on Iraqis' sense of national identity become so great that those institutions could be built?

· Hunker down and let the fires burn. The U.S. military, at its current strength or something less, could, conceivably, simply retreat to its forward operating bases, do its best to train a neutral and effective military and police force, and allow communal violence to take its course. Over time, new demographic realities would emerge, as Sunnis and Shiites separate into different neighborhoods, while some minorities -- Christians, most notably -- simply flee the country. But would there be anything left once the massacres had stopped? And would they stop?

· Back to counterinsurgency. One school has it that the U.S. should never have engaged directly in combat with Iraqi insurgents. Instead, it should have focused overwhelmingly on the training mission, retaining only enough combat units to rescue Iraqi forces (and their U.S. advisers) if they get in over their heads. To some extent this is already going on; but some have suggested much more radical reductions in the U.S. presence, down to 40,000 or 50,000 soldiers. The question is whether the levels of violence are so high, and the competence of the Iraqi forces so limited, that this has a chance of success. And what would be Plan C if it were to fail?

· - Let the generals have it. The Iraqi government is incompetent. Its ministries are viewed not as national institutions but as the playthings of competing parties and their bands of thugs. Yet Iraqi nationalism is real, and it is found where nationalism often is -- in the armed forces. A junta of military modernizers might be the only hope of a country whose democratic culture is weak, whose politicians are either corrupt or incapable. But what would then become of the American goal of democratization? And could the generals suppress the militias that have backing from abroad, and support in local communities?

· - Break it up. This option would have us concede the end of Iraq as a nation state. The precedents in the Middle East -- with the exceptions of Egypt and Iran, a collection of artificial entities produced by the highly fallible imaginations of British and French diplomats at the end of World War I -- are chilling. Presumably, population transfers on a large scale would be needed, although the problem of multiconfessional Baghdad would be particularly difficult. But it is hard to imagine that a formally independent Kurdistan would last long in the face of the hostility of all of its neighbors, or that the oil-deprived and landlocked Sunni state of western Iraq would be tranquil, or that the southern Shiastan would be able to resist Iranian penetration.

DOJ_NMG_0083829

All of the options for Plan B are either wretched to contemplate or based on fantasy; the most plausible (the sixth option, a coup which we quietly endorse) would involve a substantial repast of crow that this administration will be deeply unwilling to eat. But it is not only the administration that can, and should, feel uncomfortable about the choices that lie ahead.

An honest debate about Iraq policy will require of all who participate in it to acknowledge some unpleasant facts. We must all admit, for example, that the enemy (or rather, enemies, of us and of one another) exercises a vote. We have not yet had a Tet offensive, but the experience of Hezbollah in the Lebanon war may well encourage the Shiite militias, particularly those influenced by Iran, to try something like it. Iran's influence is great, and will become greater. There will be considerable bloodshed ahead, but our choices, though they may not make it better, could make it a lot worse.

American prestige has taken a hard knock; it will probably take a harder knock, and in ways that will not be restored without a considerable and successful use of American military power down the road. The tides of Sunni salafism and Iran's distinct combination of messianism and power politics have not crested, and will not crest without much greater violence in which we too will be engaged. Whether it be the Islamization of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the subversion of conservative regimes by salafist movements, or the continuing radicalization of European Muslims, the Long War, as the administration calls it, will be even longer, and more difficult, than anyone might have thought.

It is folly to think we can win in Iraq the way some of us thought possible in 2003. It would be even greater folly to think that by getting out, learning our lessons, and licking our wounds we can save ourselves from considerable danger, expense, effort and loss in what remains a protracted and global conflict with mortal enemies.

Mr. Cohen is Robert E. Osgood professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies.

Top US General Says Rumsfeld Is Inspired By God (AFP)

AFP, October 20, 2006

The top US general defended the leadership of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, saying it is inspired by God.

"He leads in a way that the good Lord tells him is best for our country," said Marine General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Rumsfeld is "a man whose patriotism focus, energy, drive, is exceeded by no one else I know ... quite simply, he works harder than anybody else in our building," Pace said at a ceremony at the Southern Command (Southcom) in Miami.

Rumsfeld has faced a storm of criticism and calls for his resignation, largely over his handling of the Iraq war.

But he got a strong show of support from the military establishment at Thursday's ceremony, where Navy Admiral James Stavridis took over Southcom's command from General Bantz Craddock.

"He comes to work everyday with a single-minded focus to make this country safe," said Stavridis who was a senior aide to Rumsfeld before taking on the Southcom job.

"We're lucky as a nation that he continues to serve with such passion and such integrity and such determination and such brilliance," said Stavridis, 51.

As head of Southcom, Stavridis will be responsible for military cooperation with Latin American countries, and will be in charge of the Guantanamo US military base in Cuba where more than 400 "war on terror" detainees are being held.

Craddock, who was named supreme commander of allied forces in Europe, hailed the role Southcom has played.

"Today I believe that we can say we were successful in our efforts and contributed to ensuring our nation's security through support on the global war on terror, and encouraged regional cooperation to enhance the security and stability in the region," he said.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

Casey's tenure

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is said to be fully satisfied with the performance of Army Gen. George Casey in Iraq. The four-star general is trying to defeat an amalgam of enemies — al Qaeda, Saddam Hussein loyalists, rejectionists, criminal gangs, Shi'ite death squads and militias — that may be America's toughest foe in history.

The question asked in Pentagon corridors is what's next for Gen. Casey? Defense sources say the door is open if he wants another four-star post.

DOJ_NMG_0083830

Three three-star Army generals are often mentioned inside the Pentagon's E-ring as replacements: Peter Chiarelli, the top tactical commander in Iraq; Martin Dempsey, who heads the critical task of training and equipping the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF); and David Petraeus, Gen. Dempsey's predecessor who commands the Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

Gen. Petraeus would be a likely front-runner. Mr. Rumsfeld admired his work getting the ISF on its feet. He has overseen the writing of a new counterinsurgency field manual, so he knows the Iraq mission, cover to cover.

A military officer says don't look for Gen. Casey to transfer any time soon.

Military votes

Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican, has had to bust up the Pentagon furniture to persuade it to fully adopt the integrated voting alternative site, or IVAS. It is a secure connection whereby a deployed person can download an absentee ballot from his or her county election board and mail it in. It greatly cuts the time to complete and mail in a ballot, meaning more service members should be able to beat their local election board's deadline to vote.

Mr. Burns blocked several Defense Department nominations until he thought the bureaucrats were finally adopting IVAS, as called for in Congress' 2004 defense budget.

There is an independent report that backs Mr. Burns' stance. "Successful outcomes from either the current [Federal Voter Assistance Program] or the continued IVAS effort are questionable at this point," said the August report by a military officer.

It said that after the 2004 election, the Pentagon dropped IVAS altogether. It did not restart it until the 2006 defense bill authorized it and then Mr. Burns raised concerns.

Citing "significant friction," the report also said the Pentagon's voter assistance office and the IVAS developer did not get along.

Deterring North Korea

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld warned North Korea this week not to transfer nuclear weapons to any "non-state" entity and suggested that doing so would lead to an attack on the Pyongyang regime.

Asked after a speech at Maxwell Air Force Base, Ala., about nuclear deterrence against rogue states, Mr. Rumsfeld noted that "the world is different" today than during the Cold War.

"If you have countries that are nuclear countries and one of two things happens: They transfer those capabilities, their illegal capabilities, to non-state entities, terrorist organizations of one type or another, or they're led by somebody who has a martyr complex and believes that it's OK to have great catastrophic events occur in the world, in those cases, standard deterrents don't work," he said Wednesday.

Mr. Rumsfeld said that since North Korea's nuclear test Oct. 9, the president has said "that were a nuclear country to transfer nuclear capabilities to a non-state entity, that they would be held fully accountable for that."

He did not elaborate, but the phrase "held fully accountable" has been used in the past by U.S. leaders to threaten massive retaliation.

A CIA report to Congress last year stated that "we remain concerned about North Korea's potential for exporting nuclear materials or technology," noting that in 2003 a North Korean official threatened privately to export nuclear weapons.

Casualty count

One of the military services has seen a reduction in deaths, but it has little to do with battlefields in Afghanistan or Iraq.

The Air Force has been on a campaign to cut down on accidents during what it calls the "101 Critical Days of Summer" between Memorial Day and Labor Day. In a message to the force, it reports that 18 airmen lost their lives in accidents during that span, most of them in automobile accidents.

"Due to increased participation in outdoor activities, many of which are inherently risky, this period has historically been one of the most costly in terms of fatal mishaps," the message said.

But the total was 11 fewer than a year ago and 40 percent below the five-year average.

"This is a big step toward achieving our goal of zero mishaps, but the work toward keeping ourselves and our fellow airmen safe is never done," the message says.

Mobile coms

General Dynamics Corp. has come up with the perfect communications network to fit the lighter, faster Army that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wants.

The system is called WIN-T. If installed, it would give Army combat brigades unprecedented access to satellite communications and intelligence information while on the move. Currently, such advanced communications can be set up only by stationary troops, according to documents on the program.

But an industry official says the Army, while pleased with the tests, has not reached a decision on buying WIN-Ts with its $10 billion price tag.

DOJ_NMG_0083831

An example of how WIN-T (Warfighter Information Network-Tactical) would work: An intelligence analyst in the United States might send information to an individual Stryker armored vehicle patrolling the streets of Mosul, Iraq, and link the two to a soldier on foot.

· Bill Gertz and Rowan Scarborough are Pentagon reporters. Mr. Gertz can be reached at 202/636-3274 or by e-mail at bgertz@washingtontimes.com. Mr. Scarborough can be reached at 202/636-3208 or by e-mail at rscarborough@washingtontimes.com.

Planted News Reports Were Legal, Report Says (USAT/AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

USA Today, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — A U.S. military propaganda program used in Iraq was legal under the rules for psychological operations, a Pentagon investigation has concluded.

A classified Defense Department inspector general's report says regulations were followed when the military paid to have favorable stories about coalition forces planted in Iraqi newspapers, according to the unclassified executive summary of the report obtained Thursday by the Associated Press.

The summary says psychological operations "contribute to achieving the … commander's objectives." They are aimed at conveying "selected, truthful information to foreign audiences to influence their emotions and ultimately the behavior of governments."

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., and committee member Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., had complained that planting stories could set a bad example in a country where the United States was trying to establish democracy and a free press. Kennedy requested the inspector general's investigation.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also recommended a review of the practice.

The inspector general's office completed the report Oct. 6. It was being redacted so an unclassified version could be released publicly. A copy was forwarded to Kennedy.

Kennedy said the report shows that the Pentagon can't account for millions of dollars it paid the Lincoln Group public relations firm for the program and that contracting rules were not followed. "Broader policy questions remain about whether the administration's manipulation of the news in Iraq contradicts our goal of a free and independent press there," he said.

The inspector general looked at three contracts awarded to the Lincoln Group from October 2004 through last month.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has said the military must use "non-traditional means" to get its message out in the face of widespread disinformation campaigns by insurgents.

Pentagon Audit Clears Propaganda Effort (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — An American military propaganda campaign that planted favorable news articles in the Iraqi news media did not violate laws or Pentagon regulations, but it was not properly supervised by military officials in Baghdad, an audit by the Pentagon Inspector General has concluded.

The report said that the secret program, run by the military in conjunction with the Lincoln Group, a Washington contractor, was lawful and that it did not constitute a "covert action" designed to influence the internal political conditions of another country.

By law, only intelligence operatives, not the military, are authorized to carry out covert actions, and the government is authorized to deny publicly any knowledge of these activities.

But the audit concluded that military officials in Baghdad violated federal contracting guidelines by failing to keep adequate records about the Lincoln Group's first propaganda contract — for $10.4 million, signed in September 2004.

A copy of the report's executive summary was released by the inspector general's office on Thursday, and other unclassified materials elaborating on its findings were provided to The New York Times by other government officials in response to a request.

The report found that contract officers "did not retain adequate documentation to verify expenditures," nor did they keep records about whether the contract went through the normal procedures for competitive bidding.

As a result, the report concluded, the inspector general could not determine whether the contract was properly awarded. Since that contract has expired, however, the inspector general did not recommend any punishment for the violations.

Since winning its first "strategic communications" contract in 2004, the Lincoln Group has secured more than 20 contracts from the Pentagon worth tens of millions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0083832

The company came under scrutiny late last year when news reports disclosed that Lincoln Group employees were working with the military to write favorable news articles about American operations in Iraq.

Under the terms of the contract, members of a military information operations task force would write summaries of news events and editorials, called storyboards, which Lincoln Group employees would translate into Arabic and pay Iraqi newspapers to publish.

The inspector general's report concluded that the Lincoln Group successfully placed hundreds of these articles in the Iraqi news media.

Despite criticism of the operation from within the Pentagon and from lawmakers on Capitol Hill, a military investigation in Iraq completed this year found that the propaganda program was not in violation of Pentagon policy.

In recent months, the Lincoln Group has won a string of new contracts for work both in Iraq and Afghanistan. Last month, the company was awarded a two-year, $12.4 million contract to monitor English and Arabic news outlets for military officials in Baghdad and to produce talking points and public relations material for American commanders there.

A statement from the company released on Thursday said that the Lincoln Group's work is performed "ethically and effectively" and that the company "continues to win contracts because of the firm's performance in hostile and challenging environments."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in a statement on Thursday that the inspector general's report "shows that the Pentagon cannot account for millions paid to the Lincoln Group for their propaganda program."

"Broader policy questions remain about whether the administration's manipulation of the news in Iraq contradicts our goal of a free and independent media there," said Mr. Kennedy, who had requested the inspector general's investigation.

Judge: American Can Be Transferred To Iraq For Execution (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- An American citizen facing a death sentence in Iraq lost a court challenge Thursday that would have prohibited the military from turning him over to Iraqi authorities.

Mohammad Munaf was convicted and sentenced to death by an Iraqi judge last week on charges he helped in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad.

Munaf, who was born in Iraq and became an American citizen in 2000, sought an emergency order blocking U.S. military officials from turning him over to Iraq. He claimed his trial was flawed and his confession was coerced.

Those would normally be grounds for American citizens to challenge their imprisonment. But U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth said he had no authority to intervene because Munaf was being held by coalition military forces, not by the U.S. military alone.

That distinction, adopted by the U.S. government, is at the heart of a legal fight over the fate of American citizens being held in Iraq. Critics say it is disingenuous because the prisons Munaf and others are being held in are operated by the U.S. military.

"In time of actual hostilities or war, as in Iraq, courts should tread lightly and give the president, as commander in chief, the full power of his office," Lamberth wrote.

Munaf's defense team wanted Lamberth to block the transfer at least temporarily, while an appeals court considers the similar case of Shawqi Omar, an American citizen accused of being a top Al-Qaida lieutenant in Iraq.

Munaf's lawyer said he would continue trying to block his client's transfer. Lawyers could appeal the case to the same court considering Omar's case.

"It's an unprecedented and unjustified ruling that sends an American citizen that's been tortured in U.S. custody to death after a sham Iraqi proceeding," lawyer Jonathan Hafetz said.

Judge Dismisses Bid To Elude Iraq (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

A federal judge yesterday turned down an emergency motion by attorneys for an Iraqi-born U.S. citizen to prevent the U.S. military from surrendering the translator and convicted kidnapper to Iraqi officials to face the death penalty.

U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth in Washington rejected arguments by Mohammad Munaf that an Iraqi trial violated his due process protection as a U.S. citizen, ruling that Munaf is in the custody of a multinational entity and cannot invoke the U.S. court's jurisdiction.

DOJ_NMG_0083833

Munaf's attorneys had sought a writ of habeas corpus -- an order to bring their client to the courtroom to determine whether he was lawfully imprisoned or should be released -- to stop his transfer to Iraq, where he faces execution.

Judge Lamberth said, "No court in our country's history ... has ever found habeas corpus jurisdiction over a multinational force comprised of the United States acting jointly with its allies overseas."

The ruling strikes at the heart of arguments by several detainees who have challenged the multinational designation as incorrect, saying the prisons where they are being held are operated by the U.S. military.

Munaf was convicted and sentenced to death last week by an Iraqi judge in the March 2005 kidnapping and detention of three Romanian journalists in Iraq, who were held for 55 days before their release. His attorneys argued that their client was never confronted with the evidence against him and was prevented from presenting exculpatory evidence.

A naturalized U.S. citizen since 2000, Munaf worked as a translator and guide for the journalists at the time of their kidnapping and was accused of assisting in the plot. The kidnapping was orchestrated by a group that called itself the "Muadh Ibn Jabal Brigade," and demanded a ransom and Romanian troop withdrawal from Iraq.

The journalists' release was secured by a raid by military troops under the command of Multi-National Force-Iraq.

Judge Lamberth called the MNF-I "a coalition authority" operating with the power of the United Nations to detain prisoners who pose a threat to security in Iraq.

Since the raid, Munaf has been detained by MNF-I troops at Camp Cropper, a military installation located at Baghdad International Airport.

Judge Lamberth said in the ruling that Munaf appeared Oct. 12 before a three-judge trial panel in Iraq to face kidnapping charges under the Iraqi Penal Code and was accompanied by his Iraqi counsel. The judge said Munaf had the opportunity to "submit any evidence or bring any witnesses" but only reiterated his position that he was innocent and that a prior confession was coerced.

The judge also said that although Munaf claimed two U.S. military officers attended the hearing, including an American general "who told the judge in open court that the defendants should all be convicted and sentenced to death," there was no evidence to support the claim.

General's Comment No Help To Blair (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

LONDON -- A top general's retreat from a call for an early exit from Iraq has done little to ease the damage to Prime Minister Tony Blair, with public pressure building for the early withdrawal of British troops.

Former Foreign Secretary Malcolm Rifkind of the opposition Conservative Party announced he was putting together a multiparty group of lawmakers to demand a full-day debate on Iraq.

"It is a disgrace that the House of Commons has not been allowed a full debate on Iraq since 2004," Mr. Rifkind said.

House leader Jack Straw, who previously served as Mr. Blair's foreign secretary, has rejected requests for an Iraq debate.

Gen. Richard Dannatt, the British army's chief of the general staff since August, said in a newspaper interview last week that British forces should "get ourselves out sometime soon," warning that "we are in a Muslim country, and Muslims' views of foreigners in their country are quite clear."

Gen. Dannatt backed down a day later by saying that the words "sometime soon" meant two to three years, and that he and Mr. Blair share the same views.

An opinion poll indicates that nearly three-quarters of Britons think the general got it right the first time.

The survey in London's Sunday Express newspaper indicated that 74 percent of Britons agreed with the general's assessment that the time to get out was "sometime soon."

The poll also showed that 71 percent thought Gen. Dannatt was right in asserting that the continuing presence of British troops was worsening the security crisis.

Mr. Blair insists that there is not a "cigarette paper" of difference between himself and Gen. Dannatt, and that British forces will stay as long as it takes to finish the job of pacification and democratization of Iraq. Left unsaid was exactly how long either thought that would take.

It is the general's use of the phrase "sometime soon" that has triggered the latest wave of fear that Britain is caught up with the United States in an unfolding disaster.

John McDonnell, who has said he intends to run for the leadership of the ruling Labor Party when Mr. Blair steps down as prime minister within the next year, called for a timetable to be set within the next week to withdraw Britain's forces.

"In the name of reason and humanity," Mr. McDonnell said, "the government must act and bring forward an exit strategy," adding that "the government appears to be paralyzed by indecision on this."

Conservative Party leader David Cameron, the favorite in political polls to become prime minister in Britain's next general election, has remained silent over the explosive issue, but his defense spokesman, Liam Fox, told reporters that British troops "could not remain [in Iraq] for an indefinite time."

Also lining up against the prime minister is Menzies Campbell, leader of the smaller opposition Liberal Democrat Party.

Mr. Campbell said that the Blair government, which named Gen. Dannatt chief of the general staff, "has got an overwhelming obligation to listen to what he has to say."

"If the military are now voicing these concerns, we can't ignore them. I think we now need a clear exit strategy," said Geraldine Smith, a Labor member of Parliament. "We are in a position where we could possibly be doing more harm than good by being there."

Mr. Blair is adamant that British forces will remain in Iraq and Afghanistan as long as necessary.

At his monthly press conference Tuesday, he said, "If we walk away before the job is done ... we will leave a situation in which the very people we are fighting everywhere, including the extremism in our own country, are heightened and emboldened, and we can't afford to let that happen."

Our Small Defense Budget (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Congress recently passed a record defense-spending bill for 2007, and critics lost no time adding it to their list of woes caused by the Iraq war. The real story is more interesting: to wit, how relatively little the U.S. now spends on national security, notwithstanding a war on terror and especially compared with previous periods of global conflict.

It's true that overall defense outlays for fiscal year 2007 are on track to surpass -- in dollars adjusted for inflation -- defense spending at the height of the Vietnam War. It's also true that defense spending has already increased by some 40% since 2001, when President Bush came to office. War opponents cite such figures to suggest that the Iraq campaign is too great a burden, and is sucking up funds better spent on domestic programs.

Less talked about is that the $528 billion spent on national defense in fiscal 2006, which ended on September 30, equaled only 4% of U.S. gross domestic product. Historically, that level is far more in line with peacetime military spending. Many Americans might be surprised to learn that current U.S. defense spending isn't all that much above the 3% share of GDP that prevailed from 1999-2001 and was a postwar World War II low.

The top chart nearby tracks defense spending as a share of the economy since 1940, when it was 1.7% before the mass mobilization of World War II. It reached a postwar high of 14.2% in 1953 during the Korean War, 9.5% in 1968 at the height of Vietnam, and 6.2% in 1986 at the peak of the Reagan re-armament that showed the Soviets they couldn't win the Cold War. Defense spending then took an especially rapid plunge from 4.8% in 1992, falling to 3% by the end of the 1990s. Some of this "peace dividend" was warranted after the Berlin Wall fell, but letting the security budget fall so far is also one of the ways in which the Clinton era was a holiday from global history.

This huge defense drawdown is also the real story behind President Clinton's ballyhooed deficit reduction. The GOP Congress gets some credit for slowing the rate of growth in domestic spending in the mid-1990s. But nearly all of the decline in government spending in the Clinton years came from defense. Only toward the end of the 1990s did the GOP Congress begin to agitate for modest defense increases, which Mr. Clinton accommodated in return for more spending on his own domestic priorities.

Sooner or later this trend had to stop, and it did with the jolt of September 11. President Bush needed to find more resources to fight the war on terror, and he has done so by increasing defense spending by a full percentage-point of GDP over his six years in office. More than half of the fiscal 2006 budget deficit of 1.9% of GDP can thus be attributed solely to this rebuilding of American defenses after the Clinton drawdown.

Today's relatively modest defense buildup is also apparent if you look at defense spending as a share of all federal outlays. (See lower chart.) Nearly half (46%) of all tax dollars went to national security during Vietnam, and 28.1% as recently as 1987. But spending for the war on terror, including Iraq and Afghanistan, has only lifted defense to 19.8% of all federal spending today. We have less to spend on guns because we are spending so much more than we once did on the rest of government, especially health care.

In retrospect, Mr. Bush missed a historic opportunity after 9/11 to ask government to spend less on non-essential programs so it could spend more on security. Instead, overall federal spending grew by nearly 50% in Mr. Bush's first five years, as he allowed Congress to spend more on just about everything. At least Mr. Bush avoided the trap of asking for a tax increase, which would have slowed the economic growth that we have seen throw off record amounts of revenue in the past two years, and thus fund spending on both guns and butter (or, too often, pork).

DOJ_NMG_0083835

The larger point is that America remains a long way from a state of "imperial overstretch," as critics of an assertive foreign policy like to put it. U.S. defense spending remains at modest levels, probably too modest given the threats we face and the overseas deployments by our servicemen and women. In addition to hot wars in the Middle East and against terrorism everywhere, the U.S. must maintain its air and sealift capacity to deploy to other regions if needed. Weapons built during the Reagan era must be upgraded or replaced, and the Pentagon will also have to invest in new technologies to deter any future enemies. And all of these priorities must compete with the ever-larger share of the defense budget consumed by health care and salaries for the volunteer force.

Our own judgment is that the U.S. is going to have to increase defense spending to meet these challenges, and that the time to begin such a debate is now.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Rambus Says Misdated Options Will Result In Large Charge (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Rambus Corp. said an internal investigation found that a "significant number" of stock-option grants awarded since 1996 weren't correctly dated or accounted for. It plans to take over $200 million in compensation charges to correct for the errors.

MORE ON OPTIONS

· KLA Chairman, Sapient CEO Quit1

· Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny2

· Perfect Payday: Complete coverage3

The Los Altos, Calif., chip-technology company said the vast majority of incorrectly dated grants, both in terms of number of shares of common stock and financial accounting impact, occurred between 1998 and 2001. Rambus had previously said it had discovered errors in its grants and expected to take a material charge to correct them. In August, Rambus announced the resignation of Geoff Tate, chief executive of Rambus from 1990 through 2005, from its board amid questions about past options practices.

Rambus said its independent investigation, performed by Heller Ehrman LLP as independent legal counsel and outside accounting firm Ernst & Young LLP, has taken over four months and consisted of a review of over 200 stock-option granting actions. The review looked at 1.5 million emails and other documents, and involved over 50 interviews with executive officers, directors, employees and advisers.

The findings at Rambus come as other companies are releasing results of their internal reports. With a harsh spotlight shining on compensation practices, companies have been scrambling to wrap up internal options probes and make related adjustments to their books before they file their reports with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

In all, more than 100 companies are under investigation for options backdating, and more than 30 executives and directors have lost their jobs in connection with internal and federal probes. Options represent the right to buy a stock at a set price. Backdated options allow recipients a jump-start on profits by pretending the options were granted when the share price was lower.

Due to the options investigation, Rambus didn't release its third-quarter earnings today, although it did release revenue figures. Revenue for the third quarter was $45.9 million, up 28% over the third quarter last year and down 6% from the previous quarter.

How Did UnitedHealth's McGuire Get Same Options Twice? (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Investors and the public heaped scorn on William McGuire this week for his role in apparent stock-options backdating at UnitedHealth Group Inc. But his thorniest legal problems could stem from a 1999 transaction in which backdating played only a minor role.

In the transaction, according to a report prepared by outside lawyers commissioned by UnitedHealth directors, Dr. McGuire and other employees were able to effectively get the same options twice, at favorable prices, while skirting disclosure requirements and potentially violating accounting rules. For Dr. McGuire alone, the extra options are now valued at $250 million. Just as troublesome for Dr. McGuire, the report concluded that it's unclear whether directors ever intended to give Dr. McGuire such a generous deal.

DOJ_NMG_0083836

Dr. McGuire's role in implementing the transaction is amply documented. The lawyers probing UnitedHealth found a 1999 memo from Dr. McGuire to directors in which he initiated the arrangement. He also told the investigators that it was structured as it was in part to avoid having to reprice the options, which would have unpleasant accounting consequences, according to a person familiar with the matter. That would cause a drag on earnings. (See an article1 on the company's third-quarter earnings.)

But UnitedHealth's outside lawyers believe that the accounting treatment was nonetheless improper. That will likely require UnitedHealth to take substantial charges, and it may expose Dr. McGuire or others to allegations of accounting misdeeds.

Dr. McGuire, the longtime chief executive of UnitedHealth, stepped down as chairman of the giant Minnetonka, Minn.-based insurer Sunday, and he will leave his post as chief executive by Dec. 1. The moves follow an internal investigation by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, released in a report on Sunday, that found rampant backdating of stock options at the company, and attributed a substantial portion of the blame to Dr. McGuire.

MORE

· Read about William McGuire's lawyer David Brodsky and follow coverage of the backdating scandal on the Law Blog2.

· Read the text of the board-commissioned report3 on UnitedHealth's options practices.

· UnitedHealth on the Mend4

10/20/06

PERFECT PAYDAY

· Options Scorecard5 | Complete coverage6

"If I were at the SEC, I think I would have plenty from the WilmerHale report that would motivate me to look very hard at Dr. McGuire's conduct," said Donald C. Langevoort, a law professor at the Georgetown University Law Center. The 1999 options-swap transaction, he added, "is a perfect example of a major compensation decision not being presented clearly and plainly to the investing public until well after the fact."

Dr. McGuire's lawyer, David M. Brodsky, said, "Dr. McGuire is an expert in health care but not the legal and accounting issues concerning options. For that, he sought advice from others and relied on their advice." He said he doesn't know who gave Dr. McGuire the guidance.

In late 1999, according to the WilmerHale report, Dr. McGuire was concerned that some stock options issued in the prior five years were "underwater" -- that is, carrying exercise prices above the stock's current market value. Because options give recipients the ability to buy stock at a fixed exercise price, that meant the options couldn't immediately be cashed in for a profit.

On Oct. 22, 1999, Dr. McGuire wrote a memo to the board's compensation committee proposing an unusual maneuver. He suggested that more than two million options held by him and others be "suspended," and that new ones be issued in their place with a lower exercise price.

The motivation for such a swap appears to be avoiding the deleterious accounting consequences of a straight "repricing" -- whereby options are simply given a new exercise price.

Accounting rules adopted in 1998 required repriced options to be recorded on a company's books under so-called variable accounting, a punishing method that requires assessing an option every quarter between vesting and expiration to determine if it gained in value, and recording any gain as an expense. By contrast, the usual method of accounting for options that were issued at market value at the time of grant involved no expense whatsoever.

In any event, directors approved the swap, giving Dr. McGuire and others roughly the same number of new options at substantially lower exercise prices. As it happens, the WilmerHale report concluded the new options likely were backdated to Oct. 13, 1999, the low point that year for UnitedHealth's stock, giving the recipients a running start to make a profit on their replacement options.

Dr. McGuire's actions were likely in vain, though. The WilmerHale report said the 1999 replacement grant "was effectively a repricing for accounting purposes." Though UnitedHealth itself hasn't come to a conclusion about how to account for the grant, it is likely the company will conclude that its past financial statements didn't record adequate compensation expenses -- meaning the company's earnings looked better to investors than they should have.

Charles Mulford, an accounting professor at Georgia Institute of Technology, said, "I would argue, in substance, this was a repricing and should have been accounted for as such."

In August 2000, the suspended options were reactivated. That meant that Dr. McGuire and other employees got the best of both worlds-owning both the original options, which were now "in the money" because the stock price had surpassed the exercise price, and the purported replacements.

The WilmerHale report said Dr. McGuire's 750,000 options were reactivated with an average strike price of $47.21, at a time when shares were changing hands at $81.81 -- an instant gain of $26 million for Dr. McGuire alone.

DOJ_NMG_0083837

Though the reactivation was apparently approved by directors, the WilmerHale report suggested they may not have fully understood what they were doing. The report cited missing or nonexistent documents, and said that minutes from the August 2000 board meeting don't even mention the reactivation.

Two directors "recalled that there was a discussion of the reactivation at [the August 2000] meeting," the report said. But "no member of the Compensation Committee in 2000 specifically recalled that Dr. McGuire was the intended recipient of such a large grant of options."

Legal experts said the Securities and Exchange Commission will want to determine whether directors were, in effect, bamboozled. "To the extent that the commission decides that Dr. McGuire or anyone else in senior management was not candid with the board and let them operate in the dark, I think the commission could turn that into the basis for an enforcement action," Prof. Langevoort said.

A person close to Dr. McGuire said the August 2000 reactivation was not a surreptitious pay grab. Indeed, this person said, it was decided at a compensation-committee meeting and at a full board meeting. This person added that employees with suspended options were sent a memo shortly after the meeting noting that the suspension had been lifted, and that such lifting didn't affect the 1999 supplemental grant.

In any case, the WilmerHale lawyers determined, the August 2000 reactivation should have been treated as a new grant altogether, requiring UnitedHealth to take a substantial charge against its earnings.

Dr. McGuire and UnitedHealth are negotiating the financial terms of his departure. The question of whether he should be allowed to keep the now-disputed reactivated grant is likely to be a key element in those discussions.

Companies Backdating Stock Options Likely To Share Directors (AP)

By Ellen Simon, Associated Press

AP, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK – On tennis courts and golf courses, in bars and restaurants, at meetings and conventions, it seems corporate board members spread the word about a novel way to boost executive compensation – backdating options.

A study released Thursday suggested that the common link between companies that backdated options was a network of directors who sat on some of the same company boards. Now many of them, their companies and their chief executives are losing their jobs because of it.

Of 120 companies involved in the snowballing backdating scandal, more than 40 percent share directors with other implicated companies, The Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm, said in a report Thursday. That proportion of interconnected boards is much higher than would be expected from a similar, randomly selected sample, the study found.

“Director interlocking relationships are fast becoming what appear to be the most important characteristic and indicator of backdating problems,” the report said.

Options grants give the recipient a right to buy a stock at a fixed “strike price,” which is generally set at the stock's market price the day of the grant. Generally, a company's board or compensation committee must approve its options grants to top executives.

Options holders benefit if the stock rises above the strike price because it enables them to buy stock at the lower price. In the backdating scandal, companies have dated option grants to days when the stock was at a low, enhancing the potential benefit.

The scandal was first reported in March by The Wall Street Journal, which calculated the tiny odds of companies randomly making grants on the days they chose, when the stock was at its lowest prices for the year or for the quarter. For instance, the Journal found the odds of one executive's options being timed so well, without backdating, were about 200 million to one.

H. Nejat Seyhun, a finance professor at University of Michigan, said one of his studies found that “directors are often participants, as well as beneficiaries, of backdating.”

For instance, the odds that options grants to UnitedHealth Group Inc. director Richard T. Burke occurring randomly were more than a trillion to one, Seyhun found. In Burke's 27 options grants, he got the best price available for a 91-day period five times.

Seyhun said the odds of some of Burke's grants occurring randomly were even narrower than the odds of randomness for grants given to William McGuire, the company's Chairman and CEO, who agreed Sunday to step down from both posts after an internal probe of the company's option practices. The odds of his all of his grants occurring when they did were 45 billion to one against.

UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay said that during the time period in question, “Option awards were distributed broadly, and based on merit, to over 14,000 employees.”

DOJ_NMG_0083838

At least 135 public companies have disclosed Justice Department, SEC or internal investigations of their option grants, according to an Associated Press review. So far, at least 39 executives and board directors at 19 companies have been fired or resigned.

Some of the directors on multiple boards of implicated companies include Millard S. Drexler, former chief executive and a director of retailer Gap Inc. also sits on the board of Apple Computer Inc. Both companies have uncovered troubles with options grants after internal reviews. Drexler left Gap in 2002 has been CEO of retailer J. Crew since 2003.

J. Crew and Apple representatives had no comment. Greg Rossiter, a spokesman for Gap, said that the company's internal review had found no backdating or errors in options granted to executives at or above the vice president level and less than $5 million in errors related to options given to lower-level employees. He referred questions about Drexler to J. Crew.

N.Y. Judge Orders Grasso To Pay Back Up To $100M From Compensation Package (AP)

By Michael Gormley, The Associated Press

AP, October 20, 2006

In a sternly worded decision, a state judge ordered former New York Stock Exchange chief Richard Grasso on Thursday to pay as much as $100 million back in his contested compensation package.

Grasso's claim for another $48 million from the exchange was also rejected in the ruling.

New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos also said in a partial summary judgment that he was "shocked" at one aspect of Grasso's defense that he believed stock exchange officials were fully aware of all the elements of his compensation as they increased it annually.

Ramos stated that he "must agree with Mr. Grasso that is impossible for the court to determine on this motion what Mr. Grasso actually knew about what the board members knew. But summary judgment is not granted on the basis of his actual knowledge.

"Mr. Grasso's duty is to be fully informed and to see to it that the board was fully informed. He failed in this duty."

"The question is whether his duty included disclosure of the magnitude of his SERP benefits," Ramos stated. "It did."

The court ordered an accounting of how much Grasso must repay, based on specific areas and interest identified by the judge. Spitzer spokesman Darren Dopp said he expects the court's accounting will total about $100 million.

Spitzer has been trying to recover some of the $187.5 million pay package Grasso received in 2003. Spitzer said the compensation was unreasonable under laws governing nonprofit organizations and that board members were misled into approving greater compensation. An internal NYSE review known as the Webb report claimed up to $156.7 million of the pay package was excessive compared with most U.S. corporations.

Grasso has long argued the exchange's officers were aware of the package when it was approved.

The 72-page decision by Ramos dated Wednesday said Grasso didn't fully disclose his growing compensation from his Supplemental Executive Retirement Plan. A SERP is an extra retirement fund many companies maintain for their executives.

The decision states Grasso's SERP of $36 million in 1999 grew to more than $100 million in less than three years.

"Mr. Grasso's failure to disclose the amount of the SERP thwarted the (NYSE) Compensation Committee from performing its duty of care and obedience," Ramos stated. "Year after year, it made decisions to pay him without knowing his true compensation."

Ramos continued: "Many members of the (NYSE) board testified that they did not know about the SERP and if they did, they did not know what the balance was.

"This court also finds this affirmative defense of neglect to be shocking," Ramos wrote. "That a fiduciary of any institution, profit or not-for-profit, could honestly admit that he was unaware of a liability of over $100 million, or even over $36 million, is a clear violation of the duty of care. The fact that it was a liability to an insider (chairman and CEO) is even more shocking."

Grasso's attorney, Gerson A. Zweifach of Washington, didn't immediately respond to a request for comment. The decision could be appealed.

Spitzer, who is running for governor in New York, has been criticized by some Republicans for continuing the lengthy case against Grasso, arguing a private organization should be able to pay an executive whatever it wants. But Spitzer has said the exchange was subject to nonprofit organization laws that prohibit excessive payments and that some exchange officials were misled about the size of the compensation.

Spitzer has said any return of Grasso's compensation will be used to help fund a stock exchange program that educates investors.

Grasso Is Ordered To Repay Millions In Compensation (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Joann S. Lublin

DOJ_NMG_0083839

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

A New York state judge ordered former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Dick Grasso to return tens of millions of dollars in retirement pay in a harshly written ruling that is sure to reverberate through corporate boardrooms, where executive compensation has become a hot-button concern.

Justice Charles E. Ramos ruled that Mr. Grasso would have to return an amount from his $187.5 million pay package that will be finalized after a hearing within the next 30 days. That amount totals at least $95 million in retirement benefits and interest, according to the office of New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, which brought the case against Mr. Grasso.

In his 73-page opinion, Justice Ramos repeatedly chastised Mr. Grasso, writing that, among other things, the former executive had failed to adequately disclose the size of his enormous compensation package to the exchange's board of directors. The justice also criticized the board for failing to do its homework.

"Mr. Grasso's duty is to be fully informed and to see to it that the board was fully informed. He failed in this duty," Justice Ramos wrote.

The former NYSE boss, who has repeatedly indicated he won't settle the case and wants to clear his name, said he plans to appeal yesterday's ruling, which he said was "riddled with errors."

Courts rarely criticize a top executive's pay package so forcefully, much less rebuke board members for their ignorance of such rewards. In June, the Delaware Supreme Court upheld a lower-court ruling exonerating the board of Walt Disney Co. of wrongdoing in connection with a $140 million severance package paid to Michael Ovitz at the end of his brief stint as president of the entertainment giant.

"Today, Justice Ramos somehow rejected the testimony of dozens of [NYSE] directors that they approved every dime they paid me, and decided that these men and women did not know what they were doing," Mr. Grasso said in a statement.

Yesterday's ruling is the latest in a string of decisions that have gone against Mr. Grasso in his 2½-year legal battle. Last month, he sought unsuccessfully to remove Justice Ramos from overseeing the case, arguing that the judge couldn't render an impartial decision because he has a conflict of interest, having twice applied for a job on the NYSE board. The justice's latest ruling "is not a surprise," Mr. Grasso said. "He's ruled against us every time."

The ruling represents a big victory for Mr. Spitzer, who is leading in the race to become New York governor. He has waged his campaign based in part on his record of going after what he views as Wall Street abuses. Mr. Spitzer said at the beginning of the case that Mr. Grasso should return at least $100 million to the NYSE.

At issue in the Grasso case is the outsize retirement package that he accumulated over his years as an executive at the NYSE, which was then a not-for-profit organization. The disclosure of that package in 2003 set off a controversy that led to Mr. Grasso's forced departure. The Big Board has since gone public as part of the for-profit NYSE Group Inc. The exchange is now scrambling to buy rivals and is pursuing more electronic trading -- initiatives that had been opposed in varying degrees by Mr. Grasso during his 36-year tenure there.

Among Justice Ramos's findings: that the NYSE board wasn't made aware of a huge chunk of the retirement pay Mr. Grasso was due and that Mr. Grasso had a duty to disclose that pay to the board. The justice also had harsh words for the board.

"That a fiduciary of any institution, profit or not for profit, could honestly admit that he was unaware of a liability of over $100 million, or even over $36 million, is a clear violation of the duty of care," Justice Ramos wrote in a partial summary judgment, a pretrial ruling on certain aspects of a case.

The case is particularly striking because the Big Board boasted an all-star roster of directors, including the chiefs of some of Wall Street's largest financial companies, each of whom made tens of millions of dollars in annual pay.

Jim Barrall, head of the global executive-compensation and benefits practice at Latham & Watkins LLP in Los Angeles, described the findings as "stunning." "I have never heard of a court decision finding a breach of fiduciary duty based on the failure to disclose all the numbers" about the size of a supplemental pension.

At a minimum, Mr. Barrall suggested, corporate CEOs will have to make sure "the board understands the numbers and all the elements of the [leader's] pay package and how they work together." At many companies, the size of an executive's supplemental pension swells along with the magnitude of bonuses and equity awards.

Legal experts expressed surprise that the justice would make such a ruling before the case went to trial. "It's really extraordinary," said Christopher Clark, a former assistant U.S. attorney who is now an attorney at LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae LLP. "I'm not used to seeing cases with this many facts and this many depositions decided without a trial."

The ruling has precedent, however. In 1998, Mr. Spitzer's predecessor as state attorney general, Dennis Vacco, recovered about $4 million in a lawsuit he filed against the former board of trustees of Adelphi University, also a not-for-profit organization, after critics charged that some of the money awarded to the university's former president was excessive.

DOJ_NMG_0083840

Even so, Mr. Clark and other attorneys said Mr. Grasso has strong grounds for an appeal, which would likely extend his legal battle into 2007. "I can't image the parties will be able to get close to a [settlement] agreement with the ruling hanging out there," Mr. Clark said.

In any appeal, Mr. Grasso's lawyers would be likely to argue that many of the NYSE directors in the case have said at deposition that they were aware of Mr. Grasso's increasingly valuable retirement package. Under the structure of the benefits, Mr. Grasso's rising compensation in 2000-2002 sent his retirement benefits soaring too.

"The question is whether his duty included disclosure of the magnitude of his SERP [or supplementary retirement] benefits. It did," Justice Ramos wrote. The supplementary retirement package was valued at about $80 million, according to a statement from Mr. Spitzer's office.

Robert Michels, a lawyer representing the Big Board at Winston & Strawn, agreed that Mr. Grasso would have to return close to $100 million, based on Justice Ramos's ruling. But he added that Mr. Grasso might be able to get some of that back in the portion of the trial in which Justice Ramos or a jury decides how much of Mr. Grasso's overall pay was reasonable.

Gerson Zweifach, Mr. Grasso's attorney, said that further hearings will be necessary to determine whether his client has to return money to the NYSE.

Justice Ramos also ruled that Mr. Grasso should pay the NYSE interest on payment advances the attorney general described as loans made in violation of New York's not-for-profit law. Mr. Spitzer's office said that sum could be about $15 million, depending on how the court decides to calculate the interest.

In his ruling, Justice Ramos found that the NYSE and its former chairman, John Reed, hadn't defamed Mr. Grasso, and that the NYSE didn't owe Mr. Grasso about $50 million in unpaid compensation that Mr. Grasso sued to receive.

Kenneth Langone, a former Big Board director Mr. Spitzer has sued for involvement in Mr. Grasso's pay, is still fighting his case.

There are still a number of issues to be decided in the Grasso case. A New York state appellate court is hearing arguments over whether a judge or a jury should decide whether Mr. Grasso's compensation was reasonable under New York state law.

Throughout the case, Mr. Grasso has rebuffed friends and former Big Board colleagues who have suggested he settle the legal dispute. "We feel we have a very strong case," Mr. Grasso said yesterday.

Mr. Grasso ran the NYSE at a time of soaring profits from stock trading, record returns for the market and growing interest in investing that made the NYSE a marketing icon. He was known for his efforts to keep the NYSE on top as a global stock-trading center, often picking up the phone to rebuke brokerage-firm executives when they took their clients' orders elsewhere.

His departure triggered huge changes. The current Big Board chief executive, former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. executive John Thain, has reshaped the NYSE, embracing electronic trading, adding a stock-options business and proposing the NYSE merge with Euronext NV, a pan-European market operator.

Executive-pay has become a top concern for some investors this year -- largely because so many highly paid CEOs have lost their perches following scandals, poor shareholder returns or other problems.

Last weekend, for instance, UnitedHealth Group Inc.'s William McGuire agreed to relinquish command of the giant health insurer Dec. 1 after an internal probe concluded that the stock-option grants that brought him a huge fortune likely were manipulated. At the end of last year, Dr. McGuire's cache of unexercised options was valued at $1.78 billion, a sum far greater than any other U.S. corporate chieftain's. The Senate Finance Committee is pushing for documents related to the $1.1 billion in compensation that the departing CEO could receive when he leaves the Minnetonka, Minn., company.

Pfizer Inc.'s languishing stock price and internal strife over a succession contest were among the factors that prompted the board of the big New York pharmaceutical company to replace Henry "Hank" McKinnell as CEO last summer. Mr. McKinnell had become a target of shareholder ire due to Pfizer's disclosure that he was eligible for a lump-sum retirement payout valued at $83 million as of last Dec. 31. To express their dissatisfaction, stockholders withheld more than a fifth of their votes for the re-election of two directors on Pfizer's compensation committee at April's annual meeting.

Ex-Stock Exchange Chief Told To Return Up To $100 Million (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

A New York judge ruled yesterday that Richard A. Grasso, a former chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, would have to return as much as $100 million he received as part of a fiercely contested $139.5 million payout.

The judge, Justice Charles E. Ramos of State Supreme Court in Manhattan, said that Mr. Grasso did not disclose to his fellow directors on the board of the exchange the extent to which his soaring compensation had caused his pension and savings to balloon in size and that he violated his contract by withdrawing $87 million before his retirement. Interest and money from a separate retirement account would raise the total.

The ruling was not the judge's final word on the dispute — he did not directly address the central claim in the lawsuit brought by Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, that Mr. Grasso's compensation was unreasonable under the state's not-for-profit law. But the ruling bolstered Mr. Spitzer's main argument in support of that claim — that the exchange directors were not fully informed about Mr. Grasso's compensation.

Whether his pay was reasonable or not is to be decided at a subsequent trial — one that would likely focus on the $80 million he was paid between 1999 and 2001.

Mr. Grasso said yesterday that he would appeal, which would further delay a nonjury trial that had been scheduled to start last month.

In September 2003, Mr. Grasso was forced to resign as chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, the world's largest stock market, amid an outcry over the disclosure of his $139.5 million compensation package, all of it tied to accrued pension and retirement savings. John S. Reed, Mr. Grasso's temporary successor, commissioned an inquiry into Mr. Grasso's pay. That report was passed on to Mr. Spitzer, who sued in 2004. Since then the two sides have been embroiled in a drawn-out series of legal skirmishes.

The ruling is a major legal setback for Mr. Grasso, who for the last three years has battled to make the case that the exchange's board was well aware of all aspects of his pay and approved the package accordingly.

Justice Ramos also ruled yesterday against Mr. Grasso's claim that he was terminated and thus due an additional $95 million in severance pay. And the judge dismissed a countersuit for disparagement that Mr. Grasso had filed against his temporary successor, Mr. Reed.

In his ruling, the judge was responding to several legal motions filed by Mr. Spitzer, claiming that Mr. Grasso violated his contract by withdrawing pension savings before his retirement and failed in his duty as chairman of the board by not keeping his fellow directors informed of his escalating pension.

Mr. Grasso said in a statement: "Today's ruling is riddled with errors. One month ago, the Appellate Division told Justice Ramos not to try this case himself until the Appellate Division had decided important legal questions before them. Today, Justice Ramos somehow rejected the testimony of dozens of directors that they approved every dime they paid me, and decided that these men and women did not know what they were doing."

Mr. Grasso said that he had instructed his lawyers to appeal and that he looked "forward to the jury trial that the state constitution promised me."

For Mr. Spitzer, who leads his Republican opponent in the race for New York governor by a wide margin, the ruling is a welcome riposte to the criticisms he has faced that in place of winning in the courtroom he has bullied companies and executives into reaching settlements.

"I have maintained since the beginning that the principles at stake in this issue were clear and the facts were egregious," Mr. Spitzer said in an interview yesterday. "At every turn the government perspective has been vindicated. The defendants have done nothing more than scream louder and louder and their arguments are vacuous and wrong."

In his ruling, Justice Ramos said he wanted to reach a payment solution within the next 30 days.

In the unlikely event that Mr. Grasso follows the court judgment and writes a $100 million check, Mr. Spitzer would be expected to drop the case, as he could claim that he had received the amount he had originally asked Mr. Grasso to return. Mr. Grasso would still be a wealthy man, getting to keep tens of millions of dollars in compensation from his more than three decades at the exchange.

While having to return a significant portion of his pay package carries its own financial punishment, it is the judge's sweeping rejection of Mr. Grasso's long-held contention that the exchange board had been aware of his growing pay that represents a more resonant defeat.

Justice Ramos said it was "shocking" that the board could have been "unaware of a liability of over $100 million," and he said that Mr. Grasso violated his fiduciary duty as a director to keep his board fully apprised of how quickly his pension benefits were accumulating. "Mr. Grasso's duty is to be fully informed and to see to it that the board was fully informed," he wrote. "He failed in this duty."

Between 1999 and 2002, as Mr. Grasso's annual pay soared to a high of $31 million, his pension plan, a supplemental executive retirement plan, or SERP, grew at an even faster clip, topping out at over $80 million in 2003, when Mr. Grasso made the decision to withdraw his funds.

That decision, which according to the depositions of several directors he made because he was fearful that another board would prevent such a withdrawal, set in motion the events that would lead to the public controversy over his pay and his eventual resignation. In the subsequent years, all the participants have been deposed over the matter, with many directors on the wider board claiming that they had no idea how fast Mr. Grasso's SERP had grown.

DOJ_NMG_0083842

In his decision, Justice Ramos draws the crucial conclusion that Mr. Grasso did not inform members of his board about his escalating SERP. “Mr. Grasso’s failure to disclose the amount of his SERP thwarted the compensation committee from performing its duty,” he wrote. “Year after year, it made decisions to pay him without knowing his true compensation.”

At the crux of the judge’s ruling is his decision that Mr. Grasso must return the $87 million in pension savings that he withdrew from the exchange before he retired. And it also supports a similar argument made by directors like Henry M. Paulson Jr., the former Goldman Sachs chief and current Treasury secretary who led the campaign for Mr. Grasso’s ouster. In his decision, the judge said that the pension withdrawals that he made in 1995 and 1999, totaling $35 million, were unlawful transfers and should be recognized as loans.

Lawyers from Mr. Spitzer’s office calculate that Mr. Grasso would owe interest of about $15 million on that sum. Mr. Grasso will also be required to return money from a separate retirement account that is not yet vested.

That brings the total to close to $100 million, representing a significant portion of the $185 million he was paid as head of the stock exchange from 1995 to 2003.

Court Tells Grasso To Repay Tens Of Millions (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK — New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer scored a victory Thursday when a state judge ruled that former New York Stock Exchange CEO Richard Grasso must pay back tens of millions of dollars in compensation from the Big Board.

State Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos sided with Spitzer, ruling in a 72-page partial summary judgment that Grasso “breached his fiduciary duty” to the NYSE by not fully disclosing how much compensation he had accumulated over several years.

Darren Dopp, a spokesman for Spitzer, estimated that Grasso would have to pay back almost $100 million.

Grasso was forced out as NYSE chief three years ago after the sudden disclosure that he'd accumulated $187 million in compensation during his career there, most of it after he became CEO. Several board members expressed shock at the size of his pay package.

Spitzer filed a lawsuit against Grasso, alleging that he breached his fiduciary duty to the exchange by not keeping board members fully informed as to how much money he was owed.

Grasso's attorneys argued that the CEO wasn't fully aware of every detail of his pay package, which was approved by the board in any case. Rather, they said, any oversight in this area was simply due to “neglect.”

In a stinging rebuke, Ramos described that defense as “shocking.”

“That a fiduciary of any institution, profit or not-for-profit, could honestly admit that he was unaware of a liability of over $100 million, or even over $36 million, is a clear violation of the duty of care,” the judge wrote.

The judge also ruled against Grasso's claim that he was owed an additional $48 million from the exchange and dismissed his claim that the current NYSE chairman, John Reed, had defamed him.

For Spitzer, the judge's decision is a welcome boost, just weeks before he is widely expected to be elected governor of New York. In the past four years, Spitzer has established a national reputation for his ability to identify unethical or improper behavior and force companies to change their ways. But when he took on Grasso, some observers thought he was biting off more than he could chew.

Grasso could not be reached for comment Thursday; his lawyer, Gerson Zweifach, did not return phone calls. The case is expected to go to trial early next year.

Grasso Breached Duty To NYSE, N.Y. Judge Rules (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

A judge ruled yesterday that former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso breached his duty by failing to disclose his ballooning retirement fund in the years before his resignation, a decision that could force Grasso to hand over as much as $100 million he already received and relinquish his stake to $48 million more, prosecutors said.

In what New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos called a "shocking" abdication of responsibility for an executive, Grasso thwarted the stock exchange's board from fulfilling its obligations to oversee his pay and benefits before he left the nation's largest and most prestigious market three years ago.

Ramos's sharply worded order, which Grasso's lawyers called "riddled with errors," is the most important development so far in a dispute that touched off a national debate about the bounds of executive compensation.

DOJ_NMG_0083843

Because the stock exchange had for years operated as a nonprofit entity, the ruling is being closely followed by that sector, which has received far less scrutiny from regulators seeking to rein in corporate pay and benefits. That, however, is beginning to change during a campaign for greater oversight of nonprofit groups by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and the debate over the propriety of the pay package for a former leader of California's J. Paul Getty Trust.

While the numbers at stake in the Grasso case -- more than $188 million -- are unusual for their size, many businesses and nonprofit groups use deferred compensation plans similar to the one at issue in the Grasso case, legal experts said.

"This is the kind of decision that will make nonprofit CEOs sit up and take notice," said Michael W. Peregrine, a lawyer at Chicago's McDermott, Will & Emery. "They're going to spill their coffee in their laps when they read this case."

Grasso was forced out as NYSE chief in September 2003 during a furor over the reasonableness of his pay package. Much has changed since then. Critics said that Grasso had lost sight of the NYSE's roots and instead demanded to be paid like the executives of the large companies listed on the exchange. The stock exchange later merged with Archipelago Holdings and now operates as a for-profit business.

The Securities and Exchange Commission this year adopted rules requiring companies to disclose more clearly the compensation packages of their highest-paid officials. And, in part because of the Grasso uproar, board members ask more skeptical questions about compensation and ask to see tally sheets that include several years worth of deferred and retirement income, said Mary Ann Jorgenson, a corporate lawyer at Cleveland's Squire, Sanders & Dempsey.

But in New York, Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer's two-year-old lawsuit against Grasso rages on. Yesterday's order was based on motions filed by both sides before the much-delayed trial even began. A spokesman for Spitzer, who is running for governor on the Democratic ticket, said the judge has yet to set a trial date. It is unclear whether Ramos's ruling will spur both sides to begin settlement negotiations.

Grasso's defense lawyers vowed to appeal the judge's order. They issued a statement in Grasso's name saying that the judge had rejected testimony from "dozens of directors that they approved every dime they paid me, and decided that these men and women did not know what they were doing." Grasso's team, from the Washington firm Williams & Connolly, already has contested at least three Ramos decisions and has asked for the judge to be removed from the case because, they say, he cannot be fair and impartial. An appeals court has yet to rule on that issue.

The latest ruling by Ramos has no effect on Grasso's longtime friend and fellow defendant, Kenneth G. Langone, a co-founder of Home Depot Inc. and the former chief of the stock exchange's compensation committee. Langone, who argued a separate appeal in his case Wednesday, has attacked Spitzer's case as without merit. Pointing to statements from board members, Langone maintained that the directors knew exactly what they were doing when they richly rewarded Grasso for his years of stewardship, including a difficult stretch after the 2001 terrorist attacks in New York.

But Grasso ultimately resigned during questioning about whether his pay was appropriate under New York's stringent state laws governing practices at nonprofit groups, and whether board members had known about and understood his skyrocketing compensation arrangements. Those issues will be central to the trial, whenever it takes place.

In the meantime, Ramos's latest ruling means that Grasso could be forced to turn over about $80 million in the form of retirement pay he already received, more than $10 million more in interest and a yet-to-be-determined sum in related compensation. The judge also rejected a bid by Grasso for $48 million he left on the table when he resigned.

The judge said Grasso's failure to disclose fully to the NYSE board the amount of money in his retirement fund meant that "year after year, it made decisions to pay him without knowing his true compensation."

Referring to a defense advanced by Grasso that he did not know about the size of his compensation package until the fall of 2002, when it more than tripled to top $100 million, the judge said the argument was "shocking."

"That a fiduciary of any institution, profit or not for profit, could honestly admit that the was unaware of a liability of over $100 million . . . is a clear violation of the duty of care," Ramos wrote.

Separately, the judge yesterday dismissed defamation and disparagement claims that Grasso had filed against the exchange and its former leader John S. Reed over a report that denounced his pay as "excessive." The judge also batted away defense arguments that the attorney general no longer had authority to sue because the NYSE has transformed itself into a for-profit business.

"The Attorney General represents the investing community, all of which rely on the integrity of the market," the judge wrote. "The integrity of the market mattered before the action was initiated, and it matters now."

Grasso To Repay Millions To NYSE (FT)

By Ben White In New York

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083844

Richard Grasso, the former New York Stock Exchange chairman, must return tens of millions of dollars in compensation to the organisation, a New York state judge ruled on Thursday.

The ruling represents a big win for Eliot Spitzer, New York attorney-general, a rising star in the Democratic party who is heavily favoured in his attempt to become governor of New York.

Mr Spitzer filed a high-profile lawsuit in 2004 arguing that the $139.5m in salary, bonus and benefits paid to Mr Grasso in 2003 for his eight years as NYSE chairman violated New York law requiring that compensation for executives at not-for-profit organisations be “reasonable” and “commensurate with services performed”.

The NYSE operated as a not-for-profit organisation owned by its members before becoming a publicly traded organisation under John Thain, the new chief executive, early this year. Mr Grasso was forced out by the board in 2003 after public disclosure of the payment generated outrage among regulators and investors.

In his 72-page ruling on Thursday, Charles Ramos, New York state supreme court judge, said Mr Grasso violated his fiduciary duty by failing to disclose to compensation committee members the full amount of money accruing in his supplemental retirement account.

“Year after year, [the compensation committee] made decisions to pay him without knowing his true compensation,” Judge Ramos wrote.

He also dismissed a defamation counterclaim filed by Mr Grasso against the NYSE and John Reed.

Mr Reed served as interim NYSE chairman after Mr Grasso’s ousting.

Judge Ramos also dismissed Mr Grasso’s demand that the NYSE pay him an additional $48m plus interest he claims he is owed.

The judge did not specify how much Mr Grasso must return, saving that for a future ruling. Officials in Mr Spitzer’s office said they believed the amount would be about $100m, based on language in the ruling.

Late on Thursday, Mr Grasso said: “Today’s ruling is riddled with errors...I have instructed my attorneys to seek review from the appellate court, and look forward to the jury trial that the state constitution promised me.”

Judge Ramos described as “shocking” Mr Grasso’s assertion that he did not know how much money was building up in his supplemental retirement account. “That a fiduciary of any institution, profit or not-for-profit, could honestly admit that he was unaware of a liability of over $100m, or even over $36m, is a clear violation of the duty of care,” the judge wrote.

Mr Grasso, who joined the NYSE as a clerk in 1968, has strongly defended his pay, saying it was fully disclosed to the board and justified given his contributions to the NYSE.

SKILLING'S LAST STAND (WP)

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

By Carrie Johnson {vbar} Washington Post Staff Writer

When former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling stands to face a judge and a possible decades-long prison sentence Monday, he will be -- as usual -- alone.

The death of company founder Kenneth L. Lay weeks after a jury convicted both men of fraud and conspiracy charges for misleading investors about Enron's financial health means that Skilling, 52, is the last person standing from the energy company's top ranks. It is a familiar position for a man painted by the government as both unusually self-reliant and occasionally self-destructive.

The single-mindedness that made Skilling a successful management consultant and a masterful corporate strategist powers his vow to go forward with an appeal. Skilling, who told jurors that he was "absolutely innocent," is attacking the four-year investigation against him as a "witch hunt" and claiming that prosecutors used unfair tactics and relied on shaky jury instructions to bring down a man who once dashed from presidential inaugurations to conference calls with Wall Street analysts.

"It's not in my nature not to fight something like this," Skilling testified at his trial. "I will fight those charges until the day I die."

But it is very much an open question whether U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III will let Skilling remain free pending an appeal, as defense lawyers recently requested, or whether he will order him into Bureau of Prisons custody immediately on Monday afternoon.

The judge closed the book on the criminal case against Lay on Tuesday by tossing out his conviction on 10 charges because he died before he could appeal. Thus, people who lost money in Enron's demise will watch what happens to Skilling with great interest.

Among the representatives for Enron's victims who have asked to speak at Skilling's sentencing is a lawyer for employees who lost what they say is more than $1.3 billion through the company's stock-heavy savings plan. The former employees "have all been condemned to many more years of labor to try and rebuild the hard-earned financial security that was stolen from them," the lawyers wrote in court papers last week. "Their lives have been shattered in ways that most Americans are fortunate to have never experienced."

DOJ_NMG_0083845

Skilling, a graduate of Harvard Business School, transformed the Houston energy company from a stodgy pipeline business to a cutting-edge technology trader in the 1990s. But success -- or, prosecutors would say, keeping up the appearance of success -- wore on him. After ascending to the chief executive job in early 2001, Skilling was increasingly isolated from the opportunistic, hard-charging executives he called friends during his rise to power.

His best friend, former Enron dealmaker J. Clifford Baxter, committed suicide in early 2002 as the criminal investigation widened. His closest associates -- including master salesman Kenneth D. Rice, youthful protege David W. Delainey, and finance chief Andrew S. Fastow -- all turned on him, pleading guilty and providing damning testimony that helped convince a jury to convict Skilling in May.

"I can't say that I have a lot of very close, personal relationships with people," Skilling told the jury.

During eight sometimes captivating days as his own chief witness, Skilling described for the jury his psychological odyssey, which left him "going to pieces," unable to get out of bed and plagued with alcohol problems as Enron hurtled toward bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

At one point, Skilling testified, he was so overcome with emotion and drink that his fiancee could not roust him out of a Fort Lauderdale, Fla., hotel room to meet friends and attend a boat show. The woman, former Enron corporate secretary Rebecca Carter, later became his wife. Although she sometimes appeared in court during the 16-week trial, Carter did not show up when the judge, in rapid-fire speech, read aloud 19 guilty counts against Skilling on May 25.

At inopportune times, Skilling's demons have returned to the surface.

Two months after his indictment, New York City police took him to the hospital after passersby reported a disturbed person on the street. Prosecutors later wrote in court papers that Skilling was intoxicated and had confronted bar patrons, searching for a recording device in a woman's blouse and accusing others of tailing him on behalf of the FBI. After the incident, Skilling sought treatment for his drinking.

Last month, several weeks after his conviction, Dallas police took him into custody on a misdemeanor public intoxication charge after finding him on the street in the early morning in a state they described as incapacitated, according to a police report. Skilling resolved the charge by paying a $385 fine.

At the time, his defense lawyer, Daniel M. Petrocelli, implored the media to consider Skilling's delicate predicament.

"Jeff is doing his best to cope with a nearly impossible situation," Petrocelli wrote in an e-mail to reporters.

Herbert J. Hoelter, a prison consultant who has advised domestic entrepreneur Martha Stewart and Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John J. Rigas, said the pressures on former executives facing prison are weighty, in both practical and psychological terms.

Executives who once exerted control over thousands of employees now look at the prospect of being told when to eat, when to report to work, when to go to sleep and how much money they can spend at the prison commissary. They must make their peace with their families and face such questions as "will I see my son graduate from high school or college?" Hoelter said.

In that context, Hoelter said, Skilling's recent brush with the law makes more sense. "It's certainly in my book very understandable. If I was facing this, who knows what relief you seek?"

Senate Committees Probe SEC's Pequot Investigation (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate Finance Committee, among other entities, is continuing to probe the Securities and Exchange Commission's handling of an insider-trading investigation involving hedge fund Pequot Capital Management Inc. and Wall Street executive John Mack. The matter stems from an allegation that the agency granted him favored treatment because of his large donations to Republican campaigns.

Sen. Chuck Grassley's staff has sought testimony and emails related to several SEC enforcement attorneys, including the emails of one who recently left for a law firm that represented Mr. Mack. It also has sent stinging letters to the SEC.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is involved, with Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) holding two hearings where he has raised concerns about the SEC and Justice Department's supervision of hedge funds, short-selling activities, and insider-trading.

Missing so far is the Senate Banking Committee, which has direct oversight of the SEC. Senate Finance has jurisdiction over the tax code; Judiciary writes criminal and civil laws.

Mr. Mack is now chief executive of Morgan Stanley.

The issue arose after a former SEC attorney brought his allegations to Capital Hill this spring and filed more than 80 documents with the Banking Committee. The former SEC lawyer, Gary Aguirre, was fired last year, he says, for pursuing the case. In a lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Washington, DC, Mr. Aguirre said his supervisors refused his request to interview Mr. Mack because of his "political clout." In court filings responding to the suit, the SEC conceded the supervisor said Mr. Mack's lawyers had "juice" but denied any reference to Mr. Mack's political clout.

DOJ_NMG_0083846

The SEC was investigating Pequot's trading in more than 17 stocks, including two that took place in 2001. The agency examined trades just ahead of General Electric Co.'s acquisition of Heller Financial and trades in Microsoft Corp.'s stocks just before an earnings announcement. The U.S. Attorney in Manhattan had also looked over at least those two trades but has not brought any action. Earlier this month the SEC notified Pequot and Mr. Mack that it would not be filing charges against them. The statute of limitations on those trades would run out this year.

The Banking Committee said this spring that it is looking into the SEC's handling of the case and Mr. Aguirre's firing alongside the Finance Committee. Yet, so far it appears that Sen. Grassley's committee is directing most of the action.

Favata Settles SEC Civil Charges (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The former head of a California mortgage firm settled civil securities charges that he used investor money to pay off more than $10 million in gambling debts, host lavish house parties and support community music festivals.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said Salvatore Favata, president of National Consumer Mortgage LLC in Orange County, raised $30 million from more than 200 investors from late 2001 through March 2006 by promising that they would receive annual interest payments of 30% to 60% of their original investments. Investors were told their money would be used to finance loans to homeowners who couldn't qualify for traditional mortgages, the SEC said.

Instead, Mr. Favata used the money to make payments to existing investors, pay the operating expenses of the firm's conventional-mortgage business and to pay off more than $10 million of his gambling debts, the SEC said. National Consumer Mortgage's assets were sold at an auction in June after a trustee decided to terminate the company's operations.

Mr. Favata, a resident of Yorba Linda, Calif., has deep ties in California. He attended Edgewood High School in West Covina and was picked by baseball's Los Angeles Dodgers in a 1977 draft, according to information supplied by Major League Baseball. He played baseball at California State University, Fullerton, and was drafted by the Milwaukee Brewers in 1980. He never played for the team, a Brewers spokesman said.

He hosted a music festival called "Favata Fest" at his home in 2005, according to the SEC. He had planned another live concert, also to be called "Favata Fest," for July at Titan Stadium at his alma mater and gave the university $213,200 of company money for the event, according to a complaint filed in bankruptcy court. The university said the concert didn't ultimately take place.

The case follows a period of double-digit gains in real-estate prices that was particularly notable in states such as California. Over the past five years, home prices in California have more than doubled, with prices jumping by more than 20% in 2004 and 2005 alone, according to data from the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. The big gains fueled investor appetite for real-estate investments, leaving some people vulnerable to pitches that turned out to be scams.

Mr. Favata has agreed to be banned from associating with a brokerage firm, the SEC said.

In a separate criminal case, he has agreed to plead guilty to one count of mail fraud, to pay restitution in excess of $20 million and to give up his home under a plea agreement with the U.S. attorney's office for the Central District of California, the SEC said.

An attorney for Mr. Favata couldn't be reached for comment.

Write to Siobhan Hughes at siobhan.hughes@dowjones.com1

Ex-Athlete To Plead Guilty In Ponzi Case (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

A Cal State Fullerton baseball star who hired Steve Garvey to promote his loan business cost investors more than $20 million, SEC says.

A former Cal State Fullerton baseball star who hired Steve Garvey to promote his mortgage company has agreed to plead guilty to an investment scam that raised more than $30 million, authorities said Tuesday.

From 2000 until this year, Salvatore "Sam" Favata, 46, promised investors returns of 30% to 60% a year, the Securities and Exchange Commission said. He said their money would be loaned at high rates to borrowers who needed short-term funding for real estate developments, construction projects and other ventures, according to his plea agreement with federal prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0083847

In reality, Favata was paying earlier investors with funds from new investors, employing a method known as a Ponzi scheme, the SEC said in a lawsuit filed along with the criminal case. The SEC and the U.S. attorney's office in Santa Ana estimated the total losses to investors at more than $20 million.

The SEC lawsuit and Favata's plea agreement, filed Friday and announced Tuesday, said he persuaded clients of his Orange-based National Consumer Mortgage firm — which had a legitimate home loan business — to use cash from refinancing their homes to buy investment notes issued by another arm of the company.

There was no indication that Garvey, hired as a pitchman for the legitimate loan business, knew anything was amiss, authorities said. The former Dodgers star couldn't be reached for comment.

A second baseman on Cal State Fullerton's NCAA championship team in 1979, Favata was drafted by the Milwaukee Brewers in 1980 but didn't go far as a professional player.

At National Consumer Mortgage, where he was president, Favata and his sales staff solicited investors face to face, at seminars and at a church in Colorado, and also advertised on the radio, federal officials said.

Little of the money was invested, according to the SEC, which said Favata used much of the funds to pay his living expenses and debts, including more than $10 million in gambling losses, and the expenses of his mortgage company.

He also threw lavish parties and put on oldies music festivals he called "Favata Fests," often in his spacious Yorba Linda backyard, at which Garvey, who appeared in a National League record 1,207 straight games, glad-handed Favata clients and had his picture taken with them, federal authorities said.

Favata's attorney, Nathan J. Hochman of Beverly Hills, described his client as a "gambling addict" who dug himself an ever deeper hole trying to cover his losses and "is extremely sorry for what he has done."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Brent Tabacchi said Favata agreed to plead guilty to a fraud charge carrying a maximum sentence of five years. Favata, who has remained free while cooperating with investigators, is scheduled to be arraigned by a federal magistrate judge in Santa Ana on Monday, Tabacchi said. Sentencing is expected early next year.

To settle the SEC lawsuit, Favata agreed to attempt to make full restitution to his victims, including forfeiting his house to help repay them, and to be banned from associating with investment brokers and dealers for the rest of his life.

Tabacchi and SEC officials said Favata told his more than 200 investors that their money was safe because he made sure his loans were secured by property worth much more than the loan amount. That way, he said, even if the projects went into default the investors would still be protected against losses.

That promise, along with his reputation as an athlete and his link to Garvey, apparently lulled the investors until this year, when tips to the SEC triggered an investigation, said John Reed Stark, chief of the SEC Office of Internet Enforcement.

"As is the case in many Ponzi schemes, Mr. Favata used his association with prominent figures — athletes and clergy are very common — to create an aura of legitimacy," Stark said.

*

scott.reckard@latimes.com

SEC Suits Could Influence Delphi Ownership Talks (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell In Washington, Jeffrey Mccracken In Detroit And Ianthe Jeanne Dugan In New York

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Federal securities regulators are preparing civil securities-fraud suits against former executives of auto-parts giant Delphi Corp., according to a person familiar with the matter, raising the stakes in the high-profile battle over Delphi's future.

Separate investigations by shareholders, creditors, federal prosecutors and securities regulators into Delphi's accounting and dealings with its former parent, General Motors Corp., are coming to a head as several investors jockey for a slice of a restructured Delphi. The outcome of the investigations could affect how Delphi, which had world-wide sales of $27 billion last year, reshapes itself a year after it filed for bankruptcy-law protection.

Among the issues involved is whether GM will be allowed to get a valuable stake in a reorganized Delphi as compensation for taking back the benefits obligations of thousands of Delphi's U.S. workers.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to file securities-fraud suits this month against about a dozen former executives of Delphi and others, alleging they used improper accounting in at least three different transactions, which led the auto-parts supplier to restate earnings from 2001 to 2003, according to a person familiar with the matter. It is unclear which executives will be named in the suits.

Delphi is also expected to be named in the civil complaint, although it isn't clear if the SEC will seek a penalty against the corporation, according to this person. The SEC's five commissioners are expected to vote on the case next week.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin said, "We continue to cooperate with the SEC investigation of Delphi." She added that Delphi wrapped up its own internal investigation of the accounting irregularities in 2005. Delphi in early 2005 acknowledged that the SEC had begun an investigation of accounting irregularities for how the company accounted for warranty claims, its pension plan and other matters.

DOJ_NMG_0083848

At least six high-level Delphi executives, including its former chairman and chief executive, have left or been forced out since the accounting problems came to light. Delphi's former chairman and chief executive officer, J.T. Battenberg, retired just before the SEC probe became public. It isn't clear whether the SEC believes he had any role in the alleged accounting fraud. Attorney Bill Jeffress, who represents Mr. Battenberg, declined to comment and said Mr. Battenberg also wasn't willing to comment.

Other executives, including former Chief Financial Officer Alan Dawes, were ousted following an independent internal investigation by Delphi's board that found accounting problems. Some former executives are expected to fight the allegations, while some may settle the matter, this person said.

News of the expected SEC charges was reported yesterday by the Detroit News.

As previously reported, the SEC also is investigating GM in connection with certain transactions with Delphi. GM previously disclosed it had received a subpoena from a federal grand jury investigating its handling of payments or "credits" from suppliers and said it had found "material weaknesses" or "significant deficiencies" in certain areas of its accounting controls. The company also said it had received a subpoena from the SEC in connection with a previously disclosed probe of GM's transactions in precious-metal raw materials. GM has said it is cooperating with the inquiry.

The accounting questions could have a direct bearing on the delicate negotiations that Delphi is currently conducting with GM, unions, shareholders and creditors over control of the company after bankruptcy. Among the key players is Appaloosa Management, a hedge fund that owns more than 9% of Delphi's stock and a significant share of its bonds. The fund, led by David Tepper, has proposed pumping billions of dollars into the company so it can pay off debts while keeping its shares intact. Under its plan, which also includes hedge fund Harbinger Capital Partners, Appaloosa could ultimately own more than a third of Delphi's shares.

Also involved in the talks is Cerberus Capital Management, another private-equity firm with connections to GM. Cerberus, which recently agreed to buy 51% of GM's finance unit, GMAC, is angling for a significant chunk of Delphi's stock.

A deal to create a new ownership structure for Delphi could pave the way for the parts maker to exit from bankruptcy in mid-2007. A key issue in these talks is whether GM can assert a right to an ownership stake in Delphi in return for shouldering obligations for retirement benefits for Delphi workers. But creditors and shareholders are determined to use claims of fraud in Delphi's spinoff -- claims GM denies -- to prevent that.

The official committee representing Delphi shareholders filed a report with the bankruptcy court in Manhattan last month claiming that GM designed the spinoff as a "fraudulent" way to take losing businesses off its own books while making it impossible for Delphi to profit. The committee calculates that GM owes Delphi $26 billion -- topping the $22 billion in debts that Delphi listed in its bankruptcy-law filing. The equity committee claimed, for example, that Delphi is owed $1.8 billion that it paid into a fund when it was part of GM that didn't transfer back to it after the spinoff.

GM denies the claims. "At the time of the spinoff, we feel we set up Delphi to be a successful supplier," said GM spokeswoman Gina Proia. "The industry as a whole is going through a difficult period."

The equity-committee report echoes a similar document filed by the official creditors' committee, though the creditors' report is under seal. Both reports stem from an investigation that Delphi, of Troy, Mich., commissioned to examine the circumstances surrounding its spinoff. The results of the internal investigation were furnished confidentially to creditors and shareholders, who incorporated elements into their own documents.

The creditors' report raises a host of accounting issues, according to a lawyer familiar with the report. It alleges, for example, that if GM appeared bound to miss a quarterly number, it would submit false warranty claims to Delphi. Delphi would take that obligation on as its own, padding GM's books, the person said.

Ms. Proia of GM said the claims are "unfounded and without merit."

Closing In On Hedge Funds (NYT)

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

At first glance, the market-beating returns of hedge funds are impressive. But on closer inspection, things look less showy. Performance measures are based on voluntary reporting by hedge funds and thus tend to reflect outperformers rather than laggards and losers. And even some of the winners' outsized returns are overstated because they are not adequately adjusted to reflect the huge risks that go hand in hand with big gains.

In addition to those concerns, Jenny Anderson of The Times has now articulated another: the strong possibility that hedge funds' returns are juiced by insider trading.

DOJ_NMG_0083849

Over the past several years, largely unregulated hedge funds have become a towering presence in the stock market, now accounting for roughly half of all trading on the New York and London exchanges. More recently, they have become major players in the debt market as lenders to companies, buyers of banks loans and investors in tricky derivative securities tied to companies' credit quality.

The loan market is far larger than the stock market, and as such, of vast importance to the performance of the overall economy — a fact that on its own should entice regulators to inquire more about hedge funds' potentially destabilizing positions and activities. A more immediate problem is that loan-market participants routinely deal in confidential information, including all of the details a company must divulge to qualify for a loan and frequent — nonpublic — financial updates while a loan is outstanding. With virtually no government oversight and generally fewer institutional controls than banks, hedge funds that are active in both equity and debt markets face huge temptations to trade on insider information.

Ms. Anderson reported that the Securities and Exchange Commission is looking into whether certain hedge funds improperly traded the shares of Movie Gallery, a movie rental chain, after taking part in a confidential conference call for the company's lenders. Such an investigation may be just the tip of an iceberg. Even if it doesn't uncover any wrongdoing, it has opened a window on how information travels on Wall Street.

On Monday, Senator Charles Grassley, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, sent a letter to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. and several other administration officials and members of Congress, soliciting views on how Congress could improve hedge fund transparency. The replies will, at the least, create a record of officials' ability and willingness to respond to the obvious problems posed by hedge funds — before those problems become crises.

It is time for Congress and federal regulators to take an unflinching look at how deals really get done in today's markets, and to come up with enforceable rules and laws to ensure market integrity and the overall soundness of the financial system.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Boehner, Former House Clerk Testify In Foley Investigation (CHIT/AP)

By Andrew Taylor

Chicago Tribune, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ethics investigators on Thursday heard from the GOP aide once in charge of the House page program about how he handled cases of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate behavior toward the teenage errand-runners.

The No. 2 House leader, Majority Leader John Boehner, also testified, repeating his public statements that he discussed with Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., the "overly friendly" e-mails from Foley to a former male page.

"I made myself clear on the record for the last three weeks, and I told the ethics committee today the same thing that I've told many of you," Boehner, R-Ohio, told reporters.

His appearance came after the former House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, explained how he handled incidents involving Foley and whether he alerted top House GOP staff aides about them.

Trandahl's lawyer said Trandahl "has cooperated fully" with the investigations by the FBI and the House ethics committee. "He answered every question asked of him," lawyer Cono Namorato said in a statement.

Namorato said Trandahl would not comment while the investigation continues. He did not return messages left for comment beyond his prepared statement.

Boehner would not say what he specifically told the committee in private. But Boehner publicly has quoted Hastert as telling him the complaint about Foley "had been taken care of." Hastert has said he does not recall the conversation with Boehner.

Trandahl had direct responsibility for the page program and was on the five-member oversight board. He was alerted to an earlier instance in 2001 or 2002 involving Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former page sponsored by Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., and was apprised of others.

At least two other incidents are known to be under investigation: last fall's episode involving the Louisiana page and an earlier one in which Foley reportedly tried to enter the page dorm while he was drunk.

No one, however, has claimed knowledge of the sexually graphic e-mails sent in 2003 that prompted Foley to resign from Congress on Sept. 29 when confronted with copies of them by ABC News.

Of special concern to the ethics panel is who was aware of the Foley problem and whether enough was done to end his inappropriate contacts with pages.

The known incidents were handled discreetly by Trandahl, other GOP staff aides and a few lawmakers. They were not brought to the attention of the page oversight board or the ethics committee.

DOJ_NMG_0083850

Foley's former top aide, Kirk Fordham, testified before the ethics panel last week and has said he had meetings and "one more than one conversation" with senior GOP leadership aides about Foley's inappropriate behavior. That drew a quick denial from Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer. He has not commented since and has yet to appear before investigators.

Trandahl, as one of the chamber's chief administrators, was in frequent contact with Hastert's office, including the speaker's counsel Ted Van Der Meid and Palmer about the page program and other House business. Trandahl was appointed to his post by Hastert.

Hastert's office has produced a detailed account of the 2005 incident, involving "over friendly" e-mails to a former page sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La. But the speaker's office has not commented on the page dorm incident or the earlier episode involving the e-mails to an Arizona teenager.

Palmer has denied Fordham's claim that he warned Palmer and other top GOP aides several years ago of Foley's inappropriate contact with pages and asked them to intervene.

Foley, 52, has said through his lawyer that he is alcoholic, gay and had been molested as a boy by a clergyman. On Thursday, a priest acknowledged he was naked in saunas with Foley decades ago when Foley was a boy in Florida. The priest denied that the two had sex.

The Rev. Anthony Mercieca, 69, speaking from his home on the Maltese island of Gozo, said a report in a Florida newspaper about their encounters was "exaggerated."

A story in the Sarasota Herald-Tribune described several encounters in the 1960s that the priest said Foley might perceive as sexually inappropriate.

Former Clerk Tells Panel He Alerted Speaker's Office To Foley Concerns (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Jeff Trandahl, the former House clerk who supervised the Congressional page program, testified Thursday before the House ethics committee that he had periodically advised senior Republican leadership aides of complaints about Representative Mark Foley's behavior on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Trandahl, whose account is seen by investigators as crucial to determining whether Speaker J. Dennis Hastert knew about Mr. Foley's conduct, took questions for four hours in a closed session. He declined to comment as he left the Capitol, but people familiar with his testimony said Mr. Trandahl recounted how he informed the speaker's office about concerns that Mr. Foley was spending too much time with young pages.

Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, resigned last month after news reports about his exchange of sexually suggestive e-mail and instant messages with pages. "Jeff Trandahl has cooperated fully with the investigation being conducted by the F.B.I. and the investigative group of the Committee on Standards," his lawyer, Cono Namorato, said in a statement. "He answered every question asked of him, and stands ready to render additional assistance if needed."

John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the House majority leader, also testified Thursday before the ethics committee. After more than an hour of questioning, Mr. Boehner emerged to say that he stood by his account that he had told Mr. Hastert about overly friendly e-mail messages Mr. Foley had sent a former male page.

"I've made clear on the record what I knew and when I knew it," Mr. Boehner told reporters. "I told the ethics committee the same thing I've said on the record for many of you. It was very thorough, and I was very forthcoming."

Mr. Hastert, Republican of Illinois, has said he does not recall having such a conversation with Mr. Boehner. He has not denied that it could have taken place, but said it could simply have slipped his mind as Republicans were dealing with a number of controversies earlier this year.

The House ethics committee is trying to determine how Mr. Hastert's office handled reports of Mr. Foley's inappropriate e-mail exchanges with pages. Investigators are also trying to deduce whether anyone inside the speaker's office had ignored previous concerns about Mr. Foley.

Mr. Trandahl, who left his job as House clerk last year to take a nongovernment position, has told friends that he occasionally raised alarms about Mr. Foley's advances toward high school students who had come to Washington to work on Capitol Hill. He has told former colleagues that neither he, nor anyone else, knew about the explicit e-mail exchanges between Mr. Foley and former pages.

People with knowledge of Mr. Trandahl's testimony said Mr. Trandahl corroborated previous testimony that top aides to the speaker, including his chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, had been advised of complaints about Mr. Foley for at least three years.

Mr. Hastert's office has denied that assertion, saying aides learned of concerns about Mr. Foley only a year ago when a former page from Louisiana turned over e-mail exchanges he had had with Mr. Foley.

DOJ_NMG_0083851

Mr. Trandahl, who was elected by the House but served at the pleasure of the speaker's office, has emerged as a central figure in the case. The House investigators are trying to establish whether a deteriorating relationship between Mr. Van Der Meid and others in the Capitol, particularly Mr. Trandahl, played a role in how complaints about Mr. Foley were handled.

Boehner And Ex-Clerk Of House Testify (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Two key congressional figures testified before a House ethics panel yesterday about their roles in the Mark Foley scandal, reportedly sticking to accounts indicating that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) or his top aides had been alerted to concerns about the disgraced Florida Republican's behavior toward teenage pages before it became public.

The committee spent more than four hours questioning Jeff Trandahl, a central figure who has remained publicly silent about the affair. As House clerk from 1999 through last year, Trandahl oversaw the page program and dealt with several complaints about the actions of Foley, who abruptly resigned his House seat Sept. 29 as ABC News was reporting on sexually graphic electronic messages he had exchanged with former pages.

Trandahl joined Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), the chairman of the House Page Board, in quietly confronting Foley last fall about e-mails that the lawmaker had sent to a Louisiana boy, which the youth and his parents found troubling. Those e-mails were not nearly as explicit as the messages that emerged later from other sources.

Hastert's office has said that two high-ranking aides knew about the meeting with Foley but did not tell the speaker or his chief of staff, Scott Palmer. The board's other members, including a Democratic congressman, were also not told.

Trandahl did not speak to reporters as he left the ethics committee's office in the Capitol basement yesterday, but his attorney, Cono Namorato, said in a statement that Trandahl "has cooperated fully with the investigation being conducted by the FBI" and the ethics committee and "stands ready to render additional assistance if needed."

A source who has spoken with Trandahl since the scandal broke said the former House clerk indicated that he had alerted Hastert's staff in recent years to concerns that Foley was showing inappropriate attention to teenage pages. The source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said he had no reason to think Trandahl would give a different version to the FBI or the four-member subcommittee of the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. Trandahl's main contact on Hastert's staff appeared to have been counsel Ted Van Der Meid, the source said.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean, asked to respond to the source's comments, said the ethics panel "is investigating this matter and we are confident in its ability to determine the real facts."

"The speaker has said that any person who is found guilty of improper conduct involving sexual contact or communication with a page should immediately resign, be fired, or be subjected to a vote of expulsion," Bonjean said.

Also yesterday, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) became the highest-ranking lawmaker to testify to the ethics panel on the Foley matter. Speaking to reporters after about an hour of questioning, he said: "I told the committee the same thing that I have told many of you."

Boehner originally told The Washington Post that he had spoken with Hastert earlier this year about Foley's e-mails to the Louisiana youth. He later said that he was not sure he had told Hastert, and still later said that he was fairly certain he had told the speaker.

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) has said that he had also spoken with Hastert about Foley's e-mails to the former page from Louisiana, but he has not met with the ethics committee. Hastert has said he does not recall such conversations, but does not dispute that they may have occurred.

The FBI, which interviewed Trandahl last week, is looking into whether Foley committed a crime. The ethics committee is examining whether House members or staffers handled the matter properly.

Trandahl's testimony is considered crucial in either bolstering or challenging that of Kirk Fordham, a former Foley chief of staff who testified before the ethics subcommittee last week. Fordham has said that Trandahl repeatedly urged him to rein in Foley, who was showing inappropriate attention to male pages on Capitol Hill. Fordham has said that he eventually appealed for help from Palmer, a powerful Hastert aide respected and feared by many lawmakers.

Fordham said Palmer later reported that he had met with Foley about the problem and had alerted Hastert. Palmer has issued a seven-word statement: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Fordham's attorney, Timothy J. Heaphy, said yesterday that he expected Trandahl to have corroborated his client's statement: that the then-clerk had repeatedly alerted Fordham about Foley's overly friendly behavior toward pages, long before top House leaders say the matter came to their attention. "I always believed he would say that," Heaphy said in an interview.

Craig Shniderman, a Trandahl friend who directs the Washington charity Food & Friends, said that, of all his responsibilities as House clerk, Trandahl viewed the care of the pages as his biggest.

DOJ_NMG_0083852

Republican insiders say that they are perplexed and troubled by conflicting accounts stemming from the scandal, especially the differences between Fordham and Palmer. Both men are described as truthful, conscientious staffers who are too smart and honest to try to mislead the FBI or the ethics committee.

Some GOP staffers wonder whether their differences result from misunderstandings or faulty memories. One veteran congressional aide said Palmer handles a huge load of issues for Hastert, including matters of policy, legislation, budgets, office allocations and staffing levels. House members and employees constantly approach him with problems and requests, the aide said, and it is possible that Palmer feels he had "dealt with" complaints about Foley in a way that fell short of other people's expectations and understanding.

Priest Denies Having Sex With Foley (CHIT/AP)

By Frances D'emilio

Chicago Tribune, October 20, 2006

ROME -- A priest acknowledged Thursday that he was naked in saunas and went skinny-dipping with Mark Foley decades ago when the former congressman was a boy in Florida, but denied that the two had sex.

The Rev. Anthony Mercieca, 69, speaking by telephone from his home on the Maltese island of Gozo, made his comments after the Sarasota Herald-Tribune published an interview in which he described several encounters that he said Foley might perceive as sexually inappropriate. Mercieca said the Florida newspaper report was "exaggerated."

"We were friends and trusted each other as brothers and loved each other as brothers," Mercieca told The Associated Press in Rome. Asked if their association was sexual, the priest replied: "It wasn't."

Among the activities described by Mercieca in the newspaper were massaging the boy in the nude, skinny-dipping together at a secluded lake in Lake Worth, Fla., and being nude in the same room on overnight trips while he was a priest and Foley was a parishioner.

Sarasota Herald-Tribune Executive Editor Mike Connelly said Thursday the story is accurate, including the reference to a night in which Mercieca said he was in a drug-induced stupor due to a nervous breakdown and couldn't clearly remember what happened.

"The reporter talked to the priest four times yesterday and carefully reviewed his account, especially of the one night," Connelly said. "The story accurately reports what the priest said."

Foley, a 52-year-old Florida Republican, resigned from Congress last month after his sexually explicit e-mails to young male pages surfaced.

His lawyer said shortly afterward that Foley was an alcoholic, gay and had been molested as a boy by a "clergyman." Foley's civil lawyer, Gerald Richman, said the alleged abuser was a Catholic priest whose name he shared with Florida state prosecutors.

Mike Edmondson, a spokesman for the state attorney's office in West Palm Beach, Fla., said an e-mail from Foley's attorney was received Wednesday identifying the alleged abuser. He said the e-mail was being forwarded to the Archdiocese of Miami.

The Archdiocese of Miami said in a statement Thursday evening that it had received the name from the state attorney's office but was waiting for permission from prosecutors to release it publicly.

"It is the intention of the Archdiocese of Miami to fully cooperate with the Palm Beach State Attorney's office and not to interfere with any investigation that they are conducting," the statement said. A telephone call to the Archdiocese was not immediately returned.

Edmondson said earlier in the day that law enforcement involvement at this point had ended.

Dioceses across the United States have been grappling with sex abuse scandals involving clergy and young faithful.

Mercieca had worked at Sacred Heart Catholic Church in Lake Worth in 1967, according to church records. Foley would have been 13 at the time.

Mercieca told the AP that he and Foley would go into saunas naked when he was a priest in Florida and Foley was a parishioner, but he said "everybody does that." The priest also said he didn't think it was unusual to go on overnight trips with a young boy.

The newspaper reporter "wrote many things that I didn't say," Mercieca told the AP, his voice trembling and sounding feeble at times. "He quotes me as saying I had one night stands with him. That's not true."

Richard Sipe, a former priest who studies sexuality and the priesthood and has counseled abusive clergy and victims, said abusive priests typically deny that their activities were sexual, because they often convince themselves that only intercourse violates their vow of celibacy.

"It's a lack of development," said Sipe. "This is not what an adult reasons about sex."

DOJ_NMG_0083853

A study of five decades of clergy sex abuse claims, conducted by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice for the U.S. bishops, found that most victims have been adolescent boys.

Matthew Doig, an investigative reporter with Sarasota Herald-Tribune who talked to Mercieca on Wednesday, said he did not record their phone conversations but he was "100 percent confident" his story was correct.

According to Doig, Mercieca said he had been following the Foley story on CNN and then said, "Now it's his word against mine."

The priest was not quoted in the story as saying they had any "one night stands." However, the newspaper reported Mercieca said there was one night when he was in a drug-induced stupor as he was suffering from a nervous breakdown and "there was an incident he says he can't clearly remember that might have gone too far."

Doig said Mercieca had called back three times after the initial conversation and had confirmed that paragraph but would not directly describe the behavior on that night, claiming it was obscured by many years and his use of tranquilizers and alcohol at the time.

Mercieca told the AP that at the time he knew the young Foley "I had a nervous breakdown and was taking some pills and alcohol and maybe I did something that he didn't like."

The priest said he based that statement on what he had seen on TV news accounts about the Foley case. Pressed for details about what Foley might not have liked, Mercieca said he couldn't remember because "it was a long time ago."

Foley "seems to have interpreted certain things as inappropriate. ... I don't know what I did to him," the priest said. "I wonder why 40 years later he brought this up?"

He said the two became friends when he was assigned to Foley's parish, and he had Christmas dinner at Foley's childhood home, with the boy's parents, one year.

Mercieca described Foley as "a very happy person and he knew how to do things."

"He was 'allegro,'" Mercieca said, switching from English to use a word in Italian that means cheerful or merry.

"We would go to the movies," the priest said, adding another boy would sometimes come along, although he couldn't remember his name.

Referring to the page e-mail scandal, the priest said: "I don't think there was a connection with our friendship and this thing now."

Mercieca brushed off other questions, saying he didn't remember much, and he often paused for a long time before replying.

He said the last time he saw Foley was about 18 years ago when the two had dinner in a restaurant in Lake Worth.

Foley's criminal defense lawyer David Roth declined to comment Thursday, but he said earlier this month: "Mark does not blame the trauma he sustained as a young adolescent for his totally inappropriate" e-mails and instant messages.

Mercieca lives in a house with his brother, George, who is also a priest. He regularly hears confession and celebrates Mass in Gozo's cathedral, one of two main churches on the Mediterranean island.

Gozo, 60 miles south of Sicily, has a population of about 32,000 and is one of Malta's three inhabited islands -- filled with vacation homes and holiday resorts.

Priest Says He Had Close Contact With Foley (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

MIAMI, Oct. 19 — A priest living in Malta has admitted having intimate contact with Mark Foley when he worked at the former congressman's childhood church in the 1960's. But the state attorney's office in Palm Beach County and the Archdiocese of Miami would not say on Thursday whether he was the priest Mr. Foley has said molested him.

The Rev. Anthony Mercieca, 69, told The Herald-Tribune in Sarasota, Fla., that he had formed a friendship with the young Mr. Foley after arriving at Sacred Heart Catholic Church in Lake Worth in 1966. Mr. Foley was 12 or 13, and Father Mercieca, who had moved from Brazil, was 29 or 30.

Father Mercieca told of skinny-dipping and lounging naked in saunas with Mr. Foley and massaging him while the boy was unclothed. He said that once, while on tranquilizers, he might have done something that Mr. Foley found inappropriate but that he could not recall the details.

"I wish him well," Father Mercieca told The Herald-Tribune from his home in Gozo, a Maltese island about 60 miles south of Sicily. "Let bygones be bygones."

In an interview Thursday with WPTV, an NBC affiliate in West Palm Beach, Father Mercieca said he had not done anything "dirty" but that there had been intimate contact.

DOJ_NMG_0083854

"Once maybe I touched him," he told the television station. "It's not something you call, I mean, rape or penetration or anything like that, you know. We were just fondling."

In an interview with The Associated Press, Father Mercieca said the Herald-Tribune report was "exaggerated," but the newspaper stood by its story.

The Diocese of Gozo said in a statement that it had only just learned of "the allegations" and had asked the Archdiocese of Miami for more information. Bishop Mario Grech of Gozo would start investigating on Friday, the statement said.

"Bishop Grech, conscious of the gravity of pedophilia, reiterates that he will cooperate with those responsible for investigating such cases so that justice is done to the victims, the perpetrators are reformed and the common good is safeguarded," it said.

After leaving Sacred Heart in 1967, Father Mercieca worked at seven other parishes in South Florida, most recently at Blessed Trinity Catholic Church in Miami Springs from 1993 to 2003. Officials at those churches either did not return calls or referred them to the Archdiocese of Miami, which did not return them.

The archdiocese issued a statement saying that Palm Beach County prosecutors had given it the name of the man Mr. Foley has accused, but that it would not release it without the prosecutors' permission.

Mr. Foley, 52, resigned on Sept. 29 after the release of sexually graphic messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages. Soon after, his lawyer announced that Mr. Foley was gay, had gone into treatment for alcoholism and had been molested by a clergyman as a teenager. Mr. Foley has not been seen publicly or heard from since.

The Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, a national advocacy group, asked Bishop Grech in an e-mail message to place Father Mercieca in "a secure facility" with no access to children.

"We hope Foley will go a step further and file a formal police report," said David Clohessy, the national director of the network, "and we encourage the police in the towns where the priest worked to actively beg victims and witnesses to come forward instead of sitting there and waiting for the phone to ring."

John Ombres, a childhood friend of Mr. Foley's who also attended Sacred Heart, said that Father Mercieca had gone to the movies with them when they were in sixth and seventh grades and taught them to drive.

"Sometimes we would go help him wash his car, a '57 Chevy from the parish, which we thought was very cool," Mr. Ombres, 52, said in an interview. "This is so horrible to me. I'm amazed."

Mr. Clohessy of the Survivors Network and Terence McKiernan of bishopaccountability.org, which keeps a database of accused priests, said they had no record of complaints about Father Mercieca.

According to The Herald-Tribune, Father Mercieca was born in Gozo and still has family there. Consiglia Grech, a neighbor of Father Mercieca's, said by phone that she could not believe he had done anything untoward. "That's not true," she said, "because Father Tony is very quiet."

Father Mercieca told WPTV that the Foleys had invited him to Christmas dinner at their house in Lake Worth, and that he had taken Mr. Foley to events and on overnight trips to Washington and New York.

Asked what he would tell Mr. Foley, he said, "Remember the good times we had together, you know, and how well we enjoyed each other's company." He added, "Don't keep dwelling on this thing, you know?"

Retired Priest Admits Encounters With Foley (WP)

By Howard Schneider And Debbi Wilgoren

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

A retired priest from Malta acknowledged yesterday that he had intimate contact with a young Mark Foley that involved nudity and -- on at least one occasion -- "light touching," but he denied that he and Foley had "sexual intercourse."

The Rev. Anthony Mercieca, in a telephone interview from the Maltese island of Gozo, said he was surprised that his long-ago interaction with Foley had become linked to the scandal that erupted last month and cost the former congressman his job.

Foley, who served as an altar boy at the Sacred Heart Catholic Church in Lake Worth, Fla., when Mercieca was assigned there in the mid-1960s, resigned from Congress after reports about sexually intimate electronic messages he had sent to congressional pages. After his resignation, Foley entered alcohol rehabilitation, said he was gay and alleged that he had been sexually abused by a member of the clergy as a youth.

Yesterday, the Sarasota Herald-Tribune, citing confidential sources close to Foley's family, identified Mercieca as the priest in question.

A source familiar with details of Foley's allegations confirmed yesterday that Mercieca is the priest that Foley has told investigators abused him.

Church officials have encouraged Foley to name the priest who allegedly abused him, and Foley turned that information over to law enforcement authorities yesterday, wire services reported. A statement issued by the Archdiocese of Miami yesterday morning said church officials believe the name had been given to the Palm Beach County state's attorney on Wednesday but added that the state's attorney's office had not revealed the information to the church.

The statement said the archdiocese would publicize the name of the priest once it receives it, "per our policy relating to the protection of children and vulnerable adults."

Mercieca, 69, told The Washington Post that issues such as molestation and sexual harassment are "in the eye of the beholder," and that Foley -- who was 12 or 13 at the time -- might have interpreted some of their contact "the wrong way."

During at least one encounter with Foley, "I was a little out of myself," Mercieca said, from using tranquilizers as a result of what the Sarasota paper described as a nervous breakdown. "The whole idea is . . . that I did something that he did not like, but at the time he did not say anything."

"It was not what you call intercourse. . . . There was no rape or anything. . . . Maybe light touches here or there," he said.

Mercieca said he could not explain why Foley might be attributing his broader problems to their contact.

"We had some kind of friendship. I was very friendly with him and his family," Mercieca said. "Then almost 40 years passed without him saying anything. . . . And now because he got caught, he recited these things."

An employee at the law firm that is representing Foley said his attorney, Gerald F. Richman, had no comment on Mercieca. Mercieca said he did not expect to be sued or prosecuted criminally over his ties to Foley. For criminal cases, the statute of limitations has expired.

Mark Serrano, a board member of Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, encouraged a full investigation, including whether he had similar involvement with other minors, and whether any allegations had been reported to church officials.

"A crime is a crime is a crime," Serrano said. "Advanced age is no indication that kids are safe from a perpetrator. . . . An investigation would be required."

Priest Admits 'Fondling' Foley, Denies Rape (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

A Catholic priest admitted yesterday to fondling Mark Foley nearly 40 years ago, an episode the disgraced Florida lawmaker made public after he resigned last month for sending sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage boys he knew from the Congressional Page Program.

"Once maybe I touched him or so," the Rev. Anthony Mercieca, 69, yesterday told a TV station in Florida, where Mr. Foley is in therapy for a reported alcohol addiction. "It's not something you call, I mean, rape or penetration or anything like that, you know. We were just fondling."

Father Mercieca, who now lives on the Maltese island of Gozo in the Mediterranean Sea, was posted at the Florida church where Mr. Foley was an altar boy in the 1960s. Just as Mr. Foley did after he was exposed, Father Mercieca cited substance abuse in explaining his actions.

"I have to confess, I was going through a nervous breakdown," he told the Sarasota Herald-Tribune, which broke the news in yesterday's editions. "I was taking pills -- tranquilizers. I used to take them all the time. They affected my mind a little bit."

Though associates of Mr. Foley said they never knew him to drink much, the six-term lawmaker said through his attorney that he has been a "closet drinker" for years and sent teenage boys lurid messages only when he was drunk. During that press conference, the attorney also said for the first time that a priest had molested Mr. Foley when he was a teen.

But unlike Mr. Foley, Father Mercieca is hardly apologetic.

"He seemed to like it, you know," he said in a telephone interview with West Palm Beach television station WPTV. "So it was sort of more like a spontaneous thing."

Among the activities Father Mercieca recalled were massaging the young Foley while the boy was naked, skinny-dipping with him at a secluded lake and being naked in the same room on overnight trips.

The admission ends three weeks of speculation over whether Mr. Foley really had been molested but raised other questions about why he had waited so long to report it.

"Let's say it was 40 years ago, almost 40 years ago, so why bring this up at this late stage?" Father Mercieca told the TV station.

"I would say that if I offended him, I am sorry, but to remember the good time we had together, you know?" he said. "And how really we enjoyed each other's company. And to let bygones be bygones. Don't keep dwelling on this thing, you know?"

Knowing Mr. Foley, Father Mercieca said, he's confident the former congressman will recover.

"He will overcome it with a psychiatrist, you know," he said. "Mark is a very intelligent man."

DOJ_NMG_0083856

In Washington, meanwhile, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner and former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl testified yesterday before the House ethics committee about the Foley matter and how Republican leaders had responded to complaints about Mr. Foley that arose a year ago or longer.

"Had anyone known about it, we would have moved to expel Mr. Foley from our ranks immediately," Mr. Boehner told reporters after testifying for an hour behind closed doors. "The ongoing inquiry will determine the facts."

Folier Than Thou (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Here in Washington, we're all competing to see who can be more po-faced about Mark Foley and the congressional pages. Who can deplore Foley's behavior the most?

Democrats, sensing a deeply wounded Republican Party, are going in for the kill. It's the final evidence that the GOP is terminally corrupt: A congressman was cyber-molesting teenage boys and his party leaders evidently didn't even care.

Republicans answer: Hey, we invented child molesting! As an issue, that is. We own family values, and we're not about to let the party of Monica Lewinsky and Heather Has Two Mommies outflank us on the sexual morality front.

And then there are gay voices, eager to remind people that being gay and molesting children are two different things, which of course they are. But just to make the point clear, gays want everyone to know that they defer to no one in their distaste for Foley's behavior.

So everyone claims to be terribly distressed. We glare at each other, looking as grim as possible, and the first one to break into a grin or a smirk or a snort loses. Stop it! It's not funny!

But then who are all the people watching David Letterman and Jay Leno, Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert, and laughing -- laughing! -- at Foley's shenanigans? Who are the people cracking jokes on the Internet? They are so distressed that they can't stop giggling, and they find the whole subject so distasteful that they can't get enough of it. This is not a traditional case of politicians' hypocrisy. This is politicians accommodating the hypocrisy of voters.

Perhaps it would be a better world if everybody were as disgusted by the Foley episode as almost everybody claims to be. But the truth is that most people are enjoying this story and can't get enough of it. If you gave them the secret power to wish the whole thing away, they'd say, "Are you nuts? This is terrific!"

Poor Dennis Hastert is suspected, probably falsely, of being willing to sacrifice a child for the good of his party, and now the other party reaps the benefit. Do you think that if the devil told Nancy Pelosi she could undo the scandal, save these 17-year-olds from the trauma of electronic messages from a sicko congressman and give up her hopes of being speaker, that she would find such an offer tempting? I don't. And I don't think Pelosi is callous or cruel. If she thought it through, she might conclude that the good that can come from a Democratic Congress exceeds the evil that a few randy messages may have done to a few teenage pages. Meanwhile, most Americans, I strongly suspect, would happily sacrifice a few more pages just to keep the story going for entertainment purposes.

Then there is Gerry Studds (who, by a weird coincidence, died last week). Studds was a Democratic congressman who, in 1983, was censured for having an actual physical affair with a congressional page 10 years before that. After his censure, he continued to run in his district (in Massachusetts, natch), to win and to serve in Congress until 1997.

Compare and contrast Mark Foley: It develops that he may have had physical something-or-other with a page after all. But even before this came out, he had resigned under pressure on the basis of those e-mails alone. Doesn't that prove that Republicans are more serious about Protecting Our Children than Democrats are? Don't they win the po-face contest?

The Studds case is troubling. Do the Republicans have a point? Maybe, but there are a few points in mitigation as well. One is the huge random element in what becomes a Washington scandal. You don't need ideological conspiracies or grand cultural tectonic shifts. Whether something becomes a scandal depends on how close we are to an election, on what else is in the news, on what Michael Isikoff had for lunch and so on.

The Studds case came paired with that of Republican congressman Dan Crane, who had an affair with a female page. In a mutual disarmament agreement, both miscreants were "censured," which was actually a ratchet up from "reprimanded" or "scolded" or "tickled" or some other term recommended by an outside committee. Speaker Hastert says that if Foley hadn't resigned immediately, he would have been bounced. Maybe. But Crane, like Studds, was renominated by his party in the 1984 election. That would be the Republican Party. (Unlike Studds, Crane lost.)

Back in 1983 Studds took the position that the page had been over the age of consent in the District of Columbia, which is 16, and consent for the affair had, in fact, been mutual. This, of course, left out the question whether, as a member of Congress, he had some special duty to protect even 17-year-old congressional pages from middle-aged men such as himself. He probably did have such a duty, though he never paraded around as a protector of children, as Foley did.

DOJ_NMG_0083857

A final difference between Studds and Foley is that the Foley case exposed the tawdry mechanics of a congressman trolling for action among teenage pages. No doubt the Studds affair involved the pre-e-mail equivalent of these mechanics, but they never became public. Obviously, that doesn't excuse Studds. But it also does not establish anything superior about Republican moral values.

Gun Collector Once Held In Prosecutor's Death To Help Grand Jury (AP)

By Gene Johnson

AP, October 20, 2006

A gun collector once jailed as a material witness in the assassination of a federal prosecutor has agreed to take a lie-detector test and will fully cooperate with a grand jury investigating the case, his lawyers said in a court filing Thursday.

Albert K. Kwan, of suburban Bellevue, was held for three weeks in January 2005 as part of the investigation into the killing of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales. Last month, Kwan was jailed on an unrelated charge of machine-gun possession.

In a motion challenging his detention Thursday, his lawyers, Joseph Conte and Eric Stahlfeld, wrote that Kwan signed an agreement with an assistant U.S. attorney on Monday, agreeing to take at least one polygraph examination and "to fully cooperate with the grand jury." In several previous appearances before the grand jury, Kwan has invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Wales, an 18-year veteran of the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle and the president of the gun-control group Washington CeaseFire, was shot as he worked in the basement of his home in Seattle's Queen Anne Hill neighborhood on Oct. 11, 2001. According to ballistics tests, the murder weapon was a Makarov pistol outfitted with a replacement barrel.

The FBI launched a nationwide search for the 3,500 replacement Makarov barrels imported into the United States prior to the killing.

Kwan was first contacted by the FBI in August 2003, when an agent met with him and asked if the FBI could test-fire his Makarov pistols. Kwan initially refused because his guns were collector's items that had never been fired; once investigators obtained a subpoena for them, he turned them over, his lawyers wrote.

His lawyers also insisted that agents were less than diligent in trying to serve Kwan with a subpoena to appear before the grand jury in December 2004 and January 2005. The agents made just one attempt: According to an FBI affidavit supporting a search warrant, when Kwan didn't answer his door, agents asked a neighbor where he was. Kwan called the neighbor and said he couldn't come to the door because he was washing his hair — a message the neighbor relayed. A section of the affidavit was cited in the motion.

After that, the FBI kept him under surveillance and eventually arrested him as a material witness, the lawyers wrote. According to the motion, agents insist that sales records from a Minnesota company, Federal Arms Corp., show Kwan purchased two Makarov replacement barrels in the mid-1990s, but Kwan only turned over one barrel and insists he never purchased a second one.

Kwan legally owns more than 100 pristine and historical machine guns. But during a search of Kwan's home in January 2005, agents found one — an M-14 — that they said was illegal.

Kwan's attorneys argue that the M-14 in question required substantial modification by federal agents — including use of a rotary tool with a cutting wheel and the installation of new parts — before it could be fired automatically. Therefore it didn't meet the legal definition of a machine gun, they argued.

Nevertheless, last month — long after the January 2005 search — Kwan was indicted on one count of machine gun possession. His attorneys suggested that the reason for the charge might be to improve his memory about the supposed second Makarov barrel; asked Thursday night whether he believed the federal government was trying to squeeze his client, Conte said, "Absolutely."

Through spokeswoman Emily Langlie, the U.S. attorney's office declined to respond. Previously, the prosecutor handling the case said the indictment was brought as soon as the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms provided information about the crime.

"All of Mr. Kwan's problems with the grand jury and this indictment stem from his refusal to let the government take his pistols without a subpoena and his assertion of his legal rights from that time forward," the lawyers wrote. "... At a minimum the United States somehow believes that Mr. Kwan either killed AUSA Thomas Wales or provided the gun, or the barrel to the gun, to the person who did kill Mr. Wales."

Conte said his client was not involved in Wales' death.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Monica Benton refused to release Kwan pending trial. She said that given his history of legal scuffles with federal authorities, including the revocation of his federal firearms licenses, which he has appealed; his weapons collection; and his frequent travel to China to study the language, he posed a flight risk and a danger to the community. She also said it was "difficult to ignore" his behavior regarding the Wales investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0083858

In asking U.S. District Judge Thomas Zilly to review the detention order, Conte and Stahlfeld argued that Kwan's exercise of his constitutional rights did not constitute grounds for detention. They said he is a native of Hong Kong who has lived in the Seattle area for 20 years, has no previous convictions and is a sergeant in the U.S. Army Reserve.

"He is a person who scrupulously guards his privacy and his constitutional rights," Stahlfeld and Conte wrote. "None of these makes him a risk of flight or a danger to the community."

Only one person has been identified publicly as a suspect in the Wales case: an airline pilot who recently moved from Bellevue to Snohomish, and who was once prosecuted by Wales in a fraud case. That man's lawyer has insisted he is innocent.

Gun Collector To Cooperate In Wales Case (SEATIMES)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

Seattle Times, October 20, 2006

A Bellevue gun collector who was jailed as a witness in the slaying of a federal prosecutor will cooperate with a grand-jury investigation and undergo a lie-detector test, his attorneys said Thursday.

Up to this point, Albert Kwok Leung Kwan has invoked his Fifth Amendment right prohibiting self incrimination when he's been questioned before the grand jury investigating the 2001 slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales.

Last month, Kwan was indicted for owning an illegal machine gun and jailed because he was a flight risk. He remains in custody. The machine gun was one of several weapons taken from his house in 2005 after an earlier arrest; at that time he was held for 23 days as a material witness in the Wales investigation.

In papers filed Thursday in U.S. District Court, Kwan's attorneys said he will submit to questioning by the FBI task force investigating the killing. He also will testify before the grand jury and "submit to one or more polygraph examinations." The lawyers are attempting to persuade a U.S. magistrate to release Kwan from custody in the machine-gun case.

At issue in the Wales case is Kwan's purchase of at least one replacement barrel for a 9-mm Makarov handgun. FBI experts have determined that Wales was shot with a Makarov fitted with such a barrel. His attorneys have said that Kwan has maintained he purchased just one such barrel, although the FBI has evidence he purchased two.

Joseph Conte, Kwan's attorney from Washington, D.C., said Kwan's recollection has not changed.

"This is what he has said since 2004," Conte said.

Federal investigators are tracing nearly 3,500 Makarov replacement barrels sold in the United States before Wales' slaying Oct. 11, 2001. Wales was sitting at his computer in the basement of his Queen Anne home when he was shot several times through a window.

Kwan lives just miles from the former home of an airline pilot and gun enthusiast who is the prime suspect in the Wales investigation. The pilot was once indicted for fraud by Wales, who ultimately dismissed the charges after a contentious prosecution.

If Wales' slaying was related to his job, he would be the first federal prosecutor in U.S. history to be killed in the line of duty.

Steve Clymer, the special prosecutor assigned to the Wales investigation, declined to comment on the development Thursday.

Mike Carter: 206-464-3706 or mcarter@seattletimes.com. Reporter Steve Miletich contributed to this story.

Anschutz Gesture To Deputy Prime Minister Equals Complaint (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

LONDON — A businessman has complained to the U.S. Department of Justice about gifts a Colorado billionaire gave to British Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott, a news report said Thursday.

A parliamentary ethics panel gave Prescott a mild rebuke in July, saying he should have immediately disclosed his stay at the ranch of Philip Anschutz, the American tycoon who is bidding to open a casino at London's Millennium Dome site.

But it said Prescott had "acted correctly" in belatedly declaring the visit, and recommended no further action.

The Times newspaper said George Bathurst, a businessman based in Windsor, outside London, had reported the hospitality and gifts Anschutz gave Prescott to the Justice Department under laws banning U.S. businesses from attempting to bribe foreign officials.

A call by The Associated Press to a number listed as Bathurst's went unanswered Thursday.

Prescott was widely criticized for initially failing to declare his stay with Anschutz, who also gave him a cowboy outfit.

He says he has met twice a year with the oil, media and transport billionaire who has taken over the vast Millennium Dome, an enormous exhibition space built for the 2000 New Year's celebrations. Anschutz is seeking a license to operate a casino there, but Prescott says the two never discussed that issue in their meetings.

Officials Probing Possible Theft Of Voting Software In Md. (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The FBI is investigating the possible theft of software developed by the nation's leading maker of electronic voting equipment, said a former Maryland legislator who this week received three computer disks that apparently contain key portions of programs created by Diebold Election Systems.

Cheryl C. Kagan, a former Democratic delegate who has long questioned the security of electronic voting systems, said the disks were delivered anonymously to her office in Olney on Tuesday and that the FBI contacted her yesterday. The package contained an unsigned letter critical of Maryland State Board of Elections Administrator Linda H. Lamone that said the disks were "right from SBE" and had been "accidentally picked up."

Lamone's deputy, Ross Goldstein, said "they were not our disks," but he acknowledged that the software was used in Maryland in the 2004 elections. Diebold said in a statement last night that it had never created or received the disks.

The disks bear the logos of two testing companies that send such disks to the Maryland board after using the software to conduct tests on Diebold equipment. A Ciber Inc. spokeswoman said the disks had not come from Ciber, and Wyle Laboratories Inc. said it was not missing any disks.

Diebold spokesman Mark Radke and Goldstein said that the labels on the disks referred to versions of the software that are no longer in use in Maryland, although the Diebold statement said the version of one program apparently stored on the disks is still in use in "a limited number of jurisdictions" and is protected by encryption. The statement also said the FBI is investigating the disks' chain of custody.

Michelle Crnkovich, an FBI spokeswoman in Baltimore, said she had no knowledge of an investigation.

In an unrelated development, Maryland state auditors said in a report yesterday that the State Board of Elections is not properly controlling access to a new statewide database of registered voters or verifying what changes are made to it. The report comes at a time of heightened concern over the security and effectiveness of electronic voting systems.

Legislative auditor Bruce Myers said it was unusual to allow "across-the-board access" by local election officials to a sensitive database, but Lamone defended the board's practices. In a letter released with the Office of Legislative Audits report, she wrote that the board "is unaware of any allegations of the falsification of additions or deletions to the system."

The FBI investigation into the disks could focus further scrutiny on the security of Maryland's electronic voting system.

The disks delivered to Kagan's office bear labels indicating that they hold "source code" -- the instructions that constitute the core of a software program -- for Diebold's Ballot Station and Global Election Management System (GEMS) programs. The former guides the operation of the company's touch-screen voting machines; the latter is in part a tabulation program used to tally votes after an election.

Three years ago, Diebold was embarrassed when an activist obtained some of its confidential software by searching the Internet. The company vowed to improve its security procedures to prevent another lapse.

The release of such software poses a risk, computer scientists say, because it could allow someone to discover security vulnerabilities or to write a virus that could be used to manipulate election results.

In September, computer scientists at Princeton University who had obtained a Diebold voting machine demonstrated how a program they had created could secretly alter the votes cast on the machine. Diebold President Dave Byrd called the demonstration "unrealistic and inaccurate" and said it ignored the "physical security" measures used to safeguard voting machines.

The Washington Post obtained copies of the disks Wednesday and allowed Avi Rubin, a computer scientist at Johns Hopkins University, along with a colleague and a graduate student, to review the software on the condition that they make no copies of it.

"I would be stunned if it's not real," Rubin said.

Rubin, who has said that electronic voting systems that do not produce a paper record of each vote cannot be secured, led a team that produced an analysis that pointed out security vulnerabilities in the Diebold software found on the Internet in 2003.

Sam Small, the graduate student, said the version of Ballot Station "was consistent with what we've seen previously." Small could not gain access to the GEMS software because the material on two of the disks was protected by a password.

Radke, the Diebold spokesman, said the versions of Ballot Station released since the version identified on the disks have many new security features. The Diebold statement said "it would take years for a knowledgeable scientist" to break the encryption used on the software apparently contained on the disks delivered to Kagan. But Rubin said "the data and files were not encrypted" on the Ballot Station disk he reviewed.

DOJ_NMG_0083860

The Office of Legislative Audits report also said the Maryland elections board has paid bills submitted by contractors without proper documentation and has not taken appropriate steps to safeguard its computer network and Web site.

Lamone said, "It seems inappropriate to base findings on a partially implemented system," referring to the new MDVOTERS database, which Maryland has established to comply with federal law.

She said it is appropriate for local election workers to have access to the database and said procedures are in place to verify changes. Lamone concurred with the auditors' criticism of her staff's accounting practices and said they had "obtained nearly all necessary documentation" for contractors' bills.

Providing the sort of local oversight envisioned by the auditors, she said, "simply cannot be conducted with existing resources."

Texas Inmate Kills Self Day Of Execution (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

(AP) - LIVINGSTON, Texas-A death-row inmate slit his own throat with a makeshift knife early Thursday, committing suicide less than 18 hours before he was scheduled to be executed, a prison official said.

Michael Dewayne Johnson, 29, was on death row for the 1995 killing of a convenience store clerk near Waco.

He was in a death-row cell early Thursday when he slashed his own throat with a makeshift blade fashioned from a small piece of metal attached to a wooden stick, said Michelle Lyons, spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Criminal Justice in Huntsville.

Prison guards had been checking on Johnson's welfare every 15 minutes, as is customary, when they found him unresponsive in a pool of blood in his cell, Lyons said. He was taken to a hospital in nearby Livingston, where he was pronounced dead, Lyons said.

Johnson's execution had been scheduled for 6 p.m. Thursday. His last-minute appeal was still pending before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Blagojevich Fundraiser Pleads Not Guilty In Two Cases (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 20, 2006

A fundraiser and close adviser to Gov. Rod Blagojevich pleaded not guilty to fraud charges Thursday after being escorted to federal court by FBI agents.

The appearance in court of Antoin "Tony" Rezko ended weeks of speculation about his whereabouts that peaked after a pair of indictments were unsealed against him last week.

Federal prosecutors charge that Rezko leveraged his influence with state leaders to extort illegal payments and a campaign contribution from investment firms seeking to do business with Illinois. He is separately accused of setting up a phony transaction involving the sale of his pizza restaurants.

Despite the official escort—agents met Rezko's plane as it landed Thursday at O'Hare International Airport—Rezko walked into court seemingly unconcerned, waving to family members and shaking his lawyer's hand.

His attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, said Rezko's travel back to Chicago had begun in his native Syria after he concluded a business trip to the Middle East.

"In the last week, there has been what I would call an unnecessary media frenzy about Mr. Rezko and his whereabouts and his intentions," Duffy said as he left the courthouse. "Mr. Rezko today in court proclaimed his innocence. He is confident he will be vindicated in trial."

Rezko was arraigned before U.S. District Judge Charles Kocoras in the charge related to his pizza business and before U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve in the kickback case. Kocoras and St. Eve agreed to release Rezko on $1.4 million bail.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Christopher Niewoehner had argued a decision on bail shouldn't only be made in the light of Rezko's return. Rezko could decide to flee once he realizes the full weight of the evidence against him and understands he could face up to 14 years in prison, Niewoehner said.

Rezko has significant ties to the Middle East, and his wife and daughter met him in Damascus recently. He has transferred money around the world, Niewoehner said, including $400,000 to Beirut in 2004.

Duffy countered that all of Rezko's family contacts are local and said he may have less than $5,000 in some of his bank accounts here.

DOJ_NMG_0083861

If Rezko had wanted to run, he wouldn't have been in court Thursday, Duffy said. Rezko understands his duty as a U.S. citizen to appear, he said.

"The best expression of that is he's standing here today," Duffy said.

Nine homes owned by friends and family members were submitted to secure Rezko's release. He also must put up his own residences in Wilmette and Lake Geneva, Wis.

St. Eve said Rezko must also be placed on electronic home monitoring until an affidavit outlining his finances can be organized.

Rezko's whereabouts had been a concern for authorities for weeks as the case against him progressed. Prosecutors, unsure when or whether Rezko would return from an overseas trip, sought his indictment under seal Oct. 5.

When prosecutors announced the indictment last week, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said it was done without regard for any impact it could have on the Nov. 7 election

The governor has distanced himself from Rezko in recent days, insisting his trust was betrayed and that he had no knowledge of Rezko's actions. Sources with knowledge of the case have said Rezko sought a $1.5 million campaign contribution for Blagojevich in lieu of one secret kickback.

"Tony Rezko has returned to defend the charges against him," Blagojevich said in a statement Thursday. "Today, with his arrival in court, the legal proceedings have begun. Now it is time for the justice system to fairly decide his case."

Rezko is accused of helping to get businessman Stuart Levine reappointed to the board of the state's Teachers' Retirement System and scheming with Levine to get kickbacks from companies seeking business with the state board.

Levine is cooperating with the government, and Niewoehner said there are recordings of Rezko discussing his activities.

"Mr. Rezko has no idea what is in store for him," Niewoehner said.

Rezko cooperated throughout the investigation into his activities as long ago as 2004, Duffy said, offering information when any of the entities he owns was subpoenaed.

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Rezko's travel itinerary had been provided in advance to authorities, and the FBI and U.S. Customs agents were waiting for his plane when it arrived.

He was escorted off his flight at about noon and into a van waiting on the tarmac, which took him to the FBI's Chicago headquarters on the West Side prior to his court appearance.

"He knew we would be there; we knew he would be there," Samborn said.

Tribune staff reporters Gerry Doyle and Matt O'Connor contributed to this report.

jcoen@tribune.com

Governor's Fundraiser Says He's Not Guilty Of Seeking Kickbacks (BVND)

By Deanna Bellandi

The Belleville News Democrat, October 20, 2006

CHICAGO - A fundraiser and political confidant for Gov. Rod Blagojevich pleaded not guilty Thursday to federal charges that he worked to squeeze millions of dollars in kickbacks from investment firms seeking state business.

Businessman Antoin "Tony" Rezko, 51, of Wilmette was released from custody after friends and family helped secure his release by putting up as collateral nine pieces of property worth about $1.5 million, along with Rezko's north suburban Chicago home and one he owns in Lake Geneva, Wis.

"Mr. Rezko today in court proclaimed his innocence. He is confident that he will be vindicated at trial," said his attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, who entered not guilty pleas on Rezko's behalf.

Rezko, who is charged in two separate indictments, also pleaded not guilty earlier in the day to charges he swindled the General Electric Capital Corp. out of $10.5 million in loans to a pizza restaurant company.

More than two dozen Rezko supporters traveled from courtroom to courtroom as he was arraigned in the two indictments by separate judges who reminded them they could lose their houses if Rezko doesn't show up for trial.

Prosecutor Christopher Niewoehner noted Rezko's willingness to appear in court now but said he did not know all the details of the case against him.

"Mr. Rezko has no idea what is in store for him," Niewoehner said.

Rezko was released on the condition that he be on home confinement with electronic monitoring pending the completion of a financial affidavit before a Nov. 3 hearing with U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve.

The financial affidavit will help prosecutors sort out Rezko's net worth because Duffy said he apparently has "negative cash flow."

Rezko can leave his home for certain duties, including work and court appearances, but he is not allowed to travel outside the northern district of Illinois.

Rezko was arrested without incident Thursday at O'Hare International Airport, after he returned from Syria to face charges of fraud and extortion, federal officials said. Rezko was born in Syria and moved to the U.S. as a teenager. The father of three has no criminal record.

Duffy had asked U.S. District Judge Charles Kocoras, who handled the arraignment on the case involving loans to a pizza restaurant company, to release Rezko on his own recognizance, saying there is nothing to indicate he would flee.

Kocoras declined but said the fact Rezko showed up Thursday was "a point in his favor," and Prosecutor Carolyn McNiven said she was "very happy" he appeared.

Rezko failed to show up for arraignment last Friday. His attorney said he was overseas on business and the indictments caught him by surprise.

Rezko is accused of mail fraud, wire fraud and other charges in an elaborate scheme with millionaire campaign contributor Stuart Levine to squeeze millions of dollars out of companies, including a $1.5 million contribution to "a certain public official" from a company seeking state business. A person familiar with the investigation, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing, has said the unnamed public official is Blagojevich.

The indictments came more than a year after federal authorities began investigating allegations of fraudulent hiring practices by top officials in the governor's office.

The governor has not been charged with any crime and has denied knowing of any wrongdoing.

Blagojevich has said if the allegations against Rezko are proven true, then he was duped by a friend.

"Tony Rezko has returned to defend the charges against him. Today, with his arrival in court, the legal proceedings have begun. Now it is time for the justice system to fairly decide his case," Blagojevich said in a written statement.

John McGovern, a spokesman for Blagojevich's Republican opponent, Judy Baar Topinka, said this "may well be the biggest corruption scandal in Illinois history."

Duffy has said the attempt to shake down investment firms never happened and was made up by Levine.

Levine has been under two indictments in the federal investigation of state government corruption. His attorney, Jeffrey B. Steinback, has said he is cooperating and expects to plead guilty.

Levine is due in court on the charges Oct. 27.

Warning Letter Lands Candidate In Hot Seat (USAT)

USA Today, October 20, 2006

The head of the Republican Party in Orange County, Calif., on Thursday called for the withdrawal of a GOP congressional candidate, citing a letter threatening Hispanic immigrant voters with arrest. Tan Nguyen, challenging Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, denied any knowledge of the letter sent to an estimated 14,000 voters, but said he fired a campaign staffer who may have been responsible. County Republican Chairman Scott Baugh said that after speaking with state investigators and the company that distributed the mailer, he believes Nguyen knew of the letter.

The letter warns that “if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time.” Immigrants who are citizens are eligible to vote, and it is a crime to threaten or intimidate voters.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson and state attorney general's office spokesman Nathan Barankin said their offices were investigating.

Blagojevich fundraiser pleads not guilty

A fundraiser and political confidant for Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich pleaded not guilty to federal charges of involvement in a kickback scheme.

Antoin “Tony” Rezko, 51, is accused of working with millionaire campaign contributor Stuart Levine to squeeze millions of dollars out of companies, including a $1.5 million contribution to “a certain public official” from a company seeking state business. The Associated Press reports that a person familiar with the probe, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said the unnamed public official is Blagojevich.

Rezko also pleaded not guilty to separate charges that he swindled the General Electric Capital Corp. out of $10.5 million in loans to a pizza restaurant company. Blagojevich, a Democrat seeking re-election against Republican Judy Baar Topinka, has denied wrongdoing.

Democracia USA registers 105,000 voters

Democracia USA, a Hispanic civic engagement program, said it has registered more than 105,000 Hispanics in Arizona, Florida, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Executive Director Jorge Mursuli declined to give the party breakdown, saying the group's goal was participation and not partisanship. “There is a growing sense of political engagement in the Hispanic community, and a sense of emerging political power,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083863

The group said there are about 9 million Hispanics registered to vote. The four states were chosen for their growing Hispanic communities, Mursuli said. He said the new voters could be the deciding factor in several races, including Senate races in Pennsylvania and New Jersey and the Florida gubernatorial campaign.

The group will be back in the states next week concentrating on get-out-the-vote efforts, Mursuli said.

Liberti Gets 18 Months For Pocketing $66,000 (PALMBEACHP)

By Tony Doris, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 20, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE — Ray Liberti, an elder Palm Beach County statesman snared in an FBI corruption sting, was sentenced today to 18 months in prison for pocketing $66,000 in cash, most of it delivered in a shaving kit.

Liberti, who resigned from the West Palm Beach City Commission in May after he was charged by federal prosecutors, was ordered to surrender immediately by U.S. District Judge William P. Dimitrouleas, who rejected Liberti's request that he remain free for a month to sort out his personal affairs.

He will serve the sentence at a minimum security facility, most likely in the Florida Panhandle or in Central Florida.

It's possible that Liberti will spend just nine months in a prison cell, then serve the remainder of his term in a halfway house. Two or three months could be shaved off the sentence for good behavior behind bars.

About a dozen of Liberti's family and friends attended today's sentencing hearing. He hugged each one of them for a few moments before he was escorted by marshals from the courtoom. Liberti remained composed, but some of them broke down in sobs.

"It's very strange being here," a red-eyed Liberti told the judge. "I know what I did and what I didn't do. It's the first time in my life that I've ever been in trouble. You'll never see me in this courtroom again. I want to apologize to this court, my constituents, the people of Palm Beach County and the state of Florida and most of all, to my parents and my children."

Dimitrouleas went easy on Liberti, saying he was "a good person who did some bad things." He had faced as much as 50 years in federal prison, but prosecutors John Kastrenakes and Bruce Reinhart agreed to recommend 18 to 24 months in exchange for a guilty plea and his cooperation in their investigations of others' misdeeds.

"The court doesn't view public corruption as a minor victimless crime," the judge said. "It can corrode the foundations of our government."

Liberti, 60, had been caught on FBI tape wielding his power as a city commissioner to push a massage parlor owner into slashing the price of her business. He had taken $66,000 plus a $2,000 watch from an FBI undercover agent posing as a buyer.

Thus far, nothing public has come of Liberti's promised cooperation.

Still, the repercussions from the scandal continue at city hall: A state grand jury is investigating city contracts, and the mayor has launched an unprecedented campaign to raise ethical standards for the city's public servants.

Since his guilty plea in May, Liberti has paid a private price for his betrayal of public trust. His wife, whom he married 19 months before the arrest, has divorced him and he has been shunned by politicians he had befriended while serving the city for three years and as a state representative for 14 years.

Liberti had pleaded guilty to two counts of mail fraud and one of witness-tampering and had been free on bond until today.

Nearly three dozen people wrote letters to the court on Liberti's behalf. But none came from his one-time political pals.

Instead, letters came from his parents, Ray and Fran. The elder Liberti, 83, has a heart condition, is short of breath and suffers from depression; Fran, 80, awaits a kidney operation. They need their only child, his mother wrote. "We would not have gotten this far without knowing he is always there to help us."

Eight letters came from within his family circle; four came from his neighbors on Iroquois Circle; three, from Episcopal reverends. Most came from friends and associates from various points in his career as public administrator, college instructor and consultant. His family eye doctor sent a letter. So did his chiropractor.

Enid Atwater, whose divorce from Liberti was completed Oct. 12, did not write. But Brenda Sutton, one of Liberti's three ex-wives, wrote of his proud, early years in the Florida House.

"He was a man of vision, of ideals, and of strong personal integrity," she recalled, asking for leniency.

His daughter Rachel, 26, wrote: "A couple of months ago, my car broke down at night in the middle of nowhere. I didn't call my sister, boyfriend, best friend, or my mom for help. I called my dad. He immediately ran out of his meeting, and drove the two hours to come to my aid. I don't know what I would do without him."

Charles Cannon, a deacon at St. David's-in-the-Pines Episcopal Church in Wellington, described Liberti as someone who worked "for the transformation of human systems and for a finer world." He called Liberti "a friend, a servant of God and a sinner seeking God's redemption."

DOJ_NMG_0083864

Many letters came from longtime friends who saw Liberti's confessed actions as out of character. They asked that the judge recognize that Liberti already has suffered "ridicule, humiliation and future loss in his professions," as neighbors David and JoAnn Deuschle put it.

Some professed to being baffled by events, others suspected political motivations at work. "Stories and comments made about him in the media came from recognized Democrats in journalism and public relations," wrote Linda Hamburger, an adjunct instructor at Northwood University.

Others asked that Liberti be viewed as someone who already has paid dearly.

"There is no pride or ego left in this man," wrote neighbors Michael and Sharon Kintzel. "This is a good man who made a serious moral error that he has paid for with everything in his life that he values."

Ex-WPB Official Sentenced To 18 Months In Federal Corruption Case (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- A former West Palm Beach commissioner and state legislator was sentenced Thursday to 18 months in federal prison after admitting he took bribes to harass local businesses so they could be purchased at bargain prices.

Ray Liberti, 60, pleaded guilty in May to mail fraud and obstruction of justice charges. He admitted accepting $66,000 in cash and a $2,000 Tag Heuer watch from investors - one of whom was actually an undercover FBI agent - who wanted to buy a massage parlor and a nightclub below market value.

To drive down the prices, Liberti made false health and city code violation complaints about the businesses, persuaded West Palm Beach police to conduct a prostitution investigation involving them and even posed over the telephone as a reporter for the South Florida Sun-Sentinel, threatening to write a negative story.

The sentence imposed Thursday by U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas was below the two years sought by prosecutors for what Assistant U.S. Attorney John Kastrenakes called "pervasive, repeated criminal conduct" over a nine-month span.

"I know you'll never see me again in this courtroom," Liberti told the judge.

Liberti served for 14 years in the state House of Representatives and was elected to the West Palm Beach commission in 2001. He resigned shortly after the charges were made public earlier this year.

Accountant Probed In Embezzlement At Drug Trade Group (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

Federal authorities have seized personal bank records of the accounting director at a District-based pharmaceutical research group in a probe of whether she funneled money to buy property in Jamaica.

The FBI and the financial crimes unit of the Metropolitan Police Department have been investigating accountant Marcia Campbell for more than a week after learning of an internal audit that showed that more than $200,000 was missing from the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers Association (PhRMA), court records show.

Miss Campbell declined to comment when reached by phone at her home.

Her attorney said that she has not been formally indicted and that he could not comment on the matter.

Miss Campbell was arrested Monday by a deputy U.S. marshal and was later released.

Ken Johnson, senior vice president at PhRMA, said Miss Campbell "no longer works here." He declined to discuss whether she had been terminated or had resigned.

"There is an ongoing criminal investigation, and it would be inappropriate to comment," Mr. Johnson said.

He said the investigation began after PhRMA contacted law-enforcement authorities.

According to a search warrant affidavit filed in federal court in the District this week, PhRMA began an internal investigation this month after a vendor, National Media Inc., inquired about a $73,560 payment it had not received.

Police said in court documents that PhRMA auditors traced the money to a Washington Mutual Bank account belonging to Miss Campbell.

Auditors found that it wasn't the first time that PhRMA funds had been diverted to the account, according to the affidavit.

Authorities think Miss Campbell in December transferred $150,000 to her accounts from funds that were supposed to go to another vendor, LETNOM Productions Inc., court records show.

Since December, Miss Campbell's accounts have received at least $223,560 in unauthorized transfers from PhRMA, police say.

Investigators also have examined Miss Campbell's e-mail records. They say she sent a note from her work computer to a real estate agent in Jamaica this month indicating that she recently had wired money for the closing costs in a real estate deal.

DOJ_NMG_0083865

PhRMA officials discussed "ongoing matters" related to the investigation with Miss Campbell last week, according to the affidavit.

On Monday, authorities searched Miss Campbell's home and car in Northwest and seized a day planner, an airline ticket and bank statements, according to court records.

PhRMA, the lobbying group for the nation's largest drug makers, hired Miss Campbell about six years ago, according to court filings.

Prosecution Traces Smuggled Venus' Steps (WP/AP)

By Ariel David, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

ROME -- Prosecutors in the trial of a former J. Paul Getty Museum curator retraced the steps of an ancient statue they say was smuggled out of the country, and is now one of the most significant pieces in a dispute between Italy and the Los Angeles museum.

The prosecution presented testimony and documents reconstructing the route that the fifth century B.C. statue of the goddess Aphrodite took from Sicily to the Getty, which bought the piece for $18 million in 1988.

Italy has been cracking down on antiquities trafficking and campaigning to recover artifacts it contends were stolen or illegally exported from the country and sold to European and U.S. museums.

As part of these efforts, former Getty curator Marion True and American art dealer Robert Hecht are on trial in Rome, accused of knowingly trafficking in stolen artifacts. They deny wrongdoing. Their trial resumed Wednesday after a lengthy summer break.

Fausto Guarnieri, a former police officer, testified Wednesday that he first received anonymous tips in the late 1980s of the existence of a secret dig at Morgantina _ the Greek settlement in Sicily where the "Venere di Morgantina" is said to have been found.

The tips came from illegal diggers angered that rival raiders had sold precious statues found at the site for a very low price, he said.

At the same time, as they prepared to acquire the Venus, Getty officials wrote letters to Italian authorities, inquiring if the statue had been stolen.

Guarnieri said that no connection was made then between the Venus and Morgantina, and authorities responded that the statue was not on their lists of stolen artifacts, but that they would investigate. Only a 1997 analysis of the statue confirmed it was made out of the same stone as fragments found in the Morgantina illegal dig, he said.

Prosecutor Paolo Ferri then showed the court documents from subsequent investigations that reconstructed the statue's voyage.

A 1986 receipt made out by an Italian who claimed to own the statue says it was sold in Switzerland to a London-based dealer for $400,000 after "it had been in my family's possession since 1939."

Ferri suggested the ownership claim was fake, reminding the judges that 1939 was the year Italy passed a law making all antiquities found in the country property of the state.

Ferri also showed documents that accompanied the statue as it traveled from Switzerland to Los Angeles through London, noting that the weight of the crates carrying it increased dramatically with each step. He said this was an indication that the statue was sold in pieces at different stages, a technique smugglers use to get more money out of buyers.

Lawyers for True have always maintained that their client acquired this and other disputed pieces in good faith, without knowing of their supposed illegal origin. Defense lawyer Francesco Isolabella stressed that point while cross-examining Guarnieri on Wednesday, repeatedly questioning how Italian authorities followed up on the Getty's original inquiries about the statue.

"From (1988 to 1997) they didn't do anything," Isolabella later told reporters. "They didn't ask for the Venus back, they never asked questions on its origin."

The fact that the Getty had made inquiries on the artifact and later made it available for the 1997 analysis was proof of the museum's good faith.

True and Hecht were not in court Wednesday. Their lawyers said they could show up for the next session, set for Nov. 10, and would be available to take the stand.

The 7-foot statue of Aphrodite is only one of dozens of artifacts Italy wants returned from the Getty. Negotiations between the museum and the Italian Culture Ministry have so far failed to yield a deal.

Last month, Boston's Museum of Fine Arts returned 13 disputed ancient artifacts to Italy in exchange for loans of other treasures. Earlier this year, New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art signed a similar deal for the return of 21 pieces, including a collection of Greek silverware from Morgantina.

DOJ_NMG_0083866

Five People Accused Of Stealing Katrina Relief Money (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 20, 2006

SACRAMENTO – Five people have been charged with making fraudulent claims for more than $30,000 in disaster assistance funds targeted for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott announced the charges Wednesday, calling the five individuals' behavior "unconscionable."

Larry McDaniel and Jerry Davis, both 34 and of Sacramento, are each accused of stealing more than $12,000 in funds earmarked for Katrina victims. They are charged with making false claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and mail fraud related to those claims, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle Rodriguez.

Davis also is charged with defrauding the Department of Housing and Urban Development. He allegedly attempted to obtain public housing benefits by falsely claiming he was displaced by the hurricane.

Marysville residents Crystal Housley, 27, John Housley, 49, and Shawn Cudaback, 26, are each charged with conspiracy to defraud the federal government, making false claims to FEMA and mail fraud. They allegedly stole $6,000 in disaster relief funds.

Each defendant faces up to five years in prison on the conspiracy and false claims offenses and up to 20 years on the mail fraud charges. If convicted, each defendant also faces a $250,000 fine and a three-year term of supervision, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

'God Was Right Here' During Restaurant Siege (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The Haitian restaurant Chez Yon Yon doesn't typically serve curried shrimp, but since Lyonel and Yanick Simeon are still shepherding their business through its first arduous year, they agreed to prepare the dish to please the two young gentlemen who came in for takeout Wednesday evening.

While the plantains were frying, the two men sat in small wicker chairs at the entrance of the Prince George's County restaurant, near a sign advertising the restaurant's money transfer business -- an unsuccessful service that hadn't operated in a few months. It seems no one noticed that the men were wearing bulletproof vests under their shirts.

For the next six hours, the two men would transform a warm fall evening into a hostage crisis and a tense standoff with Prince George's police.

Yesterday, Yanick and Lyonel Simeon told their story of the attempted robbery at 834 Chillum Rd., while Lyonel recovered from a beating and their 7-year-old daughter, the last hostage to get out, remained too skittish to go to school.

"This had all the makings of an absolute disaster," said Capt. Robert Liberati of the Prince George's County police.

But it ended with no shots fired and the arrest of two suspects -- Oliver Tunstall, 26, of Lanham and Darren Johnson, 19, of Landover.

Yanick Simeon said she feels grateful to be alive.

"God was right here," she said, standing amid the bloodstains on the restaurant's tile floor. "I don't know how else this could have gone the way it went. God had to be right here."

The day got off to a good start. That morning, a package arrived containing a framed restaurant review from last month's Washington Post. Lyonel Simeon proudly mounted it on the wall by the stairs. The couple's two children, son Yephnick, 11, and daughter Phabiene, 7, bustled around the restaurant, helping out. It seemed that the family's dream -- the moment they hoped for when, short of money, they slept on friends' couches -- might actually be realized.

"He was jumping up and down yesterday morning, saying this will stay on the wall for my children even when I'm dead," Yanick Simeon, 34, said of her husband, who was a well-known trombone player in Haiti before he came to the United States in the 1980s. "This was the same day. The same day."

It had been a relatively slow night when the two men walked in. Fewer than 10 guests were seated, though the Simeons were expecting a party of 18 to arrive shortly. Yanick Simeon hurried out the back door and down Riggs Road to the Save-A-Lot to buy spices.

Not long before 6 p.m., the men identified by police as Tunstall and Johnson paid for their carryout with a $20 bill. When Lyonel Simeon handed them change, one of the men pulled out a gun.

"Freeze," the man said, according to Lyonel Simeon. "Give me the money."

DOJ_NMG_0083867

Lyonel Simeon said he handed over the money from the register and his pockets, as well as his jewelry, but the men wanted more. His wife said the men demanded the nonexistent funds from the money transfer business.

Lyonel Simeon took one of the gunmen upstairs and "showed him the safe was open and there was no money inside." He said that the gunman pistol-whipped him and that he also was beaten with a VCR and a fire extinguisher.

"I said, 'You don't have to do that,' " he recalled.

Lyonel Simeon said his head wounds required nine staples.

When Yanick Simeon return to the restaurant, she said, she found both doors locked, and, looking through a downstairs window, she saw customers on the floor and one man stalking about the room.

"I thought everybody was dead," she said. "I was screaming."

She said she turned around to find two Prince George's police officers she knew standing behind her. They were coming for a meal, she said. The appearance of police caused enough commotion to bring the gunman down from upstairs, she said, at which point her husband poked his bleeding head out the second-story window.

"Help me, please, help me. You have to catch me," she recalled him saying. "I said, 'Honey, you have to jump.' "

She said yesterday that she believes he would have been killed if he had stayed.

Lyonel Simeon crashed down into the bushes and escaped. One of the gunmen went out a second-story window on the other side of the building, leapt onto a roof and then landed on the wooden deck stairs, she said. Police quickly arrested him.

The second man, identified as Tunstall, remained inside with as many as six hostages, including the Simeons' two children and a 9-year-old girl, authorities said.

Police moved in. About 30 tactical officers, including a SWAT team and conflict negotiators, rushed to the scene. Police blocked off Riggs Road, Chillum Road and nearby streets. A helicopter flew overhead, and an armored personnel carrier shuttled between the restaurant and the improvised command post outside a nearby Giant supermarket.

As dusk settled, Nixon Clermont, 44, a Haitian immigrant who plays kompa music with Lyonel Simeon, anxiously paced behind a police barricade on Chillum Road about 400 yards from the restaurant.

"I'm numb. I got the calls from the guys and I'm driving like a madman to get down here," he said. "This is unbelievable. I've never seen anything like it."

Police quickly contacted the hostage taker on his cellphone, and they talked to him repeatedly throughout the evening, said Cpl. Diane Richardson, a police spokeswoman.

"There were times he would just hang up. Other times he would talk," she said. "We had an officer who maintained contact with him and asked him to surrender peacefully."

At one point, a police officer stuck a hose through a window into the kitchen to extinguish burning food, Richardson said. About 30 firefighters were standing by.

Tunstall did not injure the children, police said. Yanick Simeon said her children told her that Johnson was the more aggressive of the two gunmen and that Tunstall allowed them to watch television. Over a period of hours, all of the hostages managed to escape or were released until only the robber and 7-year-old Phabiene remained inside.

About 10:40 p.m., an officer inside the armored truck used his public-address system. He told Tunstall to switch lights on and off if he could hear the police, and Tunstall complied, police said.

"I know you can hear me, and I know you're listening," the officer's voice boomed out. The spectators, who were kept far away, strained to listen.

The officer said he knew that Tunstall wasn't sure what to do, "and that's normal."

"Nobody's going to hurt you or harm you in any way," the officer said. "You're not a bad person."

"You were good enough to let the people come out," he went on. "Everybody here just wants you to come out."

From the police barricade on Chillum Road, Audrey Clarke, 35, who works in the grants office of the National Institutes of Health, suddenly pointed at the second-story window.

"I saw him! He's upstairs!" she said, as a dark shape passed by the window.

"This could last all night," Clermont said.

"I think he's going to give up," Clarke said of the hostage. "He has to. He's got no place to go."

Police negotiators eventually persuaded the robber to give the cellphone to Phabiene and let her go.

"We directed her outside. We told her it was okay," said Richardson, the police spokeswoman. "She was on the phone with us the entire time she was walking out."

With no hostages remaining, police fired tear gas through second-story windows, and Tunstall emerged within five to 10 minutes, police said. He was arrested without further incident.

Both men were charged with assault, armed robbery and use of a handgun; Tunstall was additionally charged with false imprisonment, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0083868

The Simeons plan to reopen Chez Yon Yon tomorrow.

"This was police work at its best," said Prince George's Chief Melvin C. High.

Witness Says He Stood By As Cousin Beat Reporter (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

It was as if David E. Rosenbaum sensed something in the darkness of Gramercy Street NW.

The 63-year-old journalist, out for a stroll near his home, stopped and looked around for a moment, one of the men accused in his death testified yesterday. But Rosenbaum didn't see anything, and by the time he did, it was too late.

Seconds later, Percey Jordan jumped Rosenbaum from behind and began beating the retired New York Times reporter with a heavy plastic pipe, Jordan's cousin said in D.C. Superior Court.

"Give it up, old man, give it up, old man," Jordan yelled, according to his cousin, Michael Hamlin, who testified in the second day of Jordan's trial before a jury in Judge Erik P. Christian's courtroom.

"It took him by surprise because it happened so quick," Hamlin said of the attack, which unfolded about 9 p.m. Jan. 6 in the 3800 block of Gramercy.

Jordan struck him twice in the head and three times in the torso, Hamlin said, and Rosenbaum staggered and crumpled to the sidewalk as Hamlin rushed in and ripped Rosenbaum's wallet from his hip pocket.

Two days later, Rosenbaum succumbed to his wounds, and a few days after that, the men suspected of killing him turned themselves in to police after store surveillance images linked them to the crime.

Not until yesterday had Hamlin, 24, provided a public account of what he says happened that night. Dressed in dark blue jail-issue shirt and pants, Hamlin sounded contrite at times, at one point choking up and pausing to regain his composure.

Facing his cousin across the courtroom, Hamlin, who pleaded guilty last month to murder, laid the worst acts of that night on Jordan -- an accusation that Jordan's attorney, Michael Starr, has assailed as a self-serving lie.

Hamlin kept changing his story during his interrogation by police in January, authorities said, and Starr said his testimony is only the latest in a series of fabrications.

Hamlin insisted yesterday that he was telling the truth. He said the trouble began after he came home from his job at a trash hauling company, took his mother to her Friday night card game and set out on a ride with his cousin, listening to oldies music along the way. "Let's go, cuz, let's go, cuz," Hamlin recalled Jordan, 42, telling him that night once they reached Wisconsin Avenue. Hamlin's planned dinner in Bethesda with a lady friend could wait, but the robbery Jordan was itching to do could not, Hamlin said he was told.

"I gave him a look, but I agreed to do it," Hamlin said during questioning by the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines.

In the darkness, in a corner of the District unfamiliar to him, Hamlin became disoriented, he said, when he pulled his Cadillac into Rosenbaum's quiet Northwest Washington neighborhood. Looking around, Jordan said he wanted to break into some of the "nice houses," Hamlin told the jury. But Hamlin told his cousin he wanted no part of any burglaries, he said yesterday.

Then, Hamlin said, they saw Rosenbaum, who had taken a walk after dinner in hopes that the cold winter air would cure him of his hiccups.

But before the cousins could strike, a woman walking her dog entered the block, prompting Hamlin to move his car to distract her, Hamlin said.

Jordan got out of the car and slipped behind a tree, the plastic pipe -- previously reported to be a metal pipe -- hidden in his sleeve, Hamlin said. About that time, Rosenbaum, who was wearing headphones, paused to look around, Hamlin said.

Accosted by Jordan, Rosenbaum resisted before the blows from the pipe sent him falling, Hamlin said. Darting in to steal Rosenbaum's wallet, Hamlin heard the murmurs of a dying man. "He mumbled, but I don't know what he said," Hamlin said yesterday.

After divvying up the cash -- $265 or $275 -- and the credit cards, Hamlin said, his conscience weighed on him. "I looked at my cousin, and I just stared at him, and I thought about it, and I said, 'It wasn't right.' "

Taking a last look at the man they had attacked, Hamlin was tempted to try to help him, he said yesterday. But he didn't. "I thought he was going to recover from his injuries," he said. "I didn't think he was hit that hard."

So they left him there. A neighbor found him and called for help. Initially believed to be intoxicated and not seriously hurt, Rosenbaum was treated as a low medical priority.

An investigation by the city found that emergency medical personnel failed Rosenbaum at almost every turn. As they sped off, Hamlin and Jordan didn't know the damage they had done, Hamlin said.

DOJ_NMG_0083869

According to prosecutors, the cousins then went to the 1200 block of Woodside Parkway in Silver Spring and robbed a woman in her 50s before making their way back to Southeast Washington, where they lived and where they went on a shopping spree using the cards stolen in the two robberies.

Security cameras captured them in a CVS and a Safeway, where they filled their baskets with laundry detergent, fabric softener, body lotion, deodorant and jumper cables, Hamlin said.

FBI Investigates Boeing Scientist In L.A. (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 20, 2006

LOS ANGELES – The FBI is investigating a Boeing Co. scientist with Defense Department security clearance whose computer the company seized earlier this year after he allegedly misused it, according to officials and court documents.

The FBI has searched the San Fernando Valley home of Abraham Lesnik three times in recent months, said bureau spokeswoman Laura Eimiller. She declined to say why, and affidavits filed in the case are sealed.

However, according to court filings the probe comes after Lesnik's laptop computer was confiscated in May after he searched for map directions during an unclassified teleconference.

Lesnik's Defense Department security clearance is listed as “Secret, Special Access” on a resume attached to the filings. The documents are part of a legal action he filed to prevent Boeing officials from examining his computer.

Lesnik, who has four children and five grandchildren, says his computer's contents include personal financial, medical and family information.

“Mr. Lesnik has never improperly transmitted any classified information to anyone,” said his attorney, Marc Harris.

Boeing spokesman Walt Rice said the company was “cooperating with U.S. government investigators.” He declined to comment further.

FBI Investigates Boeing Scientist's Handling Of Data (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

Bloomberg News, October 20, 2006

The FBI searched the home of a Boeing scientist in Los Angeles after the company confiscated his laptop.

"Search warrants were executed with respect to this matter, but they are under seal," said FBI spokesman Bill Carter in Washington, D.C. He declined further comment.

ABC News reported earlier that the FBI's foreign counterintelligence unit is investigating Abraham Lesnik's handling of secret information.

Boeing turned over the laptop to the FBI over concerns classified data ended up in the hands of unauthorized individuals, ABC reported, citing unidentified investigators.

Lesnik hasn't been charged with a crime, said his lawyer, Marc Harris.

"My client has never improperly transferred classified information to anyone," Harris said in a telephone interview.

Lesnik, a senior engineer for 28 years, has worked for Boeing since March 2004, according to a complaint Lesnik filed in Los Angeles County Superior Court to prevent Boeing from accessing private information on the laptop.

Lesnik's supervisor confiscated the computer in May because Lesnik was using it for private purposes during a Boeing meeting, according to the complaint filed June 22.

Boeing spokesman Walt Rice said the company is cooperating with the investigation. He declined additional comment.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, declined to comment.

L.A. Scientist For Boeing Is Focus Of Probe (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

Federal agents examine handling of classified data. A lawyer denies wrongdoing by his client, whose work has targeted threats to aircraft.

Federal authorities are investigating the handling of classified information by a Los Angeles scientist who works for the aerospace giant Boeing.

Though the FBI would not comment on the probe, spokeswoman Laura Eimiller confirmed that agents served three search warrants within the last two months at the Valley Village home of Abraham Lesnik. The warrants remain under seal.

Lesnik's attorney, Marc Harris, also declined to talk about the case, other than to dismiss any notion that his client engaged in corporate espionage or turned over information about a U.S. government project to a foreign power.

"He has never improperly passed classified information over to anyone who shouldn't have seen it," Harris said, declining to elaborate.

Earlier this year, Lesnik sued Boeing after a supervisor seized his laptop computer because he was accessing the Internet website Mapquest during an office meeting.

In his lawsuit, Lesnik challenged the confiscation of his laptop on grounds that it contained personal information on his wife and four children. He also said Boeing's policies permitted use of the computer.

According to court papers in the case — including Lesnik's resume — he has a Defense Department security clearance of Secret, Special Access. The resume also said that Lesnik, who has worked for Boeing for two years, has been a physicist and engineer for more than 30 years, and that he previously worked for two other major defense contractors: Northrop Grumman and Raytheon.

Lesnik's role at Boeing was not immediately known. At Northrop Grumman, according to his resume, his work included developing systems to detect and track threats to aircraft, particularly threats from missiles. Later, his resume suggests, he continued to work on the same types of surveillance and warning systems at Raytheon.

Lesnik's lawsuit also suggests that Boeing was concerned about data he carried on his laptop. On June 20, it says, Lesnik met two Boeing security officials who "advised me that the laptop computer was in their custody and had not yet been examined, but that Boeing intended to conduct a 'forensic examination' of the computer's contents."

Lesnik said in his lawsuit that he treated his laptop as an extension of himself, keeping personal diaries, e-mails concerning his children's school performance and records on his family's finances and medical histories.

"If I had known that Boeing could, on a whim and without any notice or reasonable basis, confiscate this laptop and claim the right to 'investigate' everything that I recorded on it, I would obviously not have used the laptop for my personal use," he said in the suit.

Several calls to Boeing seeking comment were not returned.

greg.krikorian@latimes.com

joe.mozingo@latimes.com

Thefts Solved By DNA Analysis (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, October 20, 2006

The national database of criminals' DNA, designed by the FBI to help solve rapes and murders, increasingly is being used to identify suspects in unsolved burglaries and other property crimes, a USA TODAY review of state crime lab records shows.

In 10 states — Alabama, Florida, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, New Mexico, Ohio, Oregon, Virginia and Wisconsin — the total number of DNA matches in property-crime cases has exceeded the number of matches in violent crimes, the review indicates. Other states also are reporting increases in property-crime matches: Of Georgia's first 171 matches, only 13 involved DNA from the scenes of unsolved burglaries. Of the 300 matches that followed, 79 were in burglary cases.

Oregon state police DNA analyst Brian Ostrom says there are many reasons for the rise in property-crime matches. DNA testing has become more sophisticated, he says, allowing analysts to draw genetic profiles from evidence left at burglary scenes — palm prints, cigarette butts, sweat stains on gloves and masks — nearly as easily as they can get profiles from blood or semen at the scenes of violent crimes. And government grants for testing evidence, initially limited to violent crimes, now can be used to analyze DNA from property crimes.

Since 1990, the states, the federal government and the military have collected DNA from those convicted of felonies — serious crimes punishable by more than a year in prison — and stored the genetic profiles in computer databases. Several states collect DNA from those convicted of misdemeanors, such as minor assaults. With FBI software, the profiles are compared with DNA from crimes. The system was designed to “solve violent crimes,” its mission statement says.

The database contains DNA profiles from about 3.5 million people and has scored matches in about 38,000 cases, FBI scientist Thomas Callaghan says. The system adds about 25,000 profiles a month.

The FBI does not keep track of the types of crimes for which the system scores DNA matches, nor does it track how many matches produce arrests or convictions. USA TODAY compiled statistics on matches by reviewing records in the 20 states that account for about 85% of the system's matches.

Critics say using DNA to solve non-violent crimes could raise privacy concerns by dramatically expanding the database. Some question spending millions of dollars to probe such crimes. “For what it does in terms of cost, and in threats to civil liberties, (the database) has to justify itself much better,” University of Minnesota political science professor Jay Aronson says.

DOJ_NMG_0083871

Backers of expanded DNA testing say burglars often go on to commit more serious crimes. In Alabama, about 80% of the rapes solved via DNA databasing in the past five years were linked to criminals whose DNA was taken after a burglary conviction, state forensic biology chief Angelo Della Manna says.

Retired Clarksburg Policeman Headed For Federal Prison. (WVSJ)

The (WV) State Journal, October 20, 2006

A retired Clarksburg police officer learned his sentence Thursday for possessing child pornography.

Ronald Alonzo pleaded guilty in July to federal charges of possessing child porn Alonzo, 54, will spend 46 months in federal prison. He will also be supervised for three years after his release.

Prosecutors say Alonzo was working as an officer when he confessed to having sexually explicit images of minors on his computer.

An FBI investigation determined Alonzo was receiving and sending pictures of children under the age of 18 as attachments in e-mails.

He is scheduled to report to prison on November 30.

Plea Deal Resolves DUI Charge In Ferrari Crash Case (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

A Swedish businessman and ex-convict charged in the infamous crash of a million-dollar Ferrari in Malibu pleaded no contest Thursday to drunk driving.

Bo Stefan Eriksson, 44, agreed to the plea deal to clear the way for his trial next week on grand theft, embezzlement and firearms possession charges, his lawyers said.

"We want to fight the battle where the battle is. It makes no sense to chase windmills and waste the jury's time and the court's time," said attorney James Parkman.

Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Patricia M. Schnegg will sentence Eriksson for the drunk driving offense at the conclusion of his trial.

Eriksson is accused of illegally bringing a second Ferrari and a Mercedes into the U.S. without authorization of the British banks that held the titles.

Eriksson allegedly crashed a red 2003 Ferrari Enzo into a utility pole on Pacific Coast Highway on Feb. 21. Authorities said the car, reportedly worth $1 million, was going 162 mph when it crashed.

The exotic car, glamorous setting and white-knuckle speed of the crash made for a sensational news story both in California and Europe. Then even more intriguing details emerged.

The video game executive told police at the scene that a man named Dietrich had been behind the wheel. Eriksson said Dietrich ran away before authorities arrived.

Eriksson also said he was deputy commissioner of the police department of the San Gabriel Valley Transit Authority, a tiny private agency that provides rides to the disabled and elderly.

A few minutes after the crash, two men arrived, identified themselves as Homeland Security officials and spoke to Eriksson at length before leaving.

Eriksson has nine criminal convictions in Sweden for forgery, counterfeiting, narcotics and firearms offenses. Because of his criminal record, Eriksson cannot legally possess a gun in this country. He faces a weapons charge for a handgun that police found at his Bel-Air house.

peter.hong@latimes.com

CIVIL LAW:

Returning Vets Can Face New Fight (MINNST)

By Bob Von Sternberg, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 20, 2006

An Inver Grove Heights Reservist went to court after trying to get his job back at the Ford plant in St. Paul.

When Army Reservist Mitch Minnaert came marching home to Inver Grove Heights after 15 months of active duty in 2003, all he wanted to do was to go back to work at the Ford plant in St. Paul.

That was easier said than done.

DOJ_NMG_0083872

After several wanderings though the company's bureaucratic maze and two more mobilizations as an intelligence officer, he sued the company in federal court, a lawsuit that was settled earlier this year.

Ford wouldn't comment on this case but said it wouldn't violate the law.

"I kept ending up between a rock and a hard place, because I could have stayed on active duty, but I needed the benefits Ford had," said Minnaert, a 22-year military veteran. "The way I was treated, problem after problem -- I can't be the first person who's had this."

He's not, by any means. Last year, a survey by the Government Accountability Office concluded that as many as 8 percent of 119,761 deactivated Reserve members were not promptly rehired by their civilian employers. Fourteen percent lost seniority, seniority-related pay or benefits; and health insurance for about one in 10 wasn't immediately reinstated, the survey found.

Still, it appears the federal government's web of laws and regulations designed to protect the jobs of returning troops has worked the way it was designed far more often than not, both in Minnesota and nationwide.

"Some employers aren't following the law, not out of malice, but to protect their bottom line," said Harry Sieben, Minnaert's attorney and a brigadier general in the Minnesota National Guard. "After 36 years in the military, I've heard about hundreds of these cases and filed dozens of lawsuits."

Another local case involves about 20 members of the mechanics union at Northwest Airlines who were on military leave serving in Iraq and elsewhere more than two years ago, were given layoff notices and did not get eight weeks of pay that normally accompanied some layoffs.

Local 33 of the Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Association (AMFA) filed grievances on those members' behalf, but those grievances have not yet been resolved, a union spokesman said.

Dennis Schulstad, who leads the volunteer effort to help Reservists and Minnesota National Guard members with their employment problems, said they crop up most often because of employers' ignorance about the law's requirements.

"Occasionally, yes, people do fall through the cracks," he said. "This thing is not perfect, but I think the system is working very well."

In 1994, Congress enacted the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act in the wake of the Gulf War, requiring that employers reinstate returning soldiers to positions equivalent to those they left, while protecting seniority, raises and benefits they would have had while on duty.

More than 6,000 complaint cases were opened by the U.S. Department of Labor between Sept. 11, 2001, and April of this year, the department reported. Minnesota cases during that period have totaled 119.

Those cases can be resolved informally or can ultimately be pursued in federal court by the Justice Department. On average, that has occurred only a few dozen times annually nationwide, according to the Accountability Office.

A veteran's first stop for help is often with the Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve, a Defense Department agency staffed by volunteers in every state. Minnesota's branch has 10 ombudsmen who conduct informal mediations between employees and their bosses.

James Thune, the program's state staff coordinator, said that its track record in Minnesota is comparable with nationwide patterns, showing that more than 95 percent of the cases it handles are resolved informally.

First suit was settled in 1999

In the case of Minnaert, 42, that didn't happen.

He joined the Army in 1984. After he finished a nine-month hitch in Bosnia in 1997, he showed up at the firm where he worked as a security guard and was told the job was no longer his.

"I returned safe and in one piece and they refused to reemploy me," he said. He tried government channels, went to Sieben, sued and in 1999 reached an undisclosed settlement.

He began working on the assembly line at Ford's Highland Park factory, primarily, he said, because of the benefits. "I could always go back on active duty, but the benefits aren't as good as they are at Ford," he said.

When he was called to active duty about two months after 9/11, Minnaert said, he tried to make sure all of his Ford paperwork was in order.

"When I came off orders in February of '03, I called them and they said to be here at 3 p.m. Monday so I could start my shift at 5."

But Ford didn't hire him back, and it became temporarily moot when he was reactivated in April 2003. "When that ended, I got a phone call from Ford and they agreed to hire me back," Minnaert said. "But my life insurance was cut down, pay raises I should have gotten didn't come in."

In May 2004, Minnaert was deployed to Iraq. While he was gone, Sieben went back to U.S. District Court in Minneapolis and sued Ford. The case was settled in January with a sealed agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0083873

Ford officials won't comment directly on the case, citing privacy policies. In a statement, company spokeswoman Kathleen Vokes said Ford "appreciates the commitment of the men and women serving in the armed forces and would not violate the statute."

Said Sieben: "Some people in the Guard and Reserve aren't getting what they're entitled to. ... "I'm sure it's a small percentage of cases, but it's 100 percent for someone in Mitch's situation."

And Minnaert isn't sure his travails are over. He has been reactivated again. "Because I won't be on the payroll, I'm worried I won't be eligible for the buyout" that Ford is offering to its 75,000 union workers in the United States.

Company officials wouldn't comment, but Jim Eagle, chairman of United Auto Workers Local 879, said the union "isn't going to leave our military guys and gals just hanging. We don't know the specifics of the buyout yet."

Added Sieben: "I'm going to wait and see if I have to sue them again."

Bob von Sternberg · 612-673-7184 · vonste@startribune.com

IT, Intranets Would Improve FOIA Processes, Attorney General Says (FCW)

By Aliya Sternstein

Federal Computer Week, October 20, 2006

A review of agency plans to improve Freedom of Information Act operations by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales found that many want to adopt information technology -- including internal Web sites -- for expediting requests.

“Agencies have enthusiastically embraced the area of advanced technology and automation as a means of improving their FOIA operations, most particularly as a way of meeting the challenges faced by those with backlogs of complex FOIA requests,” the report states.

A December 2005 executive order directed the attorney general to issue a FOIA report based on an assessment of individual agency implementation plans and fiscal 2005 annual agency FOIA reports. Gonzales submitted his report to the president Oct. 16.

Notably, two agency plans included intranet FOIA Web sites for their employees, the report states.

The Interior and Commerce departments have taken a step that “can increase an agency’s efficiency, though improved communications among its FOIA personnel has perhaps its greatest value in bridging the distance that otherwise can exist in large agencies between headquarters and field office employees,” Gonzales wrote.

He recommended that other agencies carefully consider this strategy for their FOIA divisions.

Gonzales also recommended that in the coming months, agency officials collaborate in mapping out approaches that use technology to cost-effectively expedite FOIA requests and reduce backlogs.

Agencies reported in their plans that they want to deploy or upgrade an automated system for scanning, redacting and processing FOIA records that works faster and wastes less paper.

Likewise, agencies widely recognized the importance of refining and maintaining Web sites for FOIA administrative purposes, according to the report.

Decentralized agencies, such as the departments of Veterans Affairs and Housing and Urban Development, are using IT to keep better track of the status of requests, Gonzales wrote.

Lawmakers recently acted on legislation that would strengthen FOIA beyond the requirements of the executive order. On Sept. 27, the House Government Reform Committee’s Government Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee passed the OPEN Government Act, which would mandate that each agency have a phone or Internet service to update FOIA requestors on the status of their requests.

In responding to the attorney general's report, subcommittee Chairman Todd Platts (R-Pa.) said he will not introduce any IT-specific legislation because each agency's IT needs vary.

"We feel that legislation would be too prescriptive and therefore that [IT] should be addressed at the agency level," subcommittee staff member Tabetha Mueller said.

For example, she added, a system that works for an agency with a centralized structure might not work for a more decentralized department.

"Mr. Platts would want to allow agencies to meet the goals in the OPEN Government Act -- establishment of a tracking system -- in the most appropriate way for their situation," Mueller said. "Agencies need flexibility to design the IT solution that best meets their needs."

DOJ_NMG_0083874

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Candidate Urged To Exit Race (AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

GARDEN GROVE, Calif. — Orange County Republican leaders on Thursday called for the withdrawal of a GOP congressional candidate they believe sent a letter threatening Hispanic immigrant voters with arrest.

Tan D. Nguyen denied knowing anything about the letter in an interview Thursday with The Associated Press but said he fired a campaign staffer who may have been responsible for it. Nguyen's attorney said his client had no intention of quitting.

County Republican Chairman Scott Baugh said that after speaking with state investigators and the company that distributed the mailer, he believes Nguyen had direct knowledge of the "obnoxious and reprehensible" letter. He told the AP that the party's executive committee voted unanimously to urge Nguyen to drop out of the race against Democratic U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez.

"I learned information that allows me to draw the conclusion that not only was Mr. Nguyen's campaign involved in this, but that Mr. Nguyen was personally involved in expediting the mailer," Baugh said in a telephone interview.

State and federal officials were investigating the letter, which was written in Spanish and mailed to an estimated 14,000 Democratic voters in central Orange County. It warns, "You are advised that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time."

Immigrants who are adult naturalized citizens are eligible to vote.

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant whose opposition to illegal immigration has figured heavily in his underdog campaign, was not immediately available to react to the committee's vote. His attorney, David Wiechert, said Thursday night that his client does not plan to quit.

"Mr. Nguyen has no intention of dropping out of the race. He would do the public a disservice if he dropped out," Wiechert said.

The attorney said he and Nguyen met with investigators for two hours Thursday. He described the meeting as "pleasant and professional" but declined to elaborate.

Nguyen said he has fired an employee in his office who he believes might have used his campaign's voter data base to send the letter without his knowledge.

"I will do whatever I can do to encourage all citizens in this district to vote," he said.

Orange County is an immigration battleground. One founder of the Minuteman civilian border patrol group ran for Congress here, and cities have debated issues such as the value of public centers for day laborers and the use of local police to arrest illegal immigrants.

Complaints about the letters this week prompted a state probe, and a spokesman for California's attorney general said investigators had been questioning people in Orange County. U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said the department's civil rights division was investigating in coordination with the state attorney general's office.

Numerous political leaders denounced the letter, including Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

"If it is proven that a candidate was responsible for this action, that candidate is clearly not fit to serve the people of California and should withdraw immediately from his or her race," California GOP Chairman Duf Sundheim said in a statement.

In an interview Thursday morning, Sanchez said she had never spoken to Nguyen because her campaign didn't see him as a threat to her re-election.

"If it is in fact this guy (who sent the letter), the most disgusting and saddest thing about it is that it comes from another immigrant," said Sanchez, who was born in the U.S. to Mexican parents and whose 1996 election signaled Orange County's increasing diversification. "These communities have spent years trying to get naturalized immigrants to vote."

Nguyen's campaign Web site says he was born in 1973 in Vietnam, where his family fled the Communist regime.

In 2004, he unsuccessfully ran in the Democratic primary to challenge GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher in a heavily Republican coastal district. He later changed his party affiliation and declared his bid to upset Sanchez.

State attorney general spokesman Nathan Barankin said he did not know how long the investigation would take, but did say that investigators "have identified where we believe the mailing list was obtained."

The owner of Huntington Beach-based Mailing Pros, Christopher West, said he did not know any laws were being broken when his company sent the mailer. "It was in Spanish, and I don't read Spanish," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083875

West said he gave investigators the name of the person who hired him, but he declined to provide that name in an interview.

The letterhead of the mailing resembles that of an anti-illegal immigration group, the Huntington Beach-based California Coalition for Immigration Reform. The group's leader, Barbara Coe, said she told investigators Wednesday that her group didn't authorize the letter and that she didn't know who sent it.

"The letterhead was altered, and I've never head of any Sergio Ramirez," the name signed to the letter, Coe said.

This is not the county's first dispute over alleged intimidation of Hispanic voters. In 1988, Republican Assembly candidate Curt Pringle posted uniformed "security guards" at 20 predominantly Hispanic voting places in Orange County.

Republicans said the guards were stationed to prevent noncitizens from casting ballots. Pringle and the county GOP paid $400,000 to settle a civil rights lawsuit alleging intimidation of Hispanic voters.

State Investigates Allegations Of Voter Intimidation In California (MCT)

By Martin Wisckol And Dena Bunis, The Orange County Register

McClatchy Newspapers, October 20, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Condemnation of an intimidating mailer from Congressional candidate Tan Nguyen's campaign swelled Thursday, as state investigators continued interviews in the county and the U.S. Justice Department joined the probe.

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer told Nguyen's opponent, Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Garden Grove, that details should become clearer in the next couple days and that his office "would be making arrests," Sanchez said.

Nguyen, a Republican, said Thursday that a campaign worker helped put out the letter without his knowledge and that she had been fired. He called the letter, which targeted immigrant voters, "flawed and ill-conceived."

But Orange County Republican Party Chairman Scott Baugh didn't believe Nguyen's denial and continued to call for him to bow out of the race.

"I've learned that Mr. Nguyen was involved in expediting that mailer," Baugh said. "I've had conversations with the attorney general and folks involved with the mail house. He called the mail house himself and told them to expedite the mailing."

Nguyen, who said Thursday morning that he was scheduled to meet with investigators later in the day, did not return subsequent calls seeking response to Baugh. Lockyer's office did not return calls seeking specifics of Nguyen's relationship to the case.

The letter, written in Spanish and sent to about 14,000 foreign-born Hispanic voters, said that immigrants voting in an election are committing a crime that "could result in jail time, and you will be deported for voting without a right to do so."

Immigrants who become U.S. citizens have the same voting rights as native-born citizens.

"If it is determined that this letter was directed to prevent a certain population from voting, then potentially there could have been a criminal act and there could be criminal charges," said Cynthia Magnuson of the U.S. Justice Department.

The controversial letter also said a new federal computer system could verify the names of newly registered voters and that anti-immigration groups could access the information.

Magnuson said there is no such system and no plans for one.

The mailer carried the letterhead of the Huntington Beach-based California Coalition for Immigration Reform. CCIR founder Barbara Coe condemned the letter and said her group had no part in it.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called the letter "a despicable act of political intimidation."

Sen. Barbara Boxer called it "outrageous and reprehensible." Assemblyman Van Tran, R-Westminster also condemned it.

Throughout the Vietnamese community, there was criticism of the campaign tactic. A coalition of Hispanic, Asian-American and Muslim groups will hold a joint press conference today to denounce the letter.

Nguyen said he would hold a press conference today to discuss whether he will remain in the race. If he pulls out, his name would remain on the ballot.

Orange County Democratic Party Chairman Frank Barbaro praised Baugh for calling on Nguyen to bow out. Barbaro also called on Registrar of Voters Neal Kelley to write voters who received the letter and encourage them to vote. Kelley said Thursday he is not planning such a mailing.

Like Baugh, Barbaro doesn't believe Nguyen's denial of involvement with the controversy.

"All roads lead to Tan Nguyen," he said.

But Barbaro said that rather than hurt Democratic and Hispanic turnout, it could provide a boost. While Sanchez was already predicted to win easily, turnout will play a key role in the competitive match for state Senate between Democrat Lou Correa and Republican Lynn Daucher.

"The anger here is amazing," Barbaro said. "People are mobilizing. This is going to help elect Lou Correa."

Correa wasn't so sure.

DOJ_NMG_0083876

"I'm getting phone calls from voters saying they're afraid to vote," he said.

O.C. Candidate Is Disowned (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen, Mai Tran And Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

Republicans urge their House hopeful to quit over a campaign letter scaring Latino voters.

Orange County Republican leaders urged their own congressional candidate to withdraw from the race Thursday after he acknowledged that his campaign was involved in sending out a letter intended to scare off Latino voters.

Tan Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant waging an uphill battle against a longtime Democratic incumbent in central Orange County, faced a battery of questions from state attorney general's investigators and possible civil and criminal liability for voting rights violations.

With a political firestorm growing less than three weeks before the Nov. 7 election, Nguyen said Thursday that he had fired the campaign's office manager, who he said helped produce the letter, but that he had no prior knowledge of it.

His account was contradicted by the chairman of Orange County's Republican Party, who said he had been told by the mail house that sent the letter that Nguyen was personally involved in its development.

The episode was a jarring reminder of what some observers call Orange County's history of xenophobia and voter intimidation, an ugly distinction that Republican leaders say they've tried hard to bury.

Just days ago, Nguyen had been largely overlooked as a quixotic challenger to Democratic U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, running a largely self-funded campaign that had little support from the Republican Party apparatus.

But the racially charged letter sent to an estimated 14,000 registered voters in Santa Ana, Garden Grove and Anaheim brought sweeping, national condemnation from both political parties.

Written in Spanish, the letter stated at one point: "You are advised that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time…."

The letter evoked memories of the 1988 race for the 71st Assembly District in Orange County, when the local GOP hired uniformed guards to stand in Latino neighborhoods with signs stating, "Non-Citizens Can't Vote." Even when it paid an undisclosed sum to settle a lawsuit, the GOP doggedly denied wrongdoing.

That is not the case today, as Republicans rush to condemn the letter. With the election 18 days away, politicians from the U.S. Senate to the state Senate on both sides of the aisle emerged to denounce the mailing, and several advocacy groups said they would hold rallies today and Saturday urging authorities to fully investigate the matter and prosecute anyone involved.

At the same time, Republican officials on Thursday quickly sought to distance themselves from Nguyen, with several calling for him to bow out of his underdog campaign.

Nguyen has hired a lawyer and met with investigators from the state attorney general's office Thursday.

Addressing questions about the letter publicly for the first time, Nguyen said his office manager "took it upon herself to allow our database to be used to send out the letter. It was disseminated without my authorization or approval."

The office manager, whose name was not made public, had been working for Nguyen since he opened his campaign office. He said the employee had access to a database of Democratic voters, which he bought to send mailers to 73,000 households.

Nguyen denied any involvement.

"People are pointing fingers saying that I did it, and that's going to get cleared up," he said. "I want to get the truth out so people can vote for candidates for the right reasons."

The office manager could not be reached for comment.

In an interview Thursday, Orange County GOP Chairman Scott Baugh said representatives of the Huntington Beach mail house hired to send the letter told him Nguyen had been directly involved.

"It has been relayed to me that Mr. Nguyen himself was involved in expediting this particular mail piece," Baugh said. "He called the mail house and asked them to do it."

Christopher West, owner of Mailing Pros, said in a phone interview that he wouldn't confirm or deny that Nguyen was involved. He added that he had spoken with investigators from the attorney general's office and had told them "the whole enchilada."

Another person familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the campaign office manager gave the database to a volunteer, who paid for and oversaw the production of the mailers.

Baugh, who called the letter "reprehensible and stupid," said the party's executive committee voted unanimously to ask Nguyen to withdraw from the race.

DOJ_NMG_0083877

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has called the letter "a despicable act of political intimidation and a hate crime," while Democratic gubernatorial hopeful Phil Angelides called it "the latest in a disgraceful pattern of efforts to intimidate Latino voters" by Republicans.

Rep. Sanchez said she hoped voters who received the letters would get additional correspondence, perhaps from the California secretary of state's office, encouraging them to vote. She said she was horrified that an immigrant was involved in such a scheme.

"To have an opponent who is an immigrant who is suppressing the immigrant vote is disgusting and sad," she said.

Nguyen "owes an apology to these 14,000 people. Someone needs to send out a letter to these people to explain that we want them to vote."

Nguyen said he would not withdraw from the race. "We're winning and we're going to win," he said.

Nguyen has made halting illegal immigration part of his campaign against Sanchez, who is Orange County's only Democratic member of Congress.

County officials said Nguyen met with Orange County Registrar Neal Kelley in August and asked him how illegal immigrants can be prevented from voting.

"He wanted to talk about how to keep illegal immigrants from voting," said Brett Rowley, a spokesman for Kelley who sat in on the session. "That seemed to be his main concern."

The letter warned that the state had developed a tracking system that would allow the names of Latino voters to be handed over to anti-immigrant groups.

Information in the letter is false. Immigrants who become naturalized citizens, such as Schwarzenegger, can vote. An illegal immigrant who votes can be subject to jail and deportation, but the letter's assertion that the state had developed a system that would make it easy to track down immigrants or illegal residents is false.

The letter was especially frustrating, Baugh said, "because we have been engaged in methodical efforts to open the party up."

Some observers say xenophobia has long been part of the GOP playbook in a county that spawned Proposition 187, the 1994 ballot measure that sought to curb public services for illegal immigrants. It is also home to Jim Gilchrist, co-founder of the Minuteman Project for citizen border patrols, and Costa Mesa is the nation's first municipality seeking to train local police in immigration enforcement.

"It's most natural that it would occur in Orange County," Nativo V. Lopez, president of Hermandad Mexicana, a Latino civil rights group, said of the letter. "It's a direct outcome of the type of anti-immigrant frenzy that still abides here."

When Sanchez narrowly ejected high-profile Republican Robert K. Dornan from his central Orange County House seat in 1996, Dornan accused Hermandad of registering illegal immigrants to vote. The House Oversight Committee concluded that not enough noncitizens had voted to shift the outcome, and a grand jury declined to indict Hermandad or its officers.

Peter Hinton, an attorney who represented plaintiffs against the Orange County GOP in the case stemming from the stationing of poll guards at voter precincts, said the letter indicated "that we're back in the dark ages."

"I'm really quite shocked to learn that it's going on again," Hinton said. "I thought we'd come way beyond that. This is like the South before Martin Luther King Jr."

christian.berthelsen
@latimes.com
mai.tran@latimes.com
christopher.goffard
@latimes.com

Times staff writer Jennifer Delson contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

`You are being sent this letter ...'

Following is a translation of a letter written in Spanish by the campaign office of Tan Nguyen, a Republican congressional candidate in central Orange County, and mailed to an estimated 14,000 registered voters.

Greetings …

You are being sent this letter because you were recently registered to vote. If you are a citizen of the United States, we ask that you participate in the democratic process of voting.

You are advised that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time and you will be deported for voting without having a right to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0083878

At the same time, you are advised that the government of the United States is installing a new computer system to verify the names of all new registered voters that vote in the October and November elections. Anti-immigration organizations can ask for information from this new computer system.

Unlike Mexico, here, there is no incentive to vote. There is not a voter registration card in the United States. Therefore, it is useless and dangerous to vote in any election if you are not a citizen of the United States.

Do not listen to any politician that tells you the opposite. They are only looking out for their own interest. They only want to win elections without any regard to what happens to you.

Sincerely,

Sergio Ramirez

The translation from Spanish was done by the office of state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles).

Calif. Campaign In Turmoil Over Letters (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 19 -- A California Republican's congressional campaign went into meltdown Thursday after he said a staff member was responsible for sending thousands of letters to new voters with Hispanic surnames telling them -- wrongly -- that it is illegal for them to vote if they are immigrants.

Tan Nguyen, the GOP candidate for California's 47th District, said in a statement that a staff member had sent the letters without his knowledge and has since been fired. Nguyen, himself an immigrant from Vietnam, has focused his campaign on keeping illegal immigrants out of the country, a deeply felt issue in suburban Orange County.

"The mailer was flawed and ill-conceived," Nguyen's statement said. "I will do whatever I can in the weeks before the election to encourage all citizens in this district to exercise the most important of their democratic privileges."

The Orange County Republican Party immediately called for Nguyen to withdraw from the race. He will hold a news conference today.

Written in Spanish, the letters advise recently registered voters that it is a crime for those in the country illegally to vote in a federal election, which is true. They also say, falsely, that immigrants may not vote and could be jailed or deported for doing so, that the federal government has a new computer system to verify voter names, and that anti-immigration organizations can access the records.

As many as 14,000 letters were sent in the district, now represented by Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D). The letterhead identified them as coming from the California Coalition for Immigration Reform.

The group denied responsibility, and California Attorney General Bill Lockyer launched an investigation into possible violations of two state laws that prohibit intimidation to suppress voting. On a radio program, Lockyer confirmed that his office was focused on a Republican congressional candidate.

Sanchez said she has called for a federal probe into possible violations of the Voting Rights Act. "We would like to find who did this and have them prosecuted," she said.

Local Republicans have largely ignored the race, though Sanchez's seat is not normally considered safely Democratic. The district narrowly went for President Bush in 2004.

Nguyen, 32, was largely unknown to local Republicans until he beat out a favored candidate to face Sanchez. Two years ago, Nguyen ran as a Democrat in an effort to take the 46th District seat of Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.).

Orange County Republican Party Chairman Scott Baugh said: "When I interviewed him to determine why he was becoming a Republican, I was less than convinced that he switched parties because he doesn't believe in the values of Democrats. Then, after getting the nomination, he wanted the Republican Party to carry him across the finish line. And I told him that's not how it works."

Nguyen had spent $427,000 of his own money on the race as of September, according to campaign filings.

His campaign materials describe immigration as the focus of his campaign. He praises the Minuteman Project and opposes Bush's proposed guest-worker program.

Nguyen himself immigrated to the United States at age 8, one of thousands of Vietnamese to flee in boats. He worked as a stockbroker before entering politics.

Orange County is known for heated immigration politics. One-third of its residents are Hispanic, according to 2004 census data, and the area is home to large populations of Vietnamese and Middle Eastern immigrants. It is also the birthplace of several anti-illegal-immigration movements. Jim Gilchrist, founder of the Minutemen, is a resident, as is Barbara Coe, founder of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform.

DOJ_NMG_0083879

"Certainly this is a very polarized area," Sanchez said. "When you have people like the creator of the Minutemen living there, and Gloria Tuchman, who worked on the anti-bilingual law, and Barbara Coe, one would say that it's a pretty volatile area."

County G.O.P. Asks Candidate To Withdraw Over Letter Threat (NYT)

By Cindy Chang

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 19 — The Orange County Republican Party asked one of its Congressional candidates on Thursday to withdraw from the November election after a campaign worker from his office sent a letter threatening Hispanic voters with jail if they went to the polls.

The candidate, Tan Nguyen, who is running on an anti-immigration platform, said in a news release on Thursday: "Evidently, an employee took it upon herself to allow our database to be used to send out the letter. It was disseminated without my authorization or approval. The employee has been discharged."

The letter, which The Los Angeles Times reported was sent to about 14,000 voters in central Orange County last week, wrongly claimed that immigrants could be subject to criminal penalties if they voted in a federal election. Immigrants may vote only if they are naturalized citizens.

The letter also claimed that anti-immigration groups would be able to access a federal computer system containing the names of those who vote in October and November. No such database exists.

Despite Mr. Nguyen's disavowing involvement with the letter, local Republican leaders said they thought he had played a direct role in it, said Adam Probolsky, a spokesman.

"The Republican Party of Orange County has asked Mr. Nguyen to resign his candidacy," Mr. Probolsky said. "We condemn all voter intimidation, and Mr. Nguyen is not a welcome member of our party."

Mr. Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant, is running an underdog campaign for the 47th Congressional District seat held by a five-term Democrat, Loretta Sanchez, a member of the House Hispanic Caucus. The district has a sizable Vietnamese and Hispanic population.

The Justice Department and the California attorney general are investigating the case. Bill Lockyer, the attorney general, said Wednesday on a local radio station, KPCC-FM, that the sender of the letter might have violated state laws against voter intimidation.

Written in Spanish and mailed to residents with Hispanic surnames, the letter advised that "if you're an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration" or deportation.

It was signed Sergio Ramirez and printed on stationery purporting to be that of the anti-immigration group California Coalition for Immigration Reform. That group's leader, Barbara Coe, said the stationery did not resemble her group's and denied it had sent the letter.

Monitors Sought At Polling Places In Pa. (AP-Y)

By Kathy Matheson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

The federal government has asked a judge to post monitors at city polling places next month to make sure Spanish speakers get proper help when voting.

In a federal lawsuit, the Justice Department accused the city of failing to provide enough election materials in Spanish and failing to recruit enough bilingual poll workers to assist voters who don't speak English well.

The suit, filed last Friday, asked the court to authorize monitors through 2009, and also filed court papers asking that action be taken in time for the Nov. 7 election.

A spokesman for the mayor's office did not immediately return a call for comment Thursday.

The lawsuit also contends that the city violated the federal Voting Rights Act by allowing only poll workers — some of whom did not speak Spanish — to help Hispanic voters cast ballots. The law permits voters who require assistance to request help from someone they know.

About 10 percent of Philadelphia's 1.4 million residents are Hispanic, according to 2004 Census figures cited in the suit. The government estimates that about 36 percent of voting-age Hispanics in the city have limited English skills.

The Justice Department won a similar suit against Berks County in March 2003, when a federal judge substantiated allegations that officials there had engaged in "hostile and unequal treatment" of Hispanics during past elections.

Berks County officials had resisted providing Spanish-language ballots, saying they discouraged people from learning English.

DOJ_NMG_0083880

Bill Could Bring Justice In Old Civil Rights Murder Cases (MH)

By Audra D.s. Burch

The Miami Herald, October 20, 2006

The slow march to close the cold cases that lay buried with the bones of the civil rights movement is closer to resolution.

A bill before Congress proposes to establish a squad -- much like the popular television series Cold Case-- in the Justice Department to prosecute unresolved slayings from the civil rights era, mostly those occurring before 1970.

The measure, also known as the Emmett Till bill, is part of a sweeping national effort to reconcile the ugliest crimes of the era, at least symbolically.

"It is critically important that we right the wrongs of the past and bring to justice the people who perpetrated heinous crimes predicated on racial hatred," said Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., who along with Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., sponsored the bill.

``While we cannot bring back and make whole those who suffered and died at the hands of racists, we can at least reaffirm our nation's commitment to seek the truth and make equal justice a reality."

All over the South, prosecutors are tackling a dozen or so defining civil rights cases, despite graying suspects and witnesses and fading memories. The most famous is the case of Emmett Till, the Chicago boy murdered in Mississippi after whistling at a white woman more than a half-century ago.

"The blatant failure for decades to bring Emmett Till's murderers to justice was and is a national disgrace," said Talent. ``The idea for this legislation grew out of the Emmett Till case. . . . It became clear that we needed to create federal offices to investigate and prosecute unsolved murders that occurred in the era before there was vigorous enforcement of federal law."

The proposed legislation, which is likely headed to the Senate floor after midterm elections next month, would create partnerships with state and local officials and give more prosecutorial muscle to solve crimes -- such as the case of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, a young black college student and a sawmill worker from Mississippi who were killed in 1964.

At the time, FBI agents were scouring the landscape of Mississippi to find three missing voter registration volunteers, James Chaney, Michael Schwerner and Andrew Goodman.

Instead, they found Moore and Dee -- beaten, broken, bloodied -- dumped into the the muddy waters of the Mississippi River near the town of Tallulah, La. But they were not registration workers and so their deaths, however heinous, went largely forgotten -- until recently.

Mississippi officials, buoyed by the convictions of several septuagenarians who had murdered blacks during the civil rights era, reopened the case of Moore and Dee.

The passage of the bill, which was first introduced in April, would go a long way toward helping solve the case.

It would create the Unsolved Crimes Section, a unit within the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, and an Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Investigative Office in the Civil Rights Unit of the FBI.

More than anything, the measure creates a staff and resources dedicated to the cause. But well before now, the Justice Deparment had been involved in the retrying of cold cases, including Edgar Ray Killen, who was convicted last year of orchestrating the killings of Chaney, Schwerner and Goodman and the 1994 conviction of Byron De La Beckwith who murdered Mississippi NAACP leader Medgar Evers in 1963.

"Symbolically, this will give families some closure," said Penny Weaver of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate crimes.

She added, ``You are talking about people having to live with the idea that somebody killed their loved one and got off scot-free, got to live out their lives."

Dakota Divided As Abortion Vote Tests US Opinion (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Sioux Falls, South Dakota

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

Abortion-rights activists in South Dakota took many by surprise a few months ago when they said voters should decide the fate of the state's new abortion law, the most restrictive in the US.

Now, with a referendum on the November 7 ballot, their campaign has become the frontline in the long-running national debate on abortion.

A victory here would show that even in a conservative Midwestern state, the public will not tolerate a near-total ban on abortion. But a defeat would signal just how difficult a challenge campaigners face in trying to protect a woman's right to abortion.

While they bristle at the attention, the South Dakota activists are counting on residents of this old frontier state to prove them right.

DOJ_NMG_0083881

"I don't think South Dakota likes being in the limelight," says Jan Nicolay, co-chair of the South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, formed to fight the abortion law, as a light snow falls outside the group's slipshod Sioux Falls office.

"We're a pretty independent, proud group of people," she adds, hoping that independent streak will help voters reject what she sees as government meddling in an individual decision.

The law, passed with broad support by the state legislature and signed by Governor Mike Rounds in March, makes it a crime to help a woman abort a pregnancy at any stage, including in cases of rape and incest. Women would not face charges but doctors who perform abortions could be sentenced to five years in prison. The only exception in the law is to save the life of the mother.

The central message of the campaign to repeal it – taped on the office window, printed in voter guides being mailed out this week and mentioned frequently by volunteers making telephone calls to voters – is a simple one: "This law simply goes too far." The referendum has prompted vigorous public debate, with television and radio advertisements, lawn signs and newspaper inserts. Neither side will discuss how much money has been spent, and how much of their firepower is coming from outside the state. "It's a very divisive issue," says Jack Billion, Democratic candidate for governor, who backs repeal of the law. "It pits family versus family."

A recent poll showed opponents of the law with a slim lead, and abortion-rights activists hope victory here could discourage other states from moving to adopt similar bans. But if their repeal effort fails, they will take their battle to the courts.

A court challenge would be welcome news for some anti-abortion activists, who see the strict South Dakota law as a good opportunity for the US Supreme Court – with President George W. Bush's two appointees, John Roberts and Samuel Alito – to overturn Roe vs Wade, the landmark 1973 ruling that legalised abortion.

The Vote Yes for Life campaign is based in a warehouse on the outskirts of Sioux Falls. Outside, a bumper sticker declares, "The Killing Stops Here". Inside, a home-schooled teenager stops by to volunteer. There are hundreds of lawn signs to be distributed and DVDs that feature women who regret their abortions, and one who became pregnant after she was raped. "I am here to say that true compassion does not come from abortion but from giving life."

Rushing between appointments, Leslee Unruh, who is leading the campaign, mentions an abortion she had nearly 30 years ago and the support she received from other "post-abortive" women who say they regret their decisions. She has tried to expand the traditional debate on abortion beyond its effect on the unborn to its effect on women.

"We're not going to be silenced," she says. "It doesn't matter if we win or we lose. We are educating people that abortion hurts women and we're not going to stop."

She shakes her head when asked whether the state can make such decisions for others. "Don't get pregnant then, if you don't want a child," says Mrs Unruh. But maintaining legal access to abortion should not be an option. "We need to be protected. Abortion harms us, physically and emotionally."

South Dakota voters drew national attention two years ago when they surprised the political pundits and voted out Tom Daschle, Democratic leader in the US Senate. This year, voters' positions on the abortion question are difficult to predict, frequently crossing gender and party lines.

Sharon Rons, a Democrat who owns her own small business, said she would vote to keep the law. "I don't think abortion should be a form of birth control," she says, adding that the decision to end a pregnancy "could haunt women for the rest of their lives".

But some Republicans say they will oppose it, perhaps a reflection of a libertarian strain that runs through the sparsely populated state. "I just don't feel that somebody else should make this decision for a woman," said one Republican pensioner.

"We are responsible people," said Mrs Nicolay, a Rep-ublican and former member of the state legislature. "We can make our own decisions."

Court: Groups Must Offer Contraceptives (AP-Y)

By Michael Gormley, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

New York's highest court ruled Thursday that social service agencies run by the Roman Catholic Church and other faiths must provide birth-control coverage to their employees, even if they consider contraception a sin.

The 6-0 decision by the Court of Appeals hinged on whether Catholic Charities and the nine other groups are essentially social service agencies, not churches.

At issue was a 2002 state law that requires employers to provide health insurance coverage for mammograms, bone density screening and other preventive services for women, including prescription contraceptives. The law exempts churches, seminaries and other institutions with a mainly religious mission.

Catholic Charities and the other groups sued the state for an exemption but lost in the lower courts.

DOJ_NMG_0083882

The organizations "believe contraception to be sinful," the Court of Appeals said. "We must weigh against (their) interests in adhering to the tenets of their faith the state's substantial interest in fostering equality between the sexes, and in providing women with better health care."

The New York Catholic Conference said it may appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We think this has never really been about contraception. We think it was to target the church and open the door for coverage of abortion," said Dennis Poust, spokesman for the Catholic conference.

Kelli Conlin, president of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, said the ruling "shows that no one is above the law, including the Catholic bishops."

The New York court said the fact that the organizations hire employees outside their faith was a critical factor and that they deserve the rights sought under the law.

Catholic Charities said that while it considers an appeal, it will continue to cover contraceptives for employees under protest.

Sharing The Health Bills (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

It looks like a business and, in many ways, acts like one. But it is beyond the reach of most of the rules and government oversight that apply to businesses — because it is a church mission.

This is the "medical bill sharing ministry" known as Christian Care Ministry, based in Melbourne, Fla., the largest of a handful of similar ministries around the country.

E. John Reinhold, who once worked with the Campus Crusade for Christ and is now the ministry's chairman, explains the concept simply: "You add up all the medical bills and divide by the number of sharing households. Everybody kicks in and you pay the bills."

Every month, in roughly 19,000 households across the country, ministry members — who must be observant Christians with recommendations from their pastors — write a check to Christian Care Ministry. The amount depends on their family's size and how much of their medical bills they are willing to pay out of their own pocket.

And each month, the ministry writes checks to health care providers — totaling more than $240 million since it was founded — to cover the medical bills submitted by its members. Roughly $57 million moved through the ministry in its latest fiscal year.

Mr. Reinhold, who formed Christian Care in 1993, says it is an efficient way for Christians to fulfill the admonition of Galatians 6:2, which tells them to "carry each other's burdens, and in this way you will fulfill the law of Christ."

But over the years, some state officials have looked at ministries like Christian Care and seen what they would call unregulated health insurance. Their concern is that confused consumers looking for low-cost coverage will rely on these groups as if they were insurance companies, even though the groups may lack the resources to pay claims.

Next week it will be Mr. Reinhold's turn to defend his organization, before a state judge in Kentucky.

Kentucky was one of a half-dozen states that passed laws in the early 1990's exempting religious bill-sharing ministries from state insurance laws. But regulators there say that Mr. Reinhold's organization goes beyond what that exemption allows — a claim the Florida ministry says is misguided, because its practices actually improve on the state's requirements.

The exemption being tested in Kentucky this month is just one of a host of special arrangements for religious ministries that are not available to similar secular organizations — exemptions rooted in the First Amendment's ban on any Congressional action that would restrict the free exercise of religion or establish an officially sponsored religion.

Special breaks like these have been accumulating at a time when religious organizations of all faiths are expanding into a range of new activities that may compete directly with businesses and other nonprofit organizations that are not eligible for the same exemptions.

The Internal Revenue Service has a number of special rules for religious nonprofit groups. Under those rules, as a ministry of the American Evangelistic Association, which ordains clergy and supports various educational and humanitarian missions, Christian Care Ministry is not required to file public financial statements with the I.R.S., as secular nonprofit organizations are.

The I.R.S. makes this exemption available to all churches — including synagogues, temples, mosques and other congregational forms in different faiths — as well as church associations, auxiliaries and retirement plans; religious elementary and secondary schools; foreign mission societies; and the "exclusively religious" activities of any religious order.

As part of a church association, Christian Care is also protected by special limits Congress has put on the I.R.S.'s ability to audit religious congregations.

These restrictions, which do not apply to other nonprofit groups or for-profit entities, require a top-level I.R.S. official's approval before any audit can begin. The religious group must get advance notice and the opportunity for a personal conference before the audit can proceed. The audit must be finished in two years. Finally, if the inquiry does not turn up deficiencies, the I.R.S. cannot return to audit that issue again for five years.

DOJ_NMG_0083883

How does a bill-sharing ministry become eligible for I.R.S. exemptions that apply to churches? Although the tax agency decides case by case what qualifies as a church, it lists more than a dozen criteria it weighs in reaching its decisions. These include having established times and places of worship, a recognized creed and liturgy, a distinct history and form of ecclesiastical government and spiritual leaders who are ordained in some way after a course of study.

Christian Care says the I.R.S. has determined that the American Evangelistic Association, the ministry's parent organization, meets the test. And the association's exemption extends to the ministry, Mr. Reinhold explained, because it is not considered an unrelated business — whose revenue would be taxable — but part of the association's religious mission.

But bill-sharing ministries make some regulators nervous. Indeed, the first such ministry that most regulators encountered, the Christian Brotherhood Newsletter ministry in Barberton, Ohio, faced questions, and sometimes lawsuits, from regulators in about three dozen states for more than a decade after it was founded in 1982.

The warning currently printed in Christian Brotherhood's monthly newsletter summarizes the arguments these ministries make when regulators accuse them of being health insurers: "Whether anyone chooses to pay your medical bills will be totally voluntary," members are told. "As such, this publication should never be considered as a substitute for an insurance policy."

Four years ago, a group of independent directors successfully sued Christian Brotherhood's founder and several members of his family, accusing them of diverting millions of dollars for their personal use. The attorney general's office in Ohio, which regulates charities, joined the case as co-plaintiff. By the time the founder and his relatives were removed from management, the pile of unpaid bills was as high as $27 million, a backlog the ministry expects to eliminate by next summer, according to the Rev. Howard S. Russell, who helped initiate the earlier litigation and who leads the ministry today.

Mr. Russell said the ministry had tightened its managerial controls and improved its communication with its members since the lawsuit. It makes its financial records available to the public both through an annual statement called a Form 990, filed with the I.R.S., and through responses to requests made by phone or on its Web site, he said.

Another large bill-sharing ministry, Samaritan Ministries International, based in Peoria, Ill., also files a Form 990 with the I.R.S. each year.

But Mr. Reinhold noted that churches had long been exempt from filing with the I.R.S. "I've been in Christian work since 1972 and I've never heard of a church filing a Form 990," he said in an e-mail message.

Christian Care Ministry did provide The Times with the independent audits for the parent association and affiliates for the fiscal years that ended last June and June 2005. The new draft audit substantially restated the 2005 results, to change the accounting treatment of the members' money.

Robert Baldwin, the ministry's president, said the change underscored the fact that these pending medical payments were not actually legal liabilities of the ministry — as previous accounting suggested.

The ministry reports that that member receipts in fiscal 2006 grew 11 percent over the previous year, after adjusting for the accounting change. The monthly sharing requirement was raised in March and raised again in July. The association spends about 17 percent of every member's monthly check to pay administrative costs. For years, the ministry also paid premiums for "stop loss" insurance that kicked in to cover the bills for catastrophic medical incidents.

The insurance policy had been purchased through an affiliated trust in the British Virgin Islands, which receives member contributions and sends out the medical payments.

Glenn Jennings, who until July was executive director of the Kentucky Office of Insurance, says it was the offshore insurance policy that prompted him to take a hard look at the ministry; such a policy would seem to go beyond voluntary bill sharing to the kind of formal safety net an insurance company provides.

"When I learned about that, I said to them, 'You're really starting to quack a lot like a duck,' " Mr. Jennings said.

Mr. Jennings filed suit, arguing that Christian Care does not qualify for the state's religious ministry exemption. His successor, Julie Mix McPeak, is pursuing the case, which is set for a final hearing in state court next week. .

In its defense, the ministry has argued that to deny it the safe haven of the state exemption would violate its First Amendment rights of religious freedom.

Nevertheless, the ministry eliminated one point of dispute with Kentucky regulators on Oct. 2 when it canceled its insurance, effective at the end of last month.

Mr. Baldwin, the ministry's president, said the ministry made the move, not because of the lawsuit, but because the benefits did not justify the expense.

But another difficulty remains. Kentucky requires that each sharing household send its check directly to the family whose bills it is helping to pay, not to some central office as Christian Care members do. But Mr. Reinhold said his practice leaves a clearer audit trail.

DOJ_NMG_0083884

He seemed unconcerned about the Kentucky litigation. “We went through this eight years ago,” he said. “Then, you have a regime change and another set of bushy-tails comes into command and it starts up all over again.”

ANTITRUST:

Avery Dennison Says DOJ Closes Probe (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

PASADENA, Calif. --Label and tag maker Avery Dennison Corp. on Thursday said the Justice Department has closed its investigation into alleged price-fixing in the label stock industry, without any action.

The company, one of the largest makers of office products and adhesive labels, first disclosed the probe in April 2003.

Avery Dennison shares rose 40 cents to $62.69 on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. Closes Probe, Avery Says (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

The label company apparently is still the target of price-fixing inquiries overseas.

Avery Dennison Corp. said it was notified by the Department of Justice on Thursday that the government had closed its investigation into competitive practices in the labeling industry.

Pasadena-based Avery said it was told that "no further action" would be taken in the case. Company executives declined to comment further.

The Justice Department couldn't be reached for comment late Thursday.

Avery first revealed in April 2003 that it was part of an investigation into the market for pressure-sensitive label stock, which is used on products as varied as shampoo bottles and office supplies.

Avery and Bemis Co., a Minneapolis-based competitor, were subpoenaed by the government later that year.

At the time, the Justice Department was suing to block the $420-million purchase of Bemis' MACtac unit by Raflatac Inc., a subsidiary of Finnish paper products maker UPM-Kymmene Corp.

The government argued that the deal would hinder competition in the label stock industry.

Avery, which commands about half of the labeling market, apparently is still under investigation by regulators in Europe and Australia regarding possible price fixing and manipulation.

Two years ago, Avery said an internal investigation had uncovered "instances of improper conduct" by employees in its European operations and said the infractions could result in heavy fines by regulators.

The company didn't describe the nature of the wrongdoing.

Avery launched the internal probe after the European Commission — the European Union's antitrust authority — began to look into the company's actions as part of a broader probe of the labeling market.

Avery's announcement came after the close of trading Thursday. Its shares, which rose 40 cents to $62.69 during the day, were little changed in after-hours trading.

martin.zimmerman@latimes.com

AmSouth To Sell 52 Branches In Antitrust Agreement (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

AmSouth Bancorp. said Thursday it agreed to sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee to settle Justice Department concerns over possible antitrust violations in its nearly $10 billion merger with Regions Financial Corp.

AmSouth said the branches have total assets of about $2.7 billion. The largest number of the offices are in the Mobile area, where 22 are located in two counties.

In exchange for the sale, the Justice Department said it agreed not to challenge the merger on antritrust grounds.

The deal is in the final stages of review by the Federal Reserve board.

The Birmingham-based AmSouth has 691 branches and $52.8 billion in assets. Regions, also with headquarters in Birmingham, has about 1,300 branches and $84.6 billion in assets.

AmSouth Identifies Branches To Be Sold In Merger With Regions Financial (BIRMBIZ)

Birmingham Business Journal, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083885

AmSouth Bancorporation will sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee to comply with antitrust requirements related to its pending merger with Regions Financial Corp., the bank holding company announced Thursday.

The branches hold deposits totaling approximately $2.7 billion.

None of the branches is in Birmingham, headquarters of both AmSouth (NYSE: ASO) and Regions Financial (NYSE: RF). Most of the Alabama branches are in the Mobile area.

The divestiture of the branches was required by the Justice Department to ensure that the merger of the two banks would not create unfair competition in certain markets in which both have a significant presence.

"We are dedicated to selling these branches to companies that share our commitment to our associates, our customers, and our communities," said Dowd Ritter, AmSouth's chairman, president and CEO. "We would expect the purchasers to offer positions to the associates in these branches, and we will work hard to ensure that our customers and associates experience a flawless transition."

The sale of a branch includes its deposits, loans and equipment. Customers of the affected branches "do not need to do anything at this time," the news release said, as they will be notified once a sale occurs. The release notes, too, that the Justice Department and the Federal Reserve made the decision on which branches were to be sold.

Alabama branches to be sold are as follows:

Decatur: 2404 Danville Road.

Huntsville area: 107 Lily Flagg Road S.E., 4769 Whitesburg Drive S., 1470 Perimeter Parkway N.W., 2204 Whitesburg Drive, 7930 Highway 72 (Madison).

Mobile area: 511 D'Olive St. (Bay Minette), 13825 S. Wintzell Ave. (Bayou La Batre), 28770 U.S. 98 (Daphne), 111 Baldwin Square (Fairhope), 51 S. Section St. (Fairhope), 7860 Airport Blvd., 5133 Cottage Hill Road, 2820 Springhill Ave., 1402 Government St., 720 Hillcrest Road, 6241 Cottage Hill Road, 3920 Airport Blvd., 7849 Cottage Hill Road, 3942 Government Blvd., Old Shell Road, 3250 Airport Blvd., 5351 Highway 90 W., 2326 St. Stephens Road, 34 Shelton Beach Road (Saraland), 7800 Moffat Road (Semmes), 10010 Eastern Shore (Spanish Fort), 500 Spanish Fort Blvd. (Spanish Fort).

Montgomery area: 3725 Alabama 14 (Millbrook), 5375 Atlanta Highway, 1465 Eastern Blvd., 2710 Taylor Road, 743 S. Main St. (Wetumpka).

Selma: 9 Broad St.

Tuscaloosa area: 3076 McFarland Blvd. (Northport), 719 Skyland Blvd. E., 2330 University Blvd., 331 University Blvd.

AmSouth's merger with Regions Financial is expected to close in November and will create one of the nation's 10 largest bank holding companies, with assets of about $140 billion.

Kidney Dialysis Center Deal With Amgen Blocks Roche (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

In a move that could help preserve its lucrative monopoly on an important anemia drug, Amgen has reached an agreement that will make it the sole supplier of the drug to one of the nation's two main operators of kidney dialysis centers.

The deal, announced yesterday by the dialysis provider, Fresenius Medical Care, comes as Roche is preparing to enter the market next year with a drug that would offer the first competition to Amgen's drug, which is known as Epogen.

Now, it appears, Roche will not be able to sell its drug to Fresenius, which represents about 35 percent of the American dialysis market.

Some analysts said the deal, which lasts for five years, could raise antitrust concerns. "We would use an analogy of Microsoft signing an exclusive supply agreement with Dell precluding Dell from selling any computers with a competitive operating system a few months before a market entry of a competitor," Michael Aberman, biotechnology analyst at Credit Suisse, wrote yesterday in a note to clients.

Dr. Aberman said in an interview that a deal with Fresenius alone might not attract concern. But if Amgen were to arrange a similar exclusive supply agreement with DaVita, the other major provider of dialysis, with about 30 percent of the market, it would draw attention.

Marie Fay, an Amgen spokeswoman, said the company did not think the deal presented any antitrust issues. She said that Fresenius had approached Amgen, not the other way around, about having a broader collaboration.

Still, the deal comes as Amgen's marketing practices are drawing increasing scrutiny. Representative Bill Thomas, the California Republican who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has asked the Government Accountability Office to do a report on pricing and other aspects of drugs used for dialysis patients.

Medicare, which pays most expenses for dialysis, even for people younger than 65, is estimated to spend roughly $2 billion a year on Epogen, representing one of its biggest expenditures on any drug.

Epogen had $2.5 billion in sales last year. It and Aranesp, a similar drug that also is used to treat anemia, together accounted for nearly half of Amgen's overall $12.4 billion in revenue last year.

Both drugs are synthetic forms of erythropoietin, also called EPO, a protein normally made in the kidney that spurs the production of oxygen-carrying red blood cells.

Epogen, approved in 1989, was Amgen's first product and helped transform the company into the world's largest biotechnology concern. While the basic patent protecting the product has already expired in Europe, Amgen got several patents in the United States, which could protect its franchise here until 2015.

Roche, the Swiss pharmaceutical company, has developed CERA, a form of EPO it says can be given less frequently than Amgen's drugs. Roche is expected to begin selling the drug next year, assuming approval by the Food and Drug Administration.

To block Roche, Amgen has filed a patent infringement suit against it in federal District Court in Boston. Roche said its drug did not infringe on the patent.

The deal with Fresenius, which is based in Germany, could provide further protection to Amgen.

Dr. Ben Lipps, chief executive of Fresenius, said that his company "selected Amgen as our sole supplier based on more than 10 years of demonstrated clinical efficacy and safety with Epogen." Analysts said Fresenius probably used the looming threat from Roche to extract a bigger discount from Amgen in return for making it the sole supplier.

Russians Sue To Stop Malkin From Playing (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A Russian hockey club filed an antitrust lawsuit Thursday against the NHL and the Pittsburgh Penguins, saying rookie Evgeni Malkin shouldn't be allowed to play in the league because he remains under contract in his native country.

The Metallurg Magnitogorsk hockey club, which filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, also demanded unspecified damages from the NHL and the Penguins over Malkin's deal to jump teams this summer.

NHL spokesman Frank Brown said he hadn't seen a copy of the complaint and couldn't comment. Penguins spokesman Tom McMillan said the team hadn't received the lawsuit and doesn't comment on litigation.

The 20-year-old Malkin left the Russian Super League team during August's training camp in Helsinki, Finland, slipping quietly into the United States to begin his NHL career. In his debut Wednesday night, Malkin scored his team's lone goal in a 2-1 loss to the New Jersey Devils.

Malkin was under contract for another year in Russia. The NHL had previously said the league believes any player should have the right to choose where he wants to play as long as he is legally free to do so.

After Malkin left his Russian team, he cited a Russian labor law that permits an employee to leave a job by giving two weeks notice.

The lawsuit, filed after a Russian arbitration panel ruled that Malkin is still under contract to Magnitogorsk, said the signing of Malkin to an NHL contract was a "blatant and deliberate tampering and interference" with the Russian team's existing agreement.

In the lawsuit, the team said the Penguins knew or should have known that Malkin was under contract to a Russian team when they signed him. The lawsuit said the NHL and the Penguins violated antitrust laws by conspiring in a group boycott and refusing to deal with Russian hockey clubs regarding player transfers.

Malkin and Magnitogorsk signed a one-year contract on Aug. 7, calling for Malkin to receive $3.45 million, according to the lawsuit.

It said the contract was negotiated and signed in the presence of Malkin's Russian agent and his parents, and provided favorable terms allowing him to become a free agent a year sooner than an earlier contract.

Malkin, the No. 2 pick in the 2004 NHL draft, missed the early part of the NHL season after dislocating a shoulder in his first preseason game.

The lawsuit said the NHL and its clubs have "decided to play hardball" with Russian hockey clubs to punish them for the Russian Ice Hockey Federation's rejection of a new general agreement governing the transfer of foreign players to the NHL.

It said the NHL told its clubs on Aug. 2 that they were free to sign NHL contracts with Russian hockey players already under contract with Russian hockey clubs if the players secured releases according to Russian labor law.

Tata Steel Nears Deal To Buy U.K.'s Corus For $8.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083887

LONDON -- Tata Steel Ltd. of India is moving closer to securing its purchase of Corus Group PLC, with the British steelmaker's board poised to approve the takeover and the likelihood of a competing bid fading.

Corus is set to announce as early as today that it has agreed to be acquired in a deal valued at about £4.6 billion, or $8.6 billion, according to people familiar with the situation. Corus's board, which met Wednesday, will recommend Tata's proposed cash bid of 455 pence ($8.50) a Corus share, according to these people.

The board of Corus is bound by United Kingdom takeover rules to disclose its decision once officially made. A Corus spokeswoman declined to comment.

Corus said Tuesday that Tata Steel proposed an acquisition of the British company at 455 pence a share, subject to a recommendation from Corus's board, and that talks were taking place. Since then, most of the remaining obstacles have been resolved.

Corus shares have been trading at levels higher than Tata's proposed bid price, largely on expectations that someone would attempt to trump the offer. But people close to the matter said that such a move is unlikely, since Corus has tried to sell itself all year and has talked to nearly all potential candidates. In London trading yesterday, Corus's stock price was off 1.8% at 478.50 pence.

While Tata Steel is far smaller than Corus, it is part of the Tata Group, a diversified conglomerate run by Ratan Tata. It is one of the largest and wealthiest groups in India. The deal would catapult Tata from an Indian steel producer with relatively limited capacity into one of the world's top global producers.

The steel industry has been fast consolidating, forming giant producers that can provide customers such as auto makers the steel products they need for factories in locations around the world.

Corus operates plants in Britain, which are considered among the world's least efficient with no nearby access to iron ore. It also has a state-of-the-art facility in the Netherlands. Tata, whose mills have been running at capacity, is building a mill that will produce semifinished slabs that could go to Europe to be finished and sold through Corus's operations.

The deal will be subject to normal regulatory clearance, although many potentially thorny issues, such as clearance from the trustee of Corus's huge pension fund, already have been negotiated, according to people familiar with the situation.

Any rival bidder would need to negotiate approval from Corus's pension-fund trustee and others.

Corus is advised by Credit Suisse Group and HSBC Holdings PLC. Tata Steel's advisers are Deutsche Bank AG and ABN Amro Holding NV. The deal will include a breakup fee of 1% of the transaction value, standard in acquisitions of U.K. companies.

Corus Expected To Agree To Tata Bid (FT)

By Peter Marsh In London And Joe Leahy In Mumbai

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

Corus, the Anglo-Dutch steelmaker, is on Friday expected to agree to a £5.1bn ($9.5bn) takeover by India's Tata Steel, in a deal that would create the world's sixth- biggest steel producer.

The move will throw down the gauntlet to any potential counter-bidders for Corus, Europe's second-biggest producer. Novolipetsk and Severstal, two Russian steel companies, and CSN of Brazil are thought to be interested.

A Tata-Corus deal would be the biggest takeover by an Indian business of a foreign company and underlines Asian dominance in steel, which – assuming the deal goes through – will account for five of the top six makers.

The transaction continues the rapid consolidation of the steel sector, illustrated by June's €26.9bn ($34bn) takeover of Arcelor by Mittal Steel.

Managers at Tata Steel and Corus were meeting separately on Thursday to discuss the details of the offer, which values Corus at 455p a share. The Corus board decided on Wednesday night to recommend the offer from Tata, which will be put to shareholders over the next two months.

The £5.1bn valuation includes an equity value of £4.1bn plus roughly £1bn in debt, and is subject to how big a valuation the two sides put on Corus's sizeable pension obligations. Corus shares on Thursday night closed at 478.5p, down 8.5p but still some way above the likely 455p price for the company favoured by Tata, indicating that some investors continue to believe a new bidder could come forward.

James Moss, a partner in First River, a US consultancy, said: "Corus represents important strategic assets in Europe for an emerging steel company such as Tata, and I find it difficult to believe this [the 455p bid] is the best offer for the business."

According to a person involved in the deal, Tata Steel – part of the Tata industrial group – plans to inject about $2.5bn of its own borrowings and $1bn cash into a special purpose vehicle that would take over Corus. This unit would then raise roughly $5.5bn of debt against Corus's cashflow.

DOJ_NMG_0083888

Created in 1999 from the merger of British Steel and Hoogovens of the Netherlands, Corus is three times bigger than Tata in terms of output. Some job losses among Corus's 41,000 workforce – 25,000 of whom are in the UK – would be likely, but a number of Corus's top managers are expected to stay on if the deal with goes through.

A link with Corus would help Tata diversify away from Asia and provide it with access to more sophisticated technology.

ENVIRONMENT:

Colorado Water Wars Include Spy Campaign (FINDLAW/AP)

By Steven K. Paulson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

(AP) - WIGGINS, Colo.-If some farmers in eastern Colorado felt like they were being watched this summer, they had good reason.

Private investigators hired by some of Colorado's fastest-growing communities spent weeks spying on them, trying to determine if they were illegally pumping water for their crops, The Associated Press has learned.

The investigators put together an elaborate database on 50 plots of land in eastern Colorado, noting things like "puddles around sprinkler perimeter" and "lush corn," and turned it over to state engineer Hal Simpson, who is investigating the claims.

"There was one man taking pictures. My wife asked if she could help him and he sped off," said Steve Bruntz, who recently joined other farmers at a Wiggins gas station to talk with a reporter.

Behind the fight are farmers who depend on irrigation, on one side, and cities that rely on water from the South Platte River, on the other. State water law guarantees that those with higher-priority rights get their share first.

The water crisis came to a head in May when the state engineer told farmers along the South Platte to turn off 440 wells after forecasting lower-than-average river flows and well owners were unable to devise plans to replace the water they were using.

Millions of dollars worth of wheat, corn, sugar beets and melons were left to die after some farmers and three cities - Sterling, Boulder and Highlands Ranch - rejected an emergency plan that would have allowed well owners to continue pumping.

Water attorney Tim Buchanan, who represents farmers with senior water rights, said he ordered the spying campaign because he suspected some well owners were continuing to pump water.

Buchanan said water users, including communities and farmers, hired a private investigator to go out during daylight hours to survey 50 plots of land. They then paid engineers to verify the information.

"We started hearing rumors and people in the area where the wells are located called us and said people were pumping contrary to the state's order," he said. "We looked only at properties that had wells as their sole source of water. Not only were they wet, they were growing crops."

Exact details of the spying program, including how many acres were studied and how much was spent to gather the information, was not disclosed.

But word of the investigation stunned farmers who say they are struggling because the state shut down their wells this spring after complaints from those holding more senior rights to the water.

"I wish I could have caught them on my property. We shoot every other trespasser and he'd be the second one," said David Knievel, whose name was in the database obtained by the AP.

Water attorney Veronica Sperling, who represents Boulder and Highlands Ranch, said her clients were concerned after hearing reports of illegal pumping.

Carol Ellinghouse, the water resources coordinator for Boulder, said she and others hired the investigator after she got a tip from a turf farm worker who said his neighbors were running their wells.

"They went out and some farms showed signs of being recently irrigated," she said. "Others were pretty lush, a condition that couldn't happen if they weren't watering."

John Hendrick, general manager of the Centennial Water and Sanitation District that supplies water to Highlands Ranch, said he was aware of the surveillance program and agreed with it.

"It's like people running a stop sign or speeding," he said. "The thing to do is identify the problem and fix it."

Farmer John Moser, who was on the list of alleged scofflaws provided to the AP for irrigating 290 acres and growing "green and vigorous alfalfa," said just because water is coming from a sprinkler doesn't mean the water is coming from a well. He said he is getting his water from a small lake on his property.

"It does upset me, for in fact they don't know the details. Does it bother me? Yes. Is there anything we can do about it? No," Moser said. "It's gotten out of hand. People are yelling and screaming at each other."

DOJ_NMG_0083889

On the Net:
Colorado Foundation for Water Education: http://cfwe.org

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

'Fire In The Hole!' ATF Shows Off Site For Gonzales (FFLS)

By Jeff Branscome
Fredericksburg (VA) Free Lance-Star, October 20, 2006
U.S. attorney general visits Fort A. P. Hill for an ATF demonstration

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stopped by Caroline County's Fort A.P. Hill yesterday for a fireworks show of a different kind.

Wearing a collared shirt with the Department of Justice's logo, Gonzales stood with his hands on his hips and watched a Ford Taurus explode about 1,000 feet away.

Ten pounds of dynamite in the car's back seat sent a plume of black smoke into the overcast sky.

"That's exactly what you're seeing in Iraq," Rich Marianos, a special agent for the ATF, told a reporter after assessing the damage.

It was the last of several improvised explosions at an 80-acre training site run by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Such exercises are a "very important contribution to our effort in Iraq," Gonzales said.

With his hands cupped to his mouth, an ATF employee shouted, "Fire in the hole!" several times before each boom.

Surrounded by a gaggle of cameramen and reporters, Gonzales wore protective glasses and earplugs.

But the gear didn't keep his head from quivering after the first explosion, which sent shock waves through the ground.

He turned around with a smile and proclaimed, "Wow!"

"There's nothing like experiencing it for yourself," Marianos later said.

They generated most of the blasts electronically with equipment used by the mining and quarrying industries.

At one point, officials showed off what they called "a wall of fire" by detonating 24 milk jugs filled with gasoline. That's the type of explosion seen in movies, officials said, but not real life.

Just before Gonzales arrived in a Chevrolet Suburban with tinted windows, an ATF employee asked, "Where are my dogs?"

He was referring to two bomb-sniffing Labradors, which they introduced to Gonzales at the start of his visit.

The labs then showed off their skills, with one sniffing a car for hazardous material. The dog eventually sat down to alert its handler of a problem.

For much of his 30-minute tour, Gonzalez spoke in low tones to Steve Beggs of Spotsylvania County, who is chief of ATF's explosives training branch at A.P. Hill.

The ATF established the training area in 2000, in part to teach local and state investigators how to check out the scene of a blast. Bomb technicians also learn how to dispose of explosives at the site, an open field with a large patch of asphalt.

"We probably have the broadest training mission of anyone in the federal government as it relates to explosives," Beggs said.

Gonzales left after a brief news conference but many folks stayed behind to check out the Ford Taurus--or what was left of it.

"You will save American lives," Gonzales told Beggs before taking a group photo with ATF officials.

Fifty pounds of ammonium nitrate--an explosive used in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing--made one blast possible.

In response to a question from Gonzales, Beggs said Timothy McVeigh used up to 5,000 pounds of the substance during his attack in Oklahoma City.

Gonzales called the demonstrations "interesting" and said they represent the "danger of explosives and the good work ATF is doing."

Jury Indicts 38 In Inquiry Into Multistate Drug Trade (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times
The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083890

A federal grand jury in Colorado yesterday returned an indictment against 38 persons suspected of drug trafficking in an investigation of a multistate marijuana and Ecstasy distribution and money-laundering operation in Denver, officials said.

Garrison K. Courtney, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Agency, said the probe known as Operation Berthoud led to the seizure of 95 pounds of high-grade marijuana, three indoor marijuana-growing operations containing 414 live plants, 1,500 tablets of MDMA, or Ecstasy, and more than $700,000 in cash, assets and stolen property.

Mr. Courtney said a 152-count indictment handed up in U.S. District Court in Denver accused gang members of engaging in a "pattern of racketeering activity" involving the shipment of 50-pound to 100-pound quantities of "BC Bud" marijuana -- a high-grade form of the drug grown in the Pacific Northwest -- from Washington state and California to Denver. The marijuana was valued at $3,000 to $4,000 a pound because of its potency, he said.

"This case ensures that this organization will never do business on the streets of Denver again," said Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the DEA's Rocky Mountain Division. "The fact that drug dealers are paying these prices for this high-quality marijuana reflects the appetite some in Denver have for the drug."

Police suspect the gang leader was Thanh Thea Hau, 22, of Denver, described in the indictment as the part owner of the Denver night club DC 10. He was named on 59 counts of drug trafficking.

Mr. Courtney said the charges stem from an investigation that began in March 2005 when Weld County, Colo., Task Force agents began purchasing quantities of Ecstasy from a suspected gang member.

Mr. Courtney said the purchases led agents to identify an Ecstasy trafficking organization operating in Denver, Seattle and San Francisco and bringing high-quality marijuana to Colorado.

"This case demonstrates the necessity for state, local and federal law-enforcement agencies to work in a cooperative manner to identify, target and dismantle drug trafficking organizations operating at a local, national and international level," Weld County Sheriff John Cooke said.

Mr. Courtney said that, according to agents, Mr. Hau was in contact with marijuana distributors in Seattle and San Francisco and arranged for the purchase of each load. Once the marijuana had been selected from the distributor, he said, Mr. Hau sent a driver from Denver to pick up the load and return the drugs to Denver in a rental vehicle.

The marijuana was then processed into one-pound bags for delivery to his clients, who in turn sold the marijuana to their customers for up to $500 per ounce, he said.

Denver Investigators Smash Lucrative Drug Ring (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

(AP) DENVER Investigators said Thursday they broke up a drug operation that was raking in up to $150,000 a month for its 22-year-old alleged ringleader by bringing high-grade marijuana from the West Coast to Colorado.

The alleged ring was bringing "BC Bud" marijuana from Washington state and California in 50- to 100-pound quantities, repackaging it and selling it for up to $500 an ounce, authorities said.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Denver district attorney's office said a Denver grand jury indicted 38 people on a total of 152 counts including drug distribution, marijuana cultivation, money laundering and racketeering.

Authorities said 25 of the suspects have been arrested and the others were being sought.

Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the DEA's Rocky Mountain Division, said the alleged ringleader was Thanh Thea Hau of Denver, part-owner of the Denver nightclub DC10.

Hau was making "pretty good money for a 22-year-old," Sweetin said.

A DEA statement said Hau faces 59 counts related to drug trafficking and is one of the 25 suspects in custody. The Denver jail said it had no record of Hau, and a DEA spokesman did not immediately return a call.

Michael Guerrero, general manager of DC10, declined to comment and referred questions to attorney Harvey Steinberg, who he said represents Hau. Steinberg did not immediately return a call.

Investigators seized 95 pounds of marijuana, more than 1,500 tablets of ecstasy, $149,000 in cash and 13 vehicles. Also seized were 414 live marijuana plants at three indoor growing operations.

The charges stemmed from a 20-month investigation dubbed "Operation Berthoud." The DEA said the Front Range Task Force, the Weld County Task Force and the Colorado State Patrol participated.

Dozens Arrested In Drug Investigation (DENP)

Denver Post, October 19, 2006

A sophisticated Denver-based drug ring that distributed ecstasy and high-grade California and Washington State marijuana in the metro area has been crushed following a year-long investigation, state and federal officials said today.

DOJ_NMG_0083891

The organization, allegedly headed by Thanh Thea Hu of Denver brought 50 to 100 pounds of marijuana into Denver a month, according to Jeffrey D. Sweetin, special agent in charge of the Rocky Mountain Division of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The marijuana was sold on Denver streets at $500 an ounce, Sweetin said.

"We uncovered a very significant organized crime group," Sweetin said. "We are talking about multi-pound deals. The transactions were conducted in residences or parking lots."

Sweetin said that Hau, 22, is part owner of the Denver nightclub, DC 10.

Denver District Attorney Mitch Morrissey said that the investigation resulted in the biggest indictment in the history of the Denver district attorney's office, with a total of 38 individuals being charged.

The 152-count indictment alleges that the individuals were engaged in a pattern of racketeering activity. Officials said Hau's organization transported 50-to-100 pound quantities of "BC Bud" marijuana, a high grade form of marijuana grown in the Pacific Northwest. The marijuana was valued at $3,000 - $4,000 per pound due to the drug's potency.

"This case ensures that this organization will never do business on the streets of Denver again," Sweetin said. "The fact that drug dealers are paying these prices for this high quality marijuana reflects the appetite some in Denver have for the drug," Sweetin said. "The principle trafficker our agents identified in Denver was determined to make up to $150,000 a month. That's pretty good money for a 22-year-old."

According to agents from several law enforcement agencies, Hau was in contact with marijuana distributors in Seattle and San Francisco and would personally arrange for the purchase of each load of marijuana. Once the marijuana had been selected by the distributor, Hau would send a driver from Denver to pickup the marijuana and drive the drugs back to Denver in a rental vehicle. The marijuana would be processed into one pound bags for delivery to his clients, who in turn sold the marijuana to their clients.

The DEA said that on the evening of Sept. 19, investigators watched as Hau received a large marijuana shipment at his residence that had arrived from San Francisco. Agents continued to watch as Hau distributed marijuana to many of his customers.

Later that evening, agents executed search warrants on six locations in the Denver area. As a result, agents seized approximately 70 pounds of high quality marijuana, two marijuana indoor grow operations containing 344 live marijuana plants and approximately $149,000 in cash, Sweetin aid. Also seized that night were 13 vehicles valued at $274,000.

38 Indicted In Alleged Drug Ring (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, October 19, 2006

Several Colorado law enforcement agencies today announced a 152-count indictment they said brought down a large marijuana-distribution network that stretched from Colorado to Washington State.

The federal Drug Enforcement Agency named Thanh Thea Hau, 22, of Denver. DEA officials said Hau, part-owner of the Denver nightclub DC 10, faces 59 counts related to drug trafficking.

The DEA said Hau and the other 24 members of the alleged drug network are in custody.

The Denver District Attorney's office, the Front Range Task Force, the Weld County Task Force and the Colorado State Patrol were involved in the investigation, dubbed Operation Berthoud due to its origins in Weld County.

The indictment alleges the 38 individuals were engaged in a pattern of racketeering in violation of the Colorado Organized Crime Control Act.

Denver District Attorney Mitch Morrissey said the indictment names the largest number of people in the history of his office.

At a morning news conference, DEA Special Agent-In-Charge Jeffrey D. Sweetin said the people indicted have been linked to numerous criminal enterprises, including marijuana and ecstasy distribution, marijuana cultivation and money laundering.

During the course of the year-long investigation, officials seized 95 pounds of high-grade marijuana, equipment from three indoor marijuana-growing operations containing 414 plants, more than 1,500 tablets of ecstasy, about $7,040 in cash, assets and stolen property.

Announcement of the bust comes less than three weeks before Coloradoans go to the polls to vote on Amendment 44, which would legalize possession of one ounce or less of marijuana.

Sweetin was asked if the timing of the announcement had a political intent.

"I don't consider it a political announcement," Sweetin said. "It wasn't timed to be a message, but yes, I think it was a message."

Immediately after the news conference, Amendment 44 campaign director Mason Tvert held a second news conference to blast officials for the indictment's timing, which he said was an effort to scare voters into rejecting the pot referendum.

DOJ_NMG_0083892

Massive Drug Trafficking Ring Shut Down (KMGH)

KMGH-TV, October 20, 2006

DENVER -- Local and federal officials on Thursday said they have shut down a massive drug trafficking ring in Denver and have indicted 38 people, including the co-owner of a Denver nightclub, whom they say was the mastermind behind the operation.

Of the 38 people who have been indicted, 25 have been arrested, including the alleged ring leader, Thanh Thea Hau.

Hau, 22, faces 59 counts of drug trafficking. Hau is known to be part owner of the Denver nightclub DC 10.

"The principle trafficker our agents identified in Denver was determined to be making up to $150,000 per month. That's pretty good money for a 22-year-old. Unfortunately for him, he is now out of business," said DEA agent Jeffrey D. Sweetin.

The investigation began in March 2005, when Weld County Task Force agents said they began buying large quantities of Ecstasy from an alleged co-conspirator. These purchases led agents to identify an Ecstasy trafficking organization operating in Denver, Seattle and San Francisco that was also bringing high-quality marijuana to Denver, officials said.

During the investigation, the Drug Enforcement Administration seized 95 pounds of "BC Bud" or high-grade marijuana, three indoor growing operations, thousands of tablets of Ecstasy, and $704,000 in cash and assets.

Thirteen vehicles were seized in the bust, and three cultivation centers in Denver, with 414 live marijuana plants, have been shut down.

Officials said the operation was bringing 50- to 100-pound quantities of the high-grade marijuana grown in the Pacific Northwest and California to Denver.

The marijuana was valued at $3,000 to $4,000 per pound because of its potency.

The DEA said the drug ring involved a very organized crime group that was operating in several states.

"This organization's leadership would fly up to the source areas, decide what marijuana was of sufficiently high potency and quality, then return to Denver and have that delivered through their distribution system, not unlike a legitimate business would," Sweetin said.

According to agents, Hau was in contact with marijuana distributors in Seattle and San Francisco and would personally arrange for the purchase of each load of marijuana. Once the marijuana had been selected from the distributor, Hau would send a driver from Denver to pick up the marijuana and drive the drugs back to Denver in a rental vehicle. The marijuana would be processed into 1-pound bags for delivery to his clients, who in turn sold the marijuana to their clients for up to $500 per ounce, the DEA said.

The investigation also determined that Hau provided clients with paper sacks filled with marijuana, and many of these dealers were seen entering and exiting his home, agents said. In addition, exchanges took place on the side neighborhood streets and in shopping center parking lots.

Once Hau had sold his marijuana supply, he would arrange for another purchase of marijuana, according to investigators.

Hau would have an associate drive the cash to Seattle or San Francisco with money hidden in the vehicle. With this information, agents intercepted the trips to Seattle and made two cash seizures of $132,000 and $149,000, respectively, the DEA said.

On the evening of Sept. 19, DEA investigators watched as Hau allegedly received a large marijuana shipment from San Francisco at his home. Agents continued to watch as Hau allegedly distributed marijuana to many of his customers, who were then followed and arrested. Later that evening, agents executed state of Colorado search warrants on six locations in the Denver area.

The 38 individuals were indicted by a Denver grand jury and are facing drug charges in Denver District Court related to marijuana and Ecstasy distribution, marijuana cultivation and money laundering.

The 152-count indictment, the largest in Denver's history, alleges the individuals were engaged in a pattern of racketeering activity in violation of the Colorado Organized Crime Control Act.

26 Arrested In Money-laundering Scheme (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 20, 2006

A U.S. attorney in New York said federal agents have arrested 26 people in connection with a money-laundering ring tied to Colombian drug sales.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said the suspects, who have been accused of laundering money through an illegal "Black Market Peso Exchange" system, were arrested in the Columbian cities of Bogota and Cali as well as New York, New Jersey, Florida and London, The Washington Times reported Thursday.

Garcia said federal agents seized more than $10 million in cash and about $6.5 million worth of cocaine, heroin and marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0083893

Indictments filed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan accuse the suspects of using "peso brokers" to help drug traffickers trade U.S. dollars for pesos from Colombian businesspeople seeking to purchase dollars outside of the Colombian banking system, the Times said.

Garcia said the exchanges occur with verbal agreements, leaving no paper trial and thus complicating investigation of money laundering schemes.

Garcia said the suspects could each face 20 years in prison if convicted.

Escapee Linked To Drug Cartel (PR)

Porterville Recorder, October 19, 2006

When Porterville Police Sgt. Mike Blain was informed that federal fugitive Jose Felix was not considered armed and dangerous, Blain said he knew better.

Felix, a Porterville native who escaped from a minimum-security federal prison in Kern County on Oct. 9, was exactly that, Blain said.

"They don't know his history," Blain said, referring to the Taft Correctional Institution, where Felix spent the last three years. "We are the ones who had to live with him and the results of his and his family's actions."

Felix, 35, was a prominent player in the Felix family's sophisticated drug-trafficking network, which at its peak spread methamphetamine from Tijuana, Mexico to Bakersfield, Porterville and throughout the Central Valley for two decades.

His father, Praxedes Felix Sr., 56, was the kingpin of the drug network, officials said.

TCI officials noticed Felix missing during an inmate count at 10:50 p.m. Oct. 9. He was last accounted for three hours earlier.

Jose Felix was sentenced to 11 years in federal prison shortly after he and 15 other family members were arrested by law enforcement officials in a major drug raid in April 2003.

His brother, Praxedes Felix Jr., was also sent to TCI by a federal judge.

Fourteen agencies were involved with the six-year operation to bring down the cartel, which had its roots in Sinaloa, Mexico, according to previous reports.

Interim Police Chief Chuck McMillan referred to Jose Felix as "a long-term project."

"We've dealt with Jose for many years," McMillan said. "He and his family were big-time players in the drug trade. In previous contacts with Jose, he was armed."

McMillan said that the Felix family, which operated out of Terra Bella, may have had ties to the infamous Arellano Felix Organization, also known as the Tijuana Cartel.

What is clear, Blain said, is that the family - including Jose Felix - was extremely brazen and violent in their practice.

"There was a documented history with Jose and other family members currently in custody of kidnapping, rape, shootings of people or groups which they had disagreements, and threats made to the lives of others, including officers," Blain said. "Toward the end, they were extremely brazen in their activity."

Jose Felix was arrested on a weapons charge during the 1990s, Blain said.

During that arrest, Jose Felix threatened the life of an officer and his family, Blain said.

Thus, the question is raised: How did a criminal with a record like Jose Felix end up in a minimum-security facility without a fence.

According to Blain and TCI's warden, his previous history likely did not have any bearing on his sentence, which was reached in a plea deal with federal prosecutors.

"The charges he has on his record are not a true reflection of his actions," Blain said.

Jeff Wrigley, the warden of the privately-owned federally-operated facility, said federal officials send prisoners to the low-security facilities based on the offenses for which they were convicted.

"These criminals are sent because they have non-violent offenses and are not considered threats," Wrigley said. "But oftentimes, there may be some information about a criminal that is not brought up at the time of sentencing or in pre-sentencing."

"We've had walkaways at the prison, but we've never had any incident where a walkaway has caused any harm or wreaked havoc in a community," Wrigley said.

In Wrigley's nine years as warden, an average of five inmates each year escapes the prison simply by walking away from the camp.

These statistics are on par with similar security-level prisons, according to Wrigley and the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Wrigley said he does not know how many of those walkaways are captured.

DOJ_NMG_0083894

"Sometimes what will happen is a person will be captured in another region, Wrigley said. "The U.S. Marshal's office is working diligently and coordinating with nationwide law enforcement officials and local law enforcement in the Porterville to locate Felix, and rest assured he will be prosecuted to the fullest extent for his actions."

The Marshal's office, TCI and Porterville PD have received anonymous leads in the week since Felix's disappearance, but have not located him as of the time of publication.

"One caller said that he was in Porterville, and another caller said he was Sinaloa," Blain said. "He could be anywhere, but we will continue to look for him."

Newspaper Held In Contempt In Bonds Case (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- The San Francisco Chronicle agreed to be held in contempt of court and pay perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines for refusing to assist a federal grand jury investigating who leaked its reporters the secret testimony of Barry Bonds and other athletes, according to a court filing.

The government agreed to stay any fines pending the outcome of an appeal to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The paper, citing the First Amendment, is refusing to abide by a grand jury subpoena ordering it to release any information it has on the reporters' source or sources.

Two Chronicle reporters who wrote about Bonds' 2003 testimony before a federal grand jury investigating the BALCO steroid ring also have agreed to be held in contempt, pending appeal.

Reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada could be jailed for as much as 18 months or until they agree to divulge the source or sources of the leak. They argue the First Amendment protects them as well, a position a federal judge has rejected.

Under the proposed deal between the newspaper and federal prosecutors, which must be approved by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White, the Chronicle agreed to pay a fine of at least $1,000 per day, for up to 18 months. Both sides reserve the right to argue the amount of the fine.

The agreement is largely procedural, allowing the case to move before the appeals court.

According to the leaked testimony, Bonds told the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative grand jury that he did not knowingly use steroids and said he thought his trainer Greg Anderson supplied him with flaxseed oil and arthritic balm.

Where Do Felons Get Their Guns? (HERNTDY)

By Kyle Martin

Hernando (FL) Today, October 20, 2006

BROOKSVILLE — Brooksville police Lt. Rick Hankins decided to run an experiment last year to find out how easy it is to buy a gun on the streets.

A confidential informant was sent out to buy two guns within the hour.

The informant was back 30 minutes later, guns in hand.

"It was very surprising," Hankins said.

You can legitimately buy a gun in 30 minutes, from a flea market, classified ad or yard sale. These avenues don't require the paperwork and three-day waiting period of a licensed gun dealer.

But convicted felons are prohibited from owning guns and ammunition, regardless of where they buy them. Even so, two people were charged with the crime on Monday.

One of them is also accused of attempted murder.

Michael Lavon Lazenby has been connected with Sunday's shooting in South Brooksville of Henry Maner, who was shielding a 2-year-old girl from the gunfire.

Authorities have also arrested Marcus Tyre Barnes, who they believe shot at Lazenby and the other shooters from a separate vehicle. Barnes is also a convicted felon.

So where do felons get their guns?

"The black market, thefts, robberies, gun dealers and residences," said John Ryan, assistant special agent in charge for the ATF's Tampa field division.

A popular tactic is the straw purchase, which involves a legitimate person buying guns for a felon. Two local pawnshop owners say that's rare. "I haven't had anybody try that," said Thomas Bell, owner of Bell's Pawn Shop. "Everybody knows I go by the book."

Still, there's no stopping a wife from taking a gun home to her husband, said George Redman, owner of Redman Pawn and Gun. "We have no control over that," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083895

Like any licensed dealer, if you buy a gun from Redman you have to fill out paperwork authorizing a background check by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

If the background check reveals any number of violations, including a felony conviction, a domestic violence misdemeanor, or most restraining orders, Redman, will return your money and bid you goodbye.

The background check usually takes three days, but sometimes it's red flagged and can take longer. If the dealer hasn't heard back from FDLE in five business days, though, he has the right to sell the gun. Redman chooses not to. "It just doesn't feel safe doing that," he said.

Redman's concern is flea markets, like the one he visited in Homosassa this weekend. There appeared to be little control over the gun sales, according to Redman. "It's shocking, really," he said.

Sales at flea markets and gun shows fall under the purview of local law enforcement. ATF gets involved because it's a federal offense to sell a gun to a felon and for a felon to own a gun. But unless you knowingly sell the gun to a felon, there's no crime committed.

Another source of guns is yard sales and classified ads in newspapers. Robert Turner, of St. Petersburg, is advertising two antique guns in the classifieds. The guns are functional, but Turner doubts anyone would spend several hundred dollars for a crime spree.

If he were selling some newer pistols, however, his attitude would be different. "You probably couldn't tell the difference," if a felon came to buy his guns, he said. But he would ask for a name, age and address. If it seemed suspicious, Turner would probably tell the buyer the gun was already sold. "I would feel responsible myself if anything happened," he said.

The area of Sunday's shooting straddles the boundary between city limits and Hernando County. This time it happened to fall in the hands of the sheriff's office.

Drugs and guns often go hand in hand, Hankins said, so a joint task force was created to handle the problem. This has cut back on drug dealers going across the street to the county after they are busted in the city, according to Hankins. "It's a game of ping pong otherwise," he said.

Reporter Kyle Martin can be contacted at 352-544-5271.

IMMIGRATION:

California City Bars Renting Housing To Illegal Immigrants (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

(AP) - ESCONDIDO, California-City leaders have approved a controversial ordinance prohibiting landlords from renting to illegal immigrants, the latest of a handful of communities nationwide to pass laws cracking down on people who hire or rent to undocumented immigrants.

More than 100 police officers and sheriff's deputies dressed in riot gear were on hand for the vote, passed 3-2 Wednesday. After the measure was approved, one person ran outside the council chamber and yelled, "The USA wins!" prompting opponents and supporters gathered on the lawn to shout at each other for 30 minutes.

Inside the chamber, officers removed two men after a brief confrontation. Police said no arrests were made.

Wednesday's vote was the final reading of the ordinance, which has drawn crowds each time it has been heard. The American Civil Liberties Union has indicated it will go to court to block implementation of the ordinance, which is set to take effect Nov. 18 in Escondido, a city where Hispanics make up about 42 percent of the 142,000 residents.

Councilman Sam Abed, who supported the measure, said it will improve the city's image and reputation, "and certainly our quality of life," The San Diege Union-Tribune reported Thursday.

Mayor Lori Holt Pfeiler and Councilman Ron Newman, the two no votes, said the ordinance would create new problems for Escondido.

Pfeiler said everyone agrees illegal immigration is a problem, but the ordinance "is going to have neighbor against neighbor."

Under the law, landlords will be required to submit documentation of their tenants' immigration status to the city, which will then submit the information to the federal government for verification.

If tenants are found to be illegal immigrants, landlords would be given 10 days to evict them or face suspension of their business license. Repeat offenders could face misdemeanor charges and fines.

A handful of cities across the country have passed similar ordinances, with local leaders arguing the federal government has not done enough to crackdown on the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants living in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0083896

TAX:

Loftier Limits For Retirement Savers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Federal employees will be allowed to invest up to $15,500 in their retirement savings plan in calendar year 2007, $500 more than this year's limit, the Internal Revenue Service has announced.

The elective deferral limit, which applies to 401(k) plans in the private sector as well the federal government's Thrift Savings Plan, was adjusted for inflation, as required under the tax code.

The TSP, the 401(k)-type program for government employees, allows investors to change their contribution amounts at any time. Investors can designate withholdings from their biweekly pay in either percentage or dollar amounts.

Employees covered by the Federal Employees Retirement System, though, should structure their investments so they do not hit the IRS dollar limit until the end of the year, in order to continue receiving matching government contributions. Those covered by the old Civil Service Retirement System and persons in the military do not receive matching contributions.

The IRS also announced that the "catch-up" contribution amount will remain unchanged at $5,000 in 2007.

Catch-up contributions are allowed during a calendar year for people age 50 or older who have hit the elective deferral limit or who are on a pace to do so by the end of the year. There are no matching contributions for catch-ups, which were approved by Congress in 2002 as a way to help employees who did not have an opportunity to participate in a 401(k)-type program early in their career to save more for retirement.Back to the Drawing Board

A federal district court judge has directed the Homeland Security Department and the Office of Personnel Management to revise or abandon regulations that failed to ensure that Homeland Security employees could bargain collectively and that went too far in limiting the topics that could be put on the negotiating table.

U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer also told the agencies to file a status report on their efforts to fix the regulations by July 17. Her request for a report should not be seen as a deadline for the agencies to complete decisions on what to do about the regulations, she said.

In August 2005, Collyer ruled in a lawsuit brought by the National Treasury Employees Union and other unions that the department had gone too far when it came up with new rules that called into question whether the department would be obligated to abide by binding contracts. She issued an injunction to block the regulations, and her ruling was upheld by a three-judge federal appeals panel in June. The government decided not to take an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Government lawyers asked Collyer to close the case, saying that would not prevent NTEU from returning to court if it had objections to any revised rules. But she declined the request, and issued an order saying that "this court shall retain jurisdiction over this matter for all purposes."At Center Ice

The Partnership for Public Service and the Washington Capitals will team up tomorrow night to honor federal employees at the Capitals' game against the Tampa Bay Lightning.

The Caps are sponsoring a Federal Employees' Night with the Partnership, which seeks to encourage more young people and mid-career professionals to consider working in the federal government. For discount tickets, go to http://www.ourpublicservice.org .Talk Shows

Steven L. Katz , an author and consultant on federal management issues, will be the guest on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Lt. Gen. Roger A. Brady , deputy chief of staff for manpower and personnel at Air Force headquarters, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. tomorrow on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Diary associate Eric Yoder contributed to this column. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Appoints Mine Safety Administrator (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 (AP) — With Congress now in a recess, President Bush on Thursday bypassed opposition from Democrats in the Senate and the United Mineworkers of America and appointed his nominee to head the agency that oversees mine safety.

DOJ_NMG_0083897

Mr. Bush appointed Richard M. Stickler, who is expected to serve about a year until the end of the next session of Congress.

Mr. Stickler, of Terra Alta, W. Va., will head the Mine Safety and Health Administration, which has been without a leader for two years.

The mine agency is part of the Labor Department.

Mr. Bush nominated Mr. Stickler last year, but Senate Democrats have blocked the nomination. The lawmakers and the mine workers' union said Mr. Stickler had spent too many years as a mining executive and had failed to demonstrate adequate concern for safety in the mining industry.

More than three dozen miners have been killed in accidents this year, according to the mine safety agency's Web site.

Mr. Stickler headed the Pennsylvania mine safety office from 1997 to 2003.

"I think my track record in Pennsylvania proves that I did not go easy on mine operators," Mr. Stickler said in a conference call to reporters.

U.S. Judge Orders White House To Release Cheney Visitor Logs (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge has ordered the Bush administration to release information about who visited Vice President Dick Cheney's office and personal residence, an order that could spark a late election season debate over lobbyists' White House access.

The Washington Post asked for two years of White House visitor logs in June but the Secret Service refused to process the request. Government attorneys called it "a fishing expedition into the most sensitive details of the vice presidency."

U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina ruled Wednesday that, by the end of next week, the Secret Service must produce the records or at least identity them and justify why they are being withheld.

The newspaper sought logs for anyone visiting Mr. Cheney, his legal counsel, chief spokesman and other top aides and advisers.

The Secret Service had no comment on the ruling Thursday. In court documents, government attorneys said releasing the documents would infringe on Mr. Cheney's ability to seek advice.

"This case is about protecting the effective functioning of the vice presidency under the Constitution," attorneys wrote.

A lawsuit over similar records revealed last month that Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed -- key figures in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal -- landed more than 100 meetings inside the Bush White House.

The Washington Post cited those records, which were released to the Democratic Party and Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, as evidence that the documents should be released.

Medicare Drug Aid No Longer Automatic (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

More than 600,000 low-income elderly and disabled people who automatically received federal help to pay for their Medicare drug coverage this year will have to actively apply to get such assistance in 2007, Medicare officials said yesterday.

The change affects people who were automatically enrolled in the inaugural year of the drug benefit and got the low-income subsidy in 2006 but who are no longer eligible for Medicaid or two other government assistance programs.

Some advocates say the affected seniors may not have understood a letter about the change that the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services sent last month. And even beneficiaries aware of the change might have trouble completing the six-page application, they said.

"Just sending these folks a letter and an application doesn't mean they necessarily are going to apply for the extra help even though they may need it," said Marisa Scala-Foley, associate director of the Access to Benefits Coalition at the National Council on Aging. "These are still likely to be low income folks who need all the help they can get. . . . These folks are going to need a lot of hand-holding."

There is no danger of them losing Medicare drug coverage. Even if they do nothing, they will be automatically enrolled in their current plan for 2007. But in January, most would be charged a monthly premium for the first time.

Kathleen Harrington, director of external affairs for the Medicare agency, said it has provided drug plans and community organizations with information about the affected seniors and encouraged greater outreach. The open enrollment period is Nov. 15 to Dec. 31, and the affected group will have three extra months to switch to a plan with no monthly premium, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0083898

"We're very concerned about this," Harrington said. "We want to ensure that they know and that they've been contacted by plans, by us, by advocates, by community resources to make sure that they apply for this low-income subsidy, so if they have a premium liability they can minimize it."

More than 9 million of the 23 million people enrolled in Medicare drug plans this year qualified for the low-income subsidy, which meant they paid no monthly premiums and only $1 to $5 in co-payments for their prescriptions. Of those, about 7.2 million were automatically enrolled in the program and the subsidy, while the rest applied and got it, Medicare officials said.

Medicare drug plan beneficiaries qualify for special help if their annual incomes are at or below 150 percent of the poverty level, which is $14,700 for individuals and $19,800 for married couples. Also, individuals must have no more than $11,500 in assets, and married couples no more than $23,000 in assets.

Some of the affected people who no longer automatically qualify for a subsidy might have had a change in income but could still qualify for premium assistance under the drug benefit, officials said.

"The worst outcome will be someone getting surprised that they have a premium and then dropping their coverage," Harrington said. "We want to do everything we can to keep them in coverage."

House Intel Chair Suspends Staff Member (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra has suspended a Democratic staff member because of concerns he may have leaked a high-level intelligence assessment to The New York Times last month.

In a letter obtained by The Associated Press Thursday night, Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., a committee member, said that an unidentified staffer requested the document from National Intelligence Director John Negroponte three days before the Sept. 23 story about its conclusions.

The staffer received the National Intelligence Estimate on global terror trends on Sept. 21.

"I have no credible information to say any classified information was leaked from the committee's minority staff, but the implications of such would be dramatic," LaHood wrote Hoekstra, R-Mich., late last month. "This may, in fact, be only coincidence, and simply 'look bad.' But coincidence, in this town, is rare."

A spokesman to Hoekstra, Jamal Ware, confirmed that a committee staff member was suspended this week. He said the staff member is being denied access to classified information pending the outcome of a review.

"Chairman Hoekstra considers security highly important, and the coincidence certainly merits a review," he said.

An aide to California Rep. Jane Harman, the committee's top Democrat, did not have an immediate comment Thursday night.

The New York Times did not immediately answer a telephone message seeking comment.

House Committee Dismisses Bulk Of Investigative Division (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Appropriations Committee has let go about 60 private contractors who made up most of an investigative unit that was auditing billions of dollars in government spending, including the $62 billion federal relief package for Hurricane Katrina, the panel's spokesman said Thursday.

The investigators, attached to the committee's Surveys and Investigations division, were released during the past week, committee spokesman John Scofield said. He said that the quality of the unit's work had been questioned by leaders of the Republican-controlled committee, including some Democrats, but he declined to say who.

The shake-up — which leaves only 16 full-time employees in the investigative unit — comes about a year after the Appropriations Committee's chairman, Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., launched the Katrina review by saying the unit would “conduct a wide-ranging assessment and analysis of disaster spending.” At the time, Lewis said the unit had a tradition of “comprehensive” reporting.

It's unclear how the departures will affect the work of the unit, whose contract staff is made up of former employees of the FBI, CIA and other government investigative services. Some of them had worked for the unit for several years. Scofield said the dismissals would not compromise any ongoing investigations. Scofield said he could not identify the specific work being done by investigators because much of the unit's inquiries involve classified information.

Robert Pearre, the unit's director, did not respond to requests for comment.

Scofield said the “pace” of the Katrina review was not as critical as the quality of the work. “There is nothing sinister here. It's about how we do the best oversight.”

DOJ_NMG_0083899

The committee's ranking Democrat, David Obey of Wisconsin, was in his home state and could not be reached for comment.

Established in 1943, the investigative unit has focused mainly on defense and intelligence spending programs. Its reports usually are not made public. Regarding Katrina spending, however, Lewis has said he intends to reveal the results of the committee's investigation because of "the national importance of the Katrina recovery efforts and the record amount of funds that have been appropriated."

The committee's review of Katrina spending is one of several examinations of how government relief was directed and spent after the nation's worst natural disaster.

Last year, the Justice Department launched a separate inquiry into Katrina-related incidents of alleged fraud in which dozens of people have been charged. Many were accused of filing fraudulent claims of property damage in order to get thousands of dollars in government relief checks.

Capitol Hill Eats Own Pork (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

WHERE HAVE YOU GONE, Jefferson Smith, now that we need you? A naïf sent to the U.S. Senate on a fluke in "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," Smith (played by Jimmy Stewart) discovered that his mentor had slipped a provision into a "deficiency bill" to construct a dam on land secretly purchased by the home state's political boss. The boss stood to make a killing, and Smith's former hero figured to get a piece of the action.

But Smith would have none of it. He knew graft and corruption when he saw it, so he made a courageous stand, nearly destroying himself in the process and etching into the American psyche a fable so beloved that no member of Congress, out here in the real world, would ever try such a thing.

Instead, Capitol Hill pols are outdoing even the movies with bills and deals that rake in big money for themselves, their families and their political friends.

In one of the latest instances, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is under fire for not reporting part of a complex real estate transaction that led to the sale of some of his Las Vegas property. After a little government land swap here and some rezoning there, Reid received $1.1 million. Now that the deal has made the newspapers, Reid has seen fit to amend his ethics report retroactively.

But Reid has nothing on House Republicans, who appear to be perfecting the art of "earmarking" money in federal spending bills to boost their real estate interests. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) earmarked funds for construction of a parkway near land he owned, which he later sold for a $2-million profit. Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.) directed $11.4 million in federal funds to a highway-widening project that just happened to make it easier to get to resort acreage and subdivisions that he owns. Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Corona) directed federal money to projects near his Riverside County property that he later sold for about twice the purchase price. Earmarking in another highway bill put $1.28 million to work improving land near a development owned in part by Rep. Gary G. Miller (R-Diamond Bar).

Elected officials insist that, in earmarking funds, they are only doing what politicians have done for years: directing pork back to the home district. But that doesn't mean they should be allowed to use the federal purse to do favors for themselves or their political donors and friends who happen to own chunks of land near projects Congress approves.

Earmarking used to be done in virtual secrecy. But the House recently approved a rule drafted by Rep. David Dreier (R-San Dimas) that requires bills and reports to include a list of earmarks and the names of members who sponsored them. It's still not enough. If Congress is to repair its reputation, it must go beyond merely admitting that its members engage in self-dealing. It has to change. Jefferson Smith would demand no less. Neither do we.

OTHER NEWS:

Home Run: Dow's First Close At 12000 (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Powered by once-skeptical investors rediscovering a passion for stocks, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday closed above the 12000 mark for the first time, after testing the milestone for days. It looks as if there are more potential converts still on the sidelines.

The newfound enthusiasm comes from an array of sources, including small-time investors pouring money into mutual funds and hedge funds investing money for deep-pocketed institutions and individuals.

For all the excitement of the Dow's record close, which came on the 19th anniversary of the 1987 stock-market crash, the market barely nudged over the finishing line. The Dow, comprising 30 major companies, advanced just 19.05 points, or 0.2%, to close at 12011.73.

"It was pretty balanced between winners and losers with the bulls just getting a slight advantage," said Jon Najarian, chief executive of Najarian Capital in Chicago. "It wasn't like investors were throwing money at" shares.

Even so, the Dow is now up a solid 12% this year, reflecting a recent embrace of big companies, especially by hedge funds that traditionally prefer betting on smaller companies, where they can hunt for bargains others might not have noticed.

The blue-chip companies' gains are part of a recent marketwide rally that has seen technology and small stocks show signs of strength after months of dormancy. The Russell 2000 index of small companies is up 6.4% since Sept. 1, while the tech-stock-led Nasdaq Composite Index is up 6.7%, topping the Dow's 4.8% gain. The Russell 2000 now is just 1.8% below its high, reached on May 5, and is up 14% for the year, compared with 9.5% for the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

The S&P 500 rose just one point to 1366.96, a 0.1% increase, and still is off 11% from its record high in March 2000. The Nasdaq Composite was up 0.2%, or 3.79 points, to 2340.94, less than half its record high. Apple Computer, a Nasdaq stock, rose $4.46 to $78.99, a nearly 6% jump.

The Dow was helped by a run-up in shares of cigarette maker Altria Group, a Dow component, which rose $1.85 to $80.19.

Analysts say the climb could continue as long as interest rates and inflation remain low and more skeptics abandon their doubts and start buying. There are also some dangers ahead: The market could be jolted by a change in control of Congress following next month's midterm elections or by signs that the housing slump is worsening.

Data suggest a sizable group of skeptics remains, which could give shares room to rise. Measures of bearish bets in the market have remained high during the recent rally. Record amounts of stock are being sold short, meaning investors are wagering that prices will fall by selling borrowed shares in hopes of replacing them with cheaper ones bought later. In the New York Stock Exchange's latest monthly reporting period, ending last Friday, so-called short interest -- a measure of how much stock is being shorted -- rose for the ninth straight time. Through mid-September, the Nasdaq Stock Market saw short interest rise more than 25% this year. (Related article on page B6.)

"You haven't really seen excitement among investors, retail brokers and institutional trading desks yet," says Tobias Levkovich, Citigroup's chief U.S. equity strategist. "If investors get more aggressive, there is more upside to the market."

One sign that investors are rapidly warming up to U.S. stocks: Last month, $2.2 billion was added to U.S. stock-focused mutual funds, the second-highest monthly figure this year. And investors have added an estimated $2.6 billion so far this month, according to TrimTabs Investment Research, which tracks mutual-fund flows. That is a sharp contrast to much of the past year, when investors chased international stocks and shunned U.S. companies.

There also are indications that large investors are getting more comfortable with stocks. The Volatility Index, or the VIX, a measure of the market's estimate of the stock market's future bumpiness that trades on the Chicago Board Options Exchange, is near its lowest levels of the past decade. This suggests that investors are "relatively complacent, and fairly optimistic," says Thomas McManus, chief investment strategist at Bank of America's Banc of America Securities.

A number of investors seem to be pulling back from commodity investments, amid marked weakness in energy prices and other commodities lately, and may look to redeploy their cash in the stock market. Investors withdrew $214 million from mutual funds that invest in gold and precious metals last month, according to Lipper Inc., a fund tracker. These funds added $129 million each month, on average, during the past six months.

Hedge funds that focus on stocks have lagged behind the market this year, in part because they had doubts that share prices would climb. Many are jumping on the bandwagon, especially in regard to larger stocks. Large "speculative" investors, a category dominated by hedge funds, held more bullish than bearish positions on the S&P 500 as of Oct. 10, according to Merrill Lynch. Two months ago, more of these investors were betting against a rise in the S&P 500.

Global macro hedge funds, a category of funds managing $115 billion that bets on trends in various markets, now hold positions that amount to wagers that stocks will rise further, according to Merrill Lynch. Just two months ago, these big hedge funds were holding positions betting that stocks would fall.

Among the largest buyers of Microsoft, a Dow component, in the second quarter, were hedge funds Perry Capital, Farralon Capital Management, Eminence Capital and D.E. Shaw, according to securities filings tracked by FactSet Research. Hedge funds including D.E. Shaw, Renaissance Technologies and Citadel Investment were buyers of Hewlett-Packard, also part of the Dow.

Hedge funds manage about $1.2 trillion compared with about $9.6 trillion at mutual funds, but their buying could make a difference. According to some estimates, hedge funds are responsible for more than 40% of daily stock trades.

Hedge funds hold a near-record number of short positions linked to the Russell 2000, which tracks smaller stocks, suggesting they are becoming less enamored with smaller companies even as they warm to bigger stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0083901

Chris Johnson, of the research firm Schaeffer Investment Research, says he is encouraged that the high ratio of options on individual stocks that pay off if shares falter to contracts that rise in value if a stock jumps is roughly comparable to activity shortly before some past rallies.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the NYSE was 2.65 billion shares, as 2,033 stocks advanced and 1,268 fell.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year note declined 6/32 point, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield to 4.788%. The 30-year bond fell 11/32 to yield 4.911%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 118.16 yen, compared with 118.92. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.2628, compared with $1.2534.

Dow Closes Above 12,000 For The First Time (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

Less than three weeks after it set its first record high in more than six years, the Dow Jones industrial average closed above the 12,000-point mark for the first time this afternoon.

The achievement by the popular, though not comprehensive, barometer of the stock market indicates that investors are increasingly confident that the economy is poised to perform the rare feat of slowing without stalling. The Dow is up 12 percent so far this year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, a broader measure of the market, has also done well and is up 9.5 percent for the year.

The Dow's move above 12,000 came on modest gains for the day, with the industrial average rising 19.05 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 12,011.73.

The day's gains were just as modest elsewhere in the stock market. The S.&P. rose 1 point, or less than 0.1 percent, to 1,366.96, while the Nasdaq composite index rose 3.79 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,340.94.

"It is the best of both worlds here," said Steven M. Rogé, a portfolio manager at the Rogé Partners Fund. "We have interest rates that are still below the long-term average, capital is still flowing freely and growth is strong but not excessive."

The current rally, which started in late July after an early summer swoon, has followed a well-worn pattern in which stocks do well in the last three months of midterm election years, analysts experts note. The one difference this time is that the stock market started moving up in the third quarter, which historically has proven to be a weak stretch.

"You have to back a very long way to find a negative" in a midterm election year, said Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at Standard & Poor's. "On average, you have a positive year 90 percent of the time."

Larger stocks, particularly in consumer staples, have done particularly well, which has helped the Dow, an index of 30 blue-chip companies.

Technology companies like Intel and Microsoft, which lagged the market earlier in the year, have also done well.

Some stock pickers, however, see that strength as a worrying signal that big company stocks may have become too expensive, at least for the time being.

More broadly, some economists and bond investors do not share the stock market's sanguine view. Atop their list of concerns is a softening housing market and its direct and indirect effect on the American economy.

If home sales continue to fall at current rates or faster, that decline will reduce employment in construction, mortgage lending and other related areas. Also, falling prices will make it harder for consumers to refinance and tap their homes for lines of credit for home improvement and other spending.

Other concerns include tensions in the Middle East and on the Korean peninsula. Those and other geopolitical crisis could easily reverse the two-month-long slide in oil and gasoline prices.

Dow Notches First Close Above 12,000 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 19 -- The Dow Jones industrial average scored its first close at more than 12,000 Thursday as Wall Street, showing its growing confidence despite new evidence of a weakening economy, managed to hold on to a slim advance.

The Dow ended the day at 12,011.73, the ninth time in two weeks that the index achieved a record high close. The index gained 19.05, or 0.16 percent, for the day.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.00, or 0.07 percent, to 1366.96. The Nasdaq composite index rose 3.79, or 0.16 percent, to 2340.94.

DOJ_NMG_0083902

The Dow's latest milestone came on the anniversary of Black Monday in 1987, when the Dow fell 508 points and also suffered its second-biggest percentage drop in history. The Dow finished that day at 1793.90.

The Dow's finish above 12,000 was the latest sign that the stock market continues a cautious recovery from the losses and despair that investors suffered in the early part of this decade. After peaking in early 2000, the Dow and other indicators fell precipitously during the dot-com collapse, recession and the impact of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Still, trading was erratic Thursday, with the overall market struggling to sustain gains after a pair of reports signaled that the Federal Reserve might have a tougher time orchestrating a soft landing of the economy. Disappointing earnings in the technology sector also weighed on stocks.

The Conference Board's index of U.S. leading economic indicators rose less than forecast in September. Meanwhile, the Philadelphia Fed's general economic index contracted for the first time since April 2003. The numbers rattled investors who had been sending stocks higher since September on optimism the Fed might cut rates in early 2007.Movers

Pfizer fell 42 cents, to $27.68.

Apple Computer rose $4.46, to $78.99. Sales of iPod music players helped fourth-quarter earnings.

Dell fell $1.58, to $23.12.

Advanced Micro Devices fell $3.22, to $21.01. The chipmaker forecast declining profit margins and lower desktop processor revenue.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 37.27, to 8,700.81.

American Stock Exchange index rose 16.21, to 1,933.08.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 3.98, to 767.39.Volume

NYSE: 2.65 billion shares, up from 2.63 billion on Wednesday. Advancers led decliners by 4 to 3.

Nasdaq: 2.03 billion shares, down from 2.24 billion. Advancers narrowly outnumbered decliners.Commodities

Crude oil for November delivery: $58.85, up 85 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $599 a troy ounce, up from $$588.90 on Wednesday.

Dow Breaks 12,000 (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 20, 2006

NEW YORK — Dow 12,000 is a big round number, a fresh, mountainlike peak never seen before, but it doesn't mean a return to the dangerous days of hyperinflated stocks.

Investors who recall the steep declines suffered by massively overvalued stocks after the 2000 market top might worry that the Dow Jones industrial average's first close above 12,000 Thursday is a sign that stocks are again at superexpensive prices relative to earnings, or P-E ratios. But “compared with 1999 and 2000, when valuations reached surreal levels, the Dow is priced attractively,” says Quincy Krosby, chief strategist at The Hartford.

Despite rising 19.05 points Thursday to a record close of 12,011.73, the 30 stocks in the blue-chip Dow are trading at lower valuations than they were at the 2000 top, when stock investing surpassed baseball as the national pastime.

In early 2000, Dow stocks had a median P-E (half higher, half lower) of 29, says Ned Davis Research. Now, the median P-E is 18. The broader Standard & Poor's 500 is trading at roughly 14 times estimated 2007 earnings, vs. a 27 P-E in March 2000, Thomson Financial says.

Falling oil prices, strong corporate profit growth and a belief that the Federal Reserve is done raising interest rates have fueled the Dow's rally. While more reasonably priced stocks don't preclude a market pullback, which some Wall Street analysts predict given the impressive run-up the past few months, it could provide some support.

The Dow is now at or near price targets projected by investment strategists at the start of the year. It has topped the 12,000 target of RBC Dain Rauscher. It is fast-approaching the 12,100 target set by A.G. Edwards and the recently updated target of 12,222 set by S&P's technical strategist Mark Arbeter.

The Dow is also about 6% below a year-end 2007 target of 12,750 set by Citigroup's top equity strategist, Tobias Levkovich. It's 4,000 points away from Dow 16,000, an aggressive 2007 call made by Curtis Teberg, who runs a small mutual fund.

Aside from the morale boost the Dow's record-setting run gives, it also confirms that after five years, investors are finally pulling money out of small-company stocks and putting it to work in large stocks, says Joe Quinlan, chief strategist at Bank of America Global Wealth & Investment Management.

Still, it's too “early to pop the champagne,” says Leo Kamp, TIAA-CREF's chief investment economist, because a slowing economy could hurt earnings. “A sustained rally,” he says, “won't occur until the Fed cuts rates.”

DOJ_NMG_0083903

Economic Index Suggests Continued Slowing (WSJ)

By Michael Derby And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Leading economic indicators pointed to slower U.S. economic growth in September.

Separate reports showed that factory activity in the Philadelphia region was flat in a mid-October reading even as manufacturers remain optimistic, and that weekly U.S. jobless claims hit a four-month low.

The Conference Board reported Thursday its index of leading indicators edged up just 0.1% to 137.7 in September, but noted that consumer expectations have improved. The index fell by a revised 0.2% in August. Economists had expected a more robust 0.3% advance last month.

"The economy has slowed but the evidence to date doesn't suggest it will stall or go into a recession," said Ken Goldstein, an economist with the private research group. "To the contrary, the economy retains considerable strength," given the rise in stock prices and drop in energy prices, he said. Mr. Goldstein also noted that employment remains robust and inflation relatively low.

Five of the 10 indicators making up the leading index rose last month, led by consumer expectations and money supply. The biggest negatives were building permits and average weekly manufacturing hours.

The group noted that the leading index has fallen in five of the last eight months, and from March to September, the index is down by 0.9%, a 1.7% annual rate decline.

Factory Activity in Philadelphia Area Idles

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia reported that a gauge of manufacturing activity in its region slipped to -0.7 in a mid-October reading from -0.4% in September. Economists expected October's reading to stand at 8.0. Negative readings indicate a contraction in activity.

The survey is widely seen as a precursor to a national reading on manufacturing activity next month. The October report followed the unexpectedly weak showing in September, an event that had caused considerable turmoil in financial markets. The findings of that report, however, weren't borne out in other regional manufacturing surveys, or in the Institute for Supply Management's national report.

Among the area firms surveyed, 22% reported increased activity this month, while 23% reported a decrease. Measures of new orders and shipments ticked higher from negative readings in prior months. The employment index fell by one point and, the regional bank said, remains at relatively low level. Manufacturers reported continued input-pricing pressures but a measure of prices paid dropped slightly from September's reading.

Expectations for future manufacturing growth improved after last month's sharp decline. Indicators for future orders, shipments and employment were all higher.

Weekly Jobless Claims Hit Four-Month Low

The Labor Department reported that initial jobless claims in the U.S. dropped by 10,000 last week to a seasonally adjusted level of 299,000 in the week ended Oct. 14. New claims for the week ended Oct. 7 were revised to 309,000 from a previously reported 308,000. Economists had expected a gain of 2,000 jobless claims, according to a survey by Dow Jones Newswires.

The four-week moving average of new claims, which smooths out weekly fluctuations, fell by 5,750 last week to 307,750, the lowest since the week ended June 24.

The number of workers drawing unemployment benefits for more than a week grew in the week ended Oct. 7, the latest week for which such data are available. These continuing jobless claims increased 25,000 to 2,453,000. In the week ended Oct. 7, the jobless rate for workers with unemployment insurance was 1.9%, unchanged from the previous week.

Opec Set To Defend $60 Global Minimum (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries on Thursday night agreed to cut production by 1.2m barrels a day, showing its determination to defend $60 as its new minimum international price.

The cut, which was deeper than the market had expected, will take Opec production to 26.3m barrels a day if it is fully implemented on November 1.

Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil producer, on Thursday warned that the cartel could make a second cut as early as December. The news is likely to push oil prices sharply higher this morning as traders had expected a reduction of 1m b/d.

DOJ_NMG_0083904

Opec oil ministers, who had for the last two weeks been divided over how to implement the cut, on Thursday agreed that each of Opec's 10 active members would participate on a pro rata basis, said Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's oil minister and Opec's current president.

Nymex and Brent crude futures, the world's two benchmarks, had already begun to rise on Thursday in anticipation of the deal.

Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, told reporters on Thursday: "The price is determined by the market, what we try to do is to make the market balanced. Today there is a dis-equilibrium between supply and demand. Today we are trying to get the market to the normal equilibrium and the price will take care of itself."

He added that the possibility of another cut "is there".

Vera de Ladoucette, an analyst at the consultancy Cambridge Energy Research Associates, said: "Usually when the decision is taken it has already been priced into the market. But sometimes Opec can surprise. The market is going to be caught off guard today by this decision."

Oil producers have watched with concern as crude oil inventories have grown, indicating that the market is oversupplied.

US inventories of crude have risen in the past week by 5.1m barrels a day to levels 8 per cent above those of a year ago, according to data published on Wednesday by the Energy Information Administration, the statistical arm of the US Department of Energy.

Oil prices in the last three months have fallen 25 per cent to below $60 a barrel. Mr Daukoru said: "We have never seen a drop [in the price of oil] like this in many years."

But despite its price concerns, Saudi Arabia did not want to return to being Opec's swing producer of oil, a role it played from 1980-86, when it cut supplies as prices fell. Therefore, it was imperative to get the rest of Opec on board.

The full seriousness of Opec's resolve will only become apparent in the next two months as members either adhere to the decision or cheat by not fully cutting their share.

As divisions had appeared within Opec within the past two weeks, traders began to doubt the cartel's ability to act.

They will be looking at whether the cuts will be adhered to by at least the cartel's lead members.

Opec's ambition to cut supplies comes at a cost, particularly for countries that have heavily invested their petrodollars into building up their oil sectors. Libya, the United Arab Emirates, Nigeria and Algeria have courted international energy groups to help them boost their production.

Venezuela, Indonesia, Qatar and Iran also have international oil companies working in their fields. These members of Opec will now have to tell the likes of Europe's Royal Dutch Shell, BP, Total, Repsol and the US's ExxonMobil and ChevronTexaco to reduce the output from their fields and forgo revenue. How much each company will have to sacrifice will depend on how Opec splits the burden of the cut among its member states.

But the news is not all bad for the companies as they will benefit from any boost in prices that follows Opec's decision.

OPEC Signals Resolve With Cutback (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins, Spencer Swartz And Anees Al Qudaihi

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

OPEC's decision to reduce production by 1.2 million barrels of oil a day -- a modestly larger cut than expected -- marks its strongest signal in years that the cartel will act aggressively to stop falling crude prices.

The decrease -- decided at a hastily arranged meeting late last night in Doha, Qatar, by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries -- represents about 4% of the group's current output and just more than 1% of global consumption. The cuts will take effect Nov. 1, OPEC said in a statement after the meeting. In comments before and after the meeting, ministers suggested the cartel could cut again this year if necessary.

OPEC ministers had indicated in recent weeks they had all but agreed to cut output by one million barrels a day -- worried that slowing demand growth, swelling inventories and new supply from non-OPEC producers threatened a downward price spiral below the $55-to-$60-a-barrel range for U.S. benchmark crude they suggested they were targeting.

But markets had largely shrugged off the threatened cut amid squabbling among ministers about how to distribute the decrease in production among members. That squabbling called into question the group's resolve.

By announcing a bigger-than-expected cut and leaving on the table the prospect of more cuts later in the year, OPEC ministers appear to be trying to send a strong message that they will stomach the temporary pain of reduced oil sales in exchange for the stability of higher prices.

If the gambit works, crude-oil prices could stabilize from their roughly 25% drop from mid-July highs. That could also put a floor under gasoline prices, which have also fallen sharply in the U.S., providing consumers a welcome boon from years of rising fuel costs.

DOJ_NMG_0083905

But OPEC hasn't necessarily won its battle to stabilize crude prices. In the past, OPEC members have been reluctant to decrease production in line with their promises, fearful of the double whammy to state coffers of falling prices and reduced volume. And the cut is still a small proportion of total global demand of some 84 million barrels a day. If demand growth slackens, as some analysts are predicting, prices could continue to fall.

U.S. benchmark crude futures rose 85 cents, or 1.5%, to $58.50 on the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday, before the outcome of the OPEC meeting. (See related article on page C4.) Prices have plunged from a nominal settlement high of $77.03 on July 14 and remain well below an inflation-adjusted high of $99.56, reached in April 1980.

The decision ended for now a rancorous debate among OPEC members about how to portion out the group's first production cut since February 2004. Countries that had been struggling to pump enough oil to meet their allotted share of the cartel's output had argued the group should simply reduce those quotas. That solution would cause them little pain but require the group's heavy producers to cut back more sharply.

But ministers last night said they would cut from the group's actual current output. The International Energy Agency estimates OPEC's output reached 27.8 million barrels a day in September excluding Iraq, which is exempt from production limits.

Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali Naimi, OPEC's de facto leader as the representative of the group's largest producer, suggested OPEC would act aggressively to bolster prices. Before going into last night's meeting, he said he supported another cut in output in December if necessary.

"We're trying to get the market back to equilibrium," Mr. Naimi told reporters ahead of the meeting.

OPEC Says It Will Cut 1.2 Million Barrels A Day (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries early today announced plans to cut oil production by 1.2 million barrels a day, equal to 4.3 percent of the group's total, in an effort to stop the slide in oil prices over the past three months.

The unexpectedly large size of the cut, the cartel's first since December 2004, was aimed at the many oil traders and analysts who still take a skeptical view of OPEC's will to follow through and carry out meaningful output reductions.

In contrast to the jawboning about production cuts that has been going on for the past three weeks, this plan emerged from an emergency meeting in the Qatari capital of Doha and had the crucial support of Saudi Arabia, the biggest producer in the group.

Qatar's energy minister, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, announced the decision after a late-night session and said that the production cuts would take effect Nov. 1 and be shared by all OPEC members except Iraq, but he did not say how the cuts would be allocated among the members, a key issue.

Earlier as he arrived for the meeting, Saudi Arabia's Oil Minister Ali al-Naimi threw his support behind a 1 million-barrel-a-day cut in production. "We're trying to get the market back to its normal equilibrium and the price will take care of itself," he told reporters in the Qatari capital. Prices have fallen from a peak of $78.40 a barrel in July to just under $60 a barrel recently.

Many analysts remained doubtful that the 11-member group could agree on how to divvy up the production cuts or whether it could avoid cheating by members even if they did reach an agreement. With prices high, the incentive for members to cheat is also high.

"Talk is cheap, oil isn't," said Fadel Gheit, oil analyst with Oppenheimer & Co. He said that OPEC members "never thought in their most optimistic forecasts that oil prices would be as high for as long as they have been. For them to have a knee-jerk reaction to $60 oil doesn't make sense."

Before the final agreement was announced, crude oil prices on the New York Mercantile Exchange closed at $58.50 a barrel, up 85 cents, for November delivery.

But other analysts said that OPEC's move would have an impact. Even if the cuts fall short of the stated target, "clearly cuts are on the way, and just at the moment when demand for crude oil is about to skyrocket" because of the start of the winter heating season, said Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers. Morse said he was surprised that Saudi Arabia agreed to publicly cut production just before the U.S. elections. "OPEC doesn't like to see the market betting against it and clearly felt the need to act to change the psychology of the marketplace," he said.

It remained unclear what price level OPEC is trying to support. As prices have risen, so too have the cartel members' expectations. Though down about 25 percent from its July peak, the price of crude oil is still high by historical standards. Just four years ago, OPEC had a target range of $22 to $28 a barrel. Now many members talk about supporting a price of $55 a barrel. (OPEC's oil basket usually carries a slightly lower value than the higher quality oil used as a benchmark on spot markets.)

DOJ_NMG_0083906

Higher oil revenues have political as well as economic implications. Oil dollars have helped bankroll Venezuela's efforts to spread its influence in South America, Iran's assistance to Hezbollah and the United Arab Emirates' glittering new buildings. Virtually all OPEC members have boosted spending to contain domestic social pressures.

In Saudi Arabia, where there is a rapidly growing underemployed labor force, high petroleum prices in 2005 helped double the central banks' foreign asset holdings; they also fueled 6.6 percent growth and a budget surplus equal to 18.4 percent of gross domestic product despite a sharp increase in government spending, according to an International Monetary Fund report in August. This year, average oil prices have been higher.

Saudi support is crucial for any effective OPEC cut. The kingdom accounts for nearly 30 percent of OPEC output and it is the group's swing producer. But within OPEC, it is also considered a moderate on pricing, preferring a stable price to a volatile one that might encourage too many alternative energy projects. Most traders believe that Saudi Arabia will shoulder about half the burden of OPEC's actual cuts. Bloomberg News reported that before the meeting, Naimi said: "What is 33 percent of 1 million -- that is an excellent number."

One issue the group has faced as it has negotiated over how to implement the 1.2 million-barrel-a-day cut is whether to calculate the cut from members' actual production or from their quotas, the production ceilings that were established by mutual agreement years ago and have been suspended. Kuwait, Algeria and Libya have expanded production beyond their old quotas. Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia are already producing far less than their quotas. Naimi said as he arrived for the meeting that cuts should come out of current production; Iran's oil minister, Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh, said in a statement on the ministry's Web site that cuts should be calculated from quotas, Bloomberg News reported. Last night, the Qatari minister, Attiyah, said the cuts would be from current production.

A senior European oil trader and consultant said yesterday that he doubted that OPEC could implement more than half a million barrels a day of output cuts, though he said even that might be enough to stabilize oil prices.

Without ceremony, Saudi Arabia has already trimmed its production in recent months. Its output has been reduced from 9.5 million barrels a day in the spring to 9.1 million barrels a day currently. Most of the reduction has been in low-quality crude oil that is difficult to refine and less sought after. Further reductions would probably be in this area, oil traders said.

OPEC has a regularly scheduled meeting in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, on Dec. 14. Ministers said they would review market conditions then, and cut further if necessary to prop up prices.

For the big oil companies, high prices remain welcome news. Doug Leggate, oil analyst at Citigroup Inc., said, "For the [producing] companies in this sector, the ExxonMobils, they are printing money at these prices."

The Petroleum Paradox (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Exactly three months ago, as oil prices touched $78.40 a barrel, people wondered where the ceiling was. Investment dollars flowed into a raft of alternative energy projects, and famous oilman T. Boone Pickens talked about $100-a-barrel crude oil and $4-a-gallon gasoline.

Since then, oil prices have dropped 25 percent, to $58.57 a barrel, leaving people to speculate about where the price floor is. OPEC ministers are fretting, some hedge funds are losing billions of dollars on bad market bets, and Pickens now mumbles about $70-a-barrel crude oil. Others are talking about half that price.

These wide-swinging cycles have long characterized oil markets, and the resulting uncertainty has served to discourage some of the big-money, long-term investments in new drilling, more-efficient refining techniques or alternative energy sources that could more easily meet growing demand. Now that prices have pulled back from the $70 range that held for much of the past year, industry watchers are worried that the urgency to invest in new supply may dissipate.

"Only high prices can turn around two decades of sluggish investment in exploration, production and refining capacity," said Leonardo Maugeri, author of "The Age of Oil" and senior vice president for strategy at the Italian oil giant ENI SpA. That is, the only cure for high oil prices is a high oil price.

Suddenly, the talk of the oil-producing countries is how to prop up prices, not how to ease the supply squeeze and calm political tensions that had kept oil prices stubbornly high. Yesterday the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries held an emergency meeting to negotiate production cuts. But energy experts put little faith in OPEC's efforts to hold the line on supply and prices; rather, the experts are bracing themselves for the downward whoosh of another boom-and-bust cycle.

"When you're told that 'this time is different,' that is usually the time for warning bells to go off," said Daniel Yergin, author of a history of the oil industry called "The Prize" and chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "There's no reason to think that cycles have been abolished."

DOJ_NMG_0083907

OPEC produces about 40 percent of the world's 85.4 million barrels a day of oil. Despite OPEC's new commitment to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day, the politics of the organization -- such as the traditional rivalry between Iran and Saudi Arabia or the need in populous Venezuela and Nigeria to keep up revenue to contain domestic social pressures -- make it hard for members to agree on how to share the burden of output cuts. So far, international oil traders seem unimpressed by the countries' efforts. Prices remain quiescent.

No major company has yet backed off investment plans announced when oil was $20 a barrel higher.

ConocoPhillips Co. and EnCana Corp. are still planning to spend the $10 billion they announced this month to tap and refine thick Canadian tar sands. Cambridge Energy Research Associates estimates that a new Canadian tar sands project needs oil prices of at least $35 a barrel to be profitable, much more than most conventional oil projects.

Chevron Corp. and its partners are still committed to tapping oil reserves in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, where they paid more than $100 million to drill a single exploratory well. Oil firms are also circling reserves in deep water off Angola, where their investments will pay off if oil costs as little as $20 to $30 a barrel.

At this point, oil costs are still high enough for these investments to make sense. "This price is the level we had just four or five months ago. This is not a collapse," said Doug Leggate, oil analyst at Citigroup Inc. "A collapse is $20 oil. This is a pullback."

Earlier this year, BP PLC chief executive John P. Browne said that his planners expected prices to drop no lower than $40 a barrel and that the company will therefore continue exploration and investments that would be profitable at that price.

Though experts agree that wide swings will persist in the oil markets, some think the price floors will never reach, say, $20 a barrel, last seen in March 2002. "We have to face the fact that prices are rising," said James R. Schlesinger, former secretary of defense, secretary of energy and CIA director and now head of a Council on Foreign Relations task force that warned this week that oil dependency is compromising U.S. foreign policy. "There is an illusion in the body politic that we can go back to an era of cheap oil, and that's just not feasible."

Some analysts think prices will stay high because there's only a limited amount of oil in the ground and production has peaked. Even those who disagree think much of the "easy oil" is gone. Yergin said oil supplies will keep pace with demand and increase to 110 million barrels a day by 2015. He said that because of high prices, "nontraditional liquids" -- oil sands, ultra-deep water and liquid fuels produced from natural gas -- will be a bigger portion of that total.

Investors in alternative energy supplies have also been lured by high prices. Some of these projects can be profitable at lower price levels. One executive in search of funding claims his firm can turn organic waste into ethanol for less than $1 a gallon. Other projects -- including wind, solar and hydrogen -- depend on continued high prices.

"Fuel prices can slip and put a lot of people out of business," Richard Branson, the British music and airline tycoon, said last Friday in Washington. Branson has said he will invest $3 billion in other fuels, such as ethanol. If oil prices fall, he said, "I have an advantage because I'm in the airline business. At least I can balance the books by saving money for my trains and planes." Others might not be so lucky.

World oil demand can also alter the long-term dynamics of the market -- and it's another unknown factor. After the 1979 spike in oil prices, energy use fell much more than conventional wisdom thought possible. Now analysts are trying to measure the impact of more than a year of high prices. The International Energy Agency says global oil demand will be 84.6 million barrels a day this year, a bit lower than the agency's earlier forecasts but still up 1.2 percent from last year. The increase is driven almost entirely by China and the Middle East; consumption in the developed countries belonging to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development declined. The IEA expects world demand to rise 1.7 percent next year.

"The real change is long term," Yergin said. "When people buy their next car, what do they buy? Fuel economy, which had fallen off the charts, is very much back on the charts now." Yergin notes that after the 1979 spike in oil prices, it took five to seven years for consumer responses to fully show up.

"It comes down to what this does to turnover of the nation's basic capital stock, from cars to factories," he said. "At a certain point, you notice and you start reengineering your factories. I think that's what's happened here."

Raise The Gas Tax (WSJ)

By N. Gregory Mankiw

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

With the midterm election around the corner, here's a wacky idea you won't often hear from our elected leaders: We should raise the tax on gasoline. Not quickly, but substantially. I would like to see Congress increase the gas tax by $1 per gallon, phased in gradually by 10 cents per year over the next decade. Campaign consultants aren't fond of this kind of proposal, but policy wonks keep pushing for it. Here's why:

DOJ_NMG_0083908

The environment. The burning of gasoline emits several pollutants. These include carbon dioxide, a cause of global warming. Higher gasoline taxes, perhaps as part of a broader carbon tax, would be the most direct and least invasive policy to address environmental concerns.

Road congestion. Every time I am stuck in traffic, I wish my fellow motorists would drive less, perhaps by living closer to where they work or by taking public transport. A higher gas tax would give all of us the incentive to do just that, reducing congestion on streets and highways.

Regulatory relief. Congress has tried to reduce energy dependence with corporate average fuel economy standards. These CAFE rules are heavy-handed government regulations replete with unintended consequences: They are partly responsible for the growth of SUVs, because light trucks have laxer standards than cars. In addition, by making the car fleet more fuel-efficient, the regulations encourage people to drive more, offsetting some of the conservation benefits and exacerbating road congestion. A higher gas tax would accomplish everything CAFE standards do, but without the adverse side effects.

The budget. Everyone who has studied the numbers knows that the federal budget is on an unsustainable path. When baby-boomers retire and become eligible for Social Security and Medicare, either benefits for the elderly will have to be cut or taxes raised. The most likely political compromise will include some of each. A $1 per gallon hike in gas tax would bring in $100 billion a year in government revenue and make a dent in the looming fiscal gap.

Tax incidence. A basic principle of tax analysis -- taught in most freshman economics courses -- is that the burden of a tax is shared by consumer and producer. In this case, as a higher gas tax discouraged oil consumption, the price of oil would fall in world markets. As a result, the price of gas to consumers would rise by less than the increase in the tax. Some of the tax would in effect be paid by Saudi Arabia and Venezuela.

Economic growth. Public finance experts have long preached that consumption taxes are better than income taxes for long-run economic growth, because income taxes discourage saving and investment. Gas is a component of consumption. An increased reliance on gas taxes over income taxes would make the tax code more favorable to growth. It would also encourage firms to devote more R&D spending to the search for gasoline substitutes.

National security. Alan Greenspan called for higher gas taxes recently. "It's a national security issue," he said. It is hard to judge how much high oil consumption drives U.S. involvement in Middle Eastern politics. But Mr. Greenspan may well be right that the gas tax is an economic policy with positive spillovers to foreign affairs.

Is it conceivable that the policy wonks will ever win the battle with the campaign consultants? I think it is. Even after a $1 hike, the U.S. gas tax would still be less than half the level in, say, Great Britain, which last I checked is still a democracy. But don't expect those vying for office to come around until the American people recognize that while higher gas taxes are unattractive, the alternatives are even worse.

Mr. Mankiw, a professor at Harvard, was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers from 2003 to 2005.

Police: Motorist Who Struck Officer Is 2nd Circuit Judge (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 20, 2006

A popular city police officer was fighting for his life Thursday after being hit by a sport utility vehicle driven by a federal judge, New Haven, Conn., police said.

Officer Dan Picagli, a 17-year veteran of the force, was hit while working an extra-duty job directing traffic in the rain Tuesday night in a dimly lit section of Chapel Street.

He had on a black raincoat, and Police Chief Francisco Ortiz said Thursday that he was wearing a reflective vest. Ortiz described Picagli's injuries as life-threatening.

City officials identified the driver of the SUV that hit Picagli as John M. Walker Jr., a judge on the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, who lives in Connecticut and maintains court chambers in New Haven. They said he was leaving work when the accident happened.

Ortiz said a long investigation will be required to determine what happened, but police did not feel it was necessary to test Walker for drugs or alcohol.

"He's cooperating," Ortiz said. "He's also very much distraught over what occurred."

Walker, 65, voluntarily stepped down as chief judge Oct. 1 and took the status of senior judge, said spokeswoman Karen Milton, circuit executive for the appeals court.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with the police officer and his family, and we pray for his full recovery," Milton said.

The 2nd Circuit handles federal court appeals from New York, Connecticut and Vermont.

DOJ_NMG_0083909

Picagli, 38, was the school resource officer at Fair Haven Middle School and later spent time with the department's youth-oriented policing unit.

He currently oversees the Board of Young Adult Police Commissioners and the Police Athletic League, where he organizes athletic camps for city children.

Confusion Reigns Over Safety Tester's Approval Of E85 Fuel Station Pumps (USAT)

By Justin Hyde, The Detroit Free Press

USA Today, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Underwriters Laboratories, the product-safety testing group, said on Thursday that it has no timetable for approving E85 systems for filling stations, an issue that's created confusion around the country and could slow the spread of ethanol fuel.

A UL listing is a requirement for filling stations under most fire codes. But on Oct. 5, UL said it was suspending its listings for any fuel system that handles E85, a blend of 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline.

John Drengenberg, UL's manager of consumer affairs, said the group had certified some parts of a fueling system as acceptable for alternative fuels, but it didn't take a close look at E85 until May, when a supplier applied for a UL listing for an entire "dispenser" — the pump and nozzle you park next to for refueling.

The lack of the UL seal for fuel pumps carrying E85 means that most of the roughly 1,000 stations that carry it likely violate fire codes. It also means that in most states, stations that want to install E85 pumps will need waivers from local or state fire marshals.

No safety problems with E85 pumps have been reported. UL's decision applies only to pumps that sell fuels containing more than 15% ethanol.

So far, two E85 stations in Columbus, Ohio, have been closed because of a lack of a UL listing.

Drengenberg said that as UL began to examine the system, it realized it needed more information about how ethanol reacts over long periods of time with parts made from some metals.

"We looked at it very carefully, and we found this issue of the corrosiveness of ethanol," Drengenberg said. "We're going to hold back until we get all the questions that came into our minds answered."

He said UL understands the demand for E85 pumps and is moving quickly.

Nearly all current E85 pumps were converted from gasoline, and while some components had UL listings for ethanol, many companies sold parts that had been UL-listed for gas, then upgraded to handle ethanol.

Robert Renkes of the Petroleum Equipment Institute, which represents 1,600 companies that supply fueling stations, said the UL decision puts pressure on local officials to decide whether to allow new stations.

Ruling Is Due For Justice Who Lobbied For Bush Pick (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 18 — A year after the Bush administration enlisted a Texas Supreme Court justice in its unsuccessful bid to put Harriet E. Miers on the United States Supreme Court, a special state court is to announce Friday whether the judge was guilty of "willful and persistent" violations of judicial ethics for his role in that effort.

The justice, Nathan L. Hecht, 57, the longest-serving member of the Texas high court and a friend of Ms. Miers for 30 years, testified before the State Commission on Judicial Conduct that he had given about 120 interviews to reporters in which he promoted her nomination.

Justice Hecht, a Republican who is running for re-election, also said he had reported back to the White House on questions he was asked about Ms. Miers, President Bush's longtime counsel.

Justice Hecht was widely portrayed in news reports as Ms. Miers's "spokesman." Defending himself before commission members, he said he had been swept up in a "tsunami" of news coverage. "I felt I was drawn kicking and screaming into the process," he testified.

But under questioning, he acknowledged, "Nobody forced me."

Justice Hecht also told the commission that he had been advancing a public interest in Ms. Miers's nomination, that she was not a candidate for elective office and that he was entitled to free speech.

But the commission, citing rules it said had been devised by Justice Hecht's own court, argued that the judge had improperly lent the prestige of his office to advance someone else's "private interests," illegally used his name to endorse "another candidate" for "public office," and violated the State Constitution by conduct discrediting the judiciary.

DOJ_NMG_0083910

Texas judges themselves had asked for the prohibition against political endorsements to fend off requests from fellow party candidates. Judges in Texas run for election on party lines.

The commission decided in May that the justice's actions on behalf of the White House and Ms. Miers merited a public admonition, the lightest form of reprimand, which carries no criminal or civil consequences.

But Justice Hecht sought to overturn the sanction by appealing to a Special Court of Review, which is randomly selected by the Texas Supreme Court, the nine-member bench on which Justice Hecht has served since 1989. The Texas Supreme Court has final authority over civil and juvenile delinquency cases; the Court of Criminal Appeals has ultimate jurisdiction over criminal cases.

In an unusual move, the special court — two state appellate judges from Dallas and one from El Paso — had announced this month that it would release its ruling at a court hearing and news conference in Fort Worth on Oct. 23. But this week it said instead that it would notify the parties by fax on Friday. No explanation was given for the change.

Mark L. Greenwald, a special counsel for the commission, said that if the court dismissed the admonition against the judge, "I would hope the commission would appeal it, to get the United States Supreme Court on board." An appeal from a ruling by a special review court can be made only to the nation's highest court.

Mr. Greenwald said the minimal reprimand sought by the commission translated to "please don't do that again."

Charles L. Babcock, a lawyer representing Justice Hecht, said the judge had an unblemished record and was set on vindication. "He's a candidate for re-election," Mr. Babcock said. Even the admonition, he said, "has a very nasty effect."

The justice's appeal was supported in friend of the court briefs submitted by the Republican Party of Texas and the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation of Texas.

In testimony to the Special Court of Review in August, Justice Hecht traced the start of his involvement in Ms. Miers's nomination to a call from President Bush's senior adviser, Karl Rove, on Oct. 1, 2005, two days before Mr. Bush announced his choice to fill the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Justice Hecht told the court that Mr. Rove had asked him to talk to callers about Ms. Miers's "faith, about her religious background," and that the group included James C. Dobson, a conservative leader and founder of Focus on the Family.

Justice Hecht said he also answered news media queries, which he said were so numerous that he was asked to report back to a White House aide on the nature of the questions.

He conceded to the court that he told one reporter, "I'm a P.R. office for the White House," but he later called that a joke.

Justice Hecht said he had considered the Code of Judicial Conduct during his campaign in support of Ms. Miers's nomination but did not think he was in violation of it. That opinion, he said, was reinforced by two senior appellate judges with whom he conferred.

The evidence Mr. Greenwald presented to the special review court included a television interview in which Justice Hecht vouched for Ms. Miers as an opponent of abortion, citing her attendance at "a church that is — takes an open pro-life stance." He also said of Ms. Miers: "She is very charming, of course. Everybody says gracious, but also very determined."

Mr. Greenwald told the court the case was "Shakespearean." Faulting Justice Hecht, he said, "The very individual who is part of that process of making sure that the rules and canons are in compliance with the law, being charged with violating that canon."

Mr. Babcock, Justice Hecht's lawyer, said he agreed that the case was Shakespearean but for different reasons.

"Imagine the senior-most appellate justice of this state being sanctioned for speaking truthful speech on a matter of public importance that is core speech in our democracy," he said. "Tragedy, true. Comedy tonight, perhaps."

Bush Campaigns For 2 Lawmakers Caught Up In Controversy (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa., Oct. 19 — It is not every day that a United States president visits this tiny farm and quarry town of 603 residents, where the "breaking news" story discussed on local radio Thursday was about two men caught breaking deer-hunting laws.

And it is certainly not every day that the current president stumps on behalf of a fellow party member fighting for his political life after recently admitting to an extramarital affair — but denying his mistress's accusation of abuse — in a usually reliable Republican township here in northeastern Pennsylvania. In fact, it can safely be said that this president has never before done so.

But President Bush did come here on Thursday to lend crucial support to Representative Don Sherwood, whose confessed infidelity has put his House seat into jeopardy. And far from seeming to hold his nose, Mr. Bush strongly embraced Mr. Sherwood, firmly shaking his hand as they stood on the stage, smiling for the flashing cameras, and then telling supporters, with gusto, “I’m pleased to be here with Don Sherwood: he is the right man to represent the people of the 10th Congressional District from the state of Pennsylvania.”

DOJ_NMG_0083911

The president also accompanied Mr. Sherwood; his wife, Carol and his daughter Maria to a local ice cream shop, ushering photographers over to take a picture of him with the Sherwoods, “a little family-style, eating ice cream.”

The appearance with Mr. Sherwood, at Keystone College, was the first of two stops that added up to a sort of Double Trouble Tour for Mr. Bush, who went from here to Richmond, Va., to a fund-raiser for Senator George Allen, who has been accused of using racially insensitive language and who has appeared to bristle at the recent revelation that his mother was born Jewish.

Democrats on Thursday cast the presidential visits as signs of anxiety at the White House and among national Republicans in this election year, mockingly calling it part of “Character Counts Week” in e-mail to reporters.

Local liberals, however, found it none too surprising.

“That’s how desperate he is to keep this one seat that he would actually support this man,” said Chris Darko, 49, who was one of dozens of people who turned out to protest the war in Iraq, and had to take black electrical tape off her mouth to speak. (It was worn to protest the United States’ treatment of terrorism suspects, she said.)

But the White House said it was living up to commitments made to candidates who still had the president’s support, though Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, declined Thursday to address directly the specific controversies involving Mr. Sherwood and Mr. Allen.

“The president understands it’s important to set high standards,” Mr. Snow told reporters. “But the other thing the president is doing is he’s going to go out and let the candidates speak for themselves on this.”

Mr. Bush did not dodge the issue of the Sherwoods’ marriage, going so far as to refer to a letter that Carol Sherwood sent to constituents over the weekend — and that easily made its way to local newspapers — chiding her husband’s Democratic opponent, Chris Carney, for mentioning the affair in a commercial.

“Private humiliation is one thing to endure,” Ms. Sherwood wrote. “But to be repeatedly, publicly humiliated is quite another.”

Mr. Bush turned to her on the stage, where she sat smiling, and said, “I read Carol Sherwood’s letter to the citizens of this Congressional district. I was deeply moved by her words.”

The president moved on to what he said were the two issues that mattered the most this campaign year, taxes and terrorism, beginning what may have been his strongest attack against Democrats so far this campaign season.

“As this campaign gets closer to the stretch,” he said, “you will hear a lot of rhetoric and a lot of partisan charges coming from the other side. Their goal is to distract you from the two main issues in this campaign.”

The White House did not make it easy for reporters to come here and report on his message. They were offered no directions and no charter plane to get to La Plume — far from Washington. White House officials said that was because the White House Correspondents Association, which organizes press transportation, did not ask for a plane, concluding that even with one, reporters could not catch both events.

Steven Scully, president of the association, said that was true, but he found fault with the scheduling by the White House. “They certainly weren’t making it easy for us to get up there; there’s no question about that,” Mr. Scully said.

At least this event was open to the press, he noted — unlike many others on Mr. Bush’s campaign schedule. And members of the news media were also invited to Mr. Allen’s event, to which the White House did offer directions.

At the Virginia event, Mr. Bush did not talk about the problems that have arisen in Mr. Allen’s campaign, calling the senator a “good man of strong principles” while focusing most of his remarks on tax cuts and the economy.

Outside the event, several hundred protesters drummed while chanting “Allen is a racist” and “Impeach Bush.”

Bush Campaigns For Pa., Va. Candidates (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 20, 2006

President Bush campaigned Thursday for a congressman who has confessed to adultery and a senator accused of racial insensitivity, seeking to boost incumbent Republicans once safe for re-election but now in peril.

Bush's appearances for Rep. Don Sherwood here and for Sen. George Allen in Richmond, Va., found the White House on the defensive over the decision to try to help candidates in such straits as the GOP struggles to keep control of Congress.

"I think the president understands that it's important to set high standards," said spokesman Tony Snow.

Bush, whose low approval ratings and identification with the unpopular war in Iraq has caused some Republicans to see him as a liability, tried to keep the focus on his contentions that Democrats would go soft on the war on terror and raise taxes if handed a majority in the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0083912

But the pictures of the day were of Bush descending from Air Force One in Pennsylvania alongside Sherwood, his wife and one of their daughters, who were secreted onto the plane to set up the photo-op, and of the grinning foursome's appearance later at a local farmer's ice cream store.

Allen opted for a slightly less robust presidential embrace, merely greeting Bush at the bottom of his airplane's stairs and keeping a bit of a distance on their pumpkin-buying stop at a roadside stand. Sticking closely by Allen's side throughout was state Sen. Benjamin Lambert, who is black and a Democrat who has endorsed the GOP senator.

Sherwood has held one of the safest seats in Congress, his conservatism playing well in his heavily Republican, rural district in northeastern Pennsylvania. Democrats didn't even bother fielding a candidate in the past two elections. But last year, Sherwood admitted to a five-year extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior. He settled a lawsuit that claimed he had choked her — he has denied he abused her — and has aired a campaign commercial asking constituents to forgive his infidelity.

Helping to raise more than $300,000 for Sherwood, Bush only obliquely addressed the controversy.

He praised Sherwood as "the right man to represent" his district, because of policy positions ranging from taxes to Iraq to highway money. Bush then offered effusive admiration for Sherwood's wife, Carol, who sat beaming beside her husband on the dais behind the president after mostly staying out of view during the campaign.

Bush called her a "caring and courageous woman" because of a letter she wrote to constituents over the weekend, in which she denounced Sherwood's opponent, Democrat Chris Carney, for airing campaign ads about the affair.

The president's main message at the event was that the Iraq war is part of the broader anti-terrorism effort.

He warned ominously that Democratic control of Congress would result in a chairman of the House tax-writing committee who would cut off funding for troops in Iraq and a House speaker, referring to now-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who voted against a string of bills: renewing the Patriot Act, creating a Homeland Security Department, waging the Iraq war and authorizing a warrantless wiretapping program.

"Given the record of Democrats on our nation's security, I understand why they want to change the subject," Bush said.

Responded Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider: "Clearly, the president is getting desperate to keep his rubber-stamp Republican Congress if all he can do is try to scare the American people with false claims."

Later, scooping about $500,000 into Allen's campaign account, Bush switched his emphasis to the other pillar of his campaign-trail speeches: that Democrats would preside over an economically damaging increase in taxes on American families and businesses.

The president took the unusual tack of using a Democrat from yesteryear to ridicule the Democrats of today, pointing to President Kennedy's proposal upon taking office to cut taxes across the board, including on capital gains.

"John F. Kennedy was right in 1963 and George Allen and I are right in 2006," Bush said.

The troubles of Sherwood and Allen have made them two of the GOP's more-endangered candidates as the parties head into midterm elections less than three weeks away.

Allen, once considered a potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, is in a now-tightened race with Democratic challenger Jim Webb. Allen has spent weeks battling the fallout from a series of missteps that started when he used what is sometimes regarded as a racial slur against at Webb campaign staffer of Indian descent. Bush made no mention of Allen's troubles.

Webb, gaining ground in polls and on the incumbent's financial advantage, is drawing help from national Democrats. On Thursday, former President Clinton was also in Virginia, raising money for Webb at the home of former Sen. Charles Robb.

Last week, White House press secretary Snow was in the position of defending Sherwood as a sinner who, like everyone else, is in need of forgiveness and Allen as "not a bigot."

On Thursday, Snow said the president had not changed his mind on either of those points — though he declined to repeat them — and insisted there was no downside to campaigning for the two troubled Republicans.

Anti-war protests awaited Bush at both fundraisers, with the larger and more boisterous crowd in Richmond yelling "Impeach Bush" as his limousine pulled up.

Lawmakers Mired In Gaffes, Scandal Get Help From Bush (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa. -- It is a sign of how bad Republicans' problems are that President Bush, this close to the election, had to stump yesterday for two men who should have locked up their re-election months ago but are facing difficult campaigns because of scandal or mistakes.

Mr. Bush first campaigned for a Pennsylvania congressman who admitted to a five-year affair with a staffer half his age, though Rep. Don Sherwood has denied her charges that he tried to strangle her.

DOJ_NMG_0083913

The president then flew to Virginia to campaign with Sen. George Allen, whose verbal gaffes have left him fighting for political survival against Democrat James H. Webb Jr.

Mr. Bush didn't refer to Mr. Allen's gaffes, which included using the word "macaca" -- considered a racial slur in some cultures -- to refer to an Indian American staffer from Mr. Webb's campaign. But in Pennsylvania he did refer to Mr. Sherwood's affair.

He noted that Carol Sherwood, the congressman's wife, had written an open letter over the weekend about the campaign and said he "was deeply moved by her words."

In the letter, Mrs. Sherwood said she has decided not to "dwell on" her husband's infidelity, and she accused his opponent, Democrat Chris Carney, of exploiting the issue.

"Perhaps Carney gets some pleasure out of hurting our family, or maybe that's what he thinks will make him a winner," she wrote.

Democrats said Mr. Bush's appearances yesterday were amusing given that last weekend he had proclaimed this as "Character Counts Week."

"It is no surprise that President Bush is celebrating Character Counts Week by campaigning today for two ethically challenged Republican incumbents," said Stacie Paxton, press secretary for the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. Carney said Mr. Bush "chose empty partisan rhetoric instead of addressing the realities facing our nation."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush had no hesitation about campaigning for both men. Mr. Snow said last week that Mr. Bush does not think Mr. Allen is a bigot. Mr. Snow also said the president believes everyone sins, noting that Mr. Sherwood has asked for forgiveness.

In 2004, Mr. Bush captured 60 percent of the vote for president in Mr. Sherwood's district, and he won Virginia by eight percentage points over Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

Yesterday's campaigning was a study in the power of the presidency to sway elections, particularly when in territory friendly to him. He emerged from Air Force One in Pennsylvania with Mr. Sherwood, his wife and their daughter Maria, and all of them paused for photos at the top of the stairway.

Mr. Bush then got maximum exposure in the district, taking a 30-minute motorcade route from the airport to the event and a different route back. Hundreds of supporters turned out to watch the motorcade. Mr. Bush also made a stop at an ice-cream store on the return trip, where he mugged for photos and gathered the Sherwoods around him inside the shop for what he called "family-style" ice-cream eating.

In Virginia, Mr. Bush stopped at a pumpkin patch with Mr. Allen along the motorcade route. Asked by the press during the stop about his campaigning for the two men, Mr. Bush demurred, saying instead that he was focused on getting a pumpkin for his wife, Laura.

Bush Makes House Calls On 2 Ailing GOP Candidates (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Don Sherwood shouldn't have needed President Bush's help in his reelection campaign. Sen. George Allen shouldn't have, either.

But there was Bush on Thursday, first in the small town of La Plume, Pa., and then in Richmond, Va., raising money and rousing the faithful — each appearance illustrating the difficulties Republicans face as they seek to hold on to what in the past have been safe seats.

Sherwood won 92% of the vote in his northeastern Pennsylvania district two years ago, just as he did two years before that, each time with no Democratic opposition. Allen, a former governor of Virginia seeking a second Senate term, only a few weeks ago was anticipating a run for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination.

Now, each presents unique challenges to the Republican Party as it tries to keep its majorities in Congress on Nov. 7: Sherwood is trying to survive a race in which accusations that the long-married lawmaker tried to choke his much younger mistress have become a central focus. Allen has committed a series of miscues that have raised suggestions of racism and efforts to hide his Jewish heritage.

Each race has put Bush in the awkward position of lending the prestige of the presidency to a candidate whose personal or political conduct is difficult to defend.

But that's just what he did, using the symbols of his office — and, in the case of Sherwood, an ice cream parlor — to convey his support.

Sherwood, accompanied by his wife, Carol, and daughter Maria, flew to Pennsylvania with Bush, offering a portrait of family togetherness as they stepped off Air Force One at the Wilkes-Barre-Scranton airport.

DOJ_NMG_0083914

After a fundraising reception at Keystone College, they stopped for five minutes at Manning Ice Cream & Milk in Clarks Summit. The president made sure the message was clear; he told photographers to record "a little family-style, eating ice cream," according to a pool report from Bush's motorcade.

In between, the president used the example set by Carol Sherwood to bolster the case for her husband's reelection. Responding to commercials raising the adultery issue by the Democratic candidate, college professor Chris Carney, she wrote in a mass mailing last weekend to district voters: "I am certainly not condoning the mistake Don made, but I am not going to dwell on it either…. We do not believe in flogging dead horses or living in the past. It is time to move on, and that is exactly what we are trying to do."

"I'm glad Carol's here with us today," Bush said at the reception, which the Republican National Committee said raised $375,000. "I read Carol Sherwood's letter…. I was deeply moved by her words. Carol's letter shows what a caring and courageous woman she is."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, who said Oct. 13 that Bush would stick to his commitments to campaign for Sherwood and Allen, was not quite as effusive Thursday.

Asked whether Bush had concerns, "personally and morally" about the controversies swirling about the two candidates, Snow said: "I'm just not going to comment on it."

Democrats gleefully pointed out that Bush was campaigning for Sherwood and Allen in the midst of what he declared Oct. 13 as "National Character Counts Week."

Sherwood's problems became public in May 2005, when the Wilkes-Barre Times Leader newspaper reported that District of Columbia police had responded to a 911 call from his Capitol Hill apartment the previous September. The woman who placed the call initially said Sherwood had choked her but then withdrew the complaint. In November, Sherwood settled a lawsuit she had filed, accusing him of physical abuse, after admitting a five-year affair.

Allen's difficulties emerged over several weeks this summer and autumn: During a rally, he referred to his opponent's dark-skinned campaign worker as "macaca"; he was reported to have repeatedly used a racial slur when referring to African Americans in the late 1970s; and he wrestled awkwardly with the disclosure that his mother's parents were Jewish.

At the Richmond fundraiser, which Republicans said brought in $530,000, Bush did not directly address the issues that have brought Allen into a tight race against former Navy Secretary Jim Webb, for whom former President Clinton was campaigning during the day.

Bush Boosts Allen Campaign, Even As Allen Nuances Pro-war Stance (AP)

By BOB LEWIS And MATTHEW BARAKAT

Associated Press, October 20, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) -- Sen. George Allen welcomed fundraising help Thursday from a visit by President Bush even as the senator distanced himself from Bush's tough stance on an increasingly deadly Iraq.

Allen's Democratic rival, Jim Webb, joined former President Clinton later Thursday at a fundraiser in McLean where they dismissed Bush's hawkish talk as more Republican scare tactics.

With polls showing little support for the war and poor numbers for Bush, even in conservative Virginia, the president is nevertheless campaigning nationally for sustaining American troop strength in Iraq until its fledgling government can control the sectarian carnage that threatens to spread into a civil war.

In Bush's speech to Allen supporters, he said that the best way to protect Americans is to stay on the offensive. He criticized Democrats' opposition to an indefinite military occupation in Iraq.

"That's why they're the party of cut and run," Bush said. "That's why the United States will stand with our allies in Iraq.

"We will give our military leaders the flexibility they need to win this war. We will stay and we will fight and we will win in Iraq," he said as Allen stood beside him, smiling broadly but saying nothing.

Allen has steadfastly backed Bush on the war, but when asked by reporters after Bush departed the fundraiser whether he still shares the president's hard line, Allen was evasive.

"I have my position based on my own assessment of Iraq," Allen said.

"The situation in Iraq is tough. Progress has been too slow. I think we do need to adapt to face this evolving threat that we find from the terrorists," he said.

Allen, over the past two weeks, has nuanced his position closer to that of fellow Virginia Republican Sen. John W. Warner, who returned from Iraq with a bleak assessment of the increasing death toll. Unless Iraq's government can function soon, Warner said in a news conference with Allen, the United States may have to consider changing its course.

"The president has his ideas on Iraq, John Warner has his and I have mine," Allen said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0083915

Clinton, at a fundraiser for about 375 Webb backers at the home of Democratic former Sen. Chuck Robb in the Washington, D.C., suburbs, said the public is weary of the Iraq politics Bush used successfully in 2004.

Republicans "won two elections by skin-teeth by scaring people and dividing them up. But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times," Clinton said. "It's kind of mangy dog right now."

"Look at Jim Webb. Does he look to you like a cut-and-run kind of guy?" he said.

Iraq has dominated Webb's candidacy. He warned in 2002, before the invasion, of a protracted military quagmire in Iraq that would destabilize the Middle East. Webb cited the war and other Bush policies for leaving the GOP. Six years ago, Webb not only endorsed Bush and Allen, he called Clinton's two terms "the most corrupt" in modern history.

Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran, said his differences with Clinton were over the Vietnam War, which Clinton opposed as young man.

"On 9/11, that wall came down for me. I lost my anger about Vietnam," Webb said with Clinton at his side.

Earlier Thursday, Webb said he hoped his appearance with Clinton would be viewed as "a measure of reconciliation and understanding."

Clinton joked about Webb's criticism from six years ago.

"If I only supported people who didn't criticize me, I'd have no one to support," Clinton said.

More than 100 anti-Bush protesters gathered across the street from the fundraiser for about 250 people at the Science Museum of Virginia. Most protesters held signs or wore T-shirts against the Iraq war. Some Allen donors walked nervously through the gauntlet of activists.

Both campaigns estimated that their fundraisers would generate at least $500,000 come they approach the home stretch of the race and throttle up their media campaigns to well in excess of $1 million a week.

Allen on Thursday picked up the endorsement of the National Black Farmers Association and its president, John Boyd, who unsuccessfully ran for a Virginia congressional seat as a Democrat in 2000.

Boyd praised Allen for Senate legislation he introduced that would have provided an estimated 72,000 black farmers nationally an opportunity to have their discrimination claims heard in court.

The endorsement has added importance for Allen, who this fall has battled claims he used racist epithets in the 1970s and his use of an obscure ethnic slur against a man of Indian descent in August.

On Wednesday, Allen won the endorsement of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, even though he never served in the military and Webb was a highly decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War.

Allen also picked up the endorsement of The Washington Times in its Thursday editions.

"For Virginians who favor low taxes, strong defense, limited government and traditional values, George Allen is the clear choice," the paper wrote.

Webb, meanwhile, picked up the endorsement Thursday of the Police Benevolent Association and of the Rev. Curtis Harris of Hopewell, a contemporary of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. during the civil rights era and a national officer of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Bush Trip Raises $550,000 (RTD)

By Tyler Whitley

Richmond Times Dispatch, October 20, 2006

President George W. Bush strongly defended the war in Iraq and tax cuts last night at a fundraising reception for U.S. Sen. George Allen in Richmond.

Allen aides said $550,000 was raised for the senator's re-election campaign. At the reception, the president said of the war: "It's tough," but added "we will fight, we will stay and we will win in Iraq."

He stood beside Allen, who has begun to express doubts about the war, in the rotunda of the Science Museum of Virginia.

In two hours and 40 minutes on the ground in Richmond, Bush stopped traffic, drew protesters and even found time to stop at a roadside stand in eastern Henrico County to buy a pumpkin for his wife, Laura.

"Don't tell Laura," he joked as television cameras captured him hefting a large pumpkin at Bill Gaulmyer's farm at Millers Lane and Gay Avenue.

The Bush entourage, which included political adviser Karl Rove, flew into Richmond International Airport aboard Air Force One after Bush spoke at a fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Donald L. Sherwood of Pennsylvania. Like Allen, Sherwood faces a tough re-election battle in a political climate that is hostile to Bush and particularly to the war in Iraq.

The presidential motorcade diverted briefly from Interstate 64 to the pumpkin patch before proceeding on to the twilight reception for Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0083916

Outside the Science Museum, protesters chanting anti-Bush and anti-war slogans appeared to outnumber the guests who paid $500 to listen to Bush deliver a 31-minute speech. Other guests paid $5,000 for the chance to mingle briefly with Bush and have their photograph taken with him.

The crowd, dwarfed by the rotunda in the old train station, numbered about 225 people.

"It's a fundraiser, not a rally," said Christopher J. LaCivita, a long-time Allen adviser.

Like the president, Allen put in a pitch for tax cuts, which have become a focal point of his campaign.

Neither Bush nor Allen mentioned Allen's Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, by name, but Bush lambasted Democrats in general for wanting to raise taxes. Allen, seizing on a debate comment when Webb said the government needed more revenues, has sought to tie Webb to tax increases. Webb has said he wants to close corporate tax loopholes and reimpose a tax on wealthier estates.

Bush, hoarse from his campaign rigors, said he and Allen had something in common.

"We both are named George, and we both married smart, beautiful women," he said. Allen's wife, Susan, beamed.

Among those to greet Bush at the airport was state Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III, a Richmond Democrat, who has drawn criticism from fellow African-Americans for backing Allen. Lambert said Allen has promised federal aid for his alma mater, Virginia Union University, and other historically black colleges.

Bush praised Lambert and Allen for reaching across party lines.

Bush credited the tax cuts he began in 2003 with starting an economic surge that has created 6.6 million new jobs in 37 months. Some Democrats fought those tax cuts every step of the way, he said.

"The best way to continue with tax relief is to send George Allen back to the Senate," Bush said.

Bush said Democrats will not be strong enough in fighting terrorists. He said many Democrats voted against reauthorization of the Patriot Act and against giving interrogators more powers to question detainees. Opponents say those powers could include torture and a suspension of constitutional rights.

Speaking of the terrorists, he said, "These people use murder to achieve their political goals, and you cannot negotiate with them."

Bush said America should stand firm in Iraq because Osama Bin Laden "thinks America is weak and that it is just a matter of time before we withdraw."

Bush, Clinton Headline Va. Fundraisers (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, October 20, 2006

President Bush criticized Democrats' opposition to an indefinite military occupation in Iraq during a fundraiser for the Republican Senate candidate Thursday, while President Clinton dismissed the comments as a scare tactic in a stop for the Democratic challenger.

The stops come as polls show the two locked in an even Senate race. Sen. George Allen appeared with Bush at the Science Museum of Virginia, while Democrat Jim Webb joined Clinton at a fundraiser at the home of Democratic former Sen. Chuck Robb.

The race is considered pivotal because a Democratic victory in once reliably Republican Virginia could signal a shift of power from the GOP to the Democrats in the Senate in the Nov. 7 midterm election.

In the speech to Allen supporters, Bush said the best way to protect Americans is to stay on the offensive. "That's why they're the party of cut and run," Bush said. "That's why the United States will stand with our allies in Iraq."

Clinton, speaking later in the evening, said the public is weary of the Iraq politics Bush used successfully in 2004. Republicans "won two elections by skin-teeth by scaring people and dividing them up. But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times," Clinton said. "It's kind of mangy dog right now."

"Look at Jim Webb. Does he look to you like a cut-and-run kind of guy?" he said.

Allen appeared with Bush even as he has nuanced his position on Iraq in recent weeks. Allen has steadfastly backed Bush on the war, but when asked by reporters after Bush departed the fundraiser whether he still shares the president's hard line, Allen was evasive.

"I have my position based on my own assessment of Iraq," Allen said.

Allen has been campaigning with his Virginia colleague, popular Republican Sen. John Warner, who said after a recent trip to Iraq that the country was "drifting sideways" and that a change in course may be needed if Iraq fails to restore order in two or three months. Allen's spokesman, Dick Wadhams, said this week that Warner and Allen "absolutely agree" on Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0083917

Iraq has dominated Webb's candidacy. He warned before the invasion in 2002 of a protracted military quagmire in Iraq that would destabilize the Middle East. Webb cited the war and other Bush policies for leaving the GOP. Six years ago, Webb not only endorsed Bush and Allen, he called Clinton's two terms "the most corrupt" in modern history.

At an afternoon campaign event in Richmond, Webb — a decorated Vietnam War veteran who was President Reagan's Navy secretary — said his previous criticism of Clinton was rooted in divisions over that war.

"I think 9/11 for me just changed all that," Webb told reporters.

"I see this as a measure of reconciliation and understanding that we need to come together and bring this country forward on issues of national security, on issues of economic fairness. My standing with President Clinton hopefully will be interpreted that way," he said.

Once regarded only as a warm-up race for a presumed 2008 Allen presidential bid, the race became competitive in August after Allen singled out a man of Indian descent before a mostly white crowd at a rally and called him "macaca," which can be considered a racial slur.

A Washington Post poll released Sunday showed Allen favored by 49 percent of voters surveyed last week, while Webb had 47 percent support. The results were within the poll's sampling margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Both campaigns estimated that their fundraisers would generate at least $500,000 come they approach the home stretch of the race and throttle up their media campaigns to well in excess of $1 million a week.

Bush, Clinton Ratchet Up The Drama (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

President Bush added a stern stay-the-course message on the war in Iraq to his buoyant endorsement of Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) yesterday, and the region's high-profile Senate races received special attention not only from the current occupant of the White House but the former one as well.

While Bush raised about $500,000 for Allen (R) at an event in Richmond, former president Bill Clinton raced through Maryland and into Northern Virginia with a similar mission for Democrats in mind.

Clinton headlined a fundraiser for Maryland Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin, rallied die-hard Democrats at a park in Baltimore, raised money for gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley in Montgomery County and ended his evening across the river in McLean, where 375 Democrats ponied up about $500,000 for Democratic Senate candidate James Webb.

Clinton told the Baltimore crowd that his party now has a chance to represent not just progressives but also sensible conservatives. "There's something amazing going on here," Clinton said. "This is not a usual election."

In Richmond, Allen may have gotten a bit more support from the president than he wanted; after Bush departed, Allen seemed to distance himself from some of Bush's tough talk on Iraq.

As he and his wife, Susan, stood next to Bush in front of a huge U.S. flag, the president excoriated Democrats on national security and taxes. "They would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done," Bush said. "That's why they are the party of cut and run. We will fight. We will stay. We will win in Iraq."

After the speech, the senator's aides brought Allen out to meet with reporters, where he softened the tone, saying that "America needs to adjust. Our battlefield commanders need to adjust and adapt to this evolving threat."

With polls showing that a growing number of Virginia voters are questioning whether the war was worth fighting, Allen has, in recent days, repeatedly sought to align himself with the commonwealth's senior senator, John W. Warner (R), who recently returned from Iraq and has been critical about the war's progress.

"John Warner and I discuss this . . . almost daily," Allen said, adding that a sudden withdrawal would "leave our country much less secure." Asked whether he agreed with Bush's "cut and run" statement, Allen said, "I'm not going to get in an argument here about the president's words versus my words."

He added: "The president has his ideas on Iraq, John Warner has his and I have mine."

In overwhelmingly Democratic Maryland, there was no disagreement with anything Clinton said. The crowd at a waterfront park in Baltimore, many wearing union jerseys, held camera cellphones, waved signs and cheered loudly at every applause line in the president's short speech.

Nostalgia for Clinton's years in office was the theme. Cardin, a congressman, introduced him in a plaintive voice, saying: "Mr. President, we miss you in the White House. It's been a long six years."

Clinton was full of his favorite old lines, saying that Republican attempts to accuse Democrats of not being up to the complicated battle against terrorism was "kind of a mangy old dog they're running out of the kennel one more time, and I don't think it'll hunt."

He said an anti-Washington fervor was something the political foot soldiers in Maryland should exploit.

DOJ_NMG_0083918

"You'd be amazed who wants to talk to you," he said. "In the next three weeks, don't give up on anybody."

The entire statewide Democratic ticket shared the stage with Clinton, and Democrats stressed that ousting Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and replacing retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D) with Cardin was a way to send a message to Bush.

"Ehrlich is on his way out. A Democratic House and Senate are on the way in. And Bush is on his way down," Cardin said.

From the Baltimore waterfront, Clinton and the Democratic candidates gathered again at the gated Potomac estate of real estate developer Morton Funger. Party faithful paid from $1,000 to $10,000 to mingle with Clinton and O'Malley over shrimp and mini-Reubens on the expansive veranda, some of the attendees said.

Clinton then headed to former senator Charles S. Robb's McLean estate to prove that there are no permanent friends or permanent enemies in politics.

Irony abounded. In 2000, when he was a Republican, former Navy secretary Webb endorsed Allen over Robb, the incumbent, saying that Robb had become "part of the problem." And at that November event, Webb took one of his many swipes at Clinton, saying his was "the most corrupt administration in modern memory."

Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, has said his feelings were driven by Clinton's avoidance of service in the military, "but I'll say on 9/11 that wall came down for me. I lost my anger over Vietnam." Webb made similar comments during appearances with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who has had at least two fundraisers on Webb's behalf during the campaign.

"I think there have been some obvious questions I have received about issues, issues that divided this particular generation during and after the Vietnam War," said Webb. "And I want to say as emphatically as I can it is very important for all of us to step forward and lead this country in a way it deserves in the areas of foreign policy and economic policy."

Clinton indicated no hard feelings.

"If I only supported those who never criticized me, I would have no one to support. That is part of being president. . . . Those times divided us, and maybe we are finally putting them behind us as a country."

The Allen campaign was not so accepting of the new friendship.

"Bill Clinton and Chuck Robb better enjoy their time with their fellow tax-raiser Webb tonight. His hypocrisy is becoming legendary," Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said. "Webb has a clear pattern of changing who he is and what he stands for with the political winds. Webb could well be calling Bill Clinton 'corrupt' and Chuck Robb a 'problem' again soon."

Both candidates in Virginia had to balance their guests' fundraising abilities with the baggage they bring to the state.

A Washington Post poll last week found that Bush's job approval among likely voters in the November election is at 43 percent in Virginia, about the same as nationally. In addition, 54 percent believe that the war in Iraq was not worth fighting, and 46 percent believe that "strongly."

The numbers are much higher, and Bush's approval rating much lower, in Northern Virginia, where about 30 percent of the state's voters reside.

At a news conference yesterday morning, Allen appeared reluctant to embrace Bush even as he prepared to welcome him to the state. Allen dodged a question about whether he is proud of his support for Bush -- the Webb campaign repeatedly points out that it is north of 95 percent -- describing his own record without once mentioning the president in his answer.

"I'm proud of my record as governor of Virginia, and I'm proud of my record in the United States Senate," Allen said.

Asked about the purpose for the president's visit, Allen said: "It's a fundraiser. The president's coming in to raise money. We need to raise money because Hillary Rodham Clinton has piled in a million dollars via the Democratic Senate committee."

Staff writers Tim Craig, Ann E. Marimow and Matthew Mosk contributed to this report.

JIM WEBB: Clinton Visit May Net Half-million (RTD)

By Peter Hardin

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 20, 2006

ARLINGTON -- Former President Bill Clinton saluted Democrat Jim Webb yesterday for his service to the nation and his courage in challenging Republican Sen. George Allen.

"I value his service to our country," Clinton told reporters before he moved on to a fundraiser for the decorated Marine veteran, and "the sheer audacity it took for him to make this brave race."

Though they have had different views in the past, Clinton said he and Webb share a Scots-Irish lineage and hardscrabble upbringing, and deep divisions in the nation over the Vietnam War are passing.

"Those times divided us. Maybe we're finally putting it behind us, as a country," Clinton said.

Responding to a question about President Bush's remarks in Richmond earlier, Clinton defended Democrats on the Iraq war, saying, "There isn't anybody that's cut and run."

Last night's event completed a political turnabout for Webb when he aligned himself with Clinton's star-raising power.

DOJ_NMG_0083919

Webb hoped a sell-out crowd of 375 guests at the private event with Clinton later in the evening would give his campaign a big boost.

Webb aides estimated the proceeds at between $400,000 and $600,000.

Just six years ago, then-Republican Webb called the Clinton administration "one of the most corrupt" in modern times and backed Allen for election over incumbent Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb.

Not only has Webb become a Democrat and patched things up with Clinton, last night's fundraising event in McLean was held at Robb's stately, brick-columned manor with a bird's-eye view above the Potomac River.

The appearance of Clinton in Northern Virginia on the same day that President Bush campaigned for Allen in Richmond not only underscored the importance of Virginia's vigorously contested Senate race, it mirrored the candidates' geographic strengths.

Webb, an author and former Navy secretary from Falls Church, had a solid lead in Northern Virginia in a recent Washington Post poll, with 56 percent of the vote compared to Allen's 42 percent.

In the rest of the state, Allen topped Webb in the poll by almost 10 points. Allen is a former governor, former House of Representatives member and former state legislator.

The Allen campaign, meanwhile, lambasted Webb with a press statement headlined "Webb Sells out Tonight . . . AGAIN." It cited his differences with Clinton and with Robb in the past.

"Webb has a clear pattern of changing who he is and what he stands for with the political winds. Webb could well be calling Bill Clinton 'corrupt' and Chuck Robb a 'problem' again soon," said Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams.

Senate Race In Va. Draws Biggest Fundraisers (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 20, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. — Locked in a tight race that could help decide control of the U.S. Senate, the two candidates in Virginia's Senate race Thursday brought out their party's big guns: the current and former commanders in chief.

President Bush raised money for Sen. George Allen, R-Va., while predecessor Bill Clinton campaigned with challenger Jim Webb. While Allen and Webb may hope the Oval Office aura changes voters' minds, political analysts said presidential visits are more about raising money and inspiring turnout by partisans.

“Both of them are the champion fundraisers in their parties,” said Bob Holsworth, a political scientist at Virginia Commonwealth University. “It shows you how the attention of the major parties has shifted to Virginia because of the sense it's a competitive race.”

Rich Galen, a Republican strategist, said that in non-presidential election years, campaigns need to find ways to energize wavering party members. “Presidents can do that,” he said. “Ex-presidents, too.”

The Bush-Allen event, at an old railroad station turned science museum, was expected to raise about $530,000. The Webb campaign did not offer an estimate for Clinton's appearance Thursday night at the home of former senator Chuck Robb.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll this month showed Allen with a 3-point lead over Webb, within the poll's margin of error. Allen had once been a heavy favorite in Virginia, but that was before he used the term “macaca” to refer to an Indian-American who had been filming an Allen campaign rally on behalf of the Webb campaign.

After attending a private reception, Bush and Allen were all smiles as they waved to the crowd of a few hundred in the rotunda of the train station.

Bush called the former governor of Virginia “a man who has earned the confidence of the people of this state. … We need him in the United States Senate.”

For Bush, it was a full day of helping candidates in trouble. Before jetting to Richmond, he spoke at a fundraiser for incumbent Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Pa., whose re-election bid has been dogged by his admission of an extramarital affair.

Clinton told about 375 Webb backers Thursday that the public is weary of the Iraq politics Bush used successfully in 2004, an issue Webb has focused on in his campaign.

Republicans “won two elections by skin-teeth by scaring people and dividing them up. But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times,” Clinton said. “It's kind of a mangy dog right now.”

“Look at Jim Webb. Does he look to you like a cut-and-run kind of guy?” he said.

Webb, a secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, also is a novelist and political commentator who in years past has had harsh words for Clinton.

In a 2001 letter to The Wall Street Journal concerning Clinton's end-of-term pardons, Webb, then a Republican, wrote, “It is a pleasurable experience to watch Bill Clinton finally being judged, even by his own party, for the ethical fraudulence that has characterized his entire political career.”

DOJ_NMG_0083920

Webb's spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd, said Webb's past disputes with Clinton stem from being on opposite sides during the emotional era of the Vietnam War. Todd said Webb changed his outlook after the 9/11 terrorist attacks, and opposes the war in Iraq.

Hastings Wyman, editor of the Southern Political Report, said it's hard to project a winner in Virginia's president-vs.-president faceoff. Wyman said each should “stir up the base a bit,” but, “with both of them going there, they'll probably cancel each other out.”

Big Names Campaign As Election Day Nears (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

President Bush and former President Bill Clinton, rallying party faithful at swanky fundraisers yesterday, told Virginia voters their choice in next month's U.S. Senate election is crucial.

The Nov. 7 election is about "which party will take the steps necessary to protect the American people and win the war on terror and which party is going to keep your taxes low and keep this economy growing," Mr. Bush said while standing beside Republican Sen. George Allen and his wife, Susan, at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond.

"We just have a different point of view, a different look at the world," Mr. Bush said of Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. Clinton, who endorsed Democrat James H. Webb Jr. in the Senate race, agreed the two parties have clear opposing philosophies.

"We've got a chance to win a victory for America," Mr. Clinton said, casting the upcoming election as a historic opportunity for Democrats.

Before hosting a private fundraiser in McLean for Mr. Webb last night, Mr. Clinton appeared in Maryland where he stumped for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic candidate for governor.

The Republicans have been taken over, Mr. Clinton said at Frederick Douglass-Isaac Myers Maritime Park in Baltimore, "by the most ideological, most extreme wing" of the party, prompting some conservatives to switch parties.

"We represent, now, both strains" of American politics, said Mr. Clinton, who later appeared at a fundraiser for Mr. O'Malley in Potomac. Mr. Clinton was expected to raise $500,000 for Mr. O'Malley.

At a brief stop in Arlington last night, Mr. Clinton told reporters that he admired Mr. Webb's courage for running against Mr. Allen.

"I wanted to express my public support [for Mr. Webb] for some time," Mr. Clinton said of the former Republican who several years ago called Mr. Clinton's presidency "the most corrupt administration in modern memory." Both men mended their relationship after September 11, 2001.

"This is a question of whether we're going to be frozen in ideology that ignores evidence and arguments or whether we are going to look at evidence and arguments and do what's best for our country," Mr. Clinton said.

In Richmond, Mr. Bush told the estimated 300 people who turned out to show their support for Mr. Allen that the senator "has earned the confidence of the people of this state."

"There's no bigger issue than what we're doing with people's money," Mr. Bush said. "The best thing Virginia citizens can do to make sure that taxes stay low is to send George Allen back to the United States Senate."

Mr. Allen has said he wants to make the Bush tax cuts permanent before they expire.

Mr. Bush did not mention Mr. Webb, Navy secretary under President Reagan, by name or criticize him. But he did criticize Democrats as the "party of cut and run."

Mr. Clinton, while in Arlington, responded to Mr. Bush's "party of cut and run" comment.

"They won two elections by their skins' teeth, by scaring people," Mr. Clinton said. "But you can only run a dog through the same path so many times before it doesn't work anymore. And I just kind of think it's a mangy old dog."

Mr. Bush also insisted the U.S. must fight the terrorists in Iraq to keep Americans safe. "We will fight, we will stay and we will win in Iraq," he said.

The rhetoric differs from Mr. Allen's line on the war, which he recently has tempered as its unpopularity grows and its death toll increases.

"I'm not going to get here in an argument over the president's words versus my words," Mr. Allen told reporters after the event when asked whether he agreed with Mr. Bush's statement.

Mr. Allen said he thinks the troops should come home "in victory, not defeat" and that Iraq can't become a safe haven for terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0083921

In McLean, Mr. Clinton was expected to raise between $400,000 and $600,000 for Mr. Webb at the fundraiser held at the home of former Sen. Charles S. Robb, the Democrat Mr. Allen unseated in 2000.

Webb campaign spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said about 375 people were expected to attend the sold-out event.

The White House said the Bush event was expected to raise nearly $600,000 for Mr. Allen, a former Virginia governor who is seeking re-election after one term in the Senate.

Hundreds of anti-war demonstrators lined the streets of downtown Richmond to greet Mr. Bush with handmade signs that said: "Torture is not a family value" and "Impeach Bush."

Democrats, Republicans Both Focus On Bush (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, October 20, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. -- Well before President Bush stepped on stage here Thursday evening to raise big money for embattled GOP Sen. George Allen of Virginia, the senator's Democratic rival had poured his own campaign cash into a 30-second television spot ridiculing Allen for parroting the president's promise of "staying the course" in Iraq.

Now the president's appearance has armed the campaign of challenger Jim Webb with fresh videotape, as he and Democratic congressional candidates throughout the country attempt to saddle Republicans with the unpopularity of their party's president, deploying Bush as a weapon in their own ads.

Former President Bill Clinton has joined the fray too, making an appearance alongside Webb at another Virginia fundraiser Thursday night - accentuating the debate in a campaign which Democrats are attempting to frame, in part, as a referendum on the Bush administration's policies in Iraq and at home.

"A big issue in this campaign, of course, is Iraq," Bush said in Richmond, praising Allen as a "steadfast" leader.

"Most leading Democrats argue we should pull our troops out of Iraq," he said. "They would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done. That's why they are the party of cut and run."

In the closing weeks of a campaign in which control of Congress is at stake, Bush's face has appeared in campaign ads from coast to coast. But it is Democrats who have dragged Bush into the campaign in a bid to portray Republicans as "rubber-stamps" for the White House and a vote for the GOP as a vote for the Bush agenda. Many Republicans, meanwhile, have sought to distance themselves from the president.

If the Democrats lack a unifying theme - particularly on a war which is foremost on many voters' minds - attempting to make this election more about the president and his policies is a means of capitalizing on two dynamics: Bush has staked an unwavering course on Iraq, and voters overwhelmingly say the country is on the wrong track.

With the president's job approval rating below 40 percent in opinion polls, Democrats are doing their best to rub that off on Republican senators and congressmen. Even in Rhode Island, where Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee has opposed the war and stood as far from Bush as anyone within the GOP, his Democratic foe, Sheldon Whitehouse, has aired a TV ad that opens with Bush.

"Bush needs Chafee to keep Republican control of the Senate," the narrator says. "That's how Bush keeps his agenda alive."

Such ads may play well in places like Rhode Island, where a recent Brown University survey gauged the president's job approval at 22 percent - among the lowest in the nation.

"Across the country, Bush is unpopular," says Darrell West, professor of political science at Brown University. "People don't like the way he has handled Iraq… So Democrats want to run as much against the president as their opponent. It's the Siamese-twin strategy: You tie your opponent to the president."

With a battery of similar TV and radio ads in several contested Senate races and in many congressional campaigns, Democrats are tying Republicans to Bush. And, as Bush closes his campaigning with appearances for endangered Republicans, Democrats are reveling in ties drawn anew {ndash} such as Bush and Allen, who harbored presidential ambitions of his own until his re-election chances slumped after addressing a young man of Indian descent as "macaca" at a campaign rally.

"It comes at a heckuva price," says Democratic strategist Steve Jarding, a campaign consultant for Webb. "These guys are in a hole, and the only tool they have is a shovel - not a ladder. Bush provides the shovel."

The Republicans, acutely aware that the tide of history works against the president's party during any second-term elections, are intent on focusing voters on their commitment to national security and cutting taxes. And the GOP warns that Democrats offer no alternative to the war, will raise taxes and resort to attacking Bush for lack of any true agenda.

"We've heard a lot of talk over the last few months about whether or not the Democrats were going to come up with some kind of agenda for the election, and they haven't," says Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial

DOJ_NMG_0083922

Committee. "To beat an incumbent, you have to do two things. You have to give a reason to fire, and a reason to hire. All we are hearing is the reason to fire."

Voters are hearing it, and seeing it, in campaign ads from coast to coast.

In Virginia, Webb's campaign put enough money behind a recent TV ad to ensure the typical viewer saw it ten times in a week. It pictured Bush saying: "We'll stay the course in Iraq." A price-tag for the war: $318.5 billion. And Allen saying: "I very much agree with the president" and "we need to stay the course."

The war is No. 1 on the minds of Virginia voters, according to a Washington Post poll showing that 54 percent of likely voters say the war was not worth fighting and only 43 percent approve of the job Bush is doing. It also shows Allen and Webb in a virtual tie among likely voters, with 25 percent calling their Senate vote an expression of opposition to Bush.

In five of the six Republican-held Senate seats that Democrats have targeted for takeover, Democrats have run ads connecting the Republican incumbent or candidate with the president.

In Ohio, where Republican Sen. Mike DeWine trails his Democratic rival, Rep. Sherrod Brown, by 7 percentage points in the latest Ohio Poll, the Democrats are airing a rollicking TV ad featuring DeWine and Bush arm-in-arm with hilarious smiles and a soundtrack of children singing a variation on a nursery lyric: "The more we work together, together, together, the more we work together, the happier we'll be. Cause your friends are my friends, cause your friends are my friends…"

Ads such as this play effectively to deep-seated discontent in Ohio about the way things are going at home and nationally, says Eric Rademacher, co-director of the Ohio Poll. His latest survey, showing Brown's lead over DeWine growing in the past month, found that 71 percent of the voters supporting Brown see Ohio as headed on the "wrong track."

In Tennessee, where Democratic Rep. Harold Ford is running a close race with Republican Bob Corker for the seat of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Ford has aired an ad quoting his opponent: "We are in Iraq… Our country is in Iraq. I think we should stay the course." Then Ford says: "I voted for the war. But we shouldn't stay the course as Mr. Corker wants."

Ken Goldstein, professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and seasoned campaign ad analyst, sees an attempt by Democrats in this and other ads to address a war for which the party has no unified strategy.

"In previous elections, the Democrats tried to blur the issue on Iraq and terror and said they were going to talk about issues that are more important," Goldstein says. "Now there is a way to talk about the war… It is: 'We're stuck, and this guy just doesn't understand that we're stuck.' That is something that people can understand."

If Democrats have attempted to blur their differences over the war, some Republicans have sought to blur their own party allegiance in a campaign with a president who has low approval ratings.

In Maryland, camera-friendly Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele has waged a disarmingly personable campaign for an open Senate seat with TV ads featuring a puppy. "Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd," he says in one. "Grainy pictures and spooky music, saying 'Steele hates puppies'… For the record, I love puppies."

His Democratic rival, Rep. Ben Cardin, has struck back with ads warning: "Michael Steele. He likes puppies. But he loves George Bush."

Brad Todd, a partner in On Message, produced Steele's ads. Todd's puppy, a Boston terrier, stars in the ads.

In attempting to snare Steele with Bush, Todd says, Democrats are waging a conventional attack against a candidate with a fresh, new appeal {ndash} he even takes heart in the Bush-based attacks.

"It's clear the Democrats don't really know how to deal with Lt. Gov. Steele's candidacy," Todd said. "They have come back with a very conventional campaign against him. It shows they just don't understand."

Iraq Threatens To Cripple The GOP (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - It always comes back to Iraq.

Regardless of what politicians and the media talk about from week to week - the Foley sex scandal in the House, a nuclear test in North Korea, a soaring stock market - what dominates American politics this fall is Iraq.

It's consuming George Bush's second term, threatening his party's control of Congress and endangering his dream of forging a Republican majority that would rule the country long after he retired to his Texas ranch.

Yet the debate over Iraq won't be settled on Election Day, Nov. 7.

Even as public skepticism about the war spreads, it's not producing any consensus on what to do about the mess, and thus the elections will offer little direction and no mandate for the U.S. government heading into next year.

Voters split four ways in a recent McClatchy-MSNBC poll - send more troops, keep the same level, start withdrawing, or withdraw them all. They split evenly in another poll over whether to keep troops in Iraq or pull them out.

DOJ_NMG_0083923

That helps explain the growing cracks in Republican support for the White House's open-ended, stay-the-course approach to the war. And it makes clear why Democrats don't offer a clear alternative - and why they'd have a hard time reconciling their competing visions of what to do should they win the House of Representatives or the Senate.

"It is THE dominant issue," said Andy Kohut, the director of the Pew Research Center, a non-partisan research group.

"The public is unhappy with the way the war has turned out. They're divided about what to do. But that doesn't mean they don't have a strong political point of view. They give Bush atrocious ratings. This is an unpopular war with his name on it. And that causes collateral damage for the Republican Party."

Bush and the White House continue to talk up the war.

"If you look at the general overall situation, they're doing remarkably well," Vice President Dick Cheney said of the Iraqi government this week.

But they're increasingly alone. More Republicans this fall are openly skeptical, an unthinkable break in party unity from a year ago.

"You can see some movement forward, but a lot of movement back," said Sen. John Warner, R-Va., last week. He's the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We have to rethink all the options, except any option which says we precipitously pull out."

Public confidence in the war effort fell sharply in recent weeks as violence escalated anew. The ranks of Americans who think the war is going well dropped from 47 percent to 37 percent from September to October, a Pew poll found. The biggest drops were registered by conservative Republicans, independents and conservative to moderate Democrats. Liberals had turned sour on the war long ago.

"It's creating a real challenge for Republicans," said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster.

"Not because the Democrats have any good answers, because they don't. But because voters are frustrated and don't see continuing the same course as a viable strategy."

Iraq's impact on this year's elections is evident in states such as Virginia, which features a surprisingly close contest between Republican Sen. George Allen, who supports the war, and Republican-turned-Democrat James Webb, a former Marine and Navy Secretary who opposes the war.

Iraq is the top issue in the state, where 3 out of 5 likely voters disapprove of the Bush administration's handling of the war, according to the McClatchy-MSNBC poll.

Virginia also symbolizes the muddled direction for post-Election Day policy.

"It's a mess now, and I'm not sure what to do about it," said Joel Dexter, a teacher from Richmond who supports Democrat Webb.

"If I had my way, I wish they could come home tomorrow," added Diane Canary, a homemaker from Roanoke who also supports Webb. "But I know that would leave Iraq in turmoil."

For their part, Republicans aren't telling voters much about what they'd do differently in Iraq.

Bush has said that the goal of complete withdrawal is "an objective" that "will be decided by future presidents and future governments of Iraq."

Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., caught in a tough struggle to keep his seat, said this week that Bush had a secret plan to win the war that he couldn't share with the world. There's no evidence of that, however.

At the same time, Republicans criticize Democrats for allegedly wanting to "cut and run" and for offering no alternatives to Bush's war plan.

Many Democrats do want to start withdrawing some troops. But their party leaders refuse to offer an alternative strategy beyond pressuring administration officials at hearings.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and other party leaders signed a letter urging Bush to start withdrawing troops by the end of this year, but didn't commit themselves to what they'd do if they took power- which could happen in three months.

One option would be for Congress to cut spending for the war.

"You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?" asked Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., in a newspaper interview. But members of the party's "Out of Iraq" caucus are skeptical they could get such a proposal past their party leaders.

"I understand that there's a range of views within the Democratic Party," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., who stressed the value of congressional oversight of the war. "These are tough, tough issues. We don't have a (formal) position on what your position should be on this particular issue."

But that might not make a difference on Election Day.

"People are not voting FOR the Democrats on this issue," said Kohut. "They're voting AGAINST the Republicans."

DOJ_NMG_0083924

GOP's Solidarity On War Is Cracking (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Janet Hook And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Public anxiety over the Iraq war, already reflected in polls and demands from some Democrats to withdraw U.S. troops, is now prompting calls for change from some unlikely quarters: Republican congressional candidates.

Across the country, GOP candidates are breaking with the White House over how long troops should remain in Iraq and who should lead the war effort.

Even some of President Bush's staunchest allies in solidly Republican states are publicly questioning the administration's war policies, while others are scrambling to find new ways to talk about Iraq in the face of rising voter frustration over management of the war.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas), who earlier this year stood by Bush during some of the most damaging sectarian violence, this week said that Iraq was in "chaos" and that it was "worth trying" to partition the country into semiautonomous regions, a proposal that sharply diverged from White House policy.

In Washington state this week, the Republican candidate for the Senate called on Bush to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a position also taken by a Republican congressman from Connecticut and the party's Senate candidate in New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr.

Kean said this week that the Bush administration had made "horrendous mistakes" in Iraq.

In Minnesota and Iowa, congressmen in tough reelection battles have called for withdrawing troops. So, too, has the Republican candidate in the congressional district around Boulder, Colo.

And in Virginia and Tennessee, states that Bush won handily in 2004, Senate candidates have been put on the defensive over their earlier calls to "stay the course" in Iraq, a line Republicans once hoped would demonstrate resolve. Both candidates there are now saying the U.S. must change tactics in Iraq.

"We haven't found one part of the country, even in the South, where it is good to say, 'Stay the course,' " said Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, a group for GOP centrists. But Republicans "don't want to do a major in-your-face with the president. They are trying to work around the issue in their districts."

The rhetorical tap-dancing over the war is a somewhat novel experience for Republicans, who have ridden to victory in the last two national elections with a strong and unified stand on the war. In 2002 and 2004, Bush and other GOP leaders increased the party's congressional majorities by hammering Democratic candidates as weak and indecisive.

As recently as summer, Republicans seemed poised to outmaneuver the minority party again by accusing Democrats pushing for troop withdrawals of wanting to "cut and run."

But in the last several months, strategists and pollsters from both parties say, the public mood has darkened substantially. Mounting body counts and the growing specter of civil war in Iraq have dragged public confidence in the war effort to new lows. A CNN poll over the weekend found support for the war at 34%, compared with 64% who said they opposed it.

Public dissatisfaction has been further fueled by news reports that U.S. intelligence agencies have concluded the war may be exacerbating the terrorist threat. At the same time, some of the Republican Party's most respected voices on national security, including the powerful chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, John Warner (R-Va.), have increasingly raised questions about the administration's policy in Iraq.

Bush nonetheless is continuing to portray the Democrats as wavering on the war.

"Democrats have been all over the place" in their own Iraq policy, Bush said at a campaign event for Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.) on Thursday.

He said that the "only position in the Democrat Party that everybody seems to agree on: If you want to be a Democrat these days, you can be for almost anything, but victory in Iraq is not an option."

Several GOP lawmakers said they and most of their colleagues had no plans to abandon the president.

"There's no question we're in a challenging moment in Iraq," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee official who represents a district with a heavy military presence. "But I don't think some mood has set in whereby we need to change our position as a party. You can't change it this close to the election. It's not credible. It's better to argue your position with passion than cast about for a new position."

Across the country, a number of Cole's colleagues are trying.

Some of the earliest calls for change came from Republicans with large numbers of Democratic constituents, such as Rep. Jim Leach, whose southeastern Iowa district gave 55% of its vote in 2004 to the Democratic presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry.

DOJ_NMG_0083925

Leach called for a withdrawal of U.S. troops two years ago, although he didn't say until this week that American soldiers should come home within a year.

Outside Philadelphia in Pennsylvania's 7th Congressional District, which voted 53% to 46% for Kerry two years ago, Rep. Curt Weldon has said he wants to take authority over troop withdrawal away from Rumsfeld. Weldon, like Leach, is locked in a tough race for reelection.

In Connecticut, Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, who was once one of the strongest supporters of the Iraq war, two weeks ago called for Rumsfeld to resign, months after his Democratic opponent had taken the same position.

It is not only Republicans in Democratic-leaning states who are facing the pressure to recalibrate their positions on Iraq.

In Virginia, Sen. George Allen, once considered one of the strongest adherents of Bush's strategy, has begun emphasizing his alliance with Warner, who has said that a policy change will be necessary in coming weeks if the violence in Iraq continues.

On Wednesday, Allen told a meeting of the Virginia Assn. of Schools Superintendents: "We cannot continue doing the same things and expect different results. We have to adapt our operations, adapt our tactics." Allen's race for reelection against Democrat Jim Webb has grown tighter in recent months.

An Allen spokesman said Thursday that there was nothing inconsistent in Allen's call for change.

In Tennessee, GOP Senate candidate Bob Corker found himself on the defensive after insisting at a debate earlier this month that he had never said the U.S. should "stay the course" in Iraq.

Mocking that claim, Corker's opponent pointed out that he had in fact said it in July and September.

Some Republican candidates who continue to support the war have nonetheless been forced to address the issue in sometimes tortured ways.

In New York's 20th Congressional District in the Hudson River Valley, an area that voted for Bush in 2004, Rep. John E. Sweeney aired a television ad last month featuring the mother of soldier who had died in Iraq. The mother says to the camera: "I don't believe in the war, but I do believe in our soldiers, and John Sweeney."

Sweeney's opponent has run a series of ads criticizing Sweeney's support for the war.

In Montana, Republican Sen. Conrad Burns insisted in a candidate debate this week that the president had a plan for victory — but "he's not going to tell everyone in the world."

When Jon Tester, Burns' Democratic opponent, asserted that Bush had no plan, Burns replied: "We're not going to tell you what our plan is, Jon, because you're just going to go out and blow it."

Democrats ridiculed Burns' claim, comparing it to the "secret plan" to end the Vietnam War that was attributed to Richard Nixon in his 1968 campaign for president.

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, said Thursday that GOP candidates cannot avoid talking about the war.

"Iraq is the 500-pound gorilla in the room," Kingston said. "And candidates who don't discuss it are probably going to be disappointed on election day."

noam.levey@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Breaking ranks

With sentiment against the war in Iraq growing, more Republican candidates for the U.S. House and Senate are openly criticizing the administration's strategy and distancing themselves from President Bush.

Mike McGavick,

Senate candidate in Washington

"As a show of faith that he is willing to set a new direction, the president should appoint a new secretary of Defense, preferably someone who has demonstrated bipartisanship in the past and someone who knows the value of involving Congress in these strategy decisions."

— Statement on Monday

*

Rep. Curt Weldon

of Pennsylvania

"I don't want Dick Cheney or Don Rumsfeld" deciding on a timetable for troop withdrawal. "We don't need some armchair politician back in Washington, because they want to run for office, to pick a date out of the air."

— During a recent

appearance

*

DOJ_NMG_0083926

Thomas H. Kean Jr.,
Senate candidate
in New Jersey

"I've been very clear that I think there have been horrendous mistakes that have been made in the conduct of the war in Iraq. And I said the administration has made these horrendous mistakes. That's why I've called for Secretary Rumsfeld's resignation."

— Statement
in September

*

Rep. Christopher Shays
of Connecticut

"I am losing faith in how we are fighting this war…. I believe we have to motivate the Iraqis to do more."

— Said in August,
after his 14th trip
to Iraq since the war began

*

Sen. George Allen
of Virginia

"We cannot continue doing the same things and expect different results. We have to adapt our operations, adapt our tactics…. The Iraqi people need to show some backbone, some spine. They need to get their heads, their minds and their hearts in control of their own destiny."

— In address this week to the Virginia Assn. of School
Superintendents

Source: Times research
Los Angeles Times

Bush Campaigns For GOP Candidates Facing Unexpected Troubles (PENNNWSFLSH)

By Jennifer Loven
PennLive.com, October 19, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa. (AP) — In an unusual day of campaigning, President Bush swooped into two races once safe for Republicans but turned perilous by one candidate's affair with a much-younger woman and by accusations of racial insensitivity against the other.

Bush's appearances on Thursday, for Rep. Don Sherwood in Pennsylvania and for Sen. George Allen in Richmond, Va., found the White House on the defensive over the decision to help candidates in such plights.

"I think the president understands that it's important to set high standards," said spokesman Tony Snow when asked about the situation.

Bush tried to keep the focus on his contentions that Democrats would go soft on the war on terror and would raise taxes if handed control of Congress in the November elections.

The pictures of the day from Pennsylvania were of Bush descending the steps of Air Force One followed by Sherwood, his wife, Carol, and one of their daughters, and the foursome's appearance later at a local farmer's ice cream store.

Sherwood has held one of the safest seats in Congress, his conservatism playing well in his heavily Republican, rural district in northeastern Pennsylvania. Democrats didn't even bother fielding a candidate in the past two elections. But last year, Sherwood admitted to a five-year extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior. He settled a lawsuit that claimed he had choked her — he has denied he abused her — and has aired a campaign commercial asking constituents to forgive his infidelity — and re-elect him.

Helping to raise more than $300,000 for Sherwood at Keystone College, Bush only obliquely addressed the controversy.

He praised Sherwood as "the right man to represent" his district, because of policy positions ranging from taxes to Iraq to highway money. Bush then offered effusive admiration for Sherwood's wife, Carol, who sat beaming beside her husband on the dais behind the president after mostly staying out of view during the campaign.

Bush called her a "caring and courageous woman" because of a letter she wrote to constituents over the weekend. In that letter, she denounced Sherwood's opponent, Democrat Chris Carney, for airing campaign ads about the affair and the abuse that Sherwood has denied.

DOJ_NMG_0083927

"I was deeply moved by her words," Bush said.

The president's main message at the event was that the Iraq war is part of the broader anti-terrorism effort.

He warned ominously that Democratic control of Congress would result in a chairman of the House tax-writing committee who would cut off funding for troops in Iraq and a speaker, referring to now-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who voted against a string of bills: renewing the Patriot Act, creating a Department of Homeland Security, waging the Iraq war and authorizing a warrantless wiretapping program.

"Given the record of Democrats on our nation's security, I understand why they want to change the subject," Bush said.

Responded Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider: "Clearly, the president is getting desperate to keep his rubber-stamp Republican Congress if all he can do is try to scare the American people with false claims."

Later, at the fundraiser for Allen, Bush was switching to the other pillar of his campaign-trail speeches: that a Democratic-controlled Congress would preside over an economically damaging increase in taxes on American families and businesses.

Sherwood and Allen are two of the GOP's more-endangered candidates as the parties head into midterm elections less than three weeks away that could strip Republicans of their majority in one or both houses of Congress.

Allen, once considered a potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, is in a tightening Senate re-election race with Democrat Jim Webb. Allen has spent weeks rebutting charges of racism and religious insensitivity.

Webb is gaining ground on the incumbent's financial advantage and drawing help from national Democrats, and a recent poll showed the race virtually tied.

On Thursday, former President Clinton was also in Virginia, raising money for Webb at the home of former Sen. Charles Robb.

Last week, White House press secretary Snow was in the position of defending Sherwood as a sinner who, like everyone else, is in need of forgiveness and Allen as "not a bigot."

On Thursday, Snow said the president had not changed his mind on either of those points — though he declined to repeat them — and insisted there was no downside to campaigning for the two troubled Republicans.

Bush Campaigns For Pa. Congressman Enmeshed In Sex Scandal (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 20, 2006

LA PLUME, Pa. - He said she was "a casual acquaintance." She said they were extra-marital lovers, but told police that he tried to choke her. His wife says she forgives him. So does President Bush.

In fact, Bush traveled to northeastern Pennsylvania Thursday to help the wayward husband, Republican Rep. Don Sherwood, keep his seat in Congress. Perhaps it's a measure of the Republicans' plight that the president would throw his prestige behind a candidate whose marital misbehavior conjures memories of Bill Clinton.

Sherwood's five-year fling with a woman half his age has all the elements of a bad soap opera, but voter reaction to his performance could help decide whether Republicans keep control of the House of Representatives. Polls show Sherwood trailing Democratic challenger Chris Carney in a district that had been considered a lock for the GOP.

"It looks like he's in pretty serious trouble," said Jonathan Williamson, chairman of the political science department at Lycoming College in Williamsport, Pa. "If they didn't need the seat so much, the national Republicans would cut Sherwood loose. This may be one of the firewalls - they have to have this one, even though they're not all that thrilled with their guy."

Bush gave Sherwood his wholehearted endorsement as he helped the candidate raise more than $300,000 at a fundraiser at Keystone College. The president addressed Sherwood's adultery head-on by praising the candidate's wife, Carol, for standing by him.

In a letter to voters last weekend, Carol Sherwood accused Carney of exploiting her family's trauma by casting the congressional election as a referendum on moral values.

"Chris Carney might be trying to make himself look squeaky clean, but we have all made mistakes we regret over the years," she wrote. "I am certainly not condoning the mistake Don made, but I'm not going to dwell on it, either."

Bush said he was "deeply moved" by her comments.

"Carol's letter shows what a caring and courageous woman she is," he said as the Sherwoods and one of the couple's three daughters looked on.

The congressman's marital misdeeds have become a frequent topic of discussion in his conservative, rural district, where the mountains are now covered with trees in shades of yellow, orange and red. Sherwood's problems started in September 2004, when Cynthia Ore called police to the congressman's Capitol Hill apartment claiming that he'd choked her for no apparent reason.

She was 29 at the time; he was 63.

DOJ_NMG_0083928

Sherwood was never charged, and the matter attracted little attention until the following spring, when Ore threatened legal action and provided details of a relationship that Sherwood had initially denied. The two met in 1999 at a gathering for young Republicans.

"We had such good chemistry," Ore told the Wilkes-Barre Times Leader. "I saw Don as a small-town all-American. He has that pink, rosy skin. When I first met him, he had those big glasses."

Sherwood, a wealthy car dealer, settled Ore's $5.5 million civil suit for an undisclosed sum, but his indiscretion continues to haunt him. Carney's efforts to exploit the scandal and the furor over former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit Internet messages to congressional pages have added fuel to the issue.

Sherwood has all but pleaded for voters to forgive him.

"I made a mistake that nearly cost me the love of my wife, Carol, and our daughters. As a family, we've worked through this," he said in one of his television ads. "Should you forgive me, you can count on me to continue to fight for you and your family."

But some Republicans aren't ready to forget or forgive. Former Sherwood supporter Joseph Lech of Tunkhannock, Pa., Sherwood's hometown, vented his anger in an ad for Carney.

"This incident with Don Sherwood just cuts right at the core values of our district. I've spoken to my daughter about that incident, and she's disgusted by it," Lech says in the ad. "I love my daughter tremendously. How can I tell her that I support Don Sherwood and feel good about myself?"

Carney's efforts to benefit from his opponent's failings mirror Bush's references to Clinton's infidelity during the 2000 presidential campaign. Bush presented himself as a morally upright alternative to the outgoing president by repeatedly assuring voters that he would "uphold the dignity of the office."

Sherwood admittedly fell short of Bush's pledge, but White House spokesman Tony Snow noted the congressman's contrition in explaining the president's decision to campaign for him.

"Mr. Sherwood has certainly admitted to what has gone on, and the president believes that we're all sinners, we all seek forgiveness," Snow said last week.

Pressed on the issue again Thursday, Snow seemed eager to change the topic. He defended the president's visit, then said: "I'm not going to go any further."

President Bush Visits The Area (TR)

The Times-Tribune, October 20, 2006

PITTSTON TOWNSHIP -- With a wave, President Bush walked down the steps of Air Force One at Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport, stopping briefly to greet supporters, including a Scranton literacy volunteer. Naomi Alamar, a volunteer for almost two decades with Scranton Council of Literacy Advance, met the president on the tarmac with Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Tunkhannock Township before a motorcade of five SUVs, a black box truck, two state police cruisers and a dozen police motorcycles whisked Mr. Bush to his speech at Keystone College in LaPlume. "I'm numb," Mrs. Alamar said, glancing back at Air Force One. The massive jet's 198-foot wingspan was too much for the airport's 150-foot-wide runway, sending crews out early to remove some runway lights to make room. After the president left for Keystone, about a dozen onlookers were treated to a tour of Air Force One, including 5-year-old Nathan Bakunas of Plains and his father, Rob. "It's really fun to know that we're going to see the inside of the plane," Nathan said, snapping photos of his father. About 125 protestors were waiting for Mr. Bush as he arrived at the college and made his way to the Gambal Athletic Center, where he told a cheering crowd that Republicans like Mr. Sherwood were better defenders of national security than "cut-and-run" Democrats. He also praised Mr. Sherwood's wife, Carol, for standing by her husband despite his admitted five-year affair with a woman 35 years his junior.

After the speech, Mr. Bush made a brief stop for ice cream at the Manning's Farm Dairy store on Grove Street in Clarks Summit. He was back at the airport by 3:20 p.m. Air Force One took off about 10 minutes later. Log back on to thetimes-tribune.com for updates throughout the president's visit

Presidential Visit To Lackawanna County (WNEP)

WNEP's website, October 20, 2006

President Bush spoke before a crowd at Keystone College. The president came to northeast Pennsylvania to help raise money for Congressman Don Sherwood's campaign.

The president stopped at Manning's Ice Cream in Clarks Summit after his speech at Keystone College.

Thursday, October 19, UDPATED: 3:22 p.m.

President George Bush has wrapped up his visit to Keystone College in Lackawanna County.

Air Force One took off from the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport around 3:30 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0083929

The president and his entourage arrived at the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport just before 12:45 p.m.

The president was joined on Air Force One with Congressman Don Sherwood and his wife, Carol. After spending a few minutes together aboard, they descended the steps to be greeted by other dignitaries waiting at the bottom of the steps.

The president also greeted Naomi Alamar of Scranton. She was presented with the Presidential Volunteer Service Award. Alamar is a volunteer with SCOLA Volunteers with Literacy.

There are state troopers all along Interstate 81 from the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton International Airport north and along sections of Routes 6 and 11 leading to Keystone College in La Plume.

The president was here to stump for Republican Congressman Don Sherwood. He spoke at a luncheon at the college. Tickets for the event went for $350 a plate. For people who wanted their photo taken with the president, the price tag was $2,500. It doubled for couples.

During his speech at Keystone, President Bush talked about what Sherwood has accomplished while serving in Congress and he used the opportunity of a Republican audience to make a few pointed jabs at the Democratic party.

On campus, security was very tight. There were state and local police along with secret service agents keeping a close eye on all activity on and surrounding the Keystone College campus.

The president was met with protestors and supporters as he approached the Keystone campus. The president was in our area about three hours.

After leaving Keystone, the president's entourage stopped at Manning's Ice Cream along Routes 6 and 11 in Clarks Summit for a surprise stop and a quick ice cream cone.

Newswatch 16 will bring you live team coverage of the visit beginning at 5 p.m.

More from Newswatch 16 . . .

Awaiting the President

Search for Missing Man

Secret Service Investigates Perceived Presidential Threat

New Vending Machine Promotes Healthy Eating, PA Products

A school in Columbia County has been selected to be the first to try a new state program aimed at getting students to eat healthier food made in the Keystone state.

Burglaries in Monroe County.

Republican Woes Lead To Feuding By Conservatives (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Tax-cutters are calling evangelicals bullies. Christian conservatives say Republicans in Congress have let them down. Hawks say President Bush is bungling the war in Iraq. And many conservatives blame Representative Mark Foley's sexual messages to teenage pages.

With polls showing Republican control of Congress in jeopardy, conservative leaders are pointing fingers at one other in an increasingly testy circle of blame for potential Republican losses this fall.

"It is one of those rare defeats that will have many fathers," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, expressing the gloomy view of many conservatives about the outcome on Election Day. "And they will all be somebody else."

Whether the election will bear out their pessimism remains to be seen, and the factors that contribute to an electoral defeat are often complex and even contradictory. But the post-mortem recriminations can influence politics and policy for years after the fact. After 1992, Republicans shunned tax increases. After 1994, Democrats avoided gun control and health care reform. And 2004 led some Democrats to start quoting Scripture and rethinking abortion rights, while others opened an intraparty debate about the national security that is not yet resolved.

In the case of the Republican Party this year, the skirmish among conservatives over what is going wrong has begun unusually early and turned unusually personal.

But almost regardless of the outcome on Nov. 7, many conservatives express frustration that the party has lost its ideological focus. And after six years of nearly continuous control over the White House and Congress, conservatives are having a hard time finding anyone but one another to blame.

"It is pre-criminations," said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review, the conservative magazine. "If a party looks like it is going to take a real pounding, this sort of debate is healthy. What is unusual is that it is happening beforehand."

DOJ_NMG_0083930

Some conservative leaders have often been quicker in the past to turn on Republican officials and one another than their rank-and-file supporters. But this year polls show broad disaffection at the grass roots, prompting some Republicans — including former Speaker Newt Gingrich — to worry that the public sparring could dampen turnout.

This year's antagonists also include some new critics, including Mr. Gingrich's one-time lieutenant, Dick Armey, the former House Republican majority leader.

In recent weeks, Mr. Armey has stepped up a public campaign against the influence of Dr. James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family and an influential voice among evangelical protestants. In an interview published last month in "The Elephant in the Room," a book by Ryan Sager about splits among conservatives, Mr. Armey accused Congressional Republicans of "blatant pandering to James Dobson" and "his gang of thugs," whom Mr. Armey called "real nasty bullies" — arguments he reprised on the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal and in an open letter on the Web site organization FreedomWorks.

In an interview this week, Mr. Armey said catering to Dr. Dobson and his allies had led the party to abandon budget-cutting. And he said Christian conservatives could cost Republicans seats around the country, especially in Ohio.

"The Republicans are talking about things like gay marriage and so forth, and the Democrats are talking about the things people care about, like how do I pay my bills?" he said.

Mr. Armey also pinned some of the blame on Tom DeLay, the former Republican House majority leader, who "was always more comfortable with the social conservatives, the evangelical wing of the party, than he was with the business wing."

Mr. Armey, who identifies himself as an evangelical, said he was tired of Christian conservative leaders threatening that their supporters would stay away from the ballot box unless they got what they wanted.

"Economic conservatives," he argued, were emerging as the swing voters in need of attention, in part because they had become more likely to vote Democratic in the years since President Bill Clinton was in office. "A lot of people believe he brought us from deficits to surpluses, and there is a certain empirical evidence there," Mr. Armey acknowledged.

In a statement on Thursday, Dr. Dobson said Mr. Armey was "still ticked" over a long-ago House leadership race in which Dr. Dobson endorsed someone else, and he restated his warnings to Republicans that social conservative voters "would abandon them if they forgot the promises they had made."

In a recent newsletter from Dr. Dobson's organization, Representative Mark Souder, an Indiana Republican counting on Christian conservatives to turn out for his re-election, called Mr. Armey's comments "disgusting" and insulting to "the many Christians around the United States who devoutly hold conservative moral beliefs."

Christian conservatives began complaining last year that the Republicans had put proposed Social Security changes and tax changes ahead of issues like abortion and same-sex marriage, risking the support of social-issue voters.

Over the summer, Congress held a rush of votes on just those issues — an election-year ritual intended to motivate those voters — and in an interview last week Tony Perkins, president of the Christian conservative Family Research Council, said he believed it had begun to revive some grass-roots enthusiasm.

"But the Foley scandal just let the air out of the tires," Mr. Perkins said.

Others dismissed the Foley scandal as largely irrelevant outside of Mr. Foley's district. Several conservatives said Republican incumbents were using it as a scapegoat.

"It will make you feel better to say, I didn't lose the election; Foley lost it for me," said Grover Norquist, the president of Americans for Tax Reform. "Your wife and kids will believe it."

Mr. Norquist said the Iraq war was the biggest drag on Republican candidates even before their big wins in 2004.

"Some people think we did it just to prove we could do it, like people who go running with weights on their ankles," he said.

Many blame neoconservatives who argued most vocally for the invasion of Iraq. "The principal sin of the neoconservatives is overbearing arrogance," Mr. Keene said. Neoconservatives, in turn, blamed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's insistence on holding down troop levels for the fouling up of the war

"There is a bit of a battle between people who say, Hey, your tax cuts wrecked our war and people who say, Hey, your war wrecked our tax cuts," said David Frum, a former Bush speechwriter who was among the war's proponents.

Mr. Frum argued that the problem with the Iraq war was in its execution, not in the idea behind it. "The war has to be seen through the prism of Hurricane Katrina," he argued, "because conservatives will support a tough war if they are confident in the war's management."

William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard and another prominent advocate of the invasion, said he doubted that soaring spending was turning off as many voters as tax-cutters like Mr. Norquist or Mr. Armey suggested.

"The spending bill that was supposedly going to destroy the Republican Party was the Medicare drug bill," he said. "I have heard almost no one talk about it one way or the other."

DOJ_NMG_0083931

Mr. Kristol argued that the Bush administration was suffering politically for applying too little force, not too much. “I am struck that people have the sense in North Korea and Iran that things are spinning out of control,” he said.

Mr. Frum and others blamed the Republican Senate’s support for the president’s guest-worker immigration proposal for angering the grass-roots talk-radio crowd. But Mr. Norquist, who favored the immigration proposal, argued that the election would provide a verdict on “restrictionism” in the fate of Randy Graf, a Republican candidate in Arizona running on calls for tighter borders. Polls show Mr. Graf faces long odds.

Mr. Gingrich, for his part, made the best of the fray, saying, “I would rather have a movement active enough to bite itself rather than a movement so moribund it didn’t realize it was irritated.”

Conservatives Hit For 'Whining' Over Turnout (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

Top Republican Party supporters yesterday accused fellow conservatives of "whining" in response to complaints from activists worried that grass-roots Republican voters are disillusioned and will stay home on Nov. 7.

Grover Norquist, a close associate of White House political strategist Karl Rove, dismissed concerns about voter turnout as empty threats.

"There are always in every election cycle self-appointed conservative leaders who announce, 'You haven't done enough for me, so my troops are staying home,' " Mr. Norquist said.

"The National Rifle Association, Americans for Tax Reform, the [National] Right to Life Committee -- the groups that actually put lead on the target and who do stuff all the time, they're not unhappy," Mr. Norquist said. "The people who are whining are the guys that don't have grass roots that they can actually move. So they are frustrated, and they don't have anything to do other than threaten not to participate."

Mr. Norquist was not alone in criticizing remarks in yesterday's edition of The Washington Times by Family Research Council President Tony Perkins and Republican pollsters and consultants, who expressed concern about lack of enthusiasm among conservative voters.

On his top-rated radio talk show, Rush Limbaugh yesterday denounced disillusioned Republican voters as "cut-and-run conservatives" and said those worried about turnout were just trying "to make a name for themselves."

"I think a lot of people want to matter," Mr. Limbaugh told his millions of national listeners. "They want to have power. They feel powerless, and if they think they can [mess] it up for somebody else by getting noticed and doing that, then they feel like they've got some power, so there could be all kinds of things at play here."

Conservative leaders told The Times that, while they have heard complaints from voters dismayed by a range of issues from runaway spending to immigration, they have become more concerned since Rep. Mark Foley of Florida resigned in a sex scandal, which they say has discouraged many "values voters" who helped push President Bush to victory in the 2004 election.

But Mr. Limbaugh said those worries were "conventional wisdom" inspired by liberals urging conservatives to "stay home and give the election to the Democrats."

"Have you noticed the conventional wisdom has spread, and now it's become commonplace in everybody's thinking? It is so pervasive a theme: Republicans staying home, conservatives fed up, not going to the polls because of Foley and whatever else."

The finger-pointing among conservatives is an ill omen, said Republican media consultant Craig Shirley.

"You know things are bad when the members of the leper colony start fighting with each other," Mr. Shirley said.

Mr. Norquist's description of "whining" conservative leaders telling their "troops" to stay home on Election Day prompted a puzzled response from Mr. Perkins.

"I've not heard anyone say that," the FRC president said. "He should wait until someone says it to break out the talking points."

In fact, social-conservative groups are continuing efforts to mobilize voters.

"Stand and be counted," was the subject line on an e-mail that Concerned Women for America sent yesterday to its supporters.

"Will you vote your values this election, or will you remain silent?" the CWA e-mail said, telling conservatives: "Don't stay home on Election Day. Forfeiting your right to vote -- no matter how disenchanted you are -- is no way to protest moral corruption."

Mr. Perkins said his own group has worked hard to motivate social conservatives, citing last month's "Value Voters Summit" in Washington and a "Justice Sunday" event last weekend in Boston that was co-sponsored by Colorado-based Focus on the Family and televised via satellite by churches nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0083932

But Merrill Matthews, policy analyst at the Institute for Policy Innovation, a free-market think tank, said Republicans are also worried about complaints from economic conservatives.

"It's ironic that social conservatives seem to be so upset with the administration," said Mr. Matthews, noting that the Republican Party's "libertarian faction is complaining that the president hasn't focused enough on the bread-and-butter economic issues."

Those concerns were echoed by David Boaz, executive vice president of the Cato Institute and author of a new study on libertarian voters.

"The war looks like a mistake, and Republicans have been spending worse than Democrats," Mr. Boaz said. "Both libertarians and social conservatives are disgusted with the Cunningham, Abramoff and Foley scandals. They're thinking that maybe the Republicans have been in power too long and don't deserve another term."

Republican campaign pollster Rick Shaftan said Mr. Norquist's criticisms were misdirected.

"Grover's answer is to blame conservatives for the GOP's problems," Mr. Shaftan said. "This is exactly why people are disillusioned. Those of us not on the [Republican National Committee] payroll do not feel the same obligation to spout the party line."

Despite such complaints, Mr. Matthews said, the Republican Party's election turnout machinery may yet save the day on Nov. 7.

"One never wants to underestimate the ability of Karl Rove and his team to turn out the vote," he said.

Democrats Make Big Gains In Fund-Raising, But G.O.P. Has More Cash On Hand (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Democrats raised $34 million in September and began whittling down the Republicans' financial advantage, according to finance reports to be filed on Friday. Yet Republicans still have more cash at their disposal as the midterm election campaign advances from television advertising wars to a battle of getting out the vote.

As optimism among Democrats has grown in recent weeks, the generosity of party contributors has followed suit, with the party's House campaign committee raising $14.4 million last month and the party's Senate committee raising $13.6 million. With the addition of the tally of the Democratic National Committee, the party's three main groups have outraised their Republican rivals by $3.5 million for the month.

"If you would have told me a year ago that the three Democratic committees would have raised more money than the three Republican committees, I would have said you're on a different planet," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "People are feeling a real reason for change."

Still, the three Republican committees reported having cash-on-hand balances of $77.2 million at the end of September, compared with $67.3 million for Democrats. And the Republican National Committee raised $13 million in September compared with $5.6 million by the Democratic National Committee.

"September was the best financial month we've had this cycle," Ken Mehlman, the Republican chairman, said in an interview Thursday evening. "But they are going to outspend us. That's the whole reason why it is so important to build the turnout operation."

Republican and Democratic committees are required to file their September fund-raising reports with the Federal Election Commission on Friday. While cash-on-hand tallies are viewed as critical indicators of the resources the parties can draw upon in the final weeks of the campaign, party officials concede that much of the money has already been spent on buying television commercials in competitive districts across the country.

As Election Day approaches, the parties are also investing their money on mailings, telephone banks on behalf of their candidates and a final barrage of television advertisements as the number of competitive House and Senate races expands in the final three weeks of the campaign.

To win control of Congress, Democrats must win 15 seats in the House and 6 in the Senate. Party strategists believe that more than 20 House races and at least seven Senate seats remain up for grabs in the final dash.

Throughout the midterm cycle, Democrats feared that their fund-raising efforts would be dwarfed in the closing month of the race. The electoral climate, particularly the low approval rating for Congress and President Bush, has accounted for stronger-than-expected fund-raising that Democrats say will allow them to be competitive in every race they need to be, particularly in the Senate.

On the Senate side, Democrats raised $13.6 million in September compared with $5.1 million for Republicans. On the House side, Democrats raised $14.4 million last month compared with $12 million for Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0083933

There is greater disparity in the national party committees, which concentrate on get-out-the-vote operations and larger message campaigns, with the Republican National Committee's $13 million versus the $5.6 million raised by the Democratic National Committee.

The disparity is in part caused because the Democratic chairman, Howard Dean, has taken a longer view of turning around the party by trying to rebuild state Democratic organizations across the country. The approach has been controversial inside the party.

Still, the Democratic National Committee reported a cash-on-hand balance of $8.2 million, which party officials say is twice as much as they had during the midterm race of 2002.

To close the gap, the Democratic National Committee is taking a loan of up to $10 million to finance turnout operations, half of which will be devoted to Senate races and half to increasing the turnout of minority voters.

Asked to comment on the fund-raising reports, Mr. Dean responded in a statement on Thursday evening that, "We're pleased that we nearly doubled what the D.N.C. raised in the last midterm election, but we're going to keep working hard to ensure that our candidates have the resources to win."

Democrats Close Fundraising Gap With GOP (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 20, 2006

The national Democratic Party raised $33.6 million in September, outpacing the Republican Party and setting the stage for an expensive and brawling finish to the 2006 campaign.

Overall, Republicans still held a financial advantage going into the final days of the campaign. The GOP's three national party committees reported having $77.2 million in hand. The Democratic committees reported a total of $67.3 million in the bank. But the numbers show a closing trend for Democrats who have been trailing overall Republican fundraising and were $20 million behind in cash on hand a month ago.

The committees must file detailed reports of their September financial activity with the Federal Election Commission on Friday.

_The Democratic National Committee reported raising $5.6 million and had $8.2 million in hand.

_The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said it raised $13.6 million and had $23.1 million in the bank.

_The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the House organization, reported $14.4 million raised and $36 million cash on hand.

_The Republican National Committee was the top GOP fundraiser, collecting $13 million. It reported $26 million in hand.

_The National Republican Congressional Committee, the House organization, reported raising $12 million and had $39.2 million in hand.

_The National Republican Senatorial Committee said it raised $5.15 million and had $12 million in the bank.

"The fact that the Senate Democrats beat the Michael Jordan of political fundraising speaks to the fact that there is an enormous appetite for change in the Senate and in America," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the chairman of the senatorial campaign.

But Republicans were also cheering their numbers. The Republican National Committee raised $13 million in September, the party's biggest fundraising month of this campaign season.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party was not only raising money successfully, it also was reaching out to voters. "This is clear evidence that Republicans all across the country are committed to maintaining our majorities in Congress and electing Republicans this November," he said.

Even with those sizable bank accounts, the Democrats were already borrowing money to address an expanding field of competitive races and the Republicans could follow suit. The Democratic National Committee this month took out a loan of up to $10 million and distributed $5 million of that to the DSCC to spend on Senate races. The balance, party officials said, was to be spent on turnout efforts targeted to minorities.

Since Sept. 1, the parties have spent more than $1 million in 25 congressional races, according to an analysis by the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. At the same time, the candidates have been raising and spending significant amounts of cash. According to the finance group, 39 challengers to House incumbents had raised $1 million by the end of September. In previous elections, $500,000 was considered a significant amount to run a credible campaign.

Republicans' Cash Advantage Ebbs As Vote Nears (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083934

The Democratic Party's three major campaign committees raised more money last month than their Republican counterparts, slicing deep into a financial edge Republicans hoped would provide an advantage in the final weeks of the bruising campaign for the midterm elections.

According to the reports -- among the final tallies filed before Election Day -- the three Democratic committees collectively raised $33.6 million, compared with $30 million by the Republicans. The strong showing cut the cash-on-hand advantage Republicans had a month ago to about $10 million, or nearly half. That is money the committees can use to buy television and radio ads for candidates.

ELECTION-YEAR LEDGER

See a chart showing how Democrats have saved money for campaigns by containing overhead costs.

Plus, see more spending data from PoliticalMoneyLine.org: · Democratic National Committee1

· Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee2

· Republican National Committee3

· National Republican Congressional Committee4

"If one party has fund-raising momentum, it's very helpful at this stage," said Michael Malbin, of the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan organization that tracks political money.

According to figures released yesterday, both the House and the Senate Democratic campaign committees raised more in September than the Republican National Committee, the party's fund-raising powerhouse.

House Democrats were the top money raisers, collecting $14.4 million, much of it through donations from incumbent members who aren't facing tough re-elections. Senate Democrats raised $13.6 million, through a mix of incumbent giving and a surge of individual donations. Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) said the committee received $900,000 in direct-mail checks in a single day.

The two Democratic committees reported that at the end of September they had $36 million in cash for House races and $23 million for Senate campaigns. "We've always been worried they'd throw a lot of money into some blue [Democratic-dominated] states in the end. This gives us the ability to defend our blue states and go hard in the red [Republican] states," Mr. Schumer said.

The Democratic National Committee, which has lagged behind the congressional committees in fund raising, reported $5.6 million in donations and $8.2 million in cash. Beyond that, the DNC has taken out a loan for as much as $10 million, which essentially puts the party's cash position at parity with the Republicans in the final weeks of campaigning.

The RNC reported raising $13 million, a sum Chairman Ken Mehlman said is "evidence" that Republicans are willing to fight for their majorities. The RNC had $26 million in cash, officials said.

House Republicans also showed strength, raising $12 million and reporting $39 million in cash on hand. The Republican Senate committee raised $5 million and had $12 million in the bank.

Overall, Republicans have raised more money in the 2005-2006 campaign cycle than Democrats, with totals of $408 million and $304 million, respectively. But Democrats have managed to stay within reach of their adversaries in cash on hand for the critical home stretch by containing overhead costs.

A look at spending by the national and House committees between January 2005 and Aug. 30 shows areas where Republicans spent significantly more on operations than the Democrats. Senate committee spending data weren't available.

In the run-up to Election Day, the RNC has spent nearly $8 million on consultants thus far this cycle, compared with $4 million by the DNC. Travel and event costs for the RNC approached $15 million, compared with $4 million for its Democratic counterpart. Some of that disparity is attributable to the higher cost of presidential trips, but Republicans also spend significantly more for trinkets for donors, such as lithographs and $93,500 for books about the inauguration.

All the Republican committees spend much more on fund raising, primarily through telemarketing and direct mail. The approach generates lists of supporters who can be contacted during voter-turnout operations and subsequent fund-raising programs.

The costs give the Democrats, who rely more on less-expensive Internet-based fund raising, an opportunity to narrow the cash differential at the end of each quarter.

The RNC spent nearly $15 million on telemarketing and $56 million on direct mail through Aug. 30. The DNC spent $3 million on telemarketing and nearly $30 million on direct-mail pitches. Meanwhile, the Democrats invested $5.6 million in Web programming, compared with less than $1 million by Republicans, records indicate.

At the congressional level, the differences are even more pronounced. The Republican House committee has spent nearly $45 million on fund-raising calls and processing data generated by them since January of 2005, compared with $7 million by House Democrats. Meanwhile, the Democrats invested nearly $2 million in Web-based programs, the data show.

DOJ_NMG_0083935

Democrats Approach Nov. 7 With A Surge In Fundraising (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Democratic fundraising for the midterm elections is ending with a surge.

In September, the Democratic campaign committees for the House and the Senate outraised their counterpart Republican committees, reversing historical trends.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised $14.4 million and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee collected $13.6 million last month, they said. In contrast, the National Republican Congressional Committee raised $12 million and the National Republican Senatorial Committee collected $5.2 million.

The Republican National Committee, however, continued to outpace the Democratic National Committee. In September, the RNC raised $13.1 million and reported total receipts of $14.3 million, while the DNC said it collected $5.6 million.

The GOP committees maintained an overall advantage of about $10 million in funds available to be spent. At the end of September, the Democratic committees had $67.3 million on hand; the Republican committees had $77.4 million.

"The Republicans' extra $10 million is better than being behind," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. "But it may not be enough if you're playing defense, which Republicans are."

The institute reported that 30 Democratic challengers had raised $1 million or more by Sept. 30, which compares with 12 Democratic contenders who exceeded the million-dollar threshold in 2004.

All three Democratic campaign committees raised more in the current election cycle than they did for the previous midterm elections four years ago; the House and Senate committees collected substantially more. Of the three Republican committees, only the House committee collected more this year than in 2002.

Over the past 21 months, the Republican committees raised a total of $408.4 million, while the Democratic committees raised $313.3 million, the Campaign Finance Institute calculated. The Republican total is about 10 percent lower than four years ago, while the Democratic total is 27 percent higher.

At the end of September, the DCCC had $36 million on hand and the NRCC had $39.2 million. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee had $23.1 million in the bank, while the National Republican Senatorial Committee had $12.1 million on hand.

The Republican National Committee had $26 million available, three times the amount the Democratic National Committee had.

"We're comfortable that we've brought in the resources we need," said the RNC's Tracey Schmitt.

Voters Over 50 Favor Democrats (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

OLDER VOTERS FLOCK to Democrats as midterm elections approach.

Voters over 50, traditionally more likely to show up on Election Day than younger counterparts, favor Democrats for control of Congress by 20 percentage points in new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. As Republicans brace for renewed Democratic campaign attacks on Social Security, older voters favor Bush's adversaries on the issue by more than 30 percentage points.

The poll represents "a vote of no confidence" in the Republican Party, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC survey with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. The survey of 1,006 registered voters, conducted Oct. 13-16, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

Voters 65 and over give Republicans a solid edge on handling terrorism, but rate Iraq and Social Security more important to their voting decisions.

Republicans do best, trailing by five percentage points in race for Congress, among those ages 35-49.

REPUBLICAN TURNOUT MACHINE faces steep challenge.

The left displays greater fervor. Six in 10 liberals express highest possible interest in elections, compared with five in 10 moderates and conservatives. A 46% plurality of those earning less than $30,000 calls themselves "more enthusiastic" than usual about voting, outpacing the 42% among those earning more than $75,000.

"The GOP's ground game is really going to get a stress test," one Bush adviser frets. Worries about Election Day challenges to voters' legal status diminish after Ohio and Florida ban the practice. But minority voter advocates scrutinize Michigan, which still allows them.

BUSH LOSES second-term backing from key constituencies.

DOJ_NMG_0083936

Defections among past allies undercut president's clout as his overall job approval drops to 38% from 48% just before the 2004 elections. Among white men, he receives a net negative rating by seven percentage points.

Among blue-collar workers, his performance is rated negatively by 19 percentage points. Bush draws 53% disapproval from small town and rural voters, up from 39% two years ago.

Bush retains approval of eight in 10 Republicans, down from nine in 10 as he won re-election.

NOTORIOUS: House page scandal brings Republican Rep. Foley national name recognition. Seven in 10 Americans rate him negatively, comparable with past assessments of Yasser Arafat and Michael Jackson.

TEAM BUSH seeks more credit for economic news despite expected softness in third-quarter numbers next week. "Wages are growing in real terms," says Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. But among voters who call the economy most important to their election decision, Democrats hold a 30 percentage point lead.

COMMON GROUND? A 36% plurality of Republicans echoes view of Democrats and independents that Iraq is in civil war. Some 50% of persuadable voters say Bush hasn't given good reasons for U.S. troops to remain there, while 44% say he has.

BETTER OUTCOME: Despite recent difficulties, war in Afghanistan is called successful by 51% of voters; 47% say it has been unsuccessful. Men and Southerners are most likely to express positive views of the battle there against the Taliban and al Qaeda; women and Northeasterners are most negative.

SUPPORT EBBS for hitting North Korea militarily after its nuclear test.

Just 32% of voters say the U.S. should use force to stop that country's nuclear program, down from 42% in July. Opposition rises to 57% from 47% amid increasing concerns about violence in Iraq.

Attention to the issue marginally benefits Republicans. By 33% to 31%, voters say North Korea's test blast makes them more likely to support Bush's party for Congress; 31% say it makes no difference.

By two-to-one ratio, voters say the U.S. couldn't have prevented the North Korean test.

MINOR MEMOS: Foley scandal pushes Speaker Hastert's negative rating to 32%, higher than House Democratic leader Pelosi's 25%. ... By 56% to 39%, voters say capturing or killing Osama bin Laden isn't necessary for successful conclusion of Afghanistan military campaign.

GOP Aims To Scare Up Big Voter Turnout (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

With top Republican strategists now privately predicting substantial House losses, President Bush and top GOP officials plan to spend the final days of the 2006 campaign attempting to rally partisans and limit conservative defections with dire warnings about the consequences of a Democratic Congress.

Amid predictions that demoralized conservative voters might sit out the election, Bush and other senior Republicans will escalate charges that Democrats will raise taxes, weaken national security and liberalize social policies. Bush struck those themes in campaign appearances yesterday in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and White House senior adviser Karl Rove said he "will consistently refresh that message" between now and Election Day.

Beyond the White House, however, there is increasing anxiety among Republicans about whether new efforts to frame the party's message can be effective in turning a tide that seems to be running powerfully against them as a result of the Iraq war and the Mark Foley page scandal.

For months, Republican leaders have sought to reassure candidates and activists with a succession of strategies. These included efforts to transcend the national environment by focusing House and Senate races on local issues, as well as high-profile speeches by Bush casting Iraq as just one theater in a larger war against terrorists. But none of these approaches has succeeded over a sustained time in reversing polls showing deep voter unrest and willingness to punish Republicans for the performance of Washington.

The mood among most GOP strategists -- with the exception of Rove and a few others -- is decidedly downbeat heading into the final 18 days. They see poll after poll showing a growing number of GOP House incumbents in serious danger, including many who just weeks ago were considered relatively safe for reelection. The list of most-imperiled incumbents now includes Reps. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.) and Curt Weldon (Pa.), a top GOP strategist said.

By this reckoning, roughly a dozen GOP-controlled House seats are "gone, no ifs, ands or buts about it," said the strategist, who discussed internal party deliberations on the condition of anonymity.

A number of GOP operatives said privately yesterday that they now see minimum losses of perhaps 18 seats, with 25 to 30 a more likely outcome. Democrats need 15 to take control of the House.

Republicans are slightly more optimistic about the Senate but nonetheless are worried about prospects for maintaining control. At this point, they see four seats likely to tip to the Democrats: Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Montana and Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0083937

Democrats need six seats to take control. That means the battle could come down to Republican-held seats in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, all of which are considered too close to call now. Republicans see New Jersey as their best chance to gain a seat.

"If the vote were today, we would not hold the House," said Rep. Mark Edward Souder (R-Ind.), one of several Republicans in relatively safe districts running ads and sending mailings to voters to protect their seats. Souder, who easily won two years ago with 69 percent of the vote, said that if Democrats are successful in knocking off the three Indiana GOP lawmakers who are currently trailing in the polls, he could be washed away, too. "This is going to be for me an all-time Republican low in this district," he said.

Still, Souder said the primary factor preventing a Democratic landslide has been the failure of Democrats to a present a clear alternative. Souder, who first won his seat in 1994, said he spent the past few days studying the run-up to the election 12 years ago and found that Republicans are in a slightly better position. But "right now, it is not closing right," he said.

Mike Franc, a senior analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the GOP warnings of Democratic policies might be a hard sell with conservatives upset over recent decisions on spending and other policies.

"Republicans did a lot to soften up their own base to make it very easy for rank-and-file, conservative-minded voters to say there is not a whole lot of difference between the two parties," he said. "That has become a cancerous development on the Republican biosystem." He said even the true believers at his think tank are so fed up with GOP governance that many do not seem overly worried about the consequences of losing the House.

A series of polls show that evangelical Christians, a key component of the GOP, are turning against the Republican Congress and are less likely to vote for GOP candidates this time around.

Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey -- one of the key architects of the GOP takeover in 1994 -- agreed that Republicans have ample reason to be concerned about fiscal conservatives sitting the election out. Armey said the GOP's plan to take advantage of low unemployment and a soaring stock market was destroyed by the Foley page scandal.

"The fact of the matter is, right now people are embarrassed by Republicans, and the economic base is still angry" because of high government spending over the past six years, Armey said. Consequently, he predicted, Democrats will take control of the House in three weeks.

Mark McKinnon, who was Bush's chief media adviser in 2000 and 2004, said the campaign may look better in a few weeks if Republicans can refocus the electorate on what a Democratic takeover might mean in terms of policy.

"I think Republicans wish the election were three weeks ago and the Democrats wish it were today," he said. "The fact is, it is three weeks from now. Whatever is going on right now is not the endgame; it's the middle game."

Rove, who believes that Republicans will hold both the House and Senate, said Democrats have failed to capitalize on events because they lack a clear message that presents a compelling alternative to the Republicans. "Generally when you're trying to nationalize something and you're the out party, you have a consistent message," he said. "I'm not sure what that consistent message is on the other side. Is there unanimity on Iraq? I don't think so."

Rove, speaking by telephone while on a campaign swing with the president, discounted polls and other indicators suggesting that Democratic voters are far more energized than Republicans. He said the GOP's get-out-the-vote operation, which proved more effective than the Democrats' in the past two elections, will be as strong or stronger this year.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said that for the past six weeks, a voter mobilization effort in competitive House and Senate districts has produced more contacts than during an equivalent time in 2004.

"Conservatives are cranky but not self-destructive," said GOP adviser Mary Matalin, a former aide to Vice President Cheney. "A thing we could do, have time to do and will do in the remaining time will be to hammer home what a Pelosi-Rangel-Conyers House would really mean." She was referring to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who would become House speaker if Democrats win, and fellow liberals Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.) and John Conyers Jr. (Mich.), who are in line for committee chairmanships.

"That hasn't reached penetration levels yet," Matalin said.

GOP To Air Ad Warning Of Terror Attacks (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 20, 2006

The Republican Party will begin airing a hard-hitting ad this weekend that warns of more cataclysmic terror attacks against the U.S. homeland.

The ad portrays Osama bin Laden and quotes his threats against America dating to February 1998. "These are the stakes," the ad concludes. "Vote November 7."

DOJ_NMG_0083938

Brian Jones, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said the ad would run on national cable beginning Sunday, but he declined to discuss specifics of the buy.

The commercial tracks with Republican Party strategy to make the war on terrorism a central theme of this election. It will air as recent polls show Republicans losing ground as the party best able to combat terrorism.

Last month, President Bush made the war against terrorism a recurrent topic in public appearances. But his message was drowned out by the e-mail sex scandal involving former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida and by increasing fatalities in Iraq.

The ad displays an array of quotes from bin Laden and his top lieutenant, Ayman al-Zawahri, that include bin Laden's Dec. 26, 2001 vow that "what is yet to come will be even greater."

The ad also cites al-Zawahri's claim to have obtained "some suitcase bombs," followed by a scene that appears to show a nuclear explosion.

Despite al-Zawahri's claim, portable nuclear devices are believed to be particularly difficult to produce and elusive to rogue regimes and terror groups.

The ad is also featured on the RNC's Web site. The party said the ad, called "The Stakes," will be e-mailed to millions of GOP supporters, activists and the state parties.

Democrats denounced the ad as scaremongering.

"This is a pathetic move by an increasingly desperate GOP," said Democratic National Committee Communications Director Karen Finney. "Clearly Republicans are so afraid of their abysmal record they can't offer one example of what they've done to keep America safe."

Former U.S. Navy Vice Admiral Joe Sestak, a Democratic congressional candidate running against incumbent Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., said the war in Iraq has made Americans less safe. "It's disturbing that the Republicans in Washington are trying to reinvent history with this latest message of fear," he said.

Dems To Use Moderation If They Win House (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- They're mostly a liberal bunch. Yet the would-be chairmen in a House under Democratic control promise to rule from the center. They'd have little choice, given the likely balance of power they would confront if elected.

George W. Bush would still occupy the Oval Office, and no one thinks Democrats could win control of the House by more than a few seats next month. And that would include three dozen or more moderate "blue dog" Democrats.

The dynamics ensure that despite the overwhelmingly liberal cast of the chairmen-to-be _ as measured by liberal interest groups such as Americans for Democratic Action _ the early agenda would consist of bills that could garner Republican support.

Those include legislation to raise the minimum wage, empower the government to negotiate lower prescription prices from drug companies for the Medicare program and end tax breaks for companies that move U.S. jobs overseas.

"If we do take back the House, there will certainly be a Republican president and there may well be a Republican Senate, so we're well aware of the constraints," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. "But I think there are some things that we can put out that will put some pressure on: minimum wage, negotiating with drug companies."

What won't be seen is any serious move to impeach Bush, even though the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, has introduced a bill calling on Congress to determine whether there are grounds for impeachment over the government's warrantless wiretapping program.

Conyers already has been overruled by Democratic leaders including would-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, who dismiss any talk of impeachment.

And there's no talk of gun control measures _ anathema to the 40 or so pro-gun Democrats in the House _ nor even much speculation about steps to curb greenhouse gas emissions thought responsible for global warming. For starters, would-be Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich., is a staunch supporter of his state's automobile manufacturers.

Instead, the Democrats' "Six for '06" agenda is studded with items designed to attract broad support from Democrats and also win over plenty of Republicans. Besides the minimum wage, they include: making college tuition tax deductible, boosting production of biofuels and improving military readiness.

Democrats do promise to use committee posts to step up oversight of the Bush administration. They would be likely to hold hearings into the conduct of the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's wiretapping program, Hurricane Katrina contracting abuses and the influence of industry lobbyists on environmental rulemaking.

DOJ_NMG_0083939

"When President Clinton was in office, congressional committees were themselves on steroids and investigated every possible allegation of wrongdoing, no matter how small," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., who stands to assume the chairmanship of the Government Reform Committee. "But when President Bush took over, oversight virtually ceased. No matter how big the issue, Congress now often looks away."

The Democratic chairmen deposed in 1994 were a sometimes imperious group, often uninterested in the opinions of junior lawmakers, even those of fellow Democrats. But the arrogance is gone after 12 demoralizing years in the minority.

"The biggest job is to see whether (Republicans) want to talk," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., poised to grab the helm of the Ways and Means Committee, with its broad portfolio that includes taxes, trade, Social Security, Medicare and welfare. "If we win, it's only for two years and we should be able to say what we have accomplished in two years. We really need their input and the bipartisanship if we're going to succeed."

Republicans say that giving Rangel the gavel of the tax-writing committee would lead to tax hikes. Most of Bush's tax cuts would expire at the end of the decade unless renewed by Congress.

"If Charlie Rangel were to be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he would put at risk ... some of the best economic policy this nation has seen in a long time," said Vice President Cheney in an interview with Time magazine.

Rangel said the White House would have to show flexibility on reforming Social Security and simplifying the tax code if Democrats were to try to address those issues.

Frank stands to take over the Financial Services Committee, a panel that claims jurisdiction over federal housing programs, which Democrats argue have been shortchanged under GOP rule.

"We'll be getting back into building affordable housing," Frank said.

Moderate Democrat Collin Peterson of Minnesota, who would take over the Agriculture Committee, said he would resist what he characterized as Bush administration efforts to "gut the farm bill." Farm subsidy programs are up for renewal next year.

"If I'm chairman, that's not going to work," Peterson said.

Some Democrats, such as George Miller of California _ potential chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee _ refuse to comment since it's far from a sure bet who will control the House.

Right now, Republicans hold 230 of the 435 seats, with 201 Democrats and one independent. Three seats are vacant.

Pelosi No Shoo-in For Job As Speaker (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's prospects for becoming the nation's first female House speaker depend not only on a Democratic victory in November but also on her ability to prevent any Democrats from voting against her -- primarily centrists opposed to her liberal stances.

At least one Democratic House candidate has pledged not to support Mrs. Pelosi, and others in conservative districts have refused to commit their support -- potentially leaving Mrs. Pelosi shy of the 218 votes required for the chamber's top post.

Democrat Charlie Stuart, who hopes to unseat Republican Rep. Ric Keller in Florida, already has said he opposes Mrs. Pelosi and would prefer Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the more conservative No. 2 Democrat in the House whose strained relations with Mrs. Pelosi have been well-chronicled on Capitol Hill.

"He's a centrist," Stuart spokeswoman Sultana Ali said of the Florida Democrat. "His values really are more in line with Steny Hoyer than Nancy Pelosi."

At least three other Democrats contacted by The Washington Times refused to commit their support to Mrs. Pelosi, whose San Francisco district is far more liberal than the districts that are up for grabs in this election.

Ordinarily, a party's leadership structure is set by the caucus in advance, and all members are expected go along with the decision. In the eight years Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, has been speaker, he's never had a protest vote cast against him.

Mrs. Pelosi, whose voting record is considerably more liberal than many of her fellow Democrats, has never enjoyed that luxury. In last year's election for speaker, one Democrat opposed her for the top post. Four Democrats opposed her in 2003, with three of them simply voting "present" as a protest.

Such protest votes are a sign of dissension within a party. But in the upcoming Congress -- where Democrats could hold the majority by just one or two seats -- any members who vote for someone other than Mrs. Pelosi or simply decide not to vote could trigger parliamentary mayhem.

If Mrs. Pelosi were to fail to win, the speakership would go to the highest vote-getter, most likely Mr. Hastert. Democrats would later win it back by settling on a leader after an intraparty showdown that could pit Mrs. Pelosi against Mr. Hoyer.

DOJ_NMG_0083940

But many insiders say Mrs. Pelosi has already moved to protect herself from Mr. Hoyer by privately encouraging another conservative Democrat -- Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania -- to announce earlier this year he will run for the party's No. 2 position if Democrats gain control of the chamber. Mr. Murtha, who is conservative on many issues but has lately become a hero of the left for demanding that troops be withdrawn from Iraq, is considered a formidable challenger.

One of those who opposed Mrs. Pelosi in 2003 was former Rep. Ken Lucas, Kentucky Democrat, who retired the following year. Now he is trying to regain his seat from the Republican who replaced him, and Democrats list the race as among one of their most promising chances to pick up a seat in November.

The Lucas campaign did not return several phone messages inquiring whether he would support Mrs. Pelosi for speaker.

Rep. Gene Taylor, a conservative Democrat from Mississippi, refused to support Mrs. Pelosi in both past leadership elections. Each time, he has cast his protest vote for Mr. Murtha.

Next year, however, Mr. Taylor said he would support Mrs. Pelosi, at least if his was the deciding vote.

"If it comes down to Hastert or Pelosi, then I'm certainly not going to vote for Hastert," he said. "I'm not going to vote against my own self-interest."

Mr. Taylor said that voters in his district -- which went 66 percent for President Bush in 2000 -- don't have much in common with Mrs. Pelosi, who visited recently to survey the damage left by Hurricane Katrina.

"People were very nice to her," Mr. Taylor said.

Heath Shuler, the former Washington Redskins quarterback who is challenging Rep. Charles H. Taylor in North Carolina, is another Democrat running in a conservative district who refuses to say whether he would support Mrs. Pelosi for speaker.

"He will support whoever he thinks will best represent this district," Shuler spokesman Andrew Whalen said.

Mr. Taylor's campaign -- like vulnerable Republican campaigns in conservative districts across the country -- has gone to some effort to smear the Democratic candidate by association to Mrs. Pelosi.

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said it's a campaign that won't work.

"Republicans are without a single winning issue, so it's no wonder they are desperately trying to falsely smear a churchgoing grandmother who has made fiscal responsibility, bipartisanship and middle-class tax cuts a priority," she said.

In some races, such as Democrat Brad Ellsworth's effort to unseat Republican Rep. John Hostettler in Indiana, the charge has become so heavy that the Democrat ran a television commercial pleading with voters that the election "isn't about Nancy Pelosi." Mr. Ellsworth also refuses to say he will support Mrs. Pelosi for speaker.

Said Gene Taylor of Mississippi: "I still wish Jack Murtha would run for speaker. He's pro-gun, pro-life, a real conservative."

Confident Democrats Draft Broad Health Care Agenda (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19 — Expecting to gain seats in Congress, Democrats are drafting an ambitious health care agenda to carry out their campaign promises with legislation to lower drug costs for older Americans, provide more money for children's health insurance and expand research using embryonic stem cells.

Many Democrats in the House and the Senate say they want federal officials to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies to obtain lower prices for Medicare beneficiaries. The 2003 Medicare law explicitly prohibits such negotiations.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, said that if Democrats were in control, they would try to repeal that ban in the first 100 hours after the House convenes.

Private insurers already negotiate drug discounts for Medicare beneficiaries, but Democrats say the government could get a better deal.

"I don't know that we could undo all the private plans," said Representative Pete Stark of California, who would be chairman of an important health subcommittee if Democrats were in the majority. "But at least we could offer a government-administered drug benefit. Under the existing program, we virtually guarantee the insurance companies against loss, which is a ludicrous position for us to be in."

For 12 years, House Democrats have felt powerless to shape the health care agenda. Now they sense a major opportunity. Not only are they using health care as an issue in the midterm elections, but they also plan to use it to set the stage for the 2008 presidential campaign.

Chris Murphy, the Democrat challenging Representative Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut, has attacked her role in writing the 2003 Medicare law, while Mrs. Johnson takes credit for helping "millions of seniors."

In Ohio, the Democratic candidate for the Senate, Representative Sherrod Brown, repeatedly points out that the number of uninsured has increased by more than five million since President Bush took office.

Embryonic stem cell research has been a defining issue in Senate races in Arizona, Maryland and Minnesota.

DOJ_NMG_0083941

But Republicans are not ceding those issues to Democrats.

In a recent television commercial, Representative John E. Sweeney, a four-term Republican from upstate New York, boasts that he has "come through for every hospital in this part of New York — every one." Senator Lincoln Chafee, Republican of Rhode Island, and Representative Deborah Pryce, Republican of Ohio, boast that they split with Mr. Bush and voted for research using embryonic stem cells.

On Capitol Hill, the Democratic agenda faces three significant constraints: Mr. Bush, fiscal reality and industry resistance.

Any move to allow direct federal negotiation of drug prices would be opposed by the White House, most Congressional Republicans and drug companies, which stand to lose more than any other industry if Democrats take control of Congress.

Drug companies worked closely with Republicans to pass the 2003 Medicare law, and drug makers have overwhelmingly favored Republicans over Democrats in their campaign contributions.

Democrats are not naïve about their ability to write laws over White House objections. "The Democratic agenda on health care will be somewhat limited by the fact that George Bush is still president," said Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, who has been working on health legislation for more than three decades.

After the demise of President Bill Clinton's plan for universal coverage, Mr. Waxman said, he concluded that "the health care system can be fundamentally changed only when there's strong public support for a specific proposal." Democrats will use the next two years to build such support before the 2008 presidential election, he said.

Democrats do not say exactly how they would pay for their proposals, but they have said they would consider tax increases.

A Democratic priority is to renew and expand the Children's Health Insurance Program, created with bipartisan support in 1997. Democrats say Congress must provide more money just to preserve coverage for the four million children already enrolled.

Federal officials say that two-thirds of uninsured children are eligible for Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program. Democrats want to help states find those children.

The Congressional Budget Office assumes that the budget for the child health program will continue at its current level of $5 billion a year, but Democrats say that would threaten recent gains in coverage. The number of uninsured children fell to 7.9 million in 2004, from 11 million in 1998, but grew last year by 361,000.

Democrats also vow to step up spending at the National Institutes of Health. The agency's budget had doubled over five years, reaching $27 billion in 2003, but has risen less than 6 percent since then.

With additional seats in the House and the Senate, Democrats say, they would overturn restrictions that Mr. Bush imposed on research involving embryonic stem cells. Congress passed such legislation this year, but Mr. Bush vetoed it.

Democrats have a long list of federal agencies, programs and industries they want to investigate. Many are eager to look into drug prices and marketing practices. They also want to investigate whether Medicare overpays managed care plans, compared with spending for similar beneficiaries in the traditional Medicare program.

Mr. Stark, the senior Democrat on the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, said his priority was to stop what he called "the Republican drive to privatize Medicare."

The new drug benefit is delivered by private insurance companies, subsidized by the government. Under a bill drafted by Mr. Stark and other Democrats, Medicare would offer an additional option: one or more government-operated prescription drug plans. The government would "negotiate with pharmaceutical manufacturers with respect to the purchase price" of drugs covered by its plans.

The Congressional Budget Office says that lifting the ban on federal negotiation with drug companies "would have a negligible effect on federal spending" because federal officials could probably not negotiate prices much lower than those obtained by insurers in a highly competitive private market.

Democrats insist that government negotiations could save large sums for Medicare. They would like to use the money to improve the drug benefit — by closing a gap in coverage, sometimes known as a doughnut hole, or by making it easier for low-income people to qualify for extra assistance.

Fla. Official Appeals Foley Sign Ruling (AP-Y)

By Bill Kaczor

AP, October 20, 2006

Florida's secretary of state on Thursday appealed a ruling that prohibits the posting of signs to tell voters in the district of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley that his votes will go to another Republican.

Circuit Judge Janet Ferris ruled Wednesday that state law did not permit such signs to be posted in polling places.

Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb, an appointee of Republican Gov. Jeb Bush, asked the 1st District Court of Appeal to reverse the ruling. The court agreed to expedite the case. Early voting for the Nov. 7 election begins Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0083942

"A confused voter should not be compelled to guess," said Cobb spokeswoman Jenny Nash.

Cobb has until noon Monday to file written arguments, and the Democratic Party has until noon Wednesday to reply.

Foley resigned Sept. 29 after the disclosure of suggestive electronic messages he had sent to male teenage congressional pages. The Republican Party chose state Rep. Joe Negron to replace Foley as its candidate against Democrat Tim Mahoney in the south Florida district.

But the resignation came too late to change the ballots, so Republicans wanted signs posted telling voters Foley's votes would go to Negron instead. The Democrats sued Cobb and supervisors of elections in eight counties, claiming the signs would favor Republicans.

Cobb's appeal triggered an automatic stay of the injunction banning the signs. But Ferris lifted it later in the day, saying posting the signs would cause "irreparable injury" to the Florida Democratic Party, which also had a substantial likelihood of winning its lawsuit.

Dems Look To Rancher To Win Neb. Race (AP-Y)

By Kevin O'hanlon

AP, October 20, 2006

A Yale-educated rancher — and a Democrat to boot — could rope in a House seat in the most Republican state in the nation.

Scott Kleeb, 31, has raised his party's hopes in Nebraska's 3rd Congressional District, which gave President Bush his best numbers in the deep red state in 2004 — 75 percent — and heartily embraced football icon and Republican Rep. Tom Osborne in three elections.

Osborne made an unsuccessful bid for governor, creating an open seat in the expansive district that stretches from Scottsbluff on the Wyoming border, north to South Dakota and south to Kansas.

In another year, the open seat would be a gimme for the Republicans, but Kleeb has turned heads — even conservative ones. The great-great-grandson of an 1870s homesteader near Broken Bow, Neb., Kleeb is appealing to the district's rural voters, many of whom are part of Nebraska's $6 billion beef industry.

One television ad shows Kleeb at work on the McGinn Ranch in Nebraska's storied Sandhills region: "This is pioneer country. You don't punch cows and not put in a full day's work," the narrator says. "And that's what he does. His word is his bond. That's cattle talk, but that's the way it is. His word is his bond."

Kleeb says his years as a rancher counts with voters.

"People want to know that you've experienced the same things they've experienced — that when you are writing federal policy that has real-life consequences to people who work in production agriculture, that it's not just words on a piece of paper," he said.

Kleeb faces Republican state Sen. Adrian Smith, a real estate agent and owner of a mini-storage unit who has served in the legislature since 1998. Smith is counting on prevailing in a district that is 59 percent Republican and 28 percent Democratic.

"I have a lot of folks out in cattle country who appreciate my down-to-earth and authentic approach," Smith said.

The Republican primary in May left some hard feelings as Smith defeated four other candidates. He also has received contributions from the Club for Growth, which advocates ending all farm subsidies — hardly a popular stand in Nebraska.

No surprise then that "Republicans for Kleeb" have held meetings in five cities.

Better yet for the Democrat, Kleeb recently secured the endorsement of the conservative Omaha World-Herald, the state's largest newspaper.

"When pressed aggressively, Kleeb's opponent ... falls back on sound bites and slogans. When pressed under the same conditions, Kleeb draws on different resources — mental focus, breadth of analytical ability and an unshakable internal steadiness," the newspaper said.

Kleeb's chiseled good looks and charisma remind many voters of a young Bob Kerrey, who as an unknown Democrat emerged from nowhere to unseat Republican Gov. Charles Thone in 1982 and later served two terms in the Senate.

"I wish I was tall and good looking," Kerrey joked when reminded of the comparisons. "I've heard more than one person say — accurately — that he is much better than I was in 1982."

Born in Adana, Turkey, Kleeb is the son of two teachers who worked on U.S. military bases He did his undergraduate work in history and political science at the University of Colorado and has a master's degree in international relations and a doctorate in history from Yale University.

He lists the reauthorization of the farm bill, maintaining partly subsidized rural airline service and alternative energy sources as important. Smith touts making President Bush's tax cuts permanent and reducing the number of government mandates for farmers and ranchers.

DOJ_NMG_0083943

Neither candidate has received much financial help from their respective parties. The Nebraska Democratic Party has given Kleeb $10,000 plus paid for $28,000 in ads. Smith has received just $5,000 each from the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Heading into the last month of the campaign, Smith had $319,000 on hand and Kleeb had $255,000.

If the Democrat wins, it would be one for the history books. The last time a Democrat held the House seat was 1961.

Clinton Stumps For Cardin (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Former President Bill Clinton yesterday came to Maryland to boost a state Democratic Party struggling to connect with black voters.

"This is not a usual election," Mr. Clinton told an enthusiastic crowd of several hundred at Frederick Douglass Isaac Myers Maritime Park.

He urged people to recruit as many voters for the Democrats as possible, something he acknowledged "you don't usually have to do in Maryland."

Mr. Clinton spoke at a rally for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who is running for governor, and for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who is running for the U.S. Senate.

Basking in the crowd's cheers as he stood on an outdoor stage near the Inner Harbor, Mr. Clinton described Mr. Cardin as an "old-fashioned politician."

"He actually thinks you're going to give him a job if you elect him," Mr. Clinton said, chiding Republicans for being ideological and divisive.

After the rally, Mr. Clinton attended a fundraiser in Potomac for Mr. O'Malley.

O'Malley officials said they planned to raise about $500,000 from the event.

Mr. Clinton was the latest in a string of national Democrats to stump for Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Cardin. Mr. Clinton's wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, came last month, as did Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

The appearances by Mr. Obama, the fifth black senator in U.S. history, and Mr. Clinton have been aimed at bolstering Democrats' standing among black voters, traditionally the party's most loyal voting bloc.

Race and minority representation have played large roles during this campaign season, in which Mr. Cardin defeated a black candidate, Kweisi Mfume, in the primary and now faces in the general election Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the first black to win a statewide election.

The Democratic nominees for the state's four top races -- Senate, governor, attorney general and comptroller -- are all white men. Mr. O'Malley's running mate, Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, is black.

Maryland's 10 black state senators last month met with Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Cardin to express concern about the lack of diversity at the top of the Democratic ticket, the Baltimore Sun reported.

In addition, black business and religious leaders have said there is grass-roots discontent among black Democrats over the lack of minority representation at the top of the party's ticket.

And during a visit to Maryland this month, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said that "there should be more diversity on this ticket" but added that the national party is not at fault.

Democrats have called Mr. Steele a "unique threat" to their hold on black voters.

Maryland's Senate Race (WP)

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

ONE CANDIDATE in Maryland's U.S. Senate race, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin , would be a natural leader in the Senate by dint of his command of issues, proven integrity, formidable intellect and unstinting work ethic. The other candidate, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, deploys platitudes and gauzy rhetoric to disguise a tissue-thin grasp of policy. Mr. Cardin would give Maryland legislative clout from Day One; in Annapolis and on Capitol Hill, he has been an effective, knowledgeable, serious lawmaker. Mr. Steele is hard-pressed to claim a significant achievement in public service.

Slightly frumpy and occasionally professorial, Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, is sometimes stereotyped as a drab policy wonk. In fact he is fervent about ideas, chief among them that government should be effective, accountable and proactive. No one who has heard Mr. Cardin on the subject of health insurance, Social Security, or tax and trade policy will conclude that he lacks passion -- or an impressive mastery of detail. It is that passion and attention to the mechanics of government that have earned him such respect for pragmatism and problem-solving.

DOJ_NMG_0083944

To a degree rare among Democrats, Mr. Cardin has broken through the barriers of partisanship and minority-party impotence in Congress, enabling him to craft major bills to help senior citizens and reform the Internal Revenue Service. He forged strategic partnerships with key congressional Republicans, notably former Ohio representative Rob Portman, who is now the White House budget director. Such alliances could help Mr. Cardin play a key role in the Senate on a range of issues, no matter who is in the majority.

Mr. Cardin is well known to Marylanders. While still in his 30s, he was the youngest-ever speaker of the state's House of Delegates. In that role and in Congress, he has been sensible, tough-minded and independent. He broke with many Democrats and labor unions to back the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Steele, a Republican, deserves credit for helping move Maryland's Republican Party in a centrist and more appealing direction. But during the campaign he has done everything in his power to sidestep questions of substance while positioning himself mainly as a friendly guy. At times he has bristled when pressed on, say, abortion, as if it were somehow unfair to delve deeper into his thinking. His economic prescription is tax cuts and more spending -- a recipe for budgetary disaster. As lieutenant governor, he promised a study on Maryland's death penalty, but he waited three years to produce a report that the governor did not see fit to make public.

Mr. Steele recently said on talk radio that the race is "not about the issues so much as it is about the style of leadership that we need to elect in Washington." We're old-fashioned enough to believe that leadership arises from a mastery of policy and a commitment to positive change. Mr. Cardin has both, and as a senator he would be an asset to the state of Maryland.

Too Late For Lame Attempts To Win The Black Vote (WT)

By Adrienne Washington

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

"That's the guy I don't like," said my hairstylist, pointing to yet another slick commercial that popped up featuring Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, in his bid to win a U.S. Senate seat.

Another friend is more amused. She refers to Mr. Steele's "we're in this together" campaign theme as the "EHarmony ads."

My hairstylist is not "feelin' the love." And she is just the type of black, middle-class homeowner to whom Mr. Steele is pandering, hoping to get them to cross party lines to cast a vote for his historic candidacy.

Guess again. His is no cakewalk. It is going to take more than a few fighting words from has-been boxer (Mike Tyson) or hip-hop mogul (Russell Simmons) or the black version of P.T. Barnum (Don King) to woo suddenly coveted black voters.

"What I don't like is how they're always talking, talking about the other guy and why you shouldn't vote" for their opponent," said a Largo mother of three who is distrustful of most politicians. "But they don't tell you why you should vote for them." And, "I really don't like black Republicans because they do all these things to get there, and then they forget where they come from," she said. "That's what I think when I see" Mr. Steele.

Like it or not, wrong or right, hers is the typically intractable anti-Republican sentiment that still runs high among black voters, many of whom lob far worse slurs at black conservatives than any white Democrat can dish out.

But the tide may be shifting, slightly. Another die-hard Democrat from Prince George's County told me that publicly, he is supporting the party ticket, but privately, he is going to vote for Mr. Steele.

Why? "Just to make the Democrats crazy," he said.

He suggested that Mr. Steele should have taken his message to black voters sooner. Still, he doesn't think the black crossover vote will determine Mr. Steele's fate. A loss would rest more with the number of white Republican voters who "just can't bring themselves to vote for a black man." The Washington Times reported earlier this week that Republicans, particularly in rural areas of the state, said they will vote instead for the Democratic candidate, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Ronald Walters, a political-science professor at the University of Maryland, agreed with the Prince George's man, predicting that whatever gains Mr. Steele makes among black votes will be canceled by whites who will not vote for him as happened in Virginia with L. Douglas Wilder and in New York with David Dinkins, black Democrats who won by slim margins.

He also said he expects few black voters to cast ballots in favor of Mr. Steele, despite the historic aspects of his success.

Too bad. Too late. I know it was wishful thinking to want former Rep. Kweisi Mfume as Mr. Steele's Democratic opponent.

We missed the rare and welcome opportunity to witness an election campaign that might not have deteriorated into name calling and race baiting on both sides.

No matter how hard we try, we simply cannot escape the age-old issues stemming from racial injustice and division in this country.

Even when the dueling candidates are of an apparently similar ethnic background, hurtful words still sully the debate and detract from common concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0083945

Just when the brouhaha over the use of the "N-word" seems to have subsided in the Old Dominion, we cross the Woodrow Wilson Bridge to the Free State to hear words like "Oreo," "Uncle Tom" and "slavishly" shamelessly thrown into the campaign dialogue, predictably followed by weak excuses and mea culpas.

Wasn't it E.B. White who said to choose your words wisely and "make every word tell"? Sorry, but I'm not buying the I-didn't-mean-any-offense line from Rep. Steny H. Hoyer.

For his part, Mr. Steele trots out black celebrities, slips into street dialect, spends most of his time in the 'hood and chastises his benefactors for forgetting folks who still haven't made it up the ladder as he has. But he pretends to have thin skin whenever the opposition alludes to its color.

Not surprisingly, a fair number of black Maryland voters resent politicians on both sides of the aisle who show up only to shower empty campaign promises when the margin for victory gets slim. The old-boy network in the Maryland Democrats' cabal couldn't reward its loyal black constituency by backing a single black candidate in a bid for a powerful statewide office. Then, they feared backlash from black Democrats, as they should, now that the folks they have traditionally taken for granted have a viable alternative.

The Republicans upped the ante by fielding a more attractive, articulate foe than the Democrats' pedestrian Mr. Cardin.

In response, the white Democratic Party leaders have done their best to paint Mr. Steele as a puppet for the Republicans whom they suggest are determined to return their water boy and his people to those bygone Southern Maryland farms to harvest tobacco.

Talk about a picture speaking a thousand words. Should all Maryland voters be offended by the spectacle of a lineup of suited white men preaching fire and brimstone to a black audience about why they should stick with the very people who passed them over? At the eleventh hour to add "hope" to the mix of fear, they serve up "the first black president," Bill Clinton, or the future first black vice-presidential candidate, Sen. Barack Obama.

"Give us free," says the frustrated slave in "Amistad."

No "EHarmony" here. Clearly politicians of every hue and stripe must think voters can't see through their thinly veiled, self-serving divisive rhetoric.

VP Bill? Depends On Meaning Of 'Elected' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The prospective presidential candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton has given rise to plenty of speculation about the notion of Bill Clinton as the nation's first gentleman. But what about another role? How about, say, vice president?

Politically, of course, the idea is a non-starter for all sorts of reasons. But that doesn't stop the parlor games, especially on the Internet. The issue came up last week during a chat on washingtonpost.com: What if Hillary picked Bill as her running mate? A Post reporter rashly dismissed the idea as unconstitutional. But that only proved the dangers of unedited journalism. The answer, it turns out, is not so simple.

A subsequent sampling of opinion from professors of constitutional law, former White House lawyers and even a couple of federal judges reveals a simmering disagreement on whether a president who has already served two terms can be vice president. Some agree with the conclusion that the presidential term limit embedded in the Constitution bars someone such as Clinton from returning to the White House even in the No. 2 slot. Others, though, call that a misreading of the literal language of the law.

As the former president might say, it all depends on the meaning of the word "elected." Under Article II of the Constitution, a person is "eligible to the Office of President" as long as he or she is a natural-born U.S. citizen, at least 35 years old and a resident of the United States for 14 years. The 12th Amendment says "no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President."

Okay, so that means if you're not eligible to be president, you're not eligible to be vice president. Makes sense. What would be the point of electing a vice president who can't succeed the president in case of death, incapacity or vacancy?

But then Congress and the states added the 22nd Amendment in 1951 to prevent anyone from following the example of Franklin D. Roosevelt, who won four terms. That's where things get dicey. "No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice," the 22nd Amendment says.

On its face, that seems to suggest that Clinton could be vice president because he is only barred from being elected president a third time, not from serving as president. That's the argument of Scott E. Gant, a partner at Boies, Schiller & Flexner in Washington, and Bruce G. Peabody, an assistant professor of political science at Fairleigh Dickinson University in New Jersey. The two wrote a law review article in 1999 called "The Twice and Future President" and reprised the argument this summer in the Christian Science Monitor.

DOJ_NMG_0083946

"In preventing individuals from being elected to the presidency more than twice, the amendment does not preclude a former president from again assuming the presidency by means other than election, including succession from the vice presidency," they wrote. "If this view is correct, then Clinton is not 'constitutionally ineligible to the office of president,' and is not barred by the 12th Amendment from being elected vice president."

Others share that opinion. Three former White House lawyers consulted by The Washington Post (two who served President Bush and one who served Clinton) agreed that the amendment would not bar Clinton from the vice presidency. A federal judge, who noted that he has "no views on the matter," said the plain language of the amendment would seem to allow Clinton to "become president through succession."

Kathleen M. Sullivan, director of the Stanford Constitutional Law Center, said the 22nd Amendment, "as I read it, does not preclude a Clinton-Clinton ticket." She added: "Bill, if elected VP, could become president in the event that President Hillary became incapacitated; he just could not run for reelection from that successor post."

Still, that view is not universal. Judge Richard A. Posner of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit said by e-mail that "read literally, the 22nd Amendment does not apply" and therefore Clinton could be vice president. "But one could argue that since the vice president is elected . . . should he take office he would be in effect elected president. Electing a vice president means electing a vice president and contingently electing him as president. That interpretation, though a little bold, would honor the intention behind the 22nd Amendment."

Bruce Ackerman, a constitutional scholar at Yale Law School, also pointed to original intent in addressing the issue in his book this year, "Before the Next Attack: Preserving Civil Liberties in the Age of Terrorism." The amendment, he wrote, "represents a considered judgment by the American People, after Franklin Roosevelt's lengthy stay in the White House, which deserves continuing respect" and "should not be eroded" by a narrow interpretation allowing someone to manipulate his way to a third term.

Eugene Volokh, a law professor at the University of California at Los Angeles who was a clerk for Sandra Day O'Connor when she was on the Supreme Court, focused on the broader meaning of the language in the amendment in reaching the same conclusion. "My tentative answer is that 'eligible' roughly means 'elected,' " he wrote on his Web site, the Volokh Conspiracy, this summer, meaning that if Clinton cannot be elected president, he is no longer eligible at all.

One constitutional lawyer not heard from on the issue is William Jefferson Clinton, Yale Law class of 1973. But he has offered thoughts on the 22nd Amendment. Before leaving office and again in 2003, he suggested amending the amendment to let a two-term president leave office and then run again: "Since people are living much longer . . . the 22nd Amendment should probably be modified to say two consecutive terms instead of two terms for a lifetime."

Now, who might he have had in mind?

Ehrlich Vows To Spend $338 Million Next Year (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. pledged yesterday to spend at least $338 million on school construction in the next fiscal year, matching what the state is spending this year.

The Republican incumbent's announcement, made at a school in the Frederick area, comes during a heated reelection campaign against a Democratic challenger who has made a big issue of school construction.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley has pledged to spend $400 million next fiscal year to make up for what he has characterized as insufficient funding during the early part of Ehrlich's term, resulting in too many "temporary learning shacks" on school grounds across the state.

Aides to Ehrlich said yesterday that the governor's announcement, less than three weeks before Election Day, was driven not by the political calendar but by the law. Ehrlich spokesman Henry Fawell said the law required the governor to provide a preliminary estimate of funding to legislative leaders by mid-October.

Ehrlich said this year's funding level is the highest in 30 years.

But O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese said Ehrlich's announcement was more evidence of "the two Bob Ehrlichs."

"Three weeks before the election, he says he's going to fund school construction. But when he has the power, he cuts funding," Abbruzzese said.

He was referring to the first part of Ehrlich's term, when, grappling with projected state budget deficits, the governor proposed significantly cutting school construction money from levels granted under his Democratic predecessor.

During Ehrlich's first two budget years, the state authorized $106.5 million and $116.6 million, respectively, on school construction.

A state commission has recommended that Maryland spend at least $250 million a year.

DOJ_NMG_0083947

"We will continue making substantial investments in school construction so that every child learns in a safe and modernized school," Ehrlich said during his appearance at the groundbreaking for Oakdale High School for 1,600 students.

Young Republicans Now Flourishing At Liberal Berkeley (WSJ)

By Pui-wing Tam

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

BERKELEY, Calif. -- The University of California at Berkeley has been notable for firebrand leftist students like Mario Savio. The 1960s leader of the Free Speech Movement staged sit-ins on campus to demand students' rights to academic freedom and free speech. On a recent Thursday, one of the university's new generation of student leaders was playing with a life-size cardboard cutout of Ronald Reagan.

"Elect Ronald Reagan," called out Josiah Prendergast, before unfolding the cutout on a grassy field on the Berkeley campus. After propping up the late Republican president, the 21-year-old reached into a bag and pulled out stickers and buttons featuring the slogans "Support Our Troops" and "Schwarzenegger: Protecting the California Dream."

A political-science major, Mr. Prendergast, a college senior, is serving his second term as president of the Berkeley College Republicans. Faculty, administrators and student-government officials all say the conservative organization, which has about 650 members, has become one of the campus's biggest student groups, outstripping its main rival, the Cal Berkeley Democrats.

On this day, Mr. Prendergast was busy recruiting college freshmen. He and some friends were attending "Calapalooza," an annual event at which new students sign up to join campus organizations. He figures the new blood could potentially help California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, and other Republican politicians.

"Don't be scared," Mr. Prendergast yelled out, as college kids walked by. "We don't bite."

The growth of the Berkeley College Republicans at one of the nation's most liberal campuses echoes some broader political trends. At Berkeley, while leftist students still dominate and outnumber conservatives, the liberal groups have splintered and are now spread across factions from the Cal Democrats to the International Socialist Organization to groups formed to oppose the war in Iraq. At the same time, several faculty members say, there are more conservative-leaning students than in the past, propelled by swells of patriotic feeling after events like Sept. 11 and an increase in the number of religious student groups.

The modus operandi of the Berkeley Republicans over the past few years has been to be provocative. In 2003, its members opposed affirmative action with an "Affirmative Action Bake Sale," where students paid for pastries on a sliding scale: White students were charged more, while Hispanics and African-Americans paid less. Under Mr. Prendergast's presidency, the group this year protested the People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, by giving away hot dogs and encouraging students to eat meat. Mr. Prendergast also held an "Anti Antiwar Rally" in nearby San Francisco, and staged a "Dunk a Republican" contest. The group gets several thousand dollars a year from the Berkeley student government. It also does its own fund raising and will sometimes get donations from local Republicans and others.

The splashy tactics have sometimes aroused the ire of campus liberals. Scott Lucas, president of the Cal Democrats through last May, says the Republican club cheats on membership numbers because it doesn't charge dues as other student groups do. But Mr. Lucas acknowledges that the Cal Dems are now "a hair" smaller than the Republican club.

For Republicans, the ascendant Berkeley group is a cause for celebration. Dan Schnur, communications director for John McCain's 2000 presidential run and now a lecturer at Berkeley, often speaks to Republican groups around the state and talks about how the Berkeley Republican students have become a big student club on the liberal campus. "At first, the audiences are surprised, and then they're inspired," Mr. Schnur says. "It has a tremendous motivating effect" in mobilizing Republican voters.

The strength of the Berkeley Republican students is surprising given that the club barely existed in the late 1990s. A revival began in 2000, when several new students restructured the group to hold social activities as well as engage in political debates and attend Republican conventions. They also founded a conservative publication called the Patriot. To spread the conservative gospel, the club has set up a Web site, created an alumni database, regularly brings speakers to campus and holds weekly meetings.

When Mr. Prendergast enrolled at Berkeley in 2003, he quickly became active in the group and was elected its president in 2005. A grandson of the late Spalding G. Wathen, a land developer in California's Central Valley, Mr. Prendergast grew up in Fresno, in what he calls a "gospel family." The family was conservative -- Mr. Wathen helped break a local plumbers union in the 1980s -- and Mr. Prendergast followed the same ideology. He decided to go to Berkeley when he was rejected by his first-choice college, the U.S. Naval Academy. "I thought it'd be a fun challenge," he says.

Mr. Prendergast, who hopes to go to law school, has grand ideas for the club in his final year at Berkeley. Over the summer, he held an offsite retreat with his executive board to sketch out plans, including campaigning door-to-door and showing up at rallies for conservative politicians for the November elections. To raise funds, he is organizing an Oct. 28 golf outing. And to raise student awareness and beef up membership, the group recently staged a "Conservative Coming Out Parade."

DOJ_NMG_0083948

Such tactics have helped Mr. Prendergast recruit students like Kevin Ligutom, who transferred to UC Berkeley from a junior college in nearby Hayward, Calif., in August. Mr. Ligutom, 21, isn't a Republican (he's registered as an independent voter) but was intrigued to find the conservative club on campus. After attending several of the club's meetings, he says he was impressed by the guest speakers the group brought in and how the group's members rallied to attend state Republican meetings.

"At their first meeting, they had a local Republican politician talk," says Mr. Ligutom. "And Josiah isn't just sitting around in a circle with everyone and complaining about things." Mr. Ligutom, who has since worked the phones for some Republican politicians along with the group, says he plans to remain active in the club.

Being a Republican at a liberal college isn't easy. Andrea Rasmussen, 22, an integrative biology and anthropology major who is a vice president of the club, says some fellow students once threatened to shoot her for her conservative beliefs. Mr. Prendergast, who also works as a local restaurant waiter, says some of his friends have been spat on and called fascists.

At the Calapalooza event, meanwhile, more freshmen were wandering by and picking up the club's fliers, which exhorted them to "Come Out of the Political Closet." Mr. Prendergast and Ms. Rasmussen, along with group treasurer Ben Chapman, answered questions and pitched the club as "a social outlet with conservative students." An hour into the event, they had signed up around 35 students. But they ultimately fell short of their goal of 150, netting around 100 registrations by the end of the three-hour event, with an additional 20 or so signups online.

During Calapalooza, held in late August, UC Berkeley Chancellor Robert Birgeneau walked by. When he saw President Reagan's cardboard figure, the chancellor chuckled and stopped to talk.

"I gave an interview to a British newspaper recently, and the journalist asked me about Berkeley's liberalism," said Mr. Birgeneau to the group. "I had to tell him that the largest student political group on campus is Republican. You should've seen him: He was so disappointed."

Joe Lieberman Rediscovers Belief In Connecticut (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

We see where the Democrats are laying in cases of champagne to celebrate their Nov. 7 victory in the congressional elections. If as seems possible control of the Senate turns on a single seat, attention will return to one probable winner who likely won't be in the Democratic clubhouse spraying bubbly that night -- Joe Lieberman.

Sen. Lieberman is going to defeat the Ned Lamont "insurgency" from the Democratic left. Now what?

His lead in the most recent polls runs between 8 and 13 points. It is safe to assume that if the Democrats win next month, they won't be urging reporters to focus on the Lieberman victory in Connecticut. This wasn't supposed to happen.

What was supposed to happen is that Joe Lieberman was supposed to go away. After Ned Lamont defeated Mr. Lieberman in the primary, a procession of his Senate friends traveled ostentatiously to Connecticut to recreate the scene in "Godfather II" where Tom Hagen tells Frank Pentangeli about how marked guys went away in the time of the Roman Empire. "Yeah," said Frankie, "and their families were taken care of." Hagen: "A nice deal."

That was a movie. Instead of a political corpse, the Democratic Party is about to get its own version of John McCain -- a shrewd and independent maverick. By the accounts of friends and associates, Joe Lieberman feels "liberated" and "unshackled."

Back in 2000, as Al Gore's running mate, Joe Lieberman did what the party asked him to do. He threw over some of his core beliefs, as on affirmative action and school vouchers, and swept left in a way that made his bipartisan admirers cringe. After the Lamont defeat, he could have slicked together a campaign that threw sops to Greenwich's liberals and held his Democratic base (he got 48% in the primary).

Didn't happen. In terms of what comes next for Mr. Lieberman and his party, the signal event in this campaign is his Sept. 25 speech to the Veterans of Foreign War in East Hampton. It's about Iraq. This speech could serve as a template for Democratic Party policy on Iraq after the election -- but it won't.

In August, just weeks before the Lamont antiwar frenzy crested, 12 Democrats led by Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi sent President Bush a letter urging the start of withdrawal from Iraq by the end of 2006 and a reduced mission there. That's the party's current business model. It was the energy source that the progressive blogosphere took into Connecticut. Sen. Lieberman is running straight at it.

His East Hampton VFW speech describes bringing the troops home prematurely as a "formula for defeat and disaster." He restates his support for Saddam's overthrow, criticizes rank partisanship in a time of war, praises Iraq's democratic progress and ends by offering an alternative strategy for avoiding defeat.

It includes resolving the crucial issue of sharing Iraq's oil revenues, ending the out-rotation of the U.S.'s best military commanders, accelerating the logistical support system for Iraq's army and, most interestingly, increasing the overall force structure of the Army and Marine Corps to face future threats.

DOJ_NMG_0083949

Sen. Lieberman says the troops he has spoken to want to see the job finished in a way that honors their service and sacrifice: "We owe it to them not to give up and walk off the battlefield before the job is done."

He proposes forming a "bipartisan Iraq working group" when Congress reconvenes in January made up of senior members of the relevant committees who would meet regularly with the president. It could happen. If the Democrats take the Senate, Sen. Lieberman is in line to chair the committee on homeland security.

There is talk of the ever-present Democratic "insurgency" on the left organizing to prevent Mr. Lieberman from gaining the committee chairmanship. That will happen if the Republicans are lucky, leaving Sen. Lieberman as a cherished but ignored party eccentric. But it could be back luck for the GOP if the Democrats take a close look at what is winning in Connecticut.

Sen. Lieberman is probably going to carry the Democratic vote in places like the Naugatuck Valley around Waterbury -- blue-collar, culturally conservative Reagan Democrats deeply discomfited by the war but unwilling to truck with a Vietnam-like pullout. He is pulling well in the suburbs around New Haven, home to knowledge-based industries in the biosciences, information and health. In the Republican stronghold of Fairfield County, where incumbent GOP Congressman Chris Shays may lose, a new internal Lieberman poll puts him up 15 points.

A diverse in-migration of Republicans is helping Mr. Lieberman. Maine Sen. Susan Collins, a moderate, will be in the state today for him. Jack Kemp arrives next week for stops in New London and Mystic. Most intriguing, New York City's nominally Republican mayor Mike Bloomberg is about to hold his third fund-raiser for Sen. Lieberman.

For fans of political irony, this is a wonderful race. The blog-based Democratic insurgents created the Lamont movement. But after receiving investiture from party elders Kennedy, Dodd and Kerry, Mr. Lamont was the candidate of the Washington establishment. Driven from the compound, Joe Lieberman was now the man not "of" politics-as-usual.

Unlike in 2000, Joe Lieberman is running this time on his beliefs, something he probably thought a lot about while pulling the knives out in August. The Democratic Party lost in 2000 and 2004 by running liberals who couldn't get across the goal line. The 2008 party desperately needs a belief-based centrist, with national name recognition, to hold off McCain, Romney or Giuliani. If perchance Hillary falters . . . It won't happen, but for a reborn winner, even the dreams are sweet solace.

Massachusetts, Back In The Game (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

BOSTON -- Massachusetts is often down in presidential politics, but never out.

The state that gave the United States two of its first six presidents has not had a presidential winner since John F. Kennedy in 1960. The most recent entries, Michael Dukakis and John Kerry, were dispatched by different

Bushes.

But in a state where, as the late Mary McGrory once noted, every baby is born with a campaign manager's gene, the political players are as resilient as Red Sox fans.

Astonishingly, the hottest 2008 presidential contender from this very Democratic state is a Republican, Gov. Mitt Romney. He insists, as the scripture might have it, that he may be in Massachusetts but he's surely not of it.

In an interview with Elizabeth Mehren of the Los Angeles Times earlier this month, Romney admitted that, had he known he would go into national politics, he would have been "a lot smarter to stay in Michigan," where his father, George Romney, was governor in the 1960s. He regularly excoriates the legalization of same-sex marriage by "activist judges" in his current home state who "struck a blow to the foundation of civilization, the family."

With Romney leaving the statehouse to go national, his designated successor is Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, a down-the-line loyalist -- until this year. Now, as Romney moves to the right, Healey moves the other way. After keeping mum about her differences with Romney for most of his term, she has split with his more conservative stances on a whole range of social issues, including stem cell research, abortion and same-sex civil unions.

"The poor woman has been forced to discover that she disagrees with him on all these issues," said Rep. Barney Frank, the state's most entertaining Democrat. "She should run her ads on the Discovery Channel."

But another national political player looms in Deval Patrick, Healey's Democratic opponent. Patrick, who was in charge of the Justice Department's civil rights division under President Bill Clinton, has unleashed a sense of excitement among Massachusetts Democrats, who have had a lot to be glum about in recent years.

"I haven't seen anybody else since the Kennedys who had that way of energizing people," says Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, a tough-minded pro not given to extravagant expression. "They'd march through a wall for him."

In a state famed in the 1970s for bitter racial conflict over mandatory school busing, Patrick is an African American with cross-racial appeal. Frank describes Patrick as "bright and thoughtful and extremely competent and in command," and adds: "It's hard to attack this guy as a radical leftist."

DOJ_NMG_0083950

But that's what Healey is trying to do with a series of brutal soft-on-crime attacks that bring to mind the ones that helped sink Dukakis's presidential candidacy in 1988. Healey has gone after Patrick for his efforts to seek a DNA test for a convicted rapist in the 1980s. Patrick has a strong defense, saying he dropped his support for the man when the DNA test was positive -- but he initially fumbled his explanation. Healey has also attacked Patrick for serving as a defense lawyer for a convicted killer of a police officer. "While lawyers have a right to defend admitted cop killers," the announcer on one ad intones, "do we really want one as our governor?"

Healey's assaults cut Patrick's advantage in the polls, though he still leads by double digits, and the ads have invited an anti-Healey backlash. "That's what defense lawyers do," says Menino, a Democrat, referring to the murder case. "I'm lucky I'm not a lawyer."

Patrick is commonly compared to another talented African American, Sen. Barack Obama, but many Massachusetts Democrats think the best analogy is between Patrick and Clinton, who campaigned for his former appointee this week and plans to visit again.

A Boston Globe reporter recently read Patrick a politician's long riff about "hope" vs. "fear." Patrick couldn't tell whether the words were his or Clinton's. (They were Clinton's.)

If Healey wins, Romney will claim credit for ensuring his succession in an ideologically unfriendly state, even if Healey did have to toss Romney's social conservatism over the side. But Menino's money is on Patrick for an interesting reason. "We're void of passion," Menino says of politics generally and of his Democratic Party in particular, and Patrick has it. "You see it in his face."

Imagine: A state famous for producing hard-core political pros, practical precinct captains and worldly wise consultants may be on the verge of creating two new export commodities: an attractive central-casting conservative governor and a young passionate idealist. Anything to keep Massachusetts in the game.

Black Candidates, A Welcome Norm (USAT)

Commentary By Joyce King

USA Today, October 20, 2006

An older black woman once told me: “You drive a Volvo and talk proper. You must be a black Republican.” She likely didn't know that latte-drinking Volvo owners are more closely associated with Democrats.

These days, you can't look at black people and assume anything. While most blacks are Democrats, Republicans are gradually finding converts. Yet, no matter which party blacks favor on Nov. 7, this trend is good news for the political process: A record number of black candidates are posing serious bids for high-level offices never held by blacks:

·Governor. Democrat Deval Patrick is leading in the Massachusetts race. If he wins, he will become the first black to hold that office. Another black, former NFL star Lynn Swann, is running as a Republican in Pennsylvania. In Ohio, it's Republican Kenneth Blackwell. These men are prime examples of what should matter most: qualifications, not color. Only one black has been elected governor: Virginia's Douglas Wilder in 1989.

·Lieutenant governor. Black candidates are running strong campaigns in New York, where state senator David Paterson is expected to win, and in Maryland, where Democrat Anthony Brown, on the ticket with gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley, is favored. Paterson would become the first black lieutenant governor for his state; Brown would be the second in Maryland, succeeding Michael Steele, an African-American running for U.S. Senate. Daryl Jones is Florida's first black nominee for the office, but he is trailing.

·Senate. Another closely watched race is in Tennessee, where Democratic Rep. Harold Ford narrowly leads his GOP opponent. If Ford wins, he'll be the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction.

David Bositis of the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies says Democrats Ford and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama are from a new generation of black leaders: Ivy Leaguers who focus less on opening new doors for blacks and more on taking advantage of those already opened. On the GOP side, Bositis says, Steele and Blackwell are candidates who won statewide office by advocating policies not generally popular with blacks, such as tax cuts, deregulation and limiting social services.

This year, 51 black candidates — 43 Democrats and eight Republicans — are running for House seats.

“We the people” don't all drive Volvos or espouse the same political values. Neither do black candidates. With more and more African-American candidates moving into the mainstream, voters can focus more on qualifications and less on hue; just as it should be.

It’s Voter-Fooling Time In America (NYT)

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

The homestretch of the campaign season historically puts treacherous distortions of the truth before the voters, none more so this year than a mysterious California letter informing thousands of Latino-Americans that immigrants have no right to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0083951

"You are advised," begins the Spanish-language letter, dripping with authority, that if "you're an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration." It now appears that someone in a Republican Congressional campaign conjured a contemporary spin on a classic scare tactic from torchlight politics.

Comparable outrages surface daily now, with an ad for black voters in six states misrepresenting the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s politics in a staged chat between two black women: "Dr. King was a real man," says one actress. "You know he was a Republican," the other chimes in.

Democrats are no less tempted to flash bare-knuckle mischief. In a prime example, Representative Nancy Johnson, a Connecticut Republican, is being portrayed by Chris Murphy, the Democrat, as heartlessly unresponsive to a woman whose child needed insurance coverage for a cleft lip and palate. Of course, Ms. Johnson has represented Mr. Murphy as being opposed to the surveillance of terrorists.

So it goes, with some ethically challenged spinners creating false news clippings and tucking them knifelike into campaign videos of real stories. Even Lincoln is being falsely quoted by defenders of the Iraq war. The 16th president never said that Congressional critics who damage wartime morale "should be arrested, exiled or hanged."

One of the more widespread canards is rooted in the divisive and fruitless immigration debate. Democrats in more than two dozen races are being falsely accused of wanting to give Social Security benefits to illegal immigrants — a distortion of a proposal to actually block immigrants from being credited for benefit days worked before they had legal status. One Web site coated with obvious racism and xenophobia is MuchasGraciasDebbie.com, which skewers Senator Debbie Stabenow, Democrat of Michigan, dressing her digitally in a sombrero, grinning and declaring, "No problema!"

What to do, beyond celebrating the continuing pungency of free speech across the nation? The most obvious answer is that voters need to pay ever closer attention to what the candidates say in this world of mixed media and mixed messages. The Internet is a powerful ally.

The head of Google, Eric Schmidt, is cautioning politicians stuck in the sound-bite era that "truth predictor" software is in the works so that computer-wise voters will be instantaneously able to check on the probability, if not the certainty, of what candidates claim as fact. Actually, careful parsing of egregiously misleading campaign ads is already available on the Web at factcheck.org, a nonprofit service that thinks voters should be treated as intelligent consumers entitled to the plain facts. If only the candidates saw it that way.

Tax Cut Convert (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

In an otherwise bad year for Republicans, one GOP incumbent doing well is Alabama Governor Bob Riley, in large part for the ironic reason that he failed to raise taxes.

Three years ago Mr. Riley told voters it was their "Christian duty" to approve a $1.2 billion tax hike he wanted to plug a $675 million deficit. His crusade briefly became a national story, as the press played up a GOP tax-raiser. We chimed in that this seemed like a bad idea and were chided by all sorts of Alabama Republicans who said we didn't understand the state. However, voters -- many of them even Christian -- opposed the tax hike by two-to-one in a special election, forcing lawmakers to restrain spending instead.

Mr. Riley is now running for re-election and it seems he has converted to supply-side economics. Sitting on a $1 billion budget surplus and faced with an opportunity to hand his party control of the legislature for the first time in more than 130 years, the Governor is preaching tax cuts like a true believer. He has already pushed through an income tax cut that will kick in come January. And if given a second term, he promises another round of income and property tax cuts that would eventually save residents about $250 million a year.

With the economy booming -- the unemployment rate is near a record low at 3.5% -- even some Democrats are starting to believe. Mr. Riley's Democratic opponent, Lieutenant Governor Lucy Baxley, has her own property tax cut on the table and hopes voters will have more faith in her promises than a Governor who wavered on taxes once before.

Mr. Riley has given himself a little wiggle room by also proposing "triggers" to delay his tax cuts if revenue dedicated to education doesn't increase by at least 3% a year (it's up by more than 10% this year). But should he win next month -- and he is running ahead -- it will be the second time Alabama voters have rejected higher taxes in three years. In politics, that's enough to make a believer out of anyone.

Charities Tackle Accountability (WSJ)

By Sally Beatty

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083952

As charity and foundation heads gather for their annual meeting in Minneapolis this weekend, a key issue will be accountability -- and whether the $3.37 trillion nonprofit sector is capable of policing itself.

Two years ago, the Senate Finance Committee told nonprofit leaders it was considering "comprehensive reforms to protect charities from bad actors and strengthen their accountability to donors." The warning followed public outrage over disclosures about costly perks being reaped by private foundations and questions about governance practices at the Nature Conservancy, the American Red Cross and other nonprofit organizations.

In response, Independent Sector, the leading umbrella organization representing charities and foundations, organized a blue-ribbon panel to discuss overhauls and make recommendations, including a redesign of the tax form charities file to the Internal Revenue Service.

Since then, Congress has focused on reining in abuses by donor-advised funds (which allow donors to take a tax deduction for gifts to a charitable fund that may be distributed later) and by nonprofit hospitals. It also cracked down on charities flouting the strict limits placed on political activity. Still unresolved are concerns about the patchwork of financial reporting made by nonprofits.

Despite headlines over Warren Buffett's $31 billion pledge to the foundation of his good friend Bill Gates in June, much of the growth in the nonprofit sector in recent years has come from much smaller charities. Today there are at least one million U.S. charities and foundations, excluding religious groups, up nearly 60% in the past decade. But only about a third of tax-exempt organizations file IRS returns. Under IRS rules, only organizations with annual revenue of $25,000 or more are required to file a detailed financial statement annually.

Facing the threat of stricter regulation, Independent Sector asked Congress last year to require any charitable organization with $1 million or more in annual revenue, including donations and earnings on assets, to have its financial statements audited each year. But it believes it is "too onerous" to require all charities to do so.

Currently, the IRS statement required of charities, called Form 990, offers the public the best look at individual charity finances. But nonprofit officials say many groups routinely leave out important details required by the form, such as addresses of recipients of charity dollars. The IRS is preparing to overhaul Form 990 to make it easier for the public to understand it. It also is planning to require that the form be filed electronically, which could make it easier for the agency to spot abuses by nonprofits.

 GIFT OF THE WEEK / From Jeans to African Studies

WHO GAVE IT: Thomas W. and Pauline Tusher

HOW MUCH: $10 million over five years

WHO GOT IT: California Academy of Sciences, San Francisco

BY REQUEST: The funds will help rebuild the academy's African Hall as part of a $429 million reconstruction of the entire institution.

YOUR NAME HERE: Tusher African Center, which will house the rebuilt African Hall, and the Pauline Tusher Education Facility

HOW IT HAPPENED: Tom Tusher, former president of Levi Strass & Co., was playing tennis at a country club in Ross, Calif., about five years ago when he ran into John W. Larsen, a trustee of the California Academy of Sciences. The two got to talking about the academy, and Mr. Larsen invited the Tushers to several academy benefit dinners. Mr. Tusher had retired from Levi in 1997 and was thinking more seriously about philanthropy.

In 2000, the academy hired architect Renzo Piano to design a new structure, which will include "environmentally sensitive materials" such as insulation made of recycled fiber from bluejeans -- though not necessarily Levi's brand -- and sustainably harvested wood. Mr. Larsen and Mr. Tusher subsequently spoke about Mrs. Tusher's upbringing in Africa (she was born in the U.S. to English parents and moved to Nairobi at age 6), and whether the couple would be interested in supporting the new African center, which will include dioramas about African wildlife and a live penguin exhibit. Since then, other Tusher family members have become involved in the academy, where Mr. Tusher is a trustee. In 2005, son Gregory Tusher joined the academy's investment committee and daughter-in-law Virginia Tusher, a scientist, joined the academy's education committee.

Mr. Tusher, 65 years old, says this is his family's largest single gift to date.

Calif. Ballot Battle Over Big Oil May Be Costliest In U.S. History (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 19 -- Call it the battle of Big Oil vs. Silicon Valley with a whole lot of Hollywood funding thrown in. Oil companies are squaring off against venture capitalists in a fight over a California proposition that would tax oil production in the state to fund alternative energy.

DOJ_NMG_0083953

To date, $107 million has been raised in the fight. If it is all spent, it will make Proposition 87 the most expensive proposition in the nation's history, dwarfing the $93 million epic, also in California, to legalize Las Vegas-style casinos on Indian reservations in 1998. Oil companies, including Chevron; Aera Energy, a partnership of Shell Oil and Exxon Mobil; and Occidental Petroleum have given more than $60 million to oppose the measure. On the other side is a coalition of environmentalists and venture capitalists led by John Doerr, a partner at the Silicon Valley venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, and former partners Vinod Khosla and William Randolph Hearst III. The 800-pound gorilla in that camp is Hollywood mogul Stephen Bing, who has donated $40 million.

"This is a huge amount of money," said John Matsusaka, the director of the Initiative and Referendum Institute at the University of Southern California. "Bush and Kerry spent $250 million for a national election. This measure is costing nearly half that for a local issue in one state."

The idea behind Proposition 87, formally known as the Clean Alternative Energy Act, is simple. Oil companies, the proposition's backers charge, have not spent enough on alternative energy in the state that consumes the most oil and has the dirtiest air. So it's time that the government forced them to do so.

Prop. 87 would impose a tax of 1.5 to 6 percent per barrel of oil extracted from California, generating $225 million to $485 million a year in new tax revenue. California provides 12 percent of the U.S. oil supply and 40 percent of the state's supply. This money would create a $4 billion fund that would be used to develop alternative energy, with the goal of cutting petroleum consumption by 25 percent in 10 years. The measure also prohibits oil companies from passing the tax on to consumers.

In addition to strong financial backing from Silicon Valley and Hollywood, several political, business and entertainment luminaries have rallied to the measure's cause. Among them are former president Bill Clinton, who addressed a rally on Oct. 14 of 5,000 in Los Angeles in favor of Prop. 87; former vice president Al Gore, who cut his first political commercial since the 2000 presidential campaign in favor of Prop. 87; Richard Branson, the British entrepreneur; and actress Julia Roberts.

Yes on 87's campaign strategy has been to demonize the oil companies and to raise the specter of foreign oil imports and global warming. "We buy their oil, they burn our flag," intoned the announcer on one ad that featured a photograph of King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and a Middle East mob. And in a state where Big Oil is as popular as earthquakes and even the Republican governor's Hummer is a hybrid, that strategy might seem like a winner. But support for Prop. 87, which had been in the double digits in July, is slipping. A Field Poll released earlier this month showed voters nearly evenly split on the measure.

One reason is the onslaught of ads funded by oil company money. As with any measure focused against multinational corporations, Matsusaka said, Big Oil "is trying to signal to anyone else contemplating similar measures that if you're going to take on the industry, you are going to have to spend a ton of money." The No on 87 campaign ads say that gas prices will rise and that the measure will actually increase, not lessen, California's dependence on foreign oil by forcing producers to stop pumping oil from their wells in the state. Independent economists have challenged that logic, saying energy prices are set globally, not locally.

There is also growing concern, expressed by economists and editorialists, about the state agency the measure would create and how the $4 billion would be distributed. The Los Angeles Times called the formation of a whole new government bureaucracy to fund alternative energy, already a prime target of venture capital, a "spectacularly bad idea." Indeed, of the 24 papers in California that have editorialized on the issue, only two have supported it.

Taxpayer groups have lambasted the measure, saying the new bureaucracy would be unfettered by normal checks and balances. And even energy economists worry that the proposition would simply create a taxpayer-funded piggy bank to subsidize the investments of Silicon Valley's richest venture capitalists, such as Doerr and Khosla, who are backing the measure.

Responding to those criticisms, Leslie Miller, a spokeswoman for the Yes on 87 campaign, acknowledged that firms associated with the measure's supporters could benefit but said that others would, too.

"It's going to be kids driving in clean-energy school buses," she said.

Although she acknowledged that alternative energy is already attracting millions in investment, Miller contended the program is necessary because "at a certain point you need government investment in order to propel implementation."

"This is not corporate welfare, this is venture-capitalist welfare, and that bothers me," countered James Sweeney, an economist at Stanford University who is starting a new institute that could profit from the energy fund. "I think they've chosen a bad instrument for a good goal."

Rice Presses S. Korea To Pursue Full Sanctions (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083954

SEOUL, Oct. 19 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed the South Korean government on Thursday to fully implement U.N.-authorized sanctions against North Korea for its nuclear test, but she encountered reluctance among officials in Seoul, who fear that tough action could lead to increased tensions and even war.

South Korean officials said they had deferred decisions on whether to suspend two cross-border business projects with North Korea -- the Mount Kumgang tourist resort and the Kaesong Industrial Park.

Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon said the government would evaluate its participation in light of the new U.N. Security Council resolution that punishes North Korea by halting trade in weapons, luxury goods and other items. He noted that the Kumgang resort, which provides about $13 million a year in hard currency for North Korea, is a "very symbolic project" for the two countries, separated since World War II.

Before Rice landed in Seoul, one of the government's top officials was quoted in local newspapers as saying South Korea could not be left at the whims of the United States, given that the United States "has fought more wars than any other nation." Song Min Soon, chief presidential secretary for security, later softened his remarks in a telephone interview, explaining that while the "United States has global interests," it was also important for the U.S. government "to accept our interests" and "harmonize our needs in the U.S. global policy." He said the U.N. resolution would be implemented through "our view and our interpretation."

Rice arrived here as the Chinese government announced that State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan had led a high-level delegation to Pyongyang and met with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il. A Chinese government spokesman said it was a "very significant" meeting but declined to provide details.

A senior State Department official traveling with Rice said China has taken a "rather dramatic shift" in its policy toward North Korea since the Stalinist country announced it had conducted a nuclear test on Oct. 9.

[At least four Chinese banks in recent days have halted transactions with North Korea, cutting off a major conduit for the isolated country to move its money to and from the outside world, the Wall Street Journal reported in Friday's editions.]

"I'm pretty convinced that the Chinese will have a very strong message about future tests," the official said, referring to intelligence reports that suggest preparation for a second test is underway. He spoke to reporters on Rice's plane under condition of anonymity, citing rules set by the State Department.

Tang, who as state councilor outranks the foreign minister in the Chinese system, visited Washington last week and then flew to Moscow before arriving in Pyongyang. He is scheduled to meet with Rice when she visits Beijing on Friday, but the official cautioned against any breakthrough. "Our understanding is that the North Koreans have not been in the mood to return" to negotiations, the U.S. official said. "If anything, they are looking to escalate the crisis further."

Throughout her tour of Asia, Rice has battled the perception that the United States is eager for an escalation. News media reports here have suggested that the United States wants to use the U.N. resolution to spur a dramatic confrontation with North Korea, such as a blockage or quarantine.

Asian officials have repeatedly cautioned against relying only on sanctions. Ban said that "sanctions are not made for the sake of sanctions," but as a way to draw North Korea back to negotiations. In Beijing, Rice's next stop, a Chinese government spokesman told reporters that "sanctions are a signal, not the goal."

At the news conference with Ban, Rice emphasized: "We want to leave open the path of negotiation. We don't want the crisis to escalate."

She added: "I did not come to South Korea, nor will I go anyplace else, to try and dictate to governments what they ought to do." But she urged other nations to "take stock of the leverage we have to get North Korea to return to the six-party talks" involving Russia and Japan in addition to the United States, China and the two Koreas.

Rice held lengthy talks with Ban, who was recently selected as the next U.N. secretary general, and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun. She then held a dinner with Ban and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso, which was intended to show trilateral solidarity after several years of bickering between South Korea and Japan -- and a worsening U.S.-South Korean relationship.

U.S. officials want South Korea to join the administration's Proliferation Security Initiative, a maritime exercise designed to thwart trade in weapons of mass destruction. South Korea was deliberately not invited when the program was started during President Bush's first term. The official traveling with Rice acknowledged that South Korea previously felt that joining it would be seen as a "provocative act" that would undermine its ability to influence North Korea.

Rice said that "there is a lot of misunderstanding" about the initiative, stressing that it is based on current legal authority and relies on intelligence, not "constant random inspection of ships." Rice said that while the United States wants to pay close attention to North Korean cargo, "there are many different ways in which this can be achieved," such as "container security initiatives" to detect potentially radioactive materials.

DOJ_NMG_0083955

The senior U.S. official suggested there is concern about the stability of North Korea, a tightly controlled dictatorship. "A lot of us are wondering what is going on," the official said, adding it did not make sense for North Korea to test a weapon in defiance of China, its main benefactor.

"There should never be a second nuclear test, as it would further aggravate the current situation," Ban said. The United States and South Korea "shared an understanding that if it happened, there would be more grave consequences."

South Korea Tells Rice It Won't Abandon Industrial And Tourist Ventures With North (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 19 — The government of South Korea told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday that it had no intention of pulling out of an industrial zone and a tourist resort in North Korea, even though the operations put hard currency into the pocket of its government.

During a news conference with Ms. Rice, the South Korean foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, said he had explained "the positive aspects" of the industrial park at Kaesong and described how the tourism zone around Mount Kumgang was "a very symbolic project" for reconciliation between the Koreas.

At the end of a dinner here on Thursday that united Ms. Rice with her South Korean and Japanese counterparts, a senior State Department official, speaking on the customary condition of anonymity when traveling with the secretary, said the South Korean government had said it would review its support for the industrial and tourist projects — in particular the subsidies for the Mount Kumgang zone.

"We never expected them to announce steps today," the official said.

In her public comments, at least, Ms. Rice only emphasized the importance of the United States alliance with South Korea. The goal is not to elevate tensions on the peninsula, but to put into effect sanctions under a United Nations Security Council resolution as a multinational effort to press North Korea to return to six-party negotiations and end its nuclear program, she said.

"I did not come to South Korea, nor will I go anyplace else, to try and dictate to governments what they ought to do in response to Resolution 1718," Ms. Rice said after meetings with President Roh Moo-hyun and Mr. Ban, who will be the next United Nations secretary general.

"What I do think is very important is that everyone take stock of the leverage that we have to get North Korea to return to the six-party talks and negotiate seriously the dismantlement of its nuclear weapons programs," she said.

Ms. Rice is in the region to press for strict enforcement of the Security Council's sanctions against North Korea for its nuclear test last week. Her toughest job will be persuading South Korea and China, which differ with the United States on how to engage North Korea's reclusive Communist government.

The senior State Department official said after the dinner that the South Koreans had said they would "have a full program in place" to carry out the resolution in about three weeks, and would not want to announce new steps while Ms. Rice was in town for fear of appearing to bow to American pressure.

South Korea and China hold the key to the effectiveness of the sanctions, which were passed Saturday after intense negotiations, because they share the longest borders with North Korea, and are by far its biggest economic partners. South Korea's trade with North Korea reached $1.06 billion last year.

Ms. Rice said that she had received no official Chinese report on a visit on Thursday by State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan to the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-il, but expressed certainty that he had delivered a strong message that North Korea's "behavior is unacceptable."

She is to fly to Beijing on Friday.

While the United States has long called for further isolating North Korea to discourage its nuclear ambitions, South Korea has taken a different course. Its decade-old policy of engagement has aimed to ensure peace on the peninsula by opening North Korea to trade, investment and economic interdependence.

The nuclear test raised calls in South Korea to re-examine the policy. But officials here have said the United Nations sanctions will not end broad economic and trade contacts with North Korea, a stand backed by South Korean public opinion.

State Department officials describe the tourism zone in particular as a conduit for cash for North Korean leaders. The project, which opens a revered mountain site and hot springs to foreign visitors, has earned North Korea more than $456.9 million in precious hard currency, said its South Korean developers, Hyundai Asan.

On Wednesday, Song Min-soon, a security adviser for President Roh, replied that the project "is not a policy to be changed following somebody's order to do this or that."

"We are not deviating from the international community only because we differ with a certain country," he told reporters. "I'm not going to name that country," he added, though the context made it clear he was referring to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0083956

In his comments beside Ms. Rice on Thursday, Mr. Ban said South Korea was awaiting more specific guidelines from a United Nations sanctions committee working on details of carrying out the resolution.

But many in South Korea see the United States as trying to drive a wedge between the Koreas, fueling resentment. In a show of support for the engagement policy, Kim Geun-tae, the chairman of South Korea's governing Uri Party, said he planned to visit the industrial park on Friday "to show symbolically that the inter-Korean economic cooperation projects must continue," the JoongAng Daily newspaper reported.

The Security Council sanctions bar the sale or transfer of material that could be used to make nuclear, biological and chemical weapons or ballistic missiles. They also forbid international travel and freeze overseas assets of people associated with North Korea's nuclear program.

Rice In China On Trickiest Leg Of NKorea Crisis Tour (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 20, 2006

BEIJING - US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has landed in China on the most delicate -- but potentially most promising -- leg of a tour to turn the screw on North Korea after its first atom bomb test.

Rice, who flew in from Seoul, landed just before 10:00 am (0200 GMT) for a hectic round of meetings with China's leaders, including President Hu Jintao, Premier Wen Jiabao and Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing.

On the eve of her visit to China, North Korea's closest ally and long-time protector, a Chinese presidential envoy met North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il in a bid to pull his Stalinist regime back from the nuclear brink.

No details emerged from Thursday's meeting between Kim and Tang Jiaxuan, who according to the Chinese foreign ministry delivered a message from Hu during what was described as a "significant" visit aimed at resolving the crisis.

A senior US official travelling with Rice said her talks in Beijing would focus on Tang's meeting with Kim, with the aim of finding out what came out of it and whether there were any signs of movement from Pyongyang.

US officials said Thursday that Tang was believed to have delivered "a very strong message" to North Korea not to carry out further weapons tests -- something Western intelligence services say is a real possibility.

The October 9 announcement of the impoverished nation's first nuclear test triggered global outrage and sweeping UN sanctions which China has promised to "faithfully implement," despite earlier reluctance.

China is North Korea's biggest trade and aid partner and holds the key to enforcing the UN embargo on shipments in and out of the country of weapons of mass destruction or related materials, as well as trade in luxury goods.

Tang's meeting in Pyongyang was all the more important in that the former Chinese foreign minister had met US President George W. Bush and Russian leaders days earlier.

Washington has long insisted that Chinese pressure is crucial to convincing Pyongyang to return to stalled six-party negotiations on ending its nuclear program.

Those talks reached a deal a year ago under which the North agreed to give up its nuclear arms in exchange for security guarantees and massive aid, but Pyongyang backed out in November to protest at US sanctions against a bank in Macau accused of counterfeiting and laundering money for the regime.

Beijing is reluctant to put too much pressure on the unstable and isolated nation, fearing its collapse would lead to South Korea, a key US ally, holding land all the way to its border and raising a specter of millions of starving refugees flooding the country.

Nevertheless, there have been signs this week along China's 1,400-kilometer (880-mile) border with North Korea that Chinese officials had begun inspecting cargo vehicles.

In Seoul, where Rice held three-way talks with her counterparts from South Korea and Japan, she expressed hope the Chinese envoy would convince the North Koreans to disarm and return to negotiations.

But a senior aide to the US secretary of state said "no breakthrough" was expected to be announced Friday, and revealed that Kim had kept Tang waiting 24 hours before finally meeting him.

"Our understanding is the North Koreans have not been in a mood to return to the talks and if anything the North Koreans are looking to escalate the crisis further," the official said.

Rice is also expected to reassure the Chinese that neither South Korea or Japan will seek to arm themselves with nuclear weapons in response to North Korea's provocations.

In both Tokyo and Seoul, Rice this week repeated that Washington would "fully" honor defense agreements obliging it to defend both allies -- with nuclear weapons if needed -- in case either is attacked.

The UN resolution bans trade with North Korea related to its development of nuclear arms, ballistic missiles and other weapons of mass destruction, and imposes financial controls to starve the North Korean military of funds.

DOJ_NMG_0083957

The most controversial measure calls for the inspection of cargo to and from North Korea, aimed at preventing its cash-strapped government selling material for an atomic bomb or other illicit weapons to terrorists.

Rice: Won't Coerce Allies On N. Korea (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 20, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday she would not try to dictate how U.S. allies enforce sanctions on North Korea for its nuclear program, and there were signs South Korea wouldn't quickly embrace Washington's approach.

"The key is to live up to the obligation that all of us undertook" to bar North Korea from exporting nuclear technology or receiving overseas help for its nuclear program, Rice said after meetings with South Korea's president and top diplomat.

South Korea and China are the communist North's closest neighbors and trading partners, accounting for two-thirds of its foreign commerce.

Both nations are pledged to carry out U.N. restrictions approved after North Korea's Oct. 9 test explosion of a small nuclear device, but they have hedged on details. Rice visits Chinese leaders Friday in Beijing.

In China, officials with four commercial banks said they have stopped moving funds in and out of North Korea, The Wall Street Journal Asia reported on its Web site Thursday, and one of the officials cited a ban ordered by Chinese regulators.

A senior U.S. official confirmed that the Chinese were taking "unusual measures" against the North Koreans in their banking system but would not elaborate. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice had not yet discussed the issue with her Chinese counterparts.

Rice is on a crisis mission to Asia to reinforce the sanctions and reassure jittery allies of U.S. support. But she played down differences over how to confront Pyongyang, and left U.S. expectations vague.

"I did not come to South Korea nor will I go anyplace else to try to dictate to governments what they ought to do," to enforce the U.N. mandate, Rice said at a news conference with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon.

Ban said Seoul will review the terms of economic projects it has undertaken with the North "in harmony and in line with the U.N. Security Council resolution and international demands," but he made no promises.

The United States is skeptical about a pair of landmark inter-Korean projects — a tourism venture and joint economic zone in North Korea — that are symbols of hopes for the peninsula's reunification. U.S. officials have suggested the tourism project in particular serves to funnel badly needed hard currency to the North Korean regime.

A senior State Department official traveling with Rice said Seoul is likely to announce changes to the projects or other means of meeting the sanctions requirement after Rice has left the region, so as not to appear to have caved to U.S. demands. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice's consultations were private.

South Korea has said it would fully comply with the sanctions but has also indicated it does not plan to halt key economic projects with the North.

North Korean Gen. Ri Chan Bok told ABC News that his country's nuclear weapons were "to defend our country and our people" and would not be sold for profit. He also said President Bush wants Pyongyang to "kneel."

At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow denied that Bush wanted North Korea to "kneel down," and said the U.S. was seeking a diplomatic accord with North Korea over its nuclear weapons. Snow said that included a "better economy, more security, better relations with their neighbors, integration into the global community, as opposed to isolation."

Meanwhile, a Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, delivered North Korean leader Kim Jong Il a personal message from China's president on Thursday in the highest-level Chinese visit to its isolated ally since the nuclear test.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said Kim and the diplomat had "in-depth discussions" about the nuclear dispute.

"This is a very significant visit against the backdrop of major changes on the Korean Peninsula," Liu said at a news briefing. "We hope China's diplomatic efforts ... will bear fruit."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the Chinese diplomat was "carrying a very strong message from the Chinese government about the need for the North Koreans not to engage in additional nuclear tests and to move forward in terms of stopping their negative behavior."

But in a sign of the hurdles Rice faces in Beijing, Liu said that while China will "implement in earnest" the sanctions, they are "the means to an end, which is to solve the nuclear issue on the Korean Peninsula in a peaceful way."

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council with power to veto U.N. actions, is traditionally reluctant to punish the North. Besides ideological parallels between the Asian communist nations, Beijing fears that coming down too hard could topple the fragile government of Kim Jong Il and send hundreds of thousands of hungry refugees flooding across the border.

DOJ_NMG_0083958

China signed on to the U.N. sanctions partly to rebuke North Korea for ignoring repeated Chinese warnings not to test-fire missiles or conduct a nuclear test. Beijing has since warned its neighbor against taking any further steps, such as a second nuclear test, that would heighten tensions.

Beijing's U.N. ambassador has indicated that inspectors will not board ships to search for equipment or material that can be used to make nuclear, chemical and biological weapons or ballistic missiles. China and South Korea worry that the North would consider the action provocative.

Cracks Appear In US-Korea Front (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

The US and South Korea tried to present a united front on the North Korean nuclear crisis on Thursday, again warning of "grave consequences" if there were a second test. But they remained at odds over how to punish Kim Jong-il's regime.

As China sent a special envoy to Pyongyang to speak directly to Mr Kim about last week's nuclear test, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, arrived in Seoul amid stern domestic criticism of Washington's apparent attempts to pressure the South Korean government to stop economic engagement with the North.

The South Korean government says it may "improve", rather than suspend its joint tourism and commercial projects with North Korea but US officials have made clear they view the Mount Kumgang tourist resort as a cash cow for the North. South Korea has sent about $950m (€758m, £508m) to North Korea since tours began in 1998.

Ms Rice told a news conference on Thursday, after meeting Roh Moo-hyun, South Korea's president, and Ban Ki-moon, foreign minister: "I did not come to South Korea, nor will I go anywhere else, to try to dictate to governments what they ought to do in response to [United Nations] resolution 1718.

"What I do think is very important is that everyone takes stock of the leverage we have to get North Korea to return to the six-party talks and to negotiate the serious dismantlement of its nuclear weapons programme."

The day before the talks, Song Min-soon, the president's chief security adviser, suggested at a conference that the US needed to pay more attention to South Korea's unique security situation, adding that the US "has fought more wars than any other nation in the history of its establishment and survival".

In addition to the inter-Korean co-operation projects, the two parties are at odds over South Korea's involvement in the proliferation security initiative aimed at interdicting ships carrying weapons of mass des-truction technology. But Seoul is reluctant to join, again for fear of upsetting the fragile security balance.

However, Ms Rice and Mr Ban insisted the US-South Korean alliance "could not be stronger", with Ms Rice saying they were now discussing how inspections and interdiction at sea might work. She said: "The US has no desire to do anything to escalate this. The key is to live up to the obligations that all of us undertook that North Korea should not be able to traffic in weapons or weapons technology, nor should they be able to receive help, assistance, financing for their nuclear weapons programmes."

Meanwhile, Mr Ban warned North Korea that a second test would "aggravate" the situation. "We agreed that, in case it happens, there should be more grave consequences."

In Beijing, the Chinese foreign ministry said Tang Jianxuan, the state councillor, had been sent to Pyong-yang as a special envoy for President Hu Jiantao and had met Kim Jong-il on Thursday. The foreign ministry said the visit was "very meaningful to the relations between the two countries".

Ms Rice said she had not yet received a "read out" on the meeting.

For Rice, Seoul Proves A Cautious Ally (CSM)

By Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, October 20, 2006

SEOUL

As she whirls through the capitals of northeast Asia this week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is conveying messages tailored to the sensitivities of leaders united in their concern over North Korea's nuclear test but wavering in their responses.

Nowhere is Ms. Rice's message more carefully modulated than in South Korea.

There, the government yearns to rescue its policy of reconciliation with North Korea against US pressure for strong measures to combat what Rice says is "trafficking" in weapons of mass destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0083959

The hard-line view of Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, contrasts with China's clearly defined wish to avoid an armed clash with North Korea. But Seoul's view of its alliance with the United States and its relationship with North Korea is more complex than that of any other regional stakeholder.

Anxious to restore historic ties with its northern neighbor, South Korea has pursued a policy of engagement with North Korea that increasingly conflicts with its alliance with the US - and leaves Koreans in sharp disagreement with each other.

"She did very well in Japan where she was assured the US-Japan alliance is in solid shape," says Shim Jae-hoon, a columnist and political commentator here. "But in Korea we have lost the legitimacy of the US alliance and just don't know where we belong."

It was to brace the frayed alliance, and persuade South Korea of the need for real firmness toward North Korea, that Rice spent twice the originally scheduled 30 minutes in a meeting with President Roh Moo Hyun before emerging with a finely tuned view of what the US was doing - and not doing.

She had not come to South Korea "to try to dictate" what the government should do, she said, seated beside Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon. The US, Rice wanted Koreans to understand, has "no desire" to see an escalation in tensions.

That said, Rice was firm about the need for "all of us" to "live up to the obligations we undertook that North Korea should not traffic in these materials" - that is, the military hardware covered in the UN resolution banning their movement in and out of the North and on financial dealings that might aid the weapons program.

Rice was careful not to demand that South Korea should join the Proliferation Security Initiative - a US-backed scheme in which some 70 nations have agreed to work together to try to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

She did, however, attempt what appeared to be an effort at diplomatic salesmanship, hoping to alleviate high-level Korean concerns that the interdiction of North Korean vessels might lead to armed conflict.

The Proliferation Security Initiative, she said, was "based on intelligence" - and not the constant inspection of ships.

"Scrutiny of North Korean cargoes," she noted, "can be achieved in many ways" - ranging from "port security" to "detection of radioactive materials."

Whether she sold South Koreans on this perspective, though, was far from clear. Kim Byungki, visiting scholar at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, predicts she'll only "partially succeed" in convincing skeptical South Koreans leaders to endorse US policy. Our policies are 'under review'

Throughout the meetings, a favorite phrase of South Korean officials, including Foreign Minister Ban, was that policies, including what to do about the Proliferation Security Initiative, were under review.

Ban, in what is likely to be his last meeting with Rice before he steps down to become UN secretary-general, was equally circumspect when it came to US pressure to stop tours to the North Korean resort region of Mount Kumkang. That was also "under review," he said, parrying US criticism that payment for the tours goes directly into North Korean nuclear and missile programs in violation of the UN sanctions. (See related story.) Next stop: Beijing

Rice may have an easier time when she gets to Beijing, whose emissaries were in North Korea's capital city of Pyongyang Thursday delivering what is assumed to be a firm message of warning against conducting a second nuclear test.

At the very least, US officials hope to learn what State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, who led the Chinese team to Pyongyang, said in a message described by a Chinese official as "very significant" and "in-depth discussions on China-North Korea relations as well as the prevailing situation on the Korean peninsula."

Rice is expected to use much the same diplomatic verbiage in Beijing as in Seoul, where she said everyone was taking stock "of the leverage" each country wields over North Korea and how "much we can do cooperatively."

In Beijing, unlike Seoul, Rice won't have to deal with the whole issue of widely differing views about either an alliance with the US or the future of the government - a question that hangs over all discussions here about North Korea.

"I have no idea where President Roh is trying to lead this country," says political commentator Mr. Shim. "This issue is spotlighted by Rice's visit. We need to make a decision - whether to support the sanctions or not. I just don't know where this government is leading us."

Report: N. Korean Leader Regrets Test (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il expressed regret about his country's nuclear test to a Chinese delegation and said Pyongyang would return to international nuclear talks if Washington backs off a campaign to financially isolate the country, a South Korean newspaper reported Friday.

"If the U.S. makes a concession to some degree, we will also make a concession to some degree, whether it be bilateral talks or six-party talks," Kim was quoted as telling a Chinese envoy, the mass-circulation Chosun Ilbo reported, citing a diplomatic source in China.

DOJ_NMG_0083960

Kim told the Chinese delegation that "he is sorry about the nuclear test," the newspaper reported.

The delegation led by State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan met Kim on Thursday and returned to Beijing later that day — ahead of U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's arrival in the Chinese capital Friday. China is viewed as a key nation in efforts to persuade the North to disarm, as it is the isolated communist nation's main trading partner.

North Korea has long insisted that the U.S. desist from a campaign to sever its ties to the international financial system. Washington accuses Pyongyang of complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering to sell weapons of mass destruction.

The North has refused since last November to return to the nuclear talks, which also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea. Pyongyang has sought bolster its negotiating position by a series of provocative actions, test-firing a barrage of missiles in July and performing its first-ever nuclear test Oct. 9.

China May Press North Koreans (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 19 — China is prepared to step up pressure on North Korea in coming weeks by reducing oil shipments, among other measures, if the country refuses to return to negotiations or conducts more nuclear tests, Chinese government advisers and scholars who have discussed the matter with the leadership say.

If Beijing does take a tougher line on its neighbor and longtime ally, the action is likely to bolster its relationship with the United States. Washington has urged Chinese leaders to use all the tools at their disposal to put additional pressure on Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader.

Among the most potent of those tools is oil. China provides an estimated 80 to 90 percent of North Korea's oil imports, shipped by pipeline at undisclosed prices that Chinese officials say represent a steep discount from the world market price. Any reduction in that aid could severely hamper North Korea's already faltering economy.

Several leading Chinese experts said senior officials had indicated in the past week that they planned to slap new penalties on North Korea going beyond the ban on sales of military equipment imposed by the United Nations. But they would be likely to hold off if Mr. Kim agreed to return soon to multilateral talks North Korea has boycotted since September 2005. Years of talks have produced meager results.

Discussions about how to respond to the nuclear test, which was described by one expert as a "political earthquake" for Chinese leaders, come amid a flurry of diplomacy aimed at ironing out enforcement of United Nations sanctions and luring Mr. Kim back to negotiations.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to arrive here Friday to meet with Chinese officials. On Thursday in Pyongyang, Mr. Kim met a delegation sent by President Hu Jintao of China, the first diplomatic contact with the North Korean leader since the nuclear test on Oct. 9.

There was no immediate word on what Mr. Kim told the Chinese, but Beijing experts said he would most likely have declined to meet with the delegation, headed by a cabinet-level official, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, unless he hoped to head off additional penalties by promising to resume negotiations.

"China is going to have to make some crucial choices in the coming days," said one senior international relations specialist who has participated in top-level discussions of the matter but asked to remain anonymous. "I think Chinese leaders are prepared to take a hard line, but Kim may be smart enough to try to divide China and the U.S."

China and the United States already have some differences over how to enforce the United Nations sanctions that they and the rest of the Security Council voted for last Saturday. Beijing says it will not interdict North Korean cargo ships at sea, as the United States and Japan have recommended, and has warned against seeking to use the sanctions to provoke a confrontation.

"All sides need to consider how to implement Resolution 1718 in a balanced way and not devise ways to willfully expand the sanctions," Liu Jianchao, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, said Thursday, referring to the Security Council resolution banning the sale or transfer of missile- or nuclear-weapons-related goods to North Korea. "Sanctions are the signal, not the goal."

But Chinese experts who have taken part in discussions about how to manage the situation said that after North Korea's missile tests in July, Chinese leaders concluded that Mr. Kim might not negotiate a way out of the impasse unless he had no other choice. Officials felt badly stung by the nuclear test and have dug in their heels on ending the nuclear program there, the experts said.

China has opposed military action or an embargo to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to its Korean War ally and has subsidized Mr. Kim's its government despite gross human rights violations. But it is also wary that Mr. Kim may set off an arms race in Northeast Asia and prompt Japan and South Korea, and even Taiwan, to seek nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0083961

Beijing's relations with North Korea have been strained for many years, and some Chinese officials argue that Mr. Kim wants a nuclear trump card to intimidate China as much as the United States.

In the wake of the test, President Hu renewed his government's commitment to "a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula," and ruled out recognizing North Korea, as a fellow nuclear power, they said.

"I believe that Chinese leaders are firmly resolved to roll back the nuclear program and not accept it as an accomplished fact," said Zhang Liangui, a Korea expert at the Communist Party's Central Party School in Beijing who has favored taking a tougher line.

"I do not think that the resolve of the Chinese leadership is going to be less than the resolve of the American leadership," he said.

Others agreed, arguing that as long as the Bush administration kept its focus on a diplomatic solution, China would work to maintain solidarity with the United States.

"The only issue that they do not agree on is interdiction at sea," said Xu Guangyu, a retired general who is now a member of the Chinese Arms Control and Disarmament Association, a government-sponsored institute. "For the most part the United States has responded to this with the right tone, so I don't see a major obstacle to cooperation."

Mr. Xu said the question now was not whether China and the United States could maintain common ground, but rather how Mr. Kim would respond to the universal condemnation of his test. "The matter is in his hands," Mr. Xu said. "If he returns to negotiating, the pressure will ease. If he conducts another test, that would be very reckless."

Chinese officials have already begun carrying out measures intended to increase the pressure.

Customs officers have begun inspecting cargo passing through Dandong, a major trading post with North Korea. China Southern Airlines, the only Chinese carrier that flies to Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, announced that it had suspended service to the city.

Chinese banks, fearing possible freezes on assets, have restricted some forms of transactions involving North Korean interests while expanding a crackdown on suspected laundering of drug money and counterfeiting by individuals and front companies associated with North Korea, according to Chinese officials and local news reports.

More important, Chinese officials have discussed staged reductions in oil shipments if North Korea ignores international pressure, scholars who have been told about the leadership's planning said.

Beijing is also North Korea's leading provider of grain, but is not likely to suspend food shipments. North Korea suffers severe food shortages, with about a third of the population depending on imported grain.

China has not threatened publicly to cut off oil supplies, and it has resisted imposing economic sanctions. Instead, it has emphasized reviving the six-nation nuclear talks that collapsed a year ago. At least superficially, that puts China on the same page as the United States, which has called for a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

China has put much more emphasis on the process of negotiating than has the United States, which has expressed interest only in the results. Beijing argues that resuming talks would de-escalate the crisis, giving Mr. Kim an incentive to freeze his nuclear activities and making it possible to find a peaceful way out.

Some Chinese experts speculate that Mr. Kim, having proved that he has mastered at least the basics of manufacturing atomic bombs, may now be willing to return to the table, feeling he can demand a higher price for agreeing to discontinue the program.

"Kim has done nothing but anger China for the last few months," said Shi Yinhong, a foreign policy expert at People's University in Beijing. "But he could be smart enough to make a concession now, just before Rice visits, to create some trouble for the United States."

After Mr. Kim twice ignored China's stern warnings — first when he tested ballistic missiles in July, and then when he exploded a nuclear device close to the Chinese border — many officials here felt chagrined about having sheltered him, people who discussed the situation with the leadership said.

"The people who were the most critical of Kim in the past were a minority," said one scholar. "But they have a bigger voice now. The people who had the most favorable interpretations of Kim's actions are for now keeping quiet."

China Steps Up Diplomacy With N. Korea (AP)

AP, October 20, 2006

China stepped up its diplomatic efforts with North Korea on Thursday, sending a personal message and a gift from the Chinese president to the North's leader Kim Jong Il as Washington appealed for cooperation by Asian powers on U.N. sanctions for Pyongyang's nuclear test.

The trip by State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan was the highest-level Chinese visit to its isolated ally since its Oct. 9 atomic test.

DOJ_NMG_0083962

The visit came as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice stopped in South Korea and Japan as part of a tour of Asia to solidify support for the U.N. sanctions amid reports of a possible second atomic test by Pyongyang. She was to arrive in Beijing on Friday.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said he had no details of the message from President Hu Jintao conveyed by Tang in Pyongyang, but said Kim and the diplomat had "in-depth discussions" about the nuclear dispute. North Korea's official Korean Central News Agency said Tang also brought a gift for Kim but did not say what it was.

"This is a very significant visit against the backdrop of major changes on the Korean Peninsula," Liu said at a regular news briefing. "We hope China's diplomatic efforts ... will bear fruit."

Japanese state broadcaster NHK reported late Thursday that Tang returned to Beijing but China's Foreign Ministry could not confirm the report.

Tang's trip might be a way for Beijing to express frustration at last week's test and warn against conducting any more while wooing it back to six-party talks on the North's nuclear program.

But relations between North Korea and China, the main source of food and fuel aid to Pyongyang's decrepit economy, have deteriorated in recent years, and Beijing's sway over North Korea appears to be eroding.

China's North Korean experts expressed skepticism that Tang's diplomatic mission would yield significant results. Pyongyang has ignored Chinese pleas for negotiations for months, they said, and having proven that it has nuclear-weapons capabilities, North Korea is unlikely to be open to bargaining.

"North Korea has abused China's good intentions to de-escalate this matter," said Zhang Liangui of the Central Party School, a training academy for the communist leadership. "Instead, it has dragged out the time for dialogue in order to develop nuclear weapons."

Piao Jianyi, executive director for the Center for Korean Studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, said the isolated North "doesn't care about the pressure from outside."

"It is beyond hope," he said. "It doesn't care about any consequences. It doesn't want dialogue."

Tang, a former foreign minister whose Cabinet post ranks above minister, was accompanied by Vice Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo and Wu Dawei, the Chinese envoy to the six-nation nuclear disarmament talks.

Discussions have been stalled for a year because of a boycott by the North over U.S. financial sanctions. They involve the United States, host China, the two Koreas, Japan and Russia.

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council with power to veto U.N. actions, is traditionally reluctant to punish the North. But it voted last weekend for the resolution imposing sanctions in response to the nuclear test.

The measures ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used by its ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs. They also call for inspections of all cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea.

Beijing has since warned its neighbor against taking any steps that would heighten tensions.

However, Beijing's U.N. ambassador has indicated that inspectors will not board ships. China and South Korea worry that the North would consider the action provocative.

The U.N. resolution "is a balanced resolution and the spirit must also be reflected in its implementation," Liu said.

Liu said that while China will "implement in earnest" the sanctions, they are not an end in themselves.

"They are rather the means to an end, which is to solve the nuclear issue on the Korean Peninsula in a peaceful way," he said.

China Banks To Halt Dealings With North Korea (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

Chinese banks are moving to halt transactions with North Korea as Beijing looks for ways to pressure its recalcitrant ally to abandon any further atomic-weapons tests and return to multilateral disarmament talks.

Meanwhile, a high-ranking Chinese envoy met yesterday with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il in Pyongyang, China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said. He offered no details on what he termed a "very significant visit" at a time of "major changes on the Korean peninsula."

The flurry of Chinese activity came amid fears that Pyongyang is readying for a second nuclear test as U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice toured Asian capitals to rally support for tough sanctions in the wake of the North's Oct. 9 test. But Ms. Rice, who was due to arrive in Beijing this morning, appeared to make little progress to that end during her talks yesterday in South Korea.

China's financial system has long served as a major conduit for isolated North Korea to move money to and from the outside world. China also is North Korea's major supplier of food and oil and its largest trading partner. How strictly it enforces

DOJ_NMG_0083963

United Nations-imposed economic sanctions on North Korea and what additional measures it chooses to take will be critical in determining the amount of pressure brought to bear on Pyongyang.

In China, officials at four commercial banks said that in recent days they have stopped moving funds into or out of North Korea -- a ban that could deliver a serious blow to Pyongyang's finances if it remains in force. Since the U.S. threatened sanctions against a Macau bank that allegedly helped Pyongyang launder money, other lenders outside China have shied away from North Korean customers.

One of the officials said regulators ordered the ban; the others said they weren't sure what had prompted the cutoff.

"All transactions are blocked, whether it's company-to-company or person-to-person," said an employee at a Bank of China Ltd. branch in Dandong, China, on the border with North Korea. "We don't know how long it will last."

It isn't clear how widespread the crackdown is. The People's Bank of China, the central bank, declined to comment. But officials at Shanghai Pudong Development Bank Co., China Construction Bank Corp. and China Citic Bank also said they are shutting off business with North Korea.

Since the U.N. Security Council passed the sanctions resolution Oct. 14, China also has visibly stepped up inspections of trucks bound for North Korea. The U.N. has barred North Korea from importing military equipment and materials that can be used in its nuclear program, as well as luxury goods.

Beijing's steps may be part of a short-term campaign aimed at dissuading Pyongyang from going ahead with a second test, or they may be part of a broader shift by China toward using its economic leverage to force Mr. Kim to give up his nuclear weapons.

China has long been reluctant to apply the kind of tough measures sought by Washington, in large part because it fears destabilizing or toppling the communist regime. A collapse of North Korea and its absorption by the capitalist South would put a U.S. ally right on China's northeast border. It also could cause serious economic dislocation.

"They're trying to come up with a balance between punishing North Korea for what it's done, but not squeezing hard enough to break it, because they don't want to fix it," one senior U.S. official said.

South Korea has been noticeably more reluctant to take any decisive steps that might upset Pyongyang in the wake of its nuclear test, and the U.S. approach has been to coax Seoul gently and in private. An aide traveling with Ms. Rice said en route to Seoul that the secretary of state would avoid calling for any specific steps on border inspections or on the South's economic cooperation with the North. The South Koreans, the aide said, "don't like to be seen as being pushed to make specific steps."

Ms. Rice told reporters in Seoul that she didn't come to South Korea to tell the government how it should implement the U.N. sanctions. And in remarks after their meetings, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon defended the value of two joint economic projects the South has with North Korea, while giving no indication that Seoul plans to join an international effort to crack down on trafficking in nuclear materials from North Korea and other states.

In her one nudging comment during a media briefing with Mr. Ban, Ms. Rice said "everyone should take stock of the leverage we have to get North Korea to return" to the negotiations over its nuclear program, which fell apart last year.

Ms. Rice later joined Mr. Ban and Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso in a dinner that U.S. officials portrayed as a significant sign of warming relations between Japan and South Korea, brought about in large part by shared jitters over North Korea's nuclear program. The three countries hadn't met formally at such a level since the late 1990s.

--Evan Ramstad in Seoul and Tang Hanting in Shanghai contributed to this article.

North Korean Ploy Masks Ships Under Other Flags (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

HONG KONG, Oct. 19 — When helicopter-borne Australian commandos stormed a freighter three years ago after it was spotted unloading 110 pounds of high-grade heroin, the ship proved to be registered in Tuvalu, a tiny island nation in the South Pacific.

When a Spanish warship stopped a freighter carrying cement to Yemen four years ago, the cargo vessel turned out to be carrying 15 Scud missiles as well and was registered in Cambodia.

The two freighters had something in common: although registered elsewhere, both were owned by North Korea.

The incidents illustrated North Korea's adroit use of so-called flags of convenience to camouflage the movement of its cargo vessels as they engage in tasks that sometimes violate international laws.

The North Korean ploy could both simplify and complicate the efforts to carry out the United Nations Security Council's resolution authorizing countries to inspect cargo entering or leaving North Korea to see if it includes illicit weapons, say shipping executives, lawyers and security experts.

DOJ_NMG_0083964

The use of flags of convenience could also weaken moves like Australia's on Monday to ban North Korean-flagged vessels from its ports to protest the nuclear test.

But if Western nations suspect that a North Korean-owned vessel flying another country's flag is carrying illicit weapons, boarding the vessel could be simpler than if it carried North Korea's flag, said Jonathan D. Pollack, professor of Asian and Pacific studies at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I.

A Western nation could ask the country that registered the vessel for permission to board it even if the vessel was not entering or leaving North Korean waters. Practically any country would be more cooperative about giving permission for a search than North Korea, Mr. Pollack noted.

A North Korean crew might still resist boarding, however. The crew of the Tuvalu-registered freighter, the Pong Su, did so when chased by Australian forces for four days in 2003 before it was finally boarded and captured by the commandos.

But Mr. Pollack and other experts said that flags of convenience could still prove useful to North Korea in maintaining its arms trade despite the Security Council resolution.

One possibility would be for North Korea to try to smuggle out weapons or weapons components across its land borders with China or Russia, and then to a Chinese or Russian port. The weapons could then be loaded on a vessel secretly owned by North Korea but flying another country's flag — and perhaps not be closely watched by Western intelligence services as a result.

Or weapons could be loaded on a North Korean ship flying its own flag, and the registration of the ship could be altered after it left port. "In the middle of the night, they could change the name and change the flag," said Gary Wolfe, a maritime lawyer at Seward & Kissel, a New York law firm.

Still another possibility, shipping and security experts said, would be for a North Korean-flagged ship to transfer cargo to a North Korean ship carrying another flag, either in port or in midocean if it were a calm day and the cargo small enough.

Changing the registration of a ship — and therefore its flag — is fairly simple. A ship owner simply sends the necessary paperwork to a country's ship registry, along with a fee of as little as $1,000. The vessel is not required to visit the country where it is registered, or even go to port.

Ship registries do require basic information about a vessel's length and tonnage. So if a ship of a certain size and displacement disappears from one ship's registry and a vessel of equal size and displacement pops up with a different name on another registry at the same time, they may be the same ship and could be identified with careful sleuthing, Mr. Wolfe said.

The Pong Su sailed from North Korea to Singapore in 2003 under a North Korean flag. The vessel then switched its registration to Tuvalu and sailed on to Australia, where witnesses saw a dinghy coming ashore with what proved to be the shipment of heroin.

The freighter was seized and later used as a bombing target by the Australian armed forces as a warning to drug traffickers. The North Korean government denied that it had been involved.

Without specifically mentioning flags of convenience, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld warned on Wednesday of the difficulty of monitoring North Korea's trade. "There's so much moving around the world by land, sea and air that it is practically impossible — not impossible, but certainly it would take a lot of countries cooperating with a high degree of cohesion," and cohesion has been lacking, he said during a question-and-answer period at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base in Alabama.

Until 2002, North Korea tended to register its ships as Cambodian, using a registration office that the Cambodian government had authorized in Singapore. Marcus Hand, the Asia editor for Lloyd's List, a shipping industry newspaper, said dozens of North Korean ships used to carry the Cambodian flag.

He cautioned, however, that it is often difficult to know with certainty who owns a ship, since ships are often held through various companies registered all over the world. No one outside North Korea really knows for sure how many cargo vessels the country has registered under other flags.

Cambodia canceled the right of its Singapore agents to register ships in 2002 after finding that Cambodian-registered ships were in such poor condition that ports were reluctant to let them berth, and after France accused a Cambodian-registered ship and its crew of transporting cocaine. The government of Cambodia ended up authorizing representatives in Pusan, South Korea, to manage the country's ship registry.

Charlie Bach, the managing director of the overhauled International Ship Registry of Cambodia, said in an e-mail message that there were no longer any North Korean ships carrying the Cambodian flag.

The mystery lies in where North Korea's ships are registered instead.

According to reports in the shipping press in 2003, some of the shipping agents in Singapore who represented Cambodia switched to representing Tuvalu and landlocked Mongolia instead, and encouraged their clients to change their ships' registration to those countries.

Several shipping executives said they believed that North Korean ships were sailing under Mongolian and Tuvaluan flags now.

DOJ_NMG_0083965

World War II Is Over (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

The first stop on Condoleezza Rice's post-detonation, nuclear reassurance tour was Tokyo. There she dutifully unfurled the American nuclear umbrella, pledging in person that the United States would meet any North Korean attack on Japan with massive American retaliation, nuclear if necessary.

An important message, to be sure, for the short run, lest Kim Jong Il imbibe a little too much cognac and be teased by one of his "pleasure squad" lovelies into launching a missile or two into Japan.

But Rice's declaration had another and obvious longer-run intent: to quell any thought Japan might have of going nuclear to counter and deter North Korea's bomb.

The Japanese understood this purpose well. Thus, at a joint news conference with Rice, Foreign Minister Taro Aso offered the boilerplate denial of even thinking of going nuclear: "The government of Japan has no position at all to consider going nuclear."

The impeccably polite Japanese were not about to contradict the secretary of state in her presence. Nonetheless, the very same Aso had earlier the very same day told a parliamentary committee that Japan should begin debating the issue: "The reality is that it is only Japan that has not discussed possessing nuclear weapons, and all other countries have been discussing it."

Just three days earlier, another high-ranking member of the ruling party had transgressed the same taboo and called for open debate about Japan's acquiring nuclear weapons.

The American reaction to such talk is knee-jerk opposition. Like those imperial Japanese soldiers discovered holed up on some godforsaken Pacific island decades after World War II, we continue to act as if we, too, never received news of the Japanese surrender. We applaud the Japanese for continuing their adherence to the MacArthur constitution that forever denies Japan the status of Great Power replete with commensurate military force.

Of course Japan has in recent decades skirted that proscription, building a small but serious conventional military. Nuclear weapons, however, have remained off the table.

As the only country ever to suffer nuclear attack, Japan obviously has its own reasons to resist the very thought. But now that the lunatic regime next door, which has already overflown Japan with its missiles, has officially gone nuclear, some rethinking is warranted.

Japan is a true anomaly. All the other Great Powers went nuclear decades ago -- even the once-and-no-longer great, such as France; the wannabe great, such as India; and the never-will-be great, such as North Korea. There are nukes in the hands of Pakistan, which overnight could turn into an al-Qaeda state, and North Korea, a country so cosmically deranged that it reports that the "Dear Leader" shot five holes-in-one in his first time playing golf and also wrote six operas. Yet we are plagued by doubts about Japan's joining this club.

Japan is not just a model international citizen -- dynamic economy, stable democracy, self-effacing foreign policy -- it is also the most important and reliable U.S. ally after only Britain. One of the quieter success stories of recent American foreign policy has been the intensification of the U.S.-Japanese alliance. Tokyo has joined with the United States in the development and deployment of missile defenses and aligned itself with the United States on the solidarity should there ever be a confrontation.

neuralgic issue of Taiwan, pledging

The immediate effect of Japan's considering going nuclear would be to concentrate China's mind on denuclearizing North Korea. China calculates that North Korea is a convenient buffer between it and a dynamic, capitalist South Korea bolstered by American troops. China is quite content with a client regime that is a thorn in our side, keeping us tied down while it pursues its ambitions in the rest of Asia. Pyongyang's nukes, after all, are pointed not west but east.

Japan's threatening to go nuclear would alter that calculation. It might even persuade China to squeeze Kim Jong Il as a way to prevent Japan from going nuclear. The Japan card remains the only one that carries even the remote possibility of reversing North Korea's nuclear program.

Japan's response to the North Korean threat has been very strong and very insistent on serious sanctions. This is, of course, out of self-interest, not altruism. But that is the point. Japan's natural interests parallel America's in the Pacific Rim -- maintaining military and political stability, peacefully containing an inexorably expanding China, opposing the gangster regime in Pyongyang, and spreading the liberal democratic model throughout Asia.

Why are we so intent on denying this stable, reliable, democratic ally the means to help us shoulder the burden in a world where so many other allies -- the inveterately appeasing South Koreans most notoriously -- insist on the free ride?

DOJ_NMG_0083966

Olmert Warns Iran About Its Nuke Program (AP)

By Amy Teibel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

Israel's prime minister delivered his strongest comments yet on Iran's nuclear program, warning Thursday that Tehran would have "a price to pay" if it does not back down from its atomic ambitions and hinting that Israel might be forced to take action.

Ehud Olmert did not specifically threaten to cripple Iran's nuclear program in a military strike, as it did 25 years ago in Iraq when it bombed an unfinished nuclear reactor there. But he repeated what he said a day earlier after meeting Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow — the Iranians "have to be afraid" of the consequences of their intransigence.

"They have to understand that if they object to every compromise, there will be a price to pay," Olmert said on a flight back to Israel after a three-day trip to Moscow.

Israel rejects Tehran's claim that its nuclear program is peaceful, designed solely to produce energy. In the past, Israel has said it would not lead a campaign against Iran's nuclear program, but would act in concert with world powers that are similarly worried.

But with Iran rejecting various compromise proposals and insisting on enriching uranium — a process key to developing nuclear weapons — Olmert been raising the stakes. He said Israel cannot reconcile itself to a nuclear Iran.

"There comes a time when you have to do damage control," he said. "A red line must be drawn that cannot be crossed," Olmert added, without elaborating. "Time isn't standing still," he said "and perhaps there will be a need to do something in the future."

Some Israeli officials have made specific threats to hit Iran. But military experts have questioned Israel's ability to destroy Iran's nuclear facilities, which unlike Iraq's in 1981 are scattered among installations, some hidden underground. But they have said Israel could set the program back years by striking several of the sites.

Israel considers Iran to be the greatest threat to its survival. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for the Jewish state's destruction, and Iran already has missiles capable of carrying payloads to Israel.

Ahmadinejad shrugged off the threat of U.N. sanctions Thursday, saying his nation would not give up any of its nuclear program.

"The Iranian nation will not cede one iota of its rights," Ahmadinejad told thousands of cheering supporters in the town of Islamshahr, about 25 miles south of the capital Tehran.

"Our nation achieved proficiency in nuclear energy at a time when you imposed economic, scientific and technological sanctions against us," he said, addressing the U.S. and its allies and referring to sanctions imposed on Iran after the 1979 Islamic revolution and hostage-taking at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The crowd interrupted his speech with the chant: "Nuclear energy is our right!"

France said Wednesday that a resolution calling for sanctions against Iran would likely be circulated at the U.N. Security Council by the end of the week. Support for sanctions has grown among council members after weeks of talks between the EU and Iran failed to persuade Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment and start broader negotiations.

At a meeting in Luxembourg on Tuesday, European Union foreign ministers endorsed a decision by the U.N.'s five permanent Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany to pursue limited sanctions on Tehran while keeping the door open to future talks.

Iran has stalled on a package of economic incentives and political rewards that the six countries offered in June, on the condition that Tehran agree to consider a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment.

Britain Says U.N. Iran Resolution Coming (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 20, 2006

Britain said Thursday it expects a draft U.N. resolution on Iran to be introduced in the Security Council early next week and diplomats said it will seek sanctions on Tehran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere had said Tuesday he hoped to circulate a draft by the end of the week. But France, Britain and Germany, who have led negotiations with Iran on its nuclear program, were still discussing the text with the United States on Thursday, and had not yet shown it to Russia and China.

"My expectation is that sometime early next week we'll put a resolution down," Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0083967

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said "we're consulting on it and I expect within a day or two we'll have something to circulate more broadly in the council."

European Union foreign ministers said after a meeting in Luxembourg on Tuesday that they have no choice but to back diplomatic talks at the United Nations about sanctions on Iran.

The ministers backed a decision by the U.N.'s five permanent Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany to pursue limited sanctions on Tehran while keeping the door open to future talks.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said earlier this month that they would seek measures under Article 41 of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows nonmilitary sanctions.

The six countries offered Iran a package of economic incentives and political rewards in June if it agreed to consider a long-term moratorium on enrichment and commit to a freeze on uranium enrichment before talks to discuss details of their package.

But Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly and defiantly said his country would continue enrichment, and is not intimidated by the possibility of sanctions.

The United States has called for broad sanctions, such as a total ban on missile and nuclear technology sales, while the Russians and Chinese back prohibitions of selected items as a first step.

The Black Box Of Tehran (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

Here's a real-life international mystery: What happened in Tehran in September that torpedoed the prospect of negotiations with the United States over Iran's nuclear program? Were Western hopes of Iranian pragmatism simply an illusion? Are there other channels open for discussion with Tehran if the nuclear route is blocked?

U.S. and European intelligence analysts are debating these questions, and for now they don't seem to have good answers. The process of decision making in Tehran remains a "black box." Analysts can see the decisions that emerge from the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and they can hear the competing arguments of pragmatists and hard-liners. But how consensus is reached remains a puzzle. My fear is that at its core, the Islamic republic disdains compromise as a sign of weakness.

Hopes for a breakthrough on the nuclear issue were raised last summer by discussions between Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief. Both men are at the pragmatic, deal-making ends of their respective political spectrums, and that may have been part of the problem. But as the discussions continued, the Iranians appeared ready to offer a two-month suspension of uranium enrichment once talks with the Europeans resumed -- thereby meeting the U.S. precondition for joining the talks. It looked like a classic bit of face-saving bargaining.

The background music seemed right as well. President Bush told me in an interview on Sept. 13 that the United States respected Iran's legitimate interests, including its right to a civilian nuclear program. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, while taking a defiant line on many issues, told me and Lally Weymouth of Newsweek on Sept. 19 that Iran would be willing to resume diplomatic relations with the United States "under appropriate conditions." And he said in other meetings that Iran might accept suspension of enrichment as a byproduct of negotiations, although not as a precondition. The sense that a deal was possible was reinforced by a back-channel exchange in which a European intermediary and an Iranian former official prepared a joint paper outlining a compromise formula on the nuclear issue.

But by late September, State Department officials concluded that the Iranians were backing away. Pessimistic private signals were confirmed when Khamenei, the only Iranian who speaks authoritatively on foreign policy, explained last week that Iran had already tried suspension of enrichment, in its earlier negotiations with the Europeans, and wouldn't do so again. "If we had not experienced that path [a two-year suspension of uranium enrichment], perhaps we would have criticized ourselves today. But now we will pursue with a strong heart."

So what's next? Bush administration officials rightly argue that Iran must pay some price for continuing its nuclear program in defiance of warnings from the International Atomic Energy Agency. Russia and China have promised to support some penalties for Iran, and my sense is that maintaining their support -- and international solidarity on Iran -- matters more than the details of sanctions. Failure to penalize Tehran would, among other things, undermine the Iranian pragmatists who favored negotiations. It would show that Tehran can defy the West and get away with it, which has been one of Ahmadinejad's implicit themes.

While the Bush administration wants to draw a clear red line for Tehran, it also appears ready to keep the door open for dialogue. An important gesture was the announcement this month that the United States will lift sanctions to allow an American company to provide spare parts to repair Iranian civilian aircraft. Another signal came from Undersecretary of State Nicholas

DOJ_NMG_0083968

Burns, who said last week in an otherwise hard-line speech that the U.S.-European package of incentives for Iran to halt enrichment will remain on the table, despite Tehran's refusal to join negotiations.

Burns called for "a dramatic increase in our exchanges with Iran -- in business, in academia, in athletics, in the arts." That amplified a comment Bush had made to me in our interview. (If the administration is serious about exchanges, however, it ought to quash an absurd investigation by the Treasury Department into whether American basketball players playing for Iranian teams are violating U.S. sanctions. Good grief!)

America, meanwhile, has a foreign policy mystery of its own -- rivaling that black box of decision making in Tehran. Just what was former secretary of state James A. Baker III up to, in his contacts last month with Iranian and Syrian diplomats about how to stabilize Iraq? Is Baker opening a back channel for the Bush administration? Is America quietly seeking Iranian help as Iraq spins out of control? We'll leave that puzzle to pundits in Tehran.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://www.washingtonpost.com.

UN 'poses No Threat To Israeli Aircraft' (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, October 20, 2006

The United Nations on Thursday night moved rapidly to dispel suggestions by Alain Pellegrini, the UN force commander in Lebanon, that it would consider shooting down Israeli aircraft if they continued illegal incursions into Lebanese airspace.

Major-General Pellegrini told a news conference in New York that Israeli violations were "a major concern . . . not to be accepted". While Unifil was currently using diplomatic channels to persuade Israel to stop its flights, in the future "other ways" could be considered, including force.

He added that French troops were armed with anti-aircraft missiles, although under the current rules they could only be fired in self-defence. Were its positions to be attacked, however, Unifil would "respond with these missiles". Any more proactive action would require a change to the UN's rules of engagement.

Barely had Maj-Gen Pellegrini spoken than the UN spokesman sought to play down any suggestion of a threat. One French diplomat said its UN mission was perplexed by the comments, and officials in the Italian-led strategic cell in New York said no change to the rules of engagement were on the table.

An Israeli diplomat suggested it was not the first time Mr Pellegrini had made curious statements; and one diplomat suggested it was time for him to move on.

Unifil officials said there was no appetite to end up in an armed conflict with Israel. But they added that the air violations were in contravention of UN resolution 1701, and could be considered a violent act, by spreading fear among Lebanese civilians.

Maj-Gen Pellegrini noted that the number of air violations had declined recently. He also said the 7,200-strong force had seen no evidence of illegal arms in the hands of Hizbollah or any other militias in the zone under his control.

He added that there were continued efforts to convince Israel to withdraw from the town of Ghajar, on the border between Lebanon and occupied Syria.

Hamas Charities Thrive Despite U.S.-led Fund Freeze (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- A U.S.-led funding squeeze, which has paralyzed the Hamas-led Palestinian government, has had the unintended effect of bolstering the militant group's network of schools, hospitals and alms societies.

Foreign donations, often consisting of cash in suitcases smuggled across the border, have permitted Hamas' vast social-welfare network to thrive, say officials and analysts.

"All charitable organizations affiliated with Hamas are still functioning," said Sheik Yazeeb Khader, an editor of Hamas' West Bank newspaper. He said the charities in Gaza have especially benefited from money "brought across the border and not checked."

For years, while Hamas' military wing dispatched suicide bombers to Israeli cities, the group's civilian wing quietly built up a grass-roots following with its network of Islamic social-welfare organizations.

The charities went far beyond anything established by the secular government of Yasser Arafat and helped give Hamas the support needed to oust Arafat loyalists in January elections and take power in March.

Unable to pay for supplies, government ministries have since ceased to function, and without salaries, civil servants have gone on strike.

DOJ_NMG_0083969

The charities, however, openly boast that they continue to get money from Muslim communities in the Persian Gulf, Europe and the United States.

"These organizations are living in a golden age, where they are badly needed. There is no other way to take care of those people," said Basem Ezbidi, a political science professor at Birzeit University.

The links between Hamas and its social affiliates are kept deliberately murky.

None of the charities bear the Hamas name. Ask the managers about support from Hamas, and they are quick to deny any political affiliation.

Amid continuing economic hardship, the charities are coming under fire from some who charge that Hamas is protecting its own.

"There is a lot of money in Hamas," said Abdel Nasser Najjar, a columnist for Al Ayyam, a newspaper of the opposition Fatah party.

"The problem now, is that Hamas is only giving to their own people, or people who are close to the movement."

At one Islamic charity in Ramallah, the Al Farah society, questions about Hamas make relief workers and clients -- a group of women in head scarves or veils -- go stiff.

Israeli soldiers raided the organization's offices several months ago, confiscating computers, welfare records, and eventually arresting director Teiysur Arure.

Recently released from jail, the director denies any political affiliation.

The same goes for Mohammad Tanbura, who heads the Gaza-based El-Salah society, which distributes school supplies and helps destitute families survive.

"We have nothing to do with the government, we are a Palestinian organization that works for the social sector rather than the political sector," Mr. Tanbura said. "This is not a Hamas charity work. Our money is legal."

Birzeit University's Mr. Ezbidi said most Islamic charities have some connection with Hamas, even if it's a 10 percent stake in the operations.

"To really draw a line between what is considered Hamas and what is not is a difficult thing because Hamas has a broad constituency," he said. "It's general knowledge that Hamas is running health care clinics, hospitals and subsidizing tuition. But it's done in an unpublicized forum."

In recent months, the case load at Al Farah's alms house has more than doubled under the weight of an aid boycott that has left some 140,000 civil servants without pay and the poor without welfare checks.

"If the government isn't providing for us, then Islamic institutions are providing for us," said Mr. Arure, the director. "People have crossed the red line, they have no money whatsoever."

Russia Suspends Scores Of Foreign Groups (NYT)

By C.J. Chivers

The New York Times, October 20, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 19 — Scores of foreign private organizations were forced to cease their operations in Russia on Thursday while the government considered whether to register them under a new law that has received sharp international criticism.

Among the suspended organizations were some of those most critical of the Kremlin, including Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, and others, like the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute, that have been accused by Russian officials of instigating or assisting revolutions against other former Soviet republics.

The Justice Ministry, which is responsible for registering foreign private organizations, insisted that the suspensions were neither retaliatory nor permanent.

It issued a statement saying the suspended organizations had not properly filed new registration materials or had submitted the required materials on the last day before the registration deadline, which was midnight on Wednesday. It said it was rushing to review the applications it had received.

“It is important to note that lack of re-registration does not entail the liquidation of the organization,” the statement said. “The talk here is only that these organizations cannot carry out the activity envisaged by their charters before they are brought into the register.”

The number of suspended organizations is not entirely clear. The statement said the ministry had received applications from 185 organizations, approved 108 of them and continued to review the 77 others.

But the suspensions marked the latest chapter in Russia’s pressure on many foreign organizations that have offices on its soil. They occurred in a climate of deepening worry about the Kremlin’s crackdown on civil society here, and just days ahead of a planned visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has expressed concerns about the law regulating foreign private organizations, known as nongovernmental organizations, or N.G.O.’s, which was passed earlier this year.

DOJ_NMG_0083970

Some Russian officials, including Nikolai P. Patrushev, the chief of the domestic intelligence service, have accused the groups of interfering with state affairs or even harboring spies.

The new law, strongly backed by President Vladimir V. Putin, created extensive new filing requirements, which in some cases the organizations said have been so tedious and lengthy as to be almost impossible to fulfill. The groups have also expressed fears that the rules were written vaguely enough to allow any group to be audited, and perhaps closed, on a pretext.

The groups and their supporters have said that the way the law was carried out would be a test of whether Russia would allow foreign organizations that it disliked to continue to work in the country. The first deadline, and its effects on Thursday, were accompanied by a strong sense of concern, even fear.

"My fear is that their intention is to shut us down," Josh Rubenstein, a director at Amnesty International, said by telephone. Amnesty International has had an office in Russia since the days of Mikhail S. Gorbachev, he said.

The Justice Ministry posted a list of 73 organizations that were not yet approved, and thus suspended. At least 38 of these were either listed by the ministry as American or had a clear American affiliation, including the American Bar Association, the American-Russian Business Council, the American Trade Chamber and an office of Johns Hopkins University.

The suspended Western organizations also included the Danish Refugee Council and the French and Belgian offices of Doctors without Borders.

News organizations reported that nearly 100 groups had been suspended, but did not provide a list. The Associated Press quoted one justice ministry official saying that 96 groups were suspended, while the ITAR-Tass news agency later quoted the same officials saying that the number was 93.

While the ministry said it had approved 108 organizations for registration, it provided a list of only 80.

Forty-one of those were American, including the Ford Foundation, the Nuclear Threat Initiative and the Moscow office of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Among the 41, there appeared to be 33 child-adoption agencies.

As the day passed with offices idled, some of the affected groups declined to comment, saying they worried about antagonizing Russia while their registration documents were under review.

Others described a new posture their offices had assumed on the workday on Thursday: they had abruptly stopped their work and programs, but left their lights on and offices staffed.

Carroll Bogert, an associate director at Human Rights Watch, said by telephone from New York that the employees in Russia were still being paid "but otherwise we are not operating in Russia."

She said, however, that she expected that the office would be registered once its documents were reviewed, and that the organization did not feel that it was a specific target. The new law, she said "is a weapon of broad usage."

She added that even if the government approves the registration of the Human Rights Watch office in Russia, the organization would be required to file an annual work plan by Oct. 31. This was another onerous task, she said. Such requirements, she said, "are affecting our ability to do substantive work."

The cessation of activities for some organizations was decried by their partners in the country.

Elena Panfilova, director of the Russian chapter of Transparency International, an anticorruption organization, said her office was registered as a domestic organization, and not a foreign one, so it was not directly affected by the new registration procedures.

But she said she had work planned with other groups, which now are unable to meet with her. "It is appalling," she said. "It is a total disgrace."

With such statements circulating, the Justice Ministry said it was working to expedite the registrations and placed blame on the organizations for not providing the required documentation.

"Very often," it said, "the terms of re-registration depend only on the desire of the representatives of an N.G.O. and their accuracy when filling out the documents."

Russia Halts Activities Of Many Groups From Abroad (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 20, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 19 -- Russia on Thursday suspended the activities of Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, the International Republican Institute and more than 90 other foreign nongovernmental organizations, saying they failed to meet the registration requirements of a controversial new law designed to bring activists here under much closer government scrutiny.

Across the country, foreign grass-roots organizations that investigate human rights abuses, promote democracy and work with refugees folded their tents until further notice, informing staff that all operations must cease immediately. The only work officially authorized was the paying of staff and bills.

DOJ_NMG_0083971

The law, signed by President Vladimir Putin at the start of the year, drew broad criticism as part of a general rollback of democratic freedoms in Russia. Activists said it was intended to rein in one of the last areas of independent civic life here; Putin called it necessary to prevent foreigners from interfering in the country's political process.

On Thursday, officials said the suspensions resulted simply from the failure of private groups to meet the law's requirements, not from a political decision on the part of the state. The groups would be allowed to resume work once their registrations are completed, they said.

"No political order has been given . . . to tighten the screws," said Vladimir Lukin, Russia's federal ombudsman, speaking at a Moscow forum hosted by the Council of Europe, a 46-country human rights organization based in Strasbourg, France. "Colleagues from international NGOs are not in the habit of keeping their affairs and documents in order."

Many nongovernmental organizations fear that the current bureaucratic tangle might be the beginning of a larger crackdown on activism that is not controlled by the Kremlin. They note too that successful registration would not end their dealings with the Justice Ministry. After that, they would have to report on planned activities for the year, and they worry that officials could reject their plans or penalize the groups if they deviate from the plans because of unexpected events.

Many of the suspended organizations are American, including adoption agencies, the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute. The latter two are funded by the U.S. Congress but act independently to promote democracy.

Other suspended groups include two branches of Doctors Without Borders, the Danish Refugee Council and the Netherlands-based Russian Justice Initiative, which helps Russians bring cases to the European Court of Human Rights.

Under the law, Russian nongovernmental organizations are also subject to new regulation. But a Wednesday deadline to meet the paperwork requirements or stop operation applied only to foreign groups.

Russian officials stressed that the suspensions, which went into effect at midnight Wednesday, are temporary. "We are not speaking about closing organizations; that is out of the question," said a senior Justice Ministry official, Natalia Vishnyakova, in a telephone interview. Concerning the registration process, she said: "We are working properly, and put all our efforts into making it even faster. It is not at all complicated, believe me, absolutely not. It's really their own headache. On our part, we provided all necessary conditions."

Activists complained, however, that the requirements of the law are so vague and cumbersome that meeting the deadline was extremely difficult. Russian officials, they said, nitpicked their way through the submitted documents.

The local Human Rights Watch operation, for instance, called itself the "Representative Office of the Non-Governmental Organization Human Rights Watch in the Russian Federation." Officials at the registration office rejected that description and said the group should call itself the "Representative Office of the Corporation Human Rights Watch Inc. (USA) in the Russian Federation."

That change, among others, required Human Rights Watch to send its submission back to its headquarters in New York to have the document revised and re-notarized, then retranslated into Russian and re-notarized in Russia.

Officials at the Human Rights Watch office in Moscow said they could not speak on the record to a reporter because they interpreted the strictures of the suspension to extend to news media interviews. The law says that suspended groups can do nothing that would advance the aims and goals of their offices in Russia.

"We are registering, and we are complying with the law," said Carroll Bogert, associate director of Human Rights Watch, in a telephone interview from New York. "But we have been really distracted from our work by the onerous burdens that this law imposes. But this is not particular to us. It's a hassle for everyone."

Other groups, however, said they found the registration office helpful. The American Chamber of Commerce, for instance, said Russian officials there pointed out errors before the organization formally submitted its documents, allowing it to correct them and expedite the registration. In all, the office accepted the registrations of 99 foreign organizations, freeing them to continue their work, officials at the Justice Ministry said. The American groups included the chamber, the Ford Foundation and the Carnegie Moscow Center.

Amnesty International said it was exploring whether it could continue field research in Russia by flying in researchers from its London headquarters. "We are seeking clarification," said Lydia Aroyo, a spokeswoman based in London. "But we are very unhappy. There were no clear guidelines as to what documents were required or how to fill them out. The process was very cumbersome and very time-consuming."

Foreign Groups Suspend Work In Russia Pending Registration (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

MOSCOW — Dozens of foreign nongovernmental organizations suspended work in Russia on Thursday after failing to complete a re-registration process by the deadline imposed under a controversial new law.

DOJ_NMG_0083972

Those suspending their activities included Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

Human rights organizations have said that the new law contains burdensome requirements and appears aimed at tightening control over their work in Russia, and perhaps at shutting some down.

Russian authorities have said the law is needed to ensure that nongovernmental organizations are not used as fronts for terrorist activities and to prevent foreign organizations from illegally interfering in Russian politics.

The law requires groups to submit extensive documentation on their boards and founders, even if the founders no longer have ties to the groups. The Carnegie Moscow Center, established by the Washington-based Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, was re-registered only after it provided proof of the death of its founder, Andrew Carnegie, who died in 1919.

The Russian Justice Ministry said that 108 branches of foreign NGOs had been re-registered by the Wednesday deadline, and that 77 applications were still being processed.

Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, two organizations that frequently criticize the Kremlin, were among the groups whose documents were still being processed.

"The Russian authorities go through the documents down to the last comma," Sergei Nikitin, head of Amnesty International's Russian resource center, told the Russian news agency Interfax. "They will most likely send our documents back to us and tell us to correct some mistakes they uncover."

Allison Gill, head of the Moscow office of Human Rights Watch, told Interfax that a package of documents for re-registration had been submitted to authorities in late September, and that she hoped the office would restart work soon.

Organizations that suspended their work can still pay their staff and keep their offices, but must discontinue research and publicity activities until their re-registration is official.

Many organizations have expressed even greater concern about an Oct. 31 deadline for them to report on activities they plan next year. Some groups have expressed fear this could lead to government monitoring, bans on programs, or to punishment for holding unlisted events.

Venezuela Opposition Confident Of Victory (WT)

By Sacha Feinman

The Washington Times, October 20, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chavez faces voters in fewer than two months with a credible opposition candidate, who says he can overcome a double-digit lead in public-opinion polls.

One of the most respected pollsters in Venezuela, Alfredo Keller, recently released his newest survey, which concludes that Mr. Chavez enjoys 50 percent support to Manuel Rosales' 37 percent.

The lead makes the task daunting but not impossible, analysts say, because Mr. Keller's poll also found increasing dissatisfaction with the current government among potential voters.

Polls have consistently shown that the Chavez government gets poor marks on security, as the country's violent-crime rate has steadily increased during Mr. Chavez's seven years in power.

"Rosales is a very intuitional person; he doesn't follow polls or politics," said Ivo Hernandez, a professor of political science at Venezuela's Simon Bolivar University.

"I think that Rosales absolutely has a chance to carry the elections. People are really scared of what is going on here.

"Mr. Chavez is getting more and more radical, and no one wants to return to the instability of the 2002 coup. He still has about two months; in Venezuela, two months is enough for everything to change," he said.

In 2002, a military coup removed Mr. Chavez from office for 48 hours.

Mr. Rosales, the governor of the oil-rich state Zulia, held a rally in the heart of Caracas Saturday that attracted an estimated 10,000 supporters.

It was the largest gathering of opposition forces in Venezuela since an effort to recall Mr. Chavez failed in August 2004.

Mr. Rosales is running with the unified support of the country's often splintered and squabbling opposition.

In August, he emerged from a crowded field of potential contenders as the sole opposition candidate when Julio Borges and Teodoro Petkoff withdrew their candidacies.

Mr. Petkoff, now Mr. Rosales' campaign manager, thinks the opposition's bid to unseat Mr. Chavez is within its grasp.

"We are about to witness a close competition," he told Agence France-Presse earlier this month. "We like to think of Rosales's campaign as one of 'national unity' ... as an attempt to restore civility to the political process."

In both his initial and re-election campaigns for the Zulia governorship, Mr. Rosales defeated the hand-picked candidates of the Venezuelan president.

For his part, Mr. Chavez has frequently tried to portray the election as a choice between himself and President Bush, describing Mr. Rosales as nothing more than a stalking-horse for the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0083973

In late September, Mr. Chavez charged that his security forces had foiled an assassination plot while he campaigned in Zulia.

He said the would-be assassins were members of the Zulia police and part of a larger campaign by Mr. Bush to assassinate Mr. Chavez before the U.S. president leaves office in 2009.

The U.S. State Department has dismissed as "absurd" Mr. Chavez's frequent charges that he is the target of a U.S. assassination plot.

U.N. Losers (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 20, 2006

¿QUIEN ES MAS MACHO, Hugo Chavez or George W. Bush? Or more to the point, which of the two is the biggest loser in the eyes of the world?

It seems that the United Nations General Assembly finds both pretty objectionable. Chavez's Venezuela looks like it's heading toward defeat in its bid for a nonpermanent seat on the 15-member Security Council, a heavy blow for its fiery president. But Venezuela's loss is hardly a ringing endorsement for the Bush administration, which has thrown its diplomatic weight behind Guatemala. After 35 rounds of balloting from Monday to Thursday, neither Latin American country could come close to the two-thirds vote needed to win.

Deadlocks can be resolved in one of two ways. Either the country with the least votes — in this case Venezuela — concedes, or they both agree to drop out in favor of a third candidate. Chavez has said he has no intention of quitting, and neither does Guatemala, meaning this could go on for a long time indeed. The U.N. record is 155 rounds of voting in a battle between Cuba and U.S.-backed Colombia in 1979. The seat ended up going to Mexico.

The election is a referendum of sorts between Chavez, who in a notorious rant before the General Assembly in September referred to Bush as "the devil," and the White House. If Venezuela prevails, Chavez intends to personally attend Security Council meetings to "defend dignity and truth" — meaning oppose the United States at nearly every turn.

Chavez stands to lose the most if, as expected, neither Guatemala nor Venezuela wins. Obtaining the Security Council seat has been the single-minded goal in what passes for his foreign policy agenda, and it was the focus of a recent globe-trotting tour of such nations as Iran, Russia and China.

The U.S. has far less to lose because, even if Guatemala fails, pretty much any Latin American or Caribbean country except Cuba would be less harmful to U.S. interests.

Still, Venezuela's continued support from a large portion of the developing world, even after Chavez's clownish antics last month, is a discouraging indicator of international anger toward the United States. Many argue that White House arm-twisting on behalf of Guatemala may have actually harmed the country's chances, though it's likely that the pressure pushed at least as many countries to vote yes as no.

More troubling is a recent report from the State Department showing that just 25% of U.N. member states voted in line with the U.S. last year, down from 50% a decade earlier. Bush may win this battle, but he's giving ground in the larger diplomatic war.

Population Control: In Estonia, Paying Women To Have Babies Is Paying Off (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- Pia Kurro sat cross-legged on her bed in a drab, Soviet-era maternity ward that smelled of detergent and old linoleum and breast-fed her two-day-old daughter, Syria, who owes her existence to state subsidies.

In return for having the child, Ms. Kurro will receive the equivalent of $1,560 a month from her government for over a year, a lot of money in a country where the average monthly salary is $650.

"I would not have had a baby without the support," said the 39-year-old business consultant.

Ms. Kurro embodies an increasingly urgent question: Can government policies aimed at raising a nation's birthrate actually work? The answer is vital to the future of the global economy. Like most developed countries around the world, Estonia has a critical shortfall of children that, if not reversed, will lead to a sharply aging and shrinking population. That will undermine economic growth and public finances as a dwindling work force struggles to support a growing pool of retirees who are living longer.

A handful of developed countries, including the Nordic nations and France, have stable populations thanks to a long tradition of financial support for families. But for other countries in Europe and Asia that have already seen steep falls in birthrates, demographers have doubted there was much that could be done. Governments agreed, making little serious attempt to boost their birthrates. Estonia stands out because it has made a dramatic shift, from laissez-faire to aggressive activism, in an attempt to alter its future. And as other nations slowly start to address the risk of declining birthrates, the effort there is being closely watched around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0083974

Estonia's wake-up call came in 2001, when the United Nations' annual world-population report showed that Estonia was one of the fastest-shrinking nations on earth, at risk of losing nearly half its 1.4 million people by mid-century. Estonia's fertility rate -- the average number of children a woman bears -- had collapsed to 1.3 in the late 1990s, down from 2.2 under communism only a decade earlier.

In an attempt to stop that downward spiral, Estonia took a bold step: In 2004 it began paying women to have babies. Working women who take time off after giving birth get their entire monthly income for up to 15 months, up to a ceiling of $1,560. Non-wage-earners get $200 a month. The welfare perk -- known locally as the "mother's salary" -- was a sharp about-face for the radically free-market government.

"Step by step, [the declining birthrate] became a danger to the survival of the nation, so we had to do something," says Paul-Eerik Rummo, minister for population affairs and a member of the Reform Party in Estonia's ruling coalition.

Tentative Results

Now, two years into the program, the government is seeing some of the first tentative results. Since the adoption of the new benefits, Estonia's fertility rate has improved to 1.5. That's still below the 2.1 children needed to stop the population from shrinking (one child to replace each parent, plus some room to allow for child mortality). And it will take years to see the full impact of the mother's salary. But the apparent early success has inspired the government to look at other ways of getting people to have more children -- everything from subsidies for nannies to linking pension payments to the number of children one has.

Many countries once loath to meddle in matters of fertility are looking at their numbers and concluding that they must take similar steps. "Governments may not achieve their aim, but the competing risk of doing nothing is too great for many countries -- their future young labor supplies are going to be decimated," says Peter McDonald, professor of demography at the Australian National University in Canberra.

The fertility rate in the 30 countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the club of the world's leading industrialized democracies, was only 1.6 in 2005, down from 2.4 in 1970. Mexico, at 2.4, is the highest, with South Korea the lowest at 1.1. Demographers say the decline is due to fundamental changes in society. They include: greater economic opportunities for women; advances in birth control that have made reproduction a matter of choice rather than accident; and the spread of ideas about individual freedom and happiness that are hard to reconcile with caring for a large family.

Some European countries are experimenting with monthly cash compensation to women who leave work to have babies, including Lithuania, Austria and Slovenia. Starting next year, Germany and Bulgaria plan to pay new mothers benefits linked to their previous earnings. Russian President Vladimir Putin, who bemoaned his country's lack of children in his last state-of-the-nation speech in May, has also promised more aid to parents.

Elsewhere, Australia introduced in 2004 a one-time bonus per baby, currently worth about $3,000. The fertility rate is believed to have risen slightly thanks to a combination of the incentive and a booming economy, but is still around 1.8. Australia's finance minister has even exhorted parents to "do your patriotic duty tonight," echoing similar campaigns in the city-state of Singapore, which is still struggling with a fertility rate that hovers barely above 1.2. South Korea has introduced several policies this year, including more financial aid for day care and for fertility treatment.

Payments such as Estonia's are predictably controversial. Some demographers argue that paying people to have a baby simply makes them have one earlier; it doesn't necessarily make them have more. That point is tough to prove for now: Only after the current generation of young women passes menopause will it be clear whether they had more children in their fertile years than women of an earlier age group.

But the experience in places such as France and the Nordic countries suggests that incentives can have an impact. For example, women in Sweden and Norway, which support families with generous benefits, labor laws and child care, have close to two children on average. "Where there are consistent family-oriented policies in place for a long time, people have more children," says Tomas Sobotka of the Vienna Institute of Demography.

The main exception to the rule is the U.S., where the average woman has two children, despite only modest public support for families, largely via tax breaks. Demographers say America's tradition of mass immigration and its large minority populations make it unusual among developed nations. Hispanics, in particular, boost national fertility, with more than three children per woman. The U.S.'s population passed 300 million this week, according to the Census Bureau's estimate. About 55% of America's population growth is due to legal and illegal immigrants and their children, according to the Population Reference Bureau in Washington.

Estonia's experience shows what may lie ahead for many countries. Since it regained its independence from the Soviet Union in 1991, the small Baltic country has emerged as one of the fastest-growing economies in the world and is now a member of the European Union. Along the way, family dynamics in Estonia raced through a transformation in 15 years that took a century in many other countries.

DOJ_NMG_0083975

For many, a spartan but stable lifestyle under communism preserved traditional family customs longer than in the West. Estonians tended to marry young and have two or more children despite hardship and little help from the state.

Different World

The world looked very different to many young, educated Estonians only a few years later. Miina Puusepp and Aive Levandi, both age 36 now, were 21 when Estonia broke from the Soviet Union, offering up new opportunities that pushed having children into the background. "After independence, the world was suddenly open," said Ms. Puusepp, sitting with her friend in a Tallinn cafe.

The two young women worked and studied around Europe during the 1990s, eventually building careers in marketing and tourism. Ms. Levandi has had one boyfriend for the past 12 years. They didn't want to start a family because it would have cramped the couple's lifestyle. "We are living a full life, traveling a lot," Ms. Levandi said.

Meanwhile, many working-class Estonians were putting off thoughts of childbearing, too, but for different reasons: They saw their real incomes and job security eroded.

The Estonian government had dismantled welfare provisions -- even closing many kindergartens -- and pursued some of the most radically free-market policies in Europe. The country became a model for light business regulation. It encouraged investment and entrepreneurship with flat-rate income taxes and no tax on reinvested corporate profits. Economic growth soared, topping 10% in 1997. But the benefits flowed more to newer service industries and entrepreneurs -- and less to the old-line heavy industries that nonskilled workers relied on.

The U.N.'s 2001 warning that Estonia's population would almost halve by mid-century was widely publicized, pushing the plunging birthrate to the center of national politics. When the country held elections in 2003, fertility was the main issue along with tax cuts. Every party promised generous financial aid for families. The Reform Party, previously known for championing small government, proposed the mother's salary, arguing that in a country where most women work, women needed to have their income protected if they were to have children.

Now, Estonia's government is debating other measures, such as subsidizing nannies and private day care. Currently in Tallinn, there are waiting lists of as much as three years for day-care centers. Only the relatively wealthy can afford a nanny to bridge the time between the mother's salary and kindergarten.

Advisers to the population minister are also studying different ways to link people's pension entitlements to the number of children they had. And the government is expanding pre-abortion counseling, in the hope of giving more women confidence that they can cope with a baby, and of reducing the country's high abortion rate.

"Estonia should be a test site for the rest of Europe," says Kristina Täht, who advises the population minister on family policies.

Many Estonians say the mother's salary is contributing to a change in climate. Indeed, for the capital of a country that's critically short of children, pregnant women and mothers pushing strollers are a surprisingly common sight in Tallinn -- a new trend many locals are quick to comment on.

At the Merimetsa mall near Tallinn's Baltic seafront recently, Leila Niidas pushed her five-month-old daughter Annaliisa in a stroller. "In the past I didn't see little children in the streets. Now it's crazy how many children you see here," she said.

Now 41, Ms. Niidas decided last year to have a third child, 15 years after her second child was born. She wouldn't have had Annaliisa, she said, if the government hadn't ponied up, replacing the income from her marketing job at Hansabank, the country's largest bank.

"My husband's salary would not have been enough," Ms. Niidas said. "We spend all that we earn." In addition to paying loans on the family's large four-room apartment and upmarket Audi station wagon, she has a 19-year-old son who wants to go to college in Florida, where he recently spent his last year of high school.

Not surprisingly, the mother's salary has had the biggest impact on the birthrate of affluent, career-oriented women, because the amount is linked to the mother's previous wages. Researchers at Tallinn think tank Praxis say the biggest statistical change is that more high-salaried women are having second and third children. While Ms. Niidas's higher income qualifies her for the maximum $1,560 monthly benefit, less well-off Estonians get less help.

"To me it seems an unfair way to divide the government's money," says Hanna Kaptein, 25, who gets the minimum rate of $200 a month because she had a baby right after graduating from university and wasn't working yet. Her husband, Veljo, a church pastor, earns only $650 a month.

He jokes that if the family's washing machine breaks down once more, they will need another baby to get more benefits to pay for the repair.

DOJ_NMG_0083976

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Friday, October 20, 2006 11:14 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 10/20/06 Civil Division News

Judge Orders Cheney To Say Who Visited Him

Court told it has no say over detainees

Terror Law Stymies Cases for Detainees

Questions persist in Canadian's torture case

Income sues US govt to recover $111,000 payout; Money was paid to technician killed after crash between two US helicopters

SECOND COMPANY CHALLENGES BYRD LAW ON FIFTH AMENDMENT GROUNDS

Pediatrix completes settlement of Medicaid and Tricare investigation

Houston man convicted in Medicare fraud

AP

October 20, 2006

Judge Orders Cheney To Say Who Visited Him

BY MATT APUZZO - Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal judge has ordered the Bush administration to release information about who visited Vice President Cheney's office and personal residence, an order that could spark a late election season debate over lobbyists' White House access.

The Washington Post asked for two years of White House visitor logs in June, but the Secret Service refused to process the request.Government attorneys called it "a fishing expedition into the most sensitive details of the vice presidency."

U.S. District Judge Ricardo Urbina ruled Wednesday that, by the end of next week, the Secret Service must produce the records or at least identity them and justify why they are being withheld.

The newspaper sought logs for anyone visiting Mr. Cheney, his legal counsel, chief spokesman, and other top aides and advisers. The Secret Service had no comment on the ruling yesterday. In court documents, government attorneys said releasing the documents would infringe on Mr. Cheney's ability to seek advice.

"This case is about protecting the effective functioning of the vice presidency under the Constitution," attorneys wrote.A lawsuit over similar records disclosed last month that Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed — key figures in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal — landed more than 100 meetings inside the Bush White House

END

UPI

October 20, 2006

Court told it has no say over detainees

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20 (UPI) -- The Bush administration has told the U.S. district court in Washington that it has no jurisdiction over hundreds of detainee cases at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Acting on a bill, signed this week by U.S. President George Bush, that authorizes military trials of so-called enemy combatants, the Justice Department listed 196 cases that it says are covered by the law, The Washington Post said Friday.

The administration interprets the Military Commissions Act as stating that "no justice or judge" can consider treatment or imprisonment of anyone designated as an enemy combatant.

Lawyers representing detainees claim the law as unconstitutional, which likely will mean a third airing before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Legal scholars and some members of Congress, including Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said they believe the habeas provision of the new law is unconstitutional.

END

AP
Oct 20, 8:48 AM EDT

Terror Law Stymies Cases for Detainees

By MATT APUZZO
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Hours after President Bush signed a tough anti-terrorism law, government lawyers began putting detainees on notice that the U.S. court system no longer was open to them.

Now it is up to a federal appeals court, and ultimately the Supreme Court, to decide the fate of hundreds of people who have spent years arguing the government is holding them illegally.

Such challenges normally go before federal judges. But the new law, which Bush said was necessary to fight terrorism, strips the court of any authority to hear such cases.

Under the law signed Tuesday, the military now has discretion to decide whether to charge enemy combatants before military commissions or indefinitely hold the detainees.

The Justice Department filed notices with several federal judges Wednesday, telling them the law renders their detainee cases moot.

The judges probably will not rule on that issue, however, until an appeals court decides how it is going to handle the law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which was considering two detainee cases, ordered lawyers to make their case for what should happen next.

"What's being blocked and what the government is opposing tooth and nail is the most simple thing of all: a hearing before a district court judge," said Jonathan Hafetz, who handles many detainee cases for the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law. "The government will do anything to prevent Guantanamo detainees from being able to present evidence in court."

Bush evoked the memory of the victims of the 2001 terrorist attacks when he signed the bill. He said the law allows the nation to bring to trial such detainees as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be hijacker from the 2001 strikes.

The law was passed in response to a Supreme Court ruling in June that the Bush administration's original plan for military tribunals violated U.S. and international law.

"The judiciary has provided guidance and the president acted on it with bipartisan support," said Glenn Sulmasy, a law professor at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy and an early supporter of creating new courts to try suspected terrorists.

"It will be difficult for the court to attack what's going on and intervene in what's really warfare. It would be a broad step by the judicial branch," Sulmasy said.

The three-member appeals court ordered a month of briefs on the law, which means a ruling will not come before late November or December, well after the Nov. 7 elections.

END

AP

October 20, 2006

Questions persist in Canadian's torture case

Associated Press

WASHINGTON // Days before the Bush administration put Canadian citizen Maher Arar on a plane for Syria, Canadian law enforcement officials advised their U.S. counterparts that evidence of terrorist links by Arar was not definitive.

Why the Bush administration still shipped Arar to Syria - where he was tortured - and whether he remains on the United States' terror watch list are still unknown. Administration officials refuse to talk about the case.

It has been a month since a Canadian commission cleared Syrian-born Arar of all suspicion of terrorist activity, yet Arar still can't get into the United States, one of his lawyers, Michael Ratner, said yesterday.

John Cavanagh, director of the Institute for Policy Studies, said he had asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to clear Arar's name and let him come into the United States this week to receive the organization's human rights award. Gonzales did not reply, Cavanagh said. A Justice Department spokesman said he was unaware of the letter and could not comment.

At the Homeland Security Department, which keeps track of terrorist watch lists, spokesman Russ Knocke wrote in an e-mail, "We do not disclose names on watch lists."

Fearing a repeat detention, Arar did not travel to Washington on Wednesday for the awards presentation. He delivered a videotaped message of thanks in which he described his ordeal.

Arar is a software engineer who was traveling on a Canadian passport in 2002 when he was detained at New York's Kennedy Airport because of what the Canadian government now says was faulty intelligence. Without informing Canada, the U.S. government turned Arar over to Syria, where he was tortured, tossed in a small cell and finally released after nearly a year of confinement.

"How long is it going to take to get him off the watch list, remove the bar on re-entry to the United States and exonerate him?" asked Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights.

Sending Arar to Syria "appears to be part of a Bush administration policy of using suspicion to send people to countries where they are tortured," said Ratner, whose group has been representing Arar in a lawsuit against the Bush administration.

Immediately after Arar's release from Syria in 2003, the White House summoned Canada's ambassador to a private meeting, according to an exhaustive report on Arar released last month by a Canadian government commission.

At the meeting, White House official Frances Fragos Townsend "indicated that senior administration officials were irritated" that the Canadian prime minister was saying publicly that the decision to remove Arar was made unilaterally by U.S. officials, says the Canadian report.

The Canadian commission concluded there was no evidence that Canadian officials participated in or agreed to the decision to send Arar to Syria.

Yesterday, deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino would not comment, saying that Arar plans to sue the U.S. government.

The Canadian inquiry found the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wrongly described Arar to American law enforcement officials in 2002 as "an Islamic extremist suspected of being linked to the al-Qaida terrorist network."

Raising additional questions about why the U.S. government sent Arar to Syria, the Canadian inquiry also found that in the days before the U.S. government sent him, Canadian law enforcement officials advised their U.S. counterparts at the FBI that evidence of terrorist links by Arar was not definitive.

"A link analysis has yet to be completed on Arar, and while he has had contact with many individuals of interest to this project we are unable to indicate links to al-Qaida," the Canadians stated in one communication. It added that a detailed investigation into Arar had not yet been completed.

Questions raised by the Canadian report about the Arar case have drawn only brief comment at the State Department and the Justice Department.

Regarding Arar being turned over to Syria, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said last month that the determination of U.S. government officials at the time was that Arar posed a threat to the United States and that officials had the reasonable expectation that he would not be "maltreated." At the Justice Department, Gonzales has said simply: "I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the commission report."

Speaking from Canada this week, Arar said a representative of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service was present when he was put on the plane for Syria in 2002. Arar said he told the INS representative that the Syrians would torture him.

"She said something like: 'The INS is not the body or the agency that signed the Geneva Convention against torture.' For me what that really meant is, 'We will send you to torture, and we don't care.'"

"Even when the Canadian commission exonerated, the U.S. was totally unapologetic; the man deserves an apology," said Joanne Mariner, Human Rights Watch's terrorism and counterterrorism director.

END

Straits Times (Singapore)

October 20, 2006

Income sues US govt to recover $111,000 payout; Money was paid to technician killed after crash between two US helicopters

K. C. Vijayan

WHEN two US Navy helicopters collided at Paya Lebar Airbase in 2002, the flying debris killed a Singaporean technician nearby.

The dead man's family received $111,000 in workmen's compensation.

Now, in a rare move, NTUC Income Insurance Cooperative - which ultimately made the payout - is suing the United States government to recover its money.

In a High Court suit filed by lawyers from Khattar Wong, the insurers claim pilot negligence caused the collision.

When the mishap occurred, Mohamad Ruslan Radin, 41, was an engineering services inspector with ST Aerospace Engineering, which was contracted to the Republic of Singapore Air Force to provide services at Paya Lebar Airbase.

On July 16 that year, at about 1.30pm, two CH-53 Sea Stallion heavy duty helicopters apparently came too close to each other on the ground.

One was flying along the tarmac to park when it hit the other, which was stationary but had its engine and rotor blade running.

The contact between their rotor blades triggered the collision, according to court documents.

Mr Ruslan was about 75m away, inspecting an RSAF C-130 transport plane in a hangar, when he was struck by flying debris.

He died in hospital about three hours later.

NTUC claims in its lawsuit that the pilots and/or their agents failed to exercise proper safety precautions and to ensure a safe distance between the two choppers.

It also alleges that there was a failure to circumvent or reduce the exposure to danger faced by ground staff at the site.

It further claims that the tragedy was caused by inadequate supervision or control in the operation of the helicopters and/or the direction of the aircrafts' flight path.

Singapore's Defence Ministry investigated the incident together with a US team, but no reference has been made to the outcome in the suit.

Following the death of Mr Ruslan, who was single and lived with his mother and sister, the Ministry of Manpower (MOM) granted compensation of $111,000 to his dependants.

NTUC Income, as the insurer of ST Aerospace Engineering, then had to reimburse MOM.

NTUC is also claiming the costs of its court action from the US government.

The suit has been filed in Singapore because the incident took place here.

Lawyers told The Straits Times there is a chance that the case will succeed, as it involves a third party who suffered in an accident caused by two parties belonging to the same organisation, and with which the victim had no dealings.

"The principle of res ipsa loquitor - which means ?the thing speaks for itself? - clearly applies," said senior lawyer B. Ganesh.

He explained that it was quite usual for insurers to pay the victims upfront and then sue the negligent parties, much as they do in road accident cases.

This case is rare, as it involves a government.

But the Singapore court still has jurisdiction to try the suit and pronounce judgment, he said.

If the suit succeeds, NTUC will then have to register the Singapore judgment in a US court to recover its money.

A pre-trial conference, scheduled two days ago, was deferred to allow NTUC more time to serve and receive acknowledgement of the writ from the US government through official channels.

END

Inside US Trade

October 20, 2006

SECOND COMPANY CHALLENGES BYRD LAW ON FIFTH AMENDMENT GROUNDS

A second U.S. steel ball bearing company has filed a suit against U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) and the International Trade Commission (ITC) challenging the constitutionality of the Byrd amendment, which allows duties collected in trade cases to be distributed to the petitioners of those companies.

Koyo Corporation of U.S.A filed the suit on Sept. 25 in the U.S. Court of International Trade (CIT). It argues the Byrd law, formally known as the Continued Dumping and Subsidy Offset Act, is unconstitutional because it excludes Koyo from the list of companies eligible for receiving duties collected under the Byrd law.

Koyo is excluded from collecting money because it did not support the original antidumping petition, even though the company was an interested party to that petition.

Koyo argues that the Byrd law requirement that a company support the petition in order to receive monies violates the Equal Protection guarantees of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution because it favors certain U.S. companies over others. It also said this violates the First Amendment freedom of speech protections because it provides a monetary incentive that compels companies to support the petition even though they may not want to, a source following the case said.

The CIT issued a ruling last month against the Byrd amendment in a suit brought by SKF USA, another U.S. ball bearing company excluded from receiving Byrd distributions. In that decision, the CIT ruled in favor of SKF's arguments on the Fifth Amendment, but First Amendment arguments were not raised (Inside U.S. Trade, Sept. 22, p. 1).

An answer from the U.S. government to this complaint is due in mid-December.

END

Life Science Weekly

October 24, 2006

Pediatrix completes settlement of Medicaid and Tricare investigation

Pediatrix Medical Group, Inc., (PDX) has finalized its previously announced agreement in principle with the U.S. Department of Justice to settle the government's national Medicaid and Tricare investigation.

In finalizing the settlement, Pediatrix entered into an agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice and has paid the federal government $25.1 million related to neonatal services provided from January 1996 through December 1999.

In addition, Pediatrix will enter into separate state settlement agreements for each state Medicaid program involved in the settlement. Information for the period 2000 to 2003 was reviewed as part of the investigation and Pediatrix is not making any payments for this period. Pediatrix cooperated fully in all aspects of the government's investigation and settlement of this matter.

Pediatrix announced the financial terms of the settlement agreement in February 2006 and established reserves related to the investigation during periods through December 31, 2005. This settlement amount will not impact operating results for 2006.

As part of the settlement, Pediatrix has entered into a five-year corporate integrity agreement with the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. The corporate integrity agreement acknowledges the existence of Pediatrix's comprehensive compliance program and provides other compliance-related activities during the term of the agreement.

Pediatrix is a provider of newborn, maternal-fetal and pediatric physician subspecialty services.

END

AP

October 20, 2006

Houston man convicted in Medicare fraud

LAFAYETTE, La._A Houston man accused of bilking Medicare out of more than 500-thousand dollars through fraudulent billings at an Opelousas physical rehabilitation clinic has been convicted on federal charges of health care fraud .

Michael Prince, who helped organize Alpha Healthcare Services, faces up to 10 years in prison.

Prosecutors also plan to seek a monetary judgment against Prince in an effort to recover money lost to the scheme.

U-S Attorney Donald Washington says Alpha Healthcare billed Medicare more than 700-thousand dollars from October 2000 to April 2001 -- at least 500-thousand dollars of which was fraudulent.

Prince, who attended medical school but never passed exams required to become a licensed physician, was one of three people who helped start the company.

A key witness in the case, Pamela Sampson, of Stafford, Texas, had served as the onsite director of the clinic.

She pleaded guilty in 2003 to health care fraud charges.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 23, 2006 8:24 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, October 21, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061021.pdf; dojclips061021.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

U.S.: Courts No Longer Open To Detainees (AP) 3
Opinions Vary On Constitutionality Of Tribunal Compromise Law (MCT) 4
Lawyer Convicted In Terror Case Lied On The Stand, A Juror Says (NYT) 6
Enemy Of The State: Kurdish Man Imprisoned By Taliban And U.S. (AP) 8
The FBI's Un-intelligence (TOLB) 9

Homeland Response:

Man, 20, Arrested In Stadium Threat Hoax (NYT) 10
Wisconsin Man Charged In Terror Hoax (WT) 11
FBI Removes Dead Man From Terror List (AP-Y) 12
Ground Zero Forensic Team Is Posted To Seek Remains (NYT) 12
Fire On The Water (NYT) 13
Louisiana Pays Part Of FEMA Bill And Sues On Rest (NYT/AP) 13
Storming Capitol Hill To Help Louisiana (LAT) 13

War News:

Bush, Rumsfeld Defend Strategy (WP) 16
Militias Battle For Iraqi City As Shiite Rivalry Escalates (NYT) 17
Bush Open To Shift In Iraq War 'Tactics' (LAT) 19
Pressure Builds For Policy Shift, But Bush Shows No Signs Of Budging (MCT) 21
Bush: I Won't Change Strategy In Iraq (AP) 23
Bush Sees Support Ebb Away For Military Strategy In Iraq (FT) 24
Amara Violence Increases Strains On Unified Iraq Idea (Update1) (BLOOM) 24
An Old Bush Hand Takes On A New Role On The Iraq War (NYT) 26
Bush Pins Label Of 'Defeat' Party On Democrats (WT) 27
Hutchison: WMD Info Swayed Vote On Iraq (AP) 28
Allen Faces Questions On Iraq War Stance (AP) 29
Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Take Over Security (AP) 30
Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Stand Up 'Sooner' (WT/UPI) 31
Exit Vibrations (WT) 31
Sadr Militia Briefly Seizes Southern City (WP) 32
Siege Of Amarah Reflects Trouble In Baghdad (LAT) 33
Shiite Militias Attack Iraqi Government Forces In Amara (MCT) 35
Amara Unrest Strains Plans For Unified Iraq (FT) 36
Shiite Militia Briefly Seizes Iraqi City (AP-Y) 36
Many Iraqis Look To Gunmen As Protectors (NYT) 38
Iraq's Religious Figures Issue Edicts (AP) 40
Islamic Clerics Decree A Halt To Sectarian Bloodshed (WT) 42
U.N.: 914,000 Have Fled Homes In Iraq (AP-Y) 43
914,000 Iraqis Displaced By War, U.N. Says (LAT/AP) 43
U.N. Says Iraq Seals Data On The Civilian Toll (NYT) 44
Republicans Call CNN Tape 'Enemy Propaganda' (LAT) 45
Plea Deal Reported In Iraqi Murder Case (AP) 45
Marine To Plead Guilty In Killing Of Iraqi Man (LAT) 46
Officer Awaits Fate In Abu Ghraib Case (AP) 46
Gunmen Execute 8 Afghan Laborers (LAT/AP) 47
Total Says Executive Questioned Over Iraq Oil Deals Is Innocent (NYT) 48
Total Chief Charged In Oil-for-food Scandal (FT) 48
The Real 'New Iraq' (WP) 49
Bush Exploited Americans' Urge For Safety (AJC) 50

DOJ:

U.S. Prosecutors Honored (BSUN) 51

Corporate Scandals:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Rachets Up Stock Options Scandal (AP) 52
Ruling On Convictions Could Help Skilling (BLOOM) 53
SKILLING MAY GET 20 YEARS IN PRISON (NYPOST) 53

Feinstein Asks Justice To Appeal Ruling Vacating Lay Conviction (FRESBEE) 54
Senator Wants Justice Department To Appeal Lay Decision (HC) 54
Grasso Braces For Long Battle Over Pay Ruling (WSJ) 55

Criminal Law:

Foley Case A Test For Ethics Panel (WP) 56
Priest Named By Foley Is Barred From All Religious Duties (NYT) 58
Just A Quiet Retiree Leading Mass In Malta (NYT) 58
After 3 Attempts To Convict Gotti, Prosecutors Decide Against Making It 4 (NYT) 59
Federal Prosecutors Decline To Pursue Fourth Racketeering Case Against Junior Gotti (AP) 60
We Give Up On Jr., Say Feds (NYDN) 60
Junior Gotti Won't Face Retrial (NSDY) 61
GIDDY GOTTI JR. DEFEATS THE FEDS (NYPOST) 62
Mr. Gotti, You're Free To Go (STNIA) 63
`Junior' Gotti Kidnap Case Is Dismissed By U.S. (Update2) (BLOOM) 64
Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME) 64
Rep. Harman Reportedly Under Investigation (WT) 66
Abramoff To Do Time In Cumberland, Md (NBC) 66
TAX BREAK: Legislator Lobbied Him On Behalf Of Marlow, Borough Mayor Says. (ADN) 67
FBI Said To Be Investigating Ex-official (APP) 70
Video: FBI Examines Records At West Warwick Town Hall (WJAR-TV) 71
FBI Grabs Montalbano Records In W.W. (PAWTIMES) 72
The Secret Life Of An Informant (WSJ) 72
Columnist Settles Education Dept. Case (AP) 76
Glenview Man Linked To Cop Killing In Poland (CHIT) 77
FBI Arrests Businessman Wanted In Poland Over 1998 Police Official Slaying (AP) 78
YouTube Shared User Data With Studio Lawyers (MRKTWTCH) 79
Former Youth Pastor Faces Child Porn Charges (SLPD) 81
Federal $$ To Help Purchase Bulletproof Vests For NYPD (STNIA) 81
Off-label Drug Marketing: Missing The Mark (MERCN) 82

Civil Law:

Naval Shipyard Kickback Suit Settled For $4.2M (DPHR) 84
Tentative Settlement Reached In Va. Jet-noise Case (NAVYT) 85
Feds Getting Tough On Utah Bankruptcy Fraud (SLT) 86
Response Rates To FOIA Requests Improve (FEDT) 86

Civil Rights:

Calif. Candidate's Office, Home Raided (AP) 87
Nguyen's Campaign Office Raided (OCR) 88
State Police Raid Home Of California Congressional Candidate (MCT) 89
Raids Widen 'Immigrant' Letter Probe (LAT) 91
California: Offices Searched Over Letters (NYT) 92
Discrimination Claims Hurt Business Even If False (TSSC) 92
Nevada: Street Solicitation (NYT) 94
FBI: No Hate Crimes Recorded In Alabama In 2005 (MR) 94
U.S. Asked To Watch Election In Chesterfield (RTD) 95
Citing Minority Voting Concerns, ACLU Seeks U.S. Poll Observers (AP) 96
Arizona May Use Voter-ID Law, High Court Says (WP) 96
Supreme Court Allows Arizona To Use New Voter-ID Procedure (NYT) 97
Court: Ariz. Can Seek Photo ID For Vote (AP-Y) 97
High Court Allows Arizona To Enact New Voter ID Law (LAT) 98

Antitrust:

Groups Balk Over Buyout (AP) 99
AT&T To Fight Calls To Jettison Airwaves (BLOOM) 100
Judge: Petco Vote Can Go Ahead (SDUT) 100
Regions, AmSouth Merger Wins Fed Approval (HT) 101
Ripplewood Ponders Bid For Delphi (WSJ) 102
Tops Sale Of Stores To Rival Defended (CLPD) 102
States Battle Weyerhaeuser Argument (OREG) 103
Feds Accuse Avaya In Antitrust Lawsuit (AP) 105
Update: Vista Security Discussions Off To Bad Start (IDG) 105
Microsoft Partners Fume Over Vista Security Stance (AP) 106
Gartner: Vista Antitrust Tweaks To Take Years (CNET) 107

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Sunny Side Up (NYT) 108
Future Forecast: Extreme Weather (WP/AP) 110
The Population Boon (WSJ) 111
Court Limits U.S. Authority At Casinos (AP-Y) 111

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Plead Guilty To Gun Trafficking Charges (KNOXNS) 112

Congress-Administration:

Limits On Aide In Leak Case Are Protested By Democrat (NYT) 113
Suspecting Leak, Chairman Suspends Panel Staffer (WP) 114
Democratic Aide's Access To Intelligence Is Cut Off (LAT) 115

DOJ_NMG_0083988

Democrats Back Staffer Suspended Over Iraq Leak (WT/AP) 116
Bush Urges GOP On Medicare Drug Benefit (AP-Y) 117
Michael Gerson Mr. Compassionate Conservatism (WSJ) .. 118
The Woman Who Would Be Speaker (WP) 121
Madam Speaker? Pelosi Likes The Sound (LAT) 123
Rank Would Guide Pelosi As She Chose Chairmen (WP) ... 125
At Play In The Realm Of Political Animals (NYT) 127
U.S. Treasury's Paulson Sells New York Condo For $8 Million (BLOOM) 129
Flexing Our Muscles In Space (NYT) 130
Farm Insurance Racket (WP) 131

Other News:

Dow Closes Out Week Riding Crest Of 12,000 (WP/AP) 132
Blue Chips Pause For Oxygen At 12000 Level (WSJ) 133
U.S. Stocks Rise As Google, 3M Beat Profit Estimates, Oil Falls (BLOOM) 133
Oil Tumbles Below $57 On Skepticism OPEC Will Make Output Cuts (BLOOM) 135
Oil Prices Drop Despite OPEC Call To Cut Output (WP) 136
Texas Justice Who Spoke For Bush Pick Is Cleared (NYT) 137
No Reprimand In Judge's Support Of Miers (AP-Y) 138
Bush Drops In At Italian-American Dinner (AP-Y) 139
Ads Accuse Dems Of Not Protecting Kids (AP-Y) 139
Helping Democrats Bridge The 'God Gap' (WP) 140
Politics Why The Center Matters In This Election (WSJ) 142
McCain Tries To Trump Republican Woes (WSJ) 143
In Debate, Clinton Deflects Questions About 2008 (NYT) 144
Clinton, Spencer Hold Debate In New York (AP-Y) 146
Focusing On Opinions, Slipping On Some Facts (NYT) 147
Elizabeth Edwards Apologizes To Clinton (AP-Y) 148
Lieberman Gets A Boost From A Republican And A Lift From A Recent Survey (NYT) 148
Senate Candidate Confronts Opponent (AP-Y) 149
Playboy And Pastors Enlisted For Attack Adverts (FT) 150
Allen, Webb Are Not Spotlighting Their Positions On Immigration (WP) 151
Wilder Advises Webb To Make Stance Clear (WT) 152
Open Seats Lift Democratic Hopes In The House (NYT) 153
In A G.O.P. Stronghold, 3 Districts In Indiana Are Now Battlegrounds (NYT) 155
Working Families Party's Aim: Putting Democrats In Congress (NYT) 157
The Political Season Has Gone Sordid (LAT) 158
Ehrlich, O'Malley Focus On Turnout As Election Nears (WP) 159
Anti-O'Malley Ad Shows Baltimore In A Grim Light (WP) 161
Computer Voting Disks Likely Made For Testers (WP) 162
Angelides Urges Gov. To Release Tapes (LAT) 163
Schwarzenegger Story Gets Another Rewrite (LAT) 164
Boo!? An Inevitable October Surprise (WP) 168
Obama's Project Runway (NYT) 169
The Decline Of Political Competition (LAT) 170
U.S. And China Call For North Korea To Rejoin Talks (NYT) 171
China Gave 'Strong Message' To North Koreans, Rice Says (WP) 172
China Urges North Korea To Return To Negotiations (MCT) 174
China Takes Tough Stance On North Korea (AP-Y) 175
U.S. Finds Allies Are Reluctant To Enforce North Korea Sanctions (WSJ) 176
Asia Goal Proving Elusive For Rice (LAT) 177
China Wrests N. Korean Pledge (WT) 178
N. Korea Threat Lies In Nuclear Sales (LAT) 179
Amid Nuclear Crisis, Sun May Be Setting On `sunshine Policy' (MCT) 181
U.N. Reports On Genetic Concentration Camps (WT) 182
U.S.: China Must Address Trade Disputes (AP-Y) 183
China's Milestone, Our Millstone (NYT) 184
Iran's Leader Warns West On Support For Israel (NYT) 184
Israel Accuses Iran Of Blocking Release (AP) 185
Israeli War Plan Had No Exit Strategy (WP) 186
Muslims Flood Streets Of Jerusalem For Ramadan (NYT) . 189
Residents Shut Out Of West Bank (LAT) 190
U.S. Courts Hamas Rival (WT) 192
A Liberal Brother At Odds With The Muslim Brotherhood (NYT) 192
Scrambling To Save Trade Perks (LAT) 194
EU Urges Putin To Honour Oil Contracts (FT) 196
Putin Ducks EU Demands On Energy Charter (AP) 197
Aftermath Of A Murder (WP) 198
'Enemy' Schoolchildren In Moscow (WP) 198

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S.: Courts No Longer Open To Detainees (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0083989

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 21, 2006

Hundreds of detainees received notice from the Justice Department this week that because of a new law signed by President Bush, the U.S. court system is no longer open to them. Now it will be up to a federal appeals court, and ultimately the Supreme Court, to decide the fate of prisoners who have spent years arguing the government is illegally holding them at overseas military bases.

A prisoner's right to challenge his detention is one of the basic tenets of the Constitution — a right known as habeas corpus. Under the law signed Tuesday, however, the courts no longer have authority over such petitions in cases involving "enemy combatants."

The law gives the military the authority to decide whether to charge prisoners before special commissions or, if necessary, hold them indefinitely.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Friday that the new law gives more access to appeals "than has ever been available to any enemy combatant in the past."

But the habeas corpus exemption has drawn criticism from lawyers, civil rights groups and even members of Bush's own party, such as Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"Habeas protects against the executive taking a person and locking them up without a chance to prove their innocence," said Jonathan Hafetz, who handles many detainee cases for the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law. "Habeas is what stands between us and a system of secret detentions, a police state."

The Justice Department filed notices with several federal judges Wednesday, telling them the law renders detainee cases in their courts moot.

The judges probably will not rule on that issue, however, until an appeals court decides how to handle the law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which was considering two detainee cases, ordered lawyers to make their case for what should happen next.

Bush cited the victims of the 2001 terrorist attacks when he signed the bill. He said the law allows the nation to bring to trial such detainees as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be hijacker.

The law was passed in response to a Supreme Court ruling in June that the Bush administration's original plan for military tribunals violated U.S. and international law.

"The judiciary has provided guidance, and the president acted on it with bipartisan support," said Glenn Sulmasy, a law professor at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy and an early supporter of creating new courts to try terror suspects.

"It will be difficult for the court to attack what's going on and intervene in what's really warfare. It would be a broad step by the judicial branch," Sulmasy said.

The three-member appeals court ordered a month of briefs on the law, which means a ruling will not come before late November or December, well after the Nov. 7 elections.

___

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan contributed to this report.

Opinions Vary On Constitutionality Of Tribunal Compromise Law (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - For weeks, as he and other senators held up President Bush's proposal for trying terrorism suspects, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said the Supreme Court would reject Bush's measure.

Now, after joining the president at the White House for the bill-signing ceremony, Graham is predicting that the high court will accept the compromise law produced by weeks of high-stakes negotiations.

Graham, a military lawyer who serves in the Air Force Reserve, already has counted heads on the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0083990

"I think this could be 7-2" to uphold the new law, Graham said Thursday in an interview. "I think the court is going to find that the military commissions Congress has authorized are compliant with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, and that they afford due process of a civilized nation."

"Everything we've done is consistent with the law of armed conflict, and the detainees have more rights than any other enemy prisoners have had in any other war," Graham said.

Legal scholars' opinions vary.

The tribunals law "unconstitutionally suspends the writ of habeas corpus, and it denies any noncitizen held anywhere in the world his fundamental right to contest the lawfulness of his detention by the United States," said Jonathan Hafetz, who represents a detainee as associate counsel at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice.

"It defines `enemy combatant' in overly broad terms that exceed what the Constitution allows," Hafetz said.

Habeas corpus affords those accused of crimes access to court to respond to the charges against them. The Founding Fathers wrote it into the Constitution, preceding the Bill of Rights, which was added later as its first 10 amendments.

Randy Barnett, a constitutional law professor at Georgetown University, expressed confidence that the new law will pass Supreme Court muster, however.

"Most of the Supreme Court's focus (in post-Sept. 11 detainee cases) has been about the failure of the Bush administration to get congressional authorization for what it was doing," Barnett said. "Now the administration has such authorization. The odds of the Supreme Court saying that what Congress did was unconstitutional are extremely remote."

No matter where they stand on habeas or the other substantive issues that the controversial law raises, legal experts of all stripes agree that it will end up before the Supreme Court.

According to legal scholars, much of the coming struggle over the tribunals law will focus on its stripping habeas rights from about 400 terrorism suspects, most of them detained at the U.S. military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The high court probably also will examine the law's definition of "enemy combatant" and explore whether it meets the U.S. government's obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

In large measure, as the government continues to adapt laws and procedures to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the 2006 Military Commissions Act is Congress' answer to two key high-court rulings since the tragedy:

- In a June 2004 ruling on Rasul v. Bush, the justices said U.S. courts - not the military commissions - have the ultimate say in determining whether noncitizens captured overseas and held at Guantanamo Bay have been detained legally.

- In its June 2006 decision in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case, the court ruled that Bush had exceeded his presidential authority by creating, without congressional action, a system of military commissions to try the detainees.

On Sept. 8, almost three months after the Hamdan ruling, Bush sent Congress a proposal for interrogating the detainees and trying them before military tribunals. Almost immediately, Graham and two fellow Republican senators - John McCain of Arizona and John Warner of Virginia - criticized several of its main provisions, and others soon joined them.

Over the next month, White House lawyers led by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley engaged in fevered talks with the three senators. When they reached a compromise, all said they'd found common ground on the legal issues at stake.

The administration gave more ground on how the military commissions will work and how the trials will run, while the three senators yielded more on the controversial interrogation techniques, said John Radsan, who served as the CIA's assistant general counsel from 2002 to 2004 and now runs the National Security Forum at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, Minn.

The law spells out nine "grave breaches" of Geneva Convention protections and prohibits "cruel, inhumane or degrading" treatment of detainees, Radsan said. It retains "gray areas" in weighing which interrogation procedures are legal.

"I don't know what Graham, McCain and Warner agreed to in that room with Hadley, and I don't think the American people know," Radsan said. "A lot of what was decided stayed in that room between Hadley and those three senators. We want to have some check on the CIA. This is being done in our name."

Graham said the law provided more than enough guidance for CIA interrogations. And he said it protected detainees' rights by allowing them to appeal the U.S. military's classification of them as "enemy combatants" to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0083991

Graham, though, also said the law properly dismissed hundreds of lawsuits already brought by detainees with a broad range of grievances over their confinement.

"Every detainee will have their day in court, and the court can determine whether the government properly defined them as an enemy combatant," Graham said. "But they can no longer sue the government for better exercise, mail delivery, medical malpractice."

Despite his confidence that the Supreme Court will uphold the law, Graham said he was far from cocky.

"If I'm wrong, I will take the floor of the Senate and humbly say I was wrong," he said.

Legal scholars who've combed through the 38-page Military Commissions Act of 2006 say the forthcoming court struggle over it probably will focus on three sections:

-Near its start, it defines "unlawful enemy combatant" as "a person who has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States ... including a person who is part of the Taliban, al-Qaida or associated forces." Critics say this definition is too broad and permits the indefinite detention of those who express their intense dislike of the United States but aren't terrorists.

-While the law affirms U.S. adherence to the Geneva Conventions elsewhere, a clause near the ends troubles critics. "No person may invoke the Geneva Conventions or any protocols thereto ... as a source of rights in any court of the United States or its states or territories," it says. Some scholars say the clause appears to prevent the prosecution of interrogators or other American officials for breaking U.S. laws that codify international war-crimes standards and make them part of the American justice system.

-In perhaps the most contentious issue, the measure amends federal civil law by stripping noncitizens of their habeas-corpus rights to appeal their detentions to U.S. courts outside the military. The clause reads: "No court, justice or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant or is awaiting such determination."

Lawyer Convicted In Terror Case Lied On The Stand, A Juror Says (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

He was known as Juror 8, for the jury box chair where he listened silently for more than six months as the convoluted evidence unfolded in the trial of Lynne F. Stewart, the radical defense lawyer accused of aiding Islamic terrorism.

The jurors argued behind closed doors in Federal District Court in Manhattan for another month before they finally agreed to convict Ms. Stewart on all five charges she faced for smuggling messages out of prison from her terrorist client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman.

“We found what jurors called the smoking gun,” Juror 8 said in an interview. “Lynne Stewart knew full well that violence was going to be committed,” he said, after she publicized the sheik’s words. He said the jurors also concluded that she had lied in her testimony.

So on Monday, 20 months after the verdict, Juror 8 kept his eye on the television, waiting for news of her sentence. When he heard that Judge John G. Koeltl had reduced the 30 years sought by the government to 28 months in prison, Juror 8 said he was first disbelieving, then “vastly disappointed.”

He said the light sentence obscured facts the jurors had painstakingly linked together that tied Ms. Stewart to terrorism. He believes only the jurors understood their meaning in the complex case.

He does not speak for all the jurors. Because of the serious terrorism charges, they served anonymously, and the names of the eight women and four men were known to only one court administrator. One other, a woman known as Juror 9, made her views known this week. “I am glad that the sentence was as short as it was, but sorry that she was sentenced to any time at all,” Juror 9 said in a statement issued by her lawyer, Steven Masef.

“The right thing for the judge to have done,” she said, “was to have overturned the jury verdict and thrown the whole case out.”

DOJ_NMG_0083992

Although she voted to convict, Juror 9 wrote a letter to Judge Koeltl in March 2005 saying she had done it "as a result of the fear and intimidation I was made to feel for my life" in the jury room. The judge ruled that her objections were not sufficient to overturn the verdict. Juror 8 said that Juror 9 was one of two jurors who held out for acquittal long into the deliberations.

Juror 8 still does not want his name published, saying he continues to have moments of fear because of his vote to convict Ms. Stewart. He is a research scientist in his early 60's who holds an advanced academic degree from a prominent East Coast university and lives in Manhattan.

He came forward for an interview armed with trial exhibit numbers and typewritten notes, giving the most detailed look to date inside the jury's grueling, often angry deliberations. He said he wanted to counter his dismay about the sentence by leaving a public record about the jury's findings.

The jurors' mining of the evidence, he said, convinced them that Ms. Stewart was aware that one militant from Abdel Rahman's organization in Egypt, the Islamic Group, planned to foment terror attacks using a message from the sheik that Ms. Stewart released. The sheik, a blind Islamic cleric from Egypt, is serving a life sentence for his role in a 1993 plot to bomb New York City landmarks.

Juror 8 said the militant, Rifai Taha, a fugitive convicted terrorist, emerged as a major and very chilling figure in the trial. Prosecutors showed a videotape of Mr. Taha sitting with Osama bin Laden somewhere in Afghanistan before the Sept. 11 attacks, calling for violence against Americans.

One message that Ms. Stewart carried into prison on a visit to the sheik in May 2000, violating special restrictions, was from Mr. Taha. He sought guidance about a cease-fire the sheik's followers were observing in Egypt, which Mr. Taha was chafing to cancel.

Ms. Stewart testified that she was not aware of Mr. Taha's violent history or his efforts to spur a new campaign of attacks against Egypt's government.

But according to Juror 8, the jury found clear evidence among the stacks of prosecution documents and wiretap transcripts that she did know of Mr. Taha's extremist violence as early as 1998.

"There's the belief that she didn't know who Taha was, that she didn't think anything bad would happen," Juror 8 said. "I want to state very emphatically: that is a complete lie."

Even more persuasive to the jury, Juror 8 contended, was the evidence about the chain of events after Ms. Stewart called a reporter in Egypt with the sheik's response to Mr. Taha, in which he said he no longer supported the cease-fire.

The sheik's new position provoked a furor in Egypt. According to evidence the jurors examined, Juror 8 said, several of his supporters warned in public comments and letters sent to Ms. Stewart that his words could prompt violence. But a week later Ms. Stewart issued a second press release in which the sheik once again criticized the cease-fire.

Juror 8 said the jurors found that Mr. Taha had used the sheik's words to recruit at least one Egyptian militant to start plotting an attack.

"She smuggled Taha's message in," Juror 8 said. "She smuggled Rahman's reply out. She was told that violence would occur, and she had a second press conference to reinforce the first. No person who was opposed to violence would conduct themselves in that manner."

Ultimately, the cease-fire was not canceled.

Juror 8 said he was offended after the Feb. 10, 2005, verdict when Ms. Stewart said that the jurors had been influenced by post-Sept. 11 fears of terrorism. "It wasn't politics, it was her actions," he said. "The jury did not speculate. We dealt with the evidence."

It is not uncommon for jurors, who have no say in sentencing, to disagree with a judge's decision. In court on Monday, Judge Koeltl cited laws requiring him to consider other factors besides the guilty verdict, such as Ms. Stewart's past work and the possibility that she would repeat her crime.

While the judge found that Ms. Stewart, who is 67, had engaged in "extraordinarily severe" criminal conduct that "plainly went beyond any reasonable bounds of zealous advocacy," he also considered her long career defending unpopular clients, her recent bout with cancer and her disbarment. He allowed her to remain free on bail while she pursues her appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0083993

Juror 8 said he gained respect for Judge Koeltl during the trial. “He’s a very logical man,” he said. “I’m sure he was led logically to that sentence.” The judge was appointed to the bench in 1994 by President Clinton.

The juror insisted that the looming figure of Mr. bin Laden had no impact on the jurors, who were repeatedly instructed he had no role in the case.

“The judge told me he had no part, so he had no part,” Juror 8 said. “And 11 other people agreed. We did not go off reservation.”

He said he was distressed by the sight of Ms. Stewart celebrating on Monday with cheering supporters outside the courthouse. “The end of this process,” he said, “is a person who committed very serious crimes out on the street smiling with bouquets of roses.”

Enemy Of The State: Kurdish Man Imprisoned By Taliban And U.S. (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen, Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON – Abdul Rahim insists he's an apolitical student who fled a strict father. But he's fallen into a black hole in the war on terror in which first the Taliban and then the United States imprisoned him as an enemy of the state.

Arrested by the Taliban in Afghanistan in January 2000, Rahim says al-Qaeda leaders burned him with cigarettes, smashed his right hand, deprived him of sleep, nearly drowned him and hanged him from the ceiling until he “confessed” to spying for the United States.

U.S. forces took the young Kurd from Syria into custody in January 2002 after the Taliban fled his prison. Accusing him of being an al-Qaeda terrorist, U.S. interrogators deprived him of sleep, threatened him with police dogs and kept him in stress positions for hours, he says. He's been held ever since as an enemy combatant.

Rahim's story is one of several emerging from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay as defense lawyers make bids to free their clients while the Bush administration tries to use a new law to lock them out of federal courts.

After the Supreme Court overturned President Bush's plans for commissions to try detainees, Bush obtained a new law from Congress barring federal courts from hearing appeals for release by any alien “properly detained as an enemy combatant.” The Justice Department told district and appellate judges this week they no longer have jurisdiction to hear dozens of such pending cases.

A court fight over that is certain.

Calling the move to strip jurisdiction “a direct attack on our constitutional structure,” Federal Public Defender Steven T. Wax in Portland, Ore., said, “We will litigate that as hard as we can in whatever forum we can find, because they are wrong.”

Other detainees whose lawyers filed new evidence in U.S. District Court motions this month include:

Adel Hassan Hamad, a Sudanese charity worker arrested at 1:30 a.m. July 18, 2002, in his Peshawar, Pakistan, apartment. Co-workers swear he was a hospital administrator with no connection to terrorists. A dissenting U.S. Army major on the panel that reviewed the unclassified and secret evidence against him called it “unconscionable” to detain him because some employees of the same charity may have supported terrorist ideals.

Nazar “Chaman” Gul, a 29-year-old Afghani who thought he was working as an armed fuel depot guard for the Karzi government installed by U.S. forces. The man who hired him swears that was the case, but he is accused of being a member of a terrorist group. The lawyers say he has been mistaken for a commander of that terror group, named Chaman Gul, also held at Guantanamo.

All three are represented by Wax and his assistants. Wax's staff traveled to Afghanistan, Pakistan and the United Arab Emirates to gather dozens of sworn statements from co-workers, relatives, fellow inmates and people who knew these detainees but haven't spoken to them in years. These newly filed accounts substantiate details of the detainees' denials that they were terrorists.

“These clients are not enemy combatants,” Wax said in an interview. The new law “does not apply to people who are not enemy combatants,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083994

Wax said it would be unconstitutional to apply the jurisdiction-stripping bill retroactively to existing cases. And he said the Supreme Court has ruled before that it has the final say over its jurisdiction in these so-called habeas corpus petitions for release from custody. Following President Lincoln's suspension of habeas corpus for prisoners of war, the high court in 1866 set a man free after finding he was not a prisoner of war, Wax noted.

The government feels differently about Wax's clients.

"Multiple reviews have been conducted since each detained enemy fighter was captured, including for these three individuals," said a Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon. "There is a significant amount of evidence, both unclassified and classified, which supports continued detention of these detainees and others at Guantanamo."

Now 28, Rahim, buttressed by testimony from friends and relatives, says he wound up in Afghanistan in a bid to escape his father, a strict teacher of Islamic education who objected to his borrowing money outside the family for a college trip. With his father holding his passport, he tried futilely to get from his home in the United Arab Emirates to Europe or Canada.

Finally a friendly diplomat got him deported to Afghanistan where he and others say he hoped to be declared a refugee and moved to Europe by international aid agencies. He says the Taliban conscripted him and sent him against his will to the Al Farouq terrorist training camp. When he tried to leave 18 days later, they imprisoned him, he says.

In spring 2000, Abu Dhabi television broadcast a video of a tearful, fidgeting Rahim saying a U.S. agent recruited him to find Osama bin Laden. "I deserve to die ... but if the Taliban let me live, I want to spend the next 22 years fighting for jihad," he said.

On Jan. 17, 2002, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft said U.S. forces found five videotapes in the ruined Afghan home of bin Laden aide Mohammed Atef – one of the men Rahim says directed his torture. Ashcroft said the tapes show young men delivering "martyrdom messages from suicide terrorists" and identified one as "Abd Rahim."

Rahim's attorney Stephen Sady said any Taliban tapes of Rahim "were the product of torture" and no different from false confessions Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., made to stay alive in a North Vietnamese prison.

"After two years the Americans came and saved me from the prison," Rahim told U.S. officers. "I told them about the videotape the Taliban made of me ... it created confusion to the point that the Americans believed I was working with al-Qaeda."

He added: "Nothing changed in my life. I was taken from prison to prison."

The FBI's Un-intelligence (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), October 21, 2006

A FEW weeks ago, Jeff Stein, national security editor for Congressional Quarterly magazine, interviewed Willie Hulon, who recently was named chief of the FBI's national security branch.

Toward the end of the interview, Mr. Stein (according to an op-ed article he wrote for the New York Times last Tuesday) asked Mr. Hulon if it was important for a man in his position to know the difference between Sunnis and Shiites.

"Yes, sure," Mr. Hulon responded. "It's important to know who your targets are."

But then Mr. Stein asked Mr. Hulon to explain the difference. He couldn't. And he misidentified Iran and Hezbollah as Sunni.

Mr. Hulon is continuing a long tradition of abysmal and inexcusable ignorance in high places at FBI.

"My curiosity about our policy makers' grasp of Islam's two major branches was piqued in 2005, when Jon Stewart and other TV comedians made hash out of depositions, taken in a whistle-blower case, in which top FBI officials drew blanks when asked basic questions about Islam," Mr. Stein wrote. "One of the bemused officials was Gary Bald, then the bureau's counterterrorism chief. Such expertise, Mr. Bald maintained, wasn't as important as being a good manager."

Intelligence analyses of North Korea's missile and nuclear programs were badly flawed, wrote Bill Gertz in the Washington Times Oct. 12.

"The officials said there were as many as 10 failures related to intelligence reporting on North Korean missile tests and the suspected nuclear test that harmed administration efforts to deal with the issue," Mr. Gertz wrote.

The 9/11 plot succeeded due to a massive intelligence failure on the part of the FBI and the CIA. The FBI knew that Ramzi Yousef, the architect of the 1993 attack on the World Trade Center, planned to use airplanes in (among other things) a suicide attack on CIA headquarters (Operation Bojinka), and that Islamists were taking flying lessons in Arizona, Oklahoma, and Minnesota. But senior FBI leaders failed to connect the dots and turned a deaf ear to subordinates who did.

DOJ_NMG_0083995

The 1993 World Trade Center attack could have been averted had senior FBI officials in New York paid attention to Emad Salem, an informant recruited by Special Agent Nancy Floyd, who warned of the attack. Afterwards, wrote Peter Lance in his superb book, A Thousand Years for Revenge, Ms. Floyd was driven from the bureau for having been too aggressively right. Her superiors - who were so disastrously wrong - were promoted.

When in 2002 FBI translator Sibel Edmonds reported to her supervisor that some of her fellow Turkish and Farsi translators were leaving important information out of their translations and had ties to radical groups, it was Ms. Edmonds who was fired, for "rocking the boat."

The Iraq war was undertaken in large part because intelligence agencies exaggerated the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. Reporting on Saddam's forces and tactics was also badly flawed, wrote Michael Gordon and retired Marine Gen. Bernard Trainor in their acclaimed book, Cobra II:

"The CIA in particular was not only wrong about WMD, but failed to identify the importance of the Fedayeen [irregular forces loyal to Saddam] or to uncover the tons of arms that had been cached in the cities and towns of southern Iraq," they said. "The CIA's assurances that the Iraqi military would capitulate and that the Army and Marines would be welcome in the southern cities were misleading and dangerous."

Most of what has passed for debate on intelligence failures has been efforts to assign partisan blame for them.

There is some partisan blame to be assigned. President Clinton slashed spending on intelligence gathering, and his Justice Department forbade FBI agents working on criminal cases from sharing information with FBI intelligence officers.

But most of our intelligence failures have little to do with politics. They are a product of the bureaucratic structures and imperatives of the agencies, and the competence - or lack of it - of the people who lead them.

As far as we know, no one in the FBI or the CIA has been held accountable for intelligence failures. And when no one is held accountable, you get people like Mr. Hulon in jobs they obviously are unqualified to do.

This is President Bush's greatest failure. And it's worse than President Clinton's, because it's happened after 9/11, when there can no longer be any excuse for being asleep at the switch.

"Too many officials in charge of the war on terrorism just don't care to learn much, if anything about the enemy we're fighting," Mr. Stein said.

Jack Kelly is a member of The Blade's national bureau.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man, 20, Arrested In Stadium Threat Hoax (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

NEWARK, Oct. 20 — A 20-year-old Wisconsin man was arrested Friday and charged with posting messages on Internet chat boards threatening that radioactive "dirty bombs" would go off at National Football League stadiums in seven cities on Sunday.

Federal officials labeled the threat a hoax on Thursday, but at a news conference on Friday to announce the arrest, the United States attorney in Newark, Christopher J. Christie, called it the "Internet version of yelling 'Fire!' in a crowded theater in this post-9/11 era."

Law enforcement officials said that the message posted by the man, Jake J. Brahm, a clerk at a natural-foods grocery cooperative in Wauwatosa, Wis., explained that the timing of the threatened explosions coincided with the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and that Al Qaeda would take credit for what members would call "America's Hiroshima." General chaos would follow, the message said, with civil wars erupting across the globe and economies collapsing.

Mr. Christie said investigators had determined that Mr. Brahm first posted the message in mid-September and reposted it at least 40 times. It identified the stadiums where the bombs would go off simultaneously as Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J., and those in Atlanta; Cleveland; Houston; Miami; Oakland, Calif.; and Seattle.

DOJ_NMG_0083996

Mr. Brahm surrendered to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in Milwaukee on Friday morning and later appeared in shackles for his first court appearance at the Federal District Court for the Southeastern District of Wisconsin. He was charged with making a terrorist threat over the Internet. A conviction would carry a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Citing Mr. Brahm's lack of a criminal record and his strong community ties, Federal Magistrate Patricia J. Gorence released him into the custody of his father on the condition that Mr. Brahm not travel outside Wisconsin and New Jersey, where Mr. Christie's office will have jurisdiction over his case. Judge Gorence also forbade him to use the Internet or any computer that has access to the Internet.

Mr. Brahm's lawyer, Patrick Knight, would not speculate on a motive or on F.B.I. reports that his client had said he had admitted posting the message as part of a "writing duel" with a Texas man to see who could come up with the scariest threat.

Mr. Knight did say that his client's intent was not malicious.

"It's the curse of the Internet," he said. "I think there is a whole class of folks who post a variety of things to get comments back, and in 2006 I don't think anyone is sure what is a private communication and what is intended for public consumption. I think in the end we will find that this was something that just spiraled out of control."

Wisconsin Man Charged In Terror Hoax (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

Federal prosecutors have charged a Wisconsin man as the source of an Internet posting that threatened to detonate radioactive "dirty bombs" at NFL stadiums in seven states.

Jake J. Brahm, 20, of Wauwatosa, Wis., was charged in a criminal complaint with willfully conveying false information or hoaxes threatening to damage buildings through the use of weapons of mass destruction and radiological dispersal devices. The charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie in New Jersey said Mr. Brahm, a grocery store worker, turned himself in yesterday to the U.S. Marshal's Service in Milwaukee on a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said Mr. Brahm was first taken into custody by local police in Wauwatosa on Wednesday, based on information police received that he was the source of the Internet threat to bomb the stadiums. The FBI was immediately notified, and Mr. Brahm was interviewed by agents Wednesday evening.

"These types of hoaxes scare innocent people, cost business resources and waste valuable homeland security resources," Mr. Christie said. "We cannot tolerate this Internet version of yelling fire in a crowded theater in the post-9/11 era."

According to the criminal complaint, Mr. Brahm told the FBI he posted the threatening message at least 40 times on various Web sites.

Mr. Kolko said that in the message, Mr. Brahm warned that on Oct. 22, seven "dirty explosive devices" would be delivered by truck and detonated at NFL stadiums in New Jersey, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland, Calif., and Cleveland.

All but the Atlanta stadium are open-air arenas and, according to message, that would allow for a maximum death toll, with the radioactive fallout spreading beyond the stadium to a wider area.

"The death toll will approach 100,000 from the initial blasts and countless other fatalities will later occur as result from radioactive fallout," the message said, adding that the explosions would be lauded by al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and the aftermath of the near-simultaneous blasts would be civil wars around the globe.

"Global economies will screech to a halt," the message said. "General chaos will rule."

Mr. Christie credited FBI agents in Newark, under the direction of Special Agent in Charge Leslie G. Wiser, Jr., for their work in the investigation leading to the charges against Mr. Brahm. He also credited FBI agents and the Joint Terrorism Task Force in Milwaukee, under the direction of Special Agent in Charge Richard K. Ruminski, for their work in the investigation, as well as the Wauwatosa Police Department.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael A. Hammer, Jr., chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office Terrorism Unit in Newark.

DOJ_NMG_0083997

FBI Removes Dead Man From Terror List (AP-Y)

AP, October 21, 2006

The FBI removed an al-Qaida explosives expert linked to the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Africa from the most wanted terrorists list Friday after learning he was killed six months ago.

Muhsin Musa Matwali Atwah was killed in an April 12 gunfight with Pakistani authorities, FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said. He said the FBI was notified just this week that Atwah's death had been confirmed.

Egyptian-born Atwah was wanted in connection with the deadly embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The State Department offered a $5 million reward for his capture.

News reports out of Pakistan in late April said Atwah was killed by the Pakistani military in a raid on a suspected insurgent hideout in the tribal region of North Waziristan bordering Afghanistan.

Twenty-six suspected terrorists remain on the FBI's list, including al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

___

On the Net:

FBI's Most Wanted Terrorists: http://www.fbi.gov/wanted/terrorists/fugitives.htm

Ground Zero Forensic Team Is Posted To Seek Remains (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

New York City's chief medical examiner will station a team at ground zero to look for human remains from 9/11, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday, after dozens of bones were found Thursday by workers excavating two manholes that had been covered since 2002.

"This was an enormous disaster," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said on his WABC radio program. "It's an enormous area. And I think those that did the recovery effort, you know they did the best they could. You can't be perfect, unfortunately, when something's this big."

The excavation began Wednesday under a service road paralleling West Street. Workers for Phoenix Constructors are preparing this area, south of Vesey Street and within the World Trade Center site, for a passageway to link the future trade center below ground to Battery Park City. On Thursday morning, they found as many as 80 bones and bone fragments and personal effects like wallets and watches.

Officials expect more remains to emerge from four other manholes and utility service boxes that have been covered since the service road was built four years ago. They also expect to find smaller remains in material that was vacuumed out of the manholes by Consolidated Edison crews on Wednesday.

After a 90-minute meeting yesterday with utility executives and other officials, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said that Con Ed and Verizon crews would continue to remove material from underground areas near West Street.

"The city's medical examiner will be on site to carefully sift through any material recovered to identify any human remains," Mr. Skyler said. "The medical examiner's forensic anthropologists will work closely with police and fire personnel, who will be on scene at all times."

Mr. Skyler said the city's Department of Design and Construction and the Lower Manhattan Construction Command Center would identify other underground areas, if any, that need to be searched by the same method.

Mayor Bloomberg said such discoveries might continue. "Whether or not two years from now or during construction somebody finds something else, you just don't know," he said.

Despite an impression four years ago that the recovery effort had been completed, human remains continue to be found around ground zero. In the last year, 760 body parts were discovered at the former Deutsche Bank building. Victims' relatives believe that many more remains await recovery at the Fresh Kills landfill on Staten Island.

The discovery this week reopened a scar that never healed for the many relatives of victims who all but vanished on Sept. 11, 2001. To date, the medical examiner's office has identified no physical trace of 1,151 of the 2,749 people who died in the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0083998

Yesterday, family members called on local officials to step aside and permit a thorough new search for human remains, governed by strict protocols, on the trade center site and its environs.

"If they were capable of doing the job, we wouldn't be finding these human remains now," said Sally Regenhard of the Skyscraper Safety Campaign. She has yet to recover the remains of her son, Christian, a probationary firefighter, who was killed on 9/11.

The family members demanded a halt to all construction at the trade center site and the intervention of the federal government through the Joint P.O.W.-M.I.A. Accounting Command, which recovers and identifies service members who have been killed in action and operates what it describes as the world's largest forensic anthropology laboratory.

None of these concessions were forthcoming from City Hall, leading Glenn P. Corbett, a technical adviser to the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, to call the mayor's response "totally inadequate."

Fire On The Water (NYT)

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

When the Coast Guard decided it wanted to practice firing its new machine guns on the Great Lakes, it posted an item in the Federal Register — not exactly household reading. Now that the public has caught up, there is an uproar all around the lakes — in Canada as well as the United States — and a belated decision to hold public hearings.

The Coast Guard's proposal is cautious and, as military exercises go, quite modest. It plans two or three test firings a year, a few hours each time, in 34 possible areas at least five nautical miles offshore. Officials argue that it is prudent to give crews heavier weapons than the handheld guns they carried on the lakes before 9/11.

Few are disputing that the United States needs to do more to protect its borders against terrorists. But we face far more plausible threats than terrorists cutting across Lake Michigan in small boats.

As a defense against terrorism, militarizing the Great Lakes is a symbolic defeat. And it is another in a series of incremental changes that threaten to change everything that we take for granted about our country.

The question is how far we choose to militarize ourselves at home in response to terrorism. Turning the Great Lakes — even on occasion — into a live-fire zone is the kind of decision that says little to terrorists but speaks volumes to the rest of us.

Louisiana Pays Part Of FEMA Bill And Sues On Rest (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., Oct. 20 (AP) — Louisiana wired $319 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Friday, a large part of what the agency billed the state for hurricane recovery for Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and filed a lawsuit in federal court disputing the remaining $61 million bill.

The state's actions were based on the advice of the legislative auditor.

The commissioner of administration, Jerry Luke LeBlanc, who is the governor's top financial adviser, said that the state attorney general's office filed the lawsuit Friday afternoon and that the disputed dollars would be deposited into a registry of the court until the case was resolved.

The legislative auditor, Steve Theriot, the chief investigator for the Legislature, said that he could account for only 88 percent of the spending, but that the state was objecting to a part of that as well.

In the remaining disputed money, Mr. Theriot said that in some instances, people with invalid addresses or duplicate homes, who should not have received benefits from the agency, had.

"One of those errors, as an example, was a person who was charged with a felony in another state had applied for funds and got it," he told the Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget, which approved the payment to FEMA.

Agency officials have said they welcome any information from the legislative auditor's office about improper spending and will investigate it.

States are required to pick up part of the cost for some types of FEMA's disaster aid.

Storming Capitol Hill To Help Louisiana (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0083999

By Ann M. Simmons, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Women of the Storm encourage lawmakers to visit the devastated Gulf Coast so they will be roused to offer aid. Scores have accepted.

The chartered jet that lifted off at dawn recently from New Orleans carried 131 Louisiana women — homemakers, professionals, full-time volunteers and local celebrities, dressed for political combat in pastel power suits, smart skirt outfits and discreet jewelry.

As they sipped coffee and munched scones, their conversations ranged from their kids' progress at school to next month's reopening of a downtown landmark, Saks Fifth Avenue.

But the chatter came to a stop when Anne Milling, a striking, slender woman in her 60s, strode to the front of the plane. Brimming with confidence and charm, she outlined the game plan. At stake was nothing less than the future of their Gulf Coast home, battered a year ago by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

"Be positive, be tenacious, be your upbeat self," Milling urged her compatriots. "This is how you're going to sell Louisiana."

The Women of the Storm, as this ad hoc group calls itself, were about to land in Washington and embark on a one-day mission in the nation's halls of power. The goal: to persuade members of Congress to help save the state's fast-disappearing coastline.

The powerful folks in Washington ignore this eclectic group at their peril. The Women are quickly becoming a recognized power among the activist groups that have sprouted from the rubble of Katrina, many fueled by frustration with the slow pace of government assistance.

Their first objective has been to bring Washington to New Orleans. The group's premise is simple: When lawmakers see how devastated the Gulf Coast looks, they will be roused to help. So far, the group has helped convince 55 of the nation's 100 senators and at least 106 of its 435 representatives to visit Louisiana.

But the Women of the Storm also have accomplished something just as rare: offering this city, historically fraught with ethnic division, a shining example of cross-cultural unity. Among these women are whites, blacks, Latinas and Asians. They are executives, civil servants and stay-at-home moms, all pulling together for the future of their city.

Before landing to tackle their September agenda, the group's leaders prepped the fledgling lobbyists.

"Don't hesitate to be dramatic," advised Pam Bryan, a member of the group's executive committee. "What we're asking for is $15 billion. When you think about it, that's not a lot of money. Don't be afraid to ask for that. Please pass on the sense of urgency … that we need this money now!"

Information sheets rustled, and whispered acknowledgments were heard through the cabin. Two committee members, Beverly Church and Nancy Marsiglia, rose for a role-playing exercise, with Church playing a skeptical U.S. representative and Marsiglia playing a Woman of the Storm.

"What about your leadership? Who is running the city?" Church demanded.

"We think it is important to keep politics out of this," Marsiglia responded. "We are a citizens group, and citizens are leading the way. We are the face of Louisiana today."

The grass-roots women's movement was born on Thanksgiving as Milling sat down to dinner with a group of friends and talked about the paucity of help after the storm. By Jan. 10, Milling had gathered eight pals in her living room to make a plan. And by Jan. 30, when they made their first trip to Capitol Hill to lobby for the release of funds for Louisiana's Road Home program, they had added more than 120 to their ranks. Today, more than 500 Louisiana members are registered on the group's e-mail list.

Financed by donations, the group is a broad range of Gulf Coast women, including some local celebrities, like 83-year-old chef Leah Chase, commonly known as the "queen of Creole Cuisine" and owner of the landmark New Orleans restaurant Dooky Chase's.

They hand-deliver invitations to the politicians and lead those who visit the region on tours of the most damaged neighborhoods.

Still, 45 senators and at least 329 U.S. representatives have not made the journey.

DOJ_NMG_0084000

"Why have they not come?" asked Cecile Tebo, a member of the group who is also a crisis unit coordinator for the New Orleans Police Department and a third-generation New Orleanian. "Is it fear? I can't imagine. This affects the entire country. Until you feel it, see it, smell it, hear it, you don't understand it."

For many of the women, mastering the intricacies of lobbying on Capitol Hill is new. But just as Katrina changed New Orleans forever, it changed their minds about their roles in its recovery. Jeanette Bell, a floriculturist who is African American, said, "I believe my presence [in the group] represents a commitment on the part of people of color. Just because we're not always in the forefront doesn't mean that we aren't committed to the rebuilding of the city."

"It's the power of group," added Tebo, the police crisis unit worker. "This is typical New Orleans. There's that passion. There's that little bit of funk."

The women were driven by bus from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport to a grassy area near the Capitol complex. They hoisted blue umbrellas — symbols of the blue tarps that cover many damaged rooftops in Louisiana. At a news conference, they were surrounded by the state's two senators and five of its members of Congress.

Before fanning out, some of the women changed from pumps into comfortable walking shoes. Naydja Bynum, a property preservationist who lives in the historic traditionally African American New Orleans neighborhood of Treme, donned black soft fabric slip-on shoes that she bought last year on a trip to Europe. "I knew they would come in handy, she said later that day.

The women traipsed from the House to the Senate, from the Senate to House, navigating the maze of underground tunnels and magnificent corridors that connects them.

On Tebo's list were one senator and four congressmen. She was partnered with Lang Le, a Vietnamese American whose eastern New Orleans house was inundated by several feet of water. Tebo and Le rushed to their first scheduled appointment, with Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (D-R.I.), who has not yet visited New Orleans. But he was called away on other business, so a staff member filled in.

Tebo did most of the talking, sticking to the script and convincingly pleading the case of coastal restoration and flood protection.

"I didn't know if I was saying all the right things," Tebo said as she left the room.

"You did great," Le encouraged. "It sounded good."

Milling was teamed with Rita Benson LeBlanc, executive vice president of administration for the New Orleans Saints football team. At 29, LeBlanc is one of the group's youngest members.

Their list included Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"How's it going?" Clinton asked the group.

"They know who we are," Benson LeBlanc informed the senator. The Women need no introduction on the Hill.

Clinton told them how important it was that they were helping put a human face on Louisiana's tragedy. "Just be persistent," the senator added.

"You know how women are," Milling said. "They can nag, and they are tenacious."

She handed Clinton a book about Katrina by the staff of the Times Picayune as she impressed upon the senator the need to "get the House and the Senate on the same page" in terms of backing coastal restoration in Louisiana.

"We need the revenue now," Milling told Clinton. "This is an issue that's crucial to us today."

"I'm supportive, and I'll continue to do whatever I can," the senator promised, as she readied to pose for a photograph with the women.

Many of the elected officials pledged continued assistance. But some in the group said they got the cold shoulder from a few representatives or their testy staffers; and one official reportedly mocked the Women as being nothing more than debutantes. Diplomacy prevented group members from naming names.

Encountering a naysayer or two is par for the course, said Madeline West, an attorney and core member, but "overall it was positive."

En route to the airport for the trip back to New Orleans, one woman called her kids and promised a hug and a kiss when she got home; another longed for a bath. All recognized that their work was far from done.

"The women-hours in this are tremendous," member Polly Renwick said. "And it will not end when we leave here."

DOJ_NMG_0084001

As cups of white wine were handed out on board the aircraft, Milling thanked members for their day of hard work — they had gathered at 5:45 a.m. and landed back in New Orleans at around 10:30 p.m.

She also reminded them to send a thank-you note, or a card, to every official or staffer they had called on.

"It does make a difference being a woman," Milling said. "We can say and do things men can't. We are more passionate. It's different to the way a man would approach a problem."

ann.simmons@latimes.com

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Rumsfeld Defend Strategy (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

They Say Surge In Violence Won't Change Iraq Goals

President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday defended the U.S. strategy in Iraq, saying the ultimate goals remain unchanged despite escalating violence and increasingly somber assessments from military leaders on the ground.

Speaking at a Washington fundraiser, Bush said the U.S. goal in Iraq "is clear and unchanging": creating a country that can govern and defend itself and "that will be an ally in the war against these extremists."

In a briefing later at the Pentagon, Rumsfeld played down the significance of fighting and sectarian violence that have erupted over the past few days outside Baghdad, as U.S. troops in Iraq suffer some of the highest monthly casualties since the 2003 invasion.

The U.S. military strategy of handing over security to Iraqi forces will never be a "straight, smooth, steady path" and American troops may have to step back in repeatedly to quell outbreaks of violence, Rumsfeld said.

But Rumsfeld rejected the suggestion that this means the U.S. strategy of "clear, hold and build" is failing.

The remarks came amid growing concern among both Republican and Democratic lawmakers about the administration's Iraq plan, with some predicting that upcoming elections and the apparent lack of progress on the ground would soon force the Bush administration to abandon its open-ended support of the war.

Rumsfeld said he will meet today with Bush, Vice President Cheney and top U.S. commanders including Gen. John P. Abizaid and Gen. George W. Casey Jr. to "discuss the way forward" in Iraq. White House press secretary Tony Snow said the meeting was a routine update on the conflict -- scheduled weeks ago -- and that it did not herald a major change in strategy.

"The biggest mistake would be not to pass things over to the Iraqis," Rumsfeld said. "It's their country. They're going to have to govern it. They're going to have to provide security for it. And they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

Attacks and sectarian fighting have flared beyond Baghdad in recent days -- from Amarah in the south to the Tigris River town of Balad and the northern city of Mosul -- in some cases requiring the urgent intervention of U.S. forces. Sunni insurgents have also been staging bold military displays in cities and towns in the vast western province of Anbar, which a senior U.S. military officer this week described as "an al-Qaeda stronghold."

The eruption of violence around Iraq comes as thousands of U.S. reinforcement troops are tied down in aggressive operations to secure Baghdad, where attacks have nevertheless surged 43 percent since midsummer in a trend that an American general there this week called "disheartening."

At least 75 U.S. troops have been killed so far in Iraq this month -- the highest daily rate since January 2005. The United Nations has said that more than 100 Iraqis a day are being killed in raging sectarian violence.

U.S. commanders are wrestling with the question of whether to raise troop levels. Last week, Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, said that more troops would have an immediate impact on reducing attacks in localities where they operate but that it was uncertain whether they would contribute to bringing violence down in the long term.

DOJ_NMG_0084002

Casey is working on projections for when the U.S. military can hand over responsibilities to Iraqi forces in different parts of the country, but Rumsfeld said yesterday that "there's no doubt" some of the projections will not be met. "In some cases, once we meet the projection, we may have to go back and do it again if it doesn't work," he said.

Iraqi insurgents and other fighters may be targeting areas transferred to the control of Iraqi forces, Rumsfeld said. "They're smart, the enemy," he added. "They've got brains, and they use them."

Rumsfeld and Bush said military commanders are constantly adjusting their tactics to meet enemy challenges, even though overarching goals remain unchanged.

Bush repeated his vow not to withdraw troops from Iraq before the goals are achieved. "Victory in Iraq is vital for the security of a generation of Americans who are coming up," he said. "And so we will stay in Iraq, we will fight in Iraq and we will win in Iraq."

Bush said the recent spike in violence is largely attributable to a more aggressive posture being taken by U.S. troops, who have been directly confronting militias and others who have been stirring trouble. "In other words, we're on the move," Bush said. ". . . We're engaging the enemies, and they're putting up a tough fight."

In his remarks at an event that raised $1 million for Republican Senate candidates, Bush acknowledged the difficulty of the war. "Listen, I fully understand it's a tough fight in Iraq," he said. "I know it, you know it, and our troops know it."

Still, he said, the United States has no choice but to stay in the fight. "This is going to be a long struggle, but in order to prevail, it requires perseverance and determination, and a strong belief in the power of liberty to conquer the ideology of hate," he said.

Militias Battle For Iraqi City As Shiite Rivalry Escalates (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 20 — Hundreds of militiamen linked to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr battled local police and members of a rival Shiite militia in the southeastern city of Amara on Friday, destroying police stations, seizing control of entire neighborhoods and detonating bombs that sent thick pillars of black smoke into the sky.

At one point, the Mahdi Army, Mr. Sadr's militia force, appeared to be in control of the eastern half of the city of about 250,000, close to the Iranian border. But after a day of negotiations involving representatives of the warring militias, and delegates from the Baghdad offices of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, Mahdi Army gunmen withdrew from their positions, and by nightfall the city was under the control of an Iraqi Army battalion that had been dispatched from Basra, officials and residents said.

The clashes, pitting fighters linked to Mr. Sadr against members of the Badr Organization, the military wing one of the country's leading Shiite parties, exposed the deep fissures in the country's Shiite leadership and cast doubt on the ability of the ruling Shiite coalition to hold itself together. It also underscored the weaknesses of the Iraqi security forces and the potency of the Mahdi Army, which has been able to operate virtually unchecked in Iraq and is widely accused of propelling the cycle of sectarian violence that has pushed the nation to the brink of civil war.

With the battle for the city erupting only two months after British troops withdrew from a garrison on the city's edge, it raised fresh questions, too, about the ability of the Iraqi government and security forces to maintain order once allied troops are withdrawn.

Reviews of the American strategy in Iraq took on more urgency on Friday, as President Bush held a half-hour meeting at the White House with Gen. John. P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East. The meeting was the first of several scheduled in coming days with his senior advisers.

The stability of Mr. Maliki's government in Baghdad depends on a tenuous peace between Mr. Sadr, who controls one of the largest parties in the ruling Shiite bloc, and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who leads another, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and its private army, the Badr Organization. A dynastic rivalry between their families, dating back decades, has carried over into a personal and political rivalry between the men, and their militias have periodically clashed.

"The split is very old and it has caused a lot of tragedy," said Abd-Kareem al-Mahamedawy, one of Amara's most prominent political leaders and a moderate Shiite. "It's just a fight for power."

DOJ_NMG_0084003

Mr. Sadr's office disavowed responsibility for the fighting in Amara, and his role in the assault remained murky. But residents and local officials said the gunmen, who wore the black clothes and black balaclavas that have become hallmarks of the Mahdi Army, claimed allegiance to Mr. Sadr.

The possibility of a violent break between the factions would severely complicate the efforts of Iraqi and American officials to quell the soaring sectarian and insurgent violence in Iraq. A factional war among the Shiite groups, which might quickly spread to other major centers where Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim are vying for power, including Baghdad, would add another nightmarish dimension to the bloodletting here, on top of the sectarian killing between Sunnis and Shiites and the war that militant groups from both sects are waging against American-led allied troops.

Compared to the west and north of the country, where a fierce Sunni Arab-led insurgency has tormented American and Iraqi troops and Sunni and Shiite death squads have engaged in a vicious cycle of violence, the predominantly Shiite south has been relatively peaceful. But a disintegration of the unstable pact between Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim could draw American attention away from the other fronts and compel the British military to return to areas they had ceded to the Iraqis.

The American military command acknowledged this week that it was re-examining the latest security plan for Baghdad, where three months of intensive American-led sweeps had failed to curb violence by Sunni Arab-led insurgents and Shiite and Sunni militias. An American soldier was killed Friday in a bombing in southwest Baghdad, according to the military, raising the total of American troop deaths in Iraq this month to at least 74.

The Bush administration has pinned the withdrawal of American troops on the ability of Iraqi forces to assume command of the country's security. In the south, the British have handed over security for two provinces to the Iraqis. In August, they put Iraqi forces in charge of Amara and withdrew from the city.

In an interview with The Associated Press, President Bush said of Iraq, "We are constantly adjusting our tactics so that we achieve the objective, and right now it's tough, it's tough."

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said it was essential to transfer more security and governing responsibilities to the Iraqi government. "It's their country," he said at a news conference. "They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

Shiite militias — especially the Mahdi Army — have presented Mr. Maliki with perhaps the greatest conundrum of his administration. American officials have pressed him vigorously to disarm the militias and rid the state security forces of their influence. Yet Mr. Maliki has been hesitant to attack them, particularly the Mahdi Army and Badr Organization, for fear of alienating fundamentalist Shiite leaders inside his fractious coalition. On Wednesday, Mr. Maliki met privately with Mr. Sadr in Najaf but offered no details about their conversation.

British forces did not intervene to stop the bloodshed in Amara, instead deferring to the Iraqi government to resolve the dispute. British military officials said a quick reaction force was standing by in case Iraqi diplomatic efforts failed.

British commanders called the Iraqi response to the crisis a success.

"The Iraqi police and Iraqi Army have faced their sternest test since we stepped back from Amara," Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a British military spokesman, said in a telephone interview. "We believed the Iraqi security forces were in position to provide day-to-day security and implement the rule of law in Amara, and we still maintain the case."

The fighting, he said, did not upset plans to hand over full control of Maysan Province to the Iraqi government in December.

According to Mr. Mahamedawy, this week's dispute between the Shiite militias began after Qassim al-Tamimi, chief of investigations for the provincial police force and a member of the Badr Organization, was killed in a bombing. Badr fighters blamed the Mahdi Army. Police then arrested the brother of the local Mahdi Army commander in connection with the bombing, the authorities said.

More than 200 Mahdi fighters responded with an assault on the city beginning Thursday afternoon, then continuing at daybreak on Friday. According to Col. Khalid al-Fredgy, a police officer in Amara, the police officers eventually ran out of ammunition and fled their posts. By late morning, Mahdi gunmen wearing black clothes and black balaclavas were patrolling neighborhoods in commandeered police vehicles and manning roadblocks, local leaders and residents said.

"Policemen tried to protect the stations, but what can they do?" Mr. Mahamedawy said by telephone early Friday afternoon. "They do not have enough weapons and ammunition compared with the militia, which has all kinds of weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0084004

Delegates from the Badr Organization and from Mr. Sadr's headquarters in Najaf met with envoys from Mr. Maliki's office and hammered out a truce that allowed for the Iraqi Army to retake the streets, according to Mr. Mahamedawy.

By dusk, at least 10 police officers and 15 militiamen had been killed, according to Major Burbridge, and about 90 gunmen were wounded. Police officials said that several of their men remained unaccounted for and had presumably been kidnapped by the Mahdi Army fighters.

"Those rogue gangs were brought back into line by their political leaders," Major Burbridge said.

Witnesses said a message from Mr. Sadr was broadcast by loudspeakers atop vehicles Friday, calling on gunmen to lay down their weapons, though the order was widely disregarded.

Western intelligence officials in Baghdad have also spoken of Mahdi splinter groups operating as freelance death squads beyond Mr. Sadr's control, but some American officers have questioned whether Mr. Sadr has adopted this notion in order to deflect responsibility for crimes committed by his men.

Amara is the capital of Maysan Province, a region of farmland and marshes about 240 miles southeast of Baghdad. The city has been a chokepoint for munitions and people entering from Iran.

Political control there, and throughout the south, has been fiercely contested by followers of Mr. Hakim and Mr. Sadr. Mr. Sadr's allies dominate the provincial council. But the police chief is a former Badr Organization member and many of his officers are loyal to the militia.

Some local leaders warned that the cycle of revenge among Shiites would likely not end with Friday's truce, and that in the fiercely tribal culture of Maysan, relatives of officers who were killed or kidnapped might seek to avenge those attacks.

Bush Open To Shift In Iraq War 'Tactics' (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — With U.S. casualties rising and pressure growing from Republican and Democratic leaders for a change of course in Iraq, President Bush said Friday that he was willing to adjust U.S. "tactics" in Baghdad but did not intend to change his strategy or long-term goals.

"We will stay in Iraq, we will fight in Iraq and we will win in Iraq," Bush told Republican contributors in Washington. "Our goal hasn't changed, but the tactics are constantly adjusting to an enemy which is brutal and violent."

But pressure is mounting among some administration officials and party faithful for a major change in the way Bush is handling the war.

His remarks appeared to signal that he was open to at least a limited change in his approach, and that he was not wedded to a "stay-the-course" doctrine, as critics say. At the same time, Bush pledged to secure victory and said he would not change his administration's strategy or overall goals, even if it shifted tactics.

He spoke at the end of a grim week that saw an American commander acknowledge that U.S. policies aimed at quelling violence in Baghdad had fallen short and on the eve of a White House conference with generals, Cabinet officials and national security advisors.

The developments came as an increasing number of Republicans questioned the wisdom of Bush's policies in Iraq and called for new military and political options, and as expectations grew for a postelection change in direction. By adhering to longer-term goals while allowing for tactical changes, Bush could argue that military shifts did not represent a failure of policies.

In his comments, Bush said his administration's "unchanging" goal was to enable Iraq to govern, defend and sustain itself.

But some administration officials said Friday that in the face of Iraq's deepening troubles, they were weighing major changes in direction and expected a new course — though not a withdrawal — to be announced within months.

One senior official said he expected the change to come once a congressionally chartered panel, the Iraq Study Group, makes its recommendations, giving the administration "political cover."

"We're not going to pack up and go home," said the official, who asked to remain anonymous because he was not authorized to speak on the subject. "But the situation is grim, and may even be worse than it looks in the media" because of frequent near-calamities in Iraq that never come to the public's attention.

DOJ_NMG_0084005

"People here are desperate, and there is a lot of deep thinking going on," the senior official said.

Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, an independent foreign policy organization, said opinion on the war appeared to be near "a tipping point."

"I think we are reaching the point, and it's going to happen soon, where simply 'more of essentially the same' is going to be a policy that very few people are going to be able to support," said Haass, who was an aide to former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

Several strategic alternatives in Iraq are receiving the most attention, observers said.

They include setting a timetable for withdrawal; giving a larger role to other countries in the region, notably Syria and Iran, to win their cooperation on security; decentralizing the government of Iraq, or even formally dividing the country into Kurdish, Sunni Arab and Shiite states; and encouraging the formation of a new government led by a strong leader, such as an Iraqi army general.

Administration officials and outside experts said all of the options had major disadvantages and would have substantial political costs. U.S. officials said each of the alternatives had been rejected at various points by the administration.

But the senior U.S. official said some in the government continued to think about options that had been ruled out — including a more authoritarian approach — in hopes of establishing order as a first step toward rebuilding the country.

The official described it as a "last choice," but said, "at some point, the situation becomes so serious that you need order, period."

Handing the government over to a strong leader would carry large political costs. It would mean setting aside the administration's goal of establishing an American-style government, at least temporarily. And it would mean finding what some officials call a "man on horseback" who would have support from all the major Iraqi factions — perhaps an impossible task.

The strongman option was called the "most plausible" by scholar Eliot Cohen of the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies, who has close ties to the military and administration. Cohen, often described as a leading neoconservative, has been praised by Bush.

Cohen wrote in a Wall Street Journal column published Friday that the Iraq war was, "if not a failure, failing." He said throwing U.S. support behind a strong leader would force the administration to swallow "a substantial repast of crow."

The option of regionalizing the effort — with the help of Iran and Syria — appears to have the support of former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, the Iraq Study Group co-chairman.

The senior U.S. official said that such an approach would require Washington to set aside other goals regarding Syria and Iran — including its push to keep Tehran from gaining a nuclear weapon.

"The question is, are they willing to throw out their Iran and Syria policies to help their Iraq policy?" he said. "That's hard for me to conceive."

The Pentagon has begun its own work on a "Plan B," involving changes that Bush would consider tactical rather than strategic.

Pentagon officials have declined to talk about alternatives under discussion, but there are several shifts they could make.

The military could intensify its counterinsurgency efforts, moving more American units out of bases and into cities and neighborhoods — a version of the strategy the U.S. pursued in Tall Afar and Ramadi. But those options probably would require additional troops, who most likely would come from unpopular combat tour extensions.

A probable candidate for an extension under such a scenario would be the 4th Infantry Division, which is expected to complete its yearlong tour in November and December. Keeping the division in Baghdad would provide an instant boost in the U.S. military presence.

Conversely, the military may decide to abandon its Baghdad security plan, returning more forces to bases. Such a move essentially would mean dropping a large part of the Pentagon's counterinsurgency effort, but it could force the Iraqi military to take more responsibility.

The Pentagon also could seek to ramp up its military advisor efforts. Top Army generals have repeatedly predicted that as infantry brigades shrink, the number of military advisors working with Iraqi security forces will increase.

One military option, backed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and others, is increasing troop levels. But administration officials are concerned that would further erode public support, and that there are no extra troops to be had in large numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0084006

Bush summoned Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, to the White House on Friday. The administration said Abizaid already was in the capital and Bush asked for a meeting.

Bush will consult today with Abizaid and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Dick Cheney and national security advisor Stephen Hadley also will take part, Rumsfeld told reporters.

Abizaid will appear via teleconference from the U.S. Central Command in Florida and Casey will take part from Baghdad.

Democrats sought Friday to use the acknowledged breakdown of the Baghdad offensive as an opportunity to emphasize their case for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

"It has never been more clear that we need to change course in Iraq," House and Senate Democratic leaders wrote in a letter to Bush.

Times staff writers Julian E. Barnes and Peter Spiegel contributed to this report.

Pressure Builds For Policy Shift, But Bush Shows No Signs Of Budging (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Appalled by spiraling violence in Iraq and frustrated by Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki's failure to quell it, American officials are grasping for new ways to keep the conflict from spinning out of control.

But President Bush has given no indication that he's ready to make dramatic changes in his Iraq policy, which has come to define his presidency and dominate next month's congressional elections. If anything, the president's public comments and those of his senior aides suggest that he's more determined than ever to stay the course.

Senior U.S. military, diplomatic and intelligence officials, however, have concluded that Maliki's Iraqi government is either unwilling or unable to crack down on the country's Shiite Muslim militias. Some even have suggested that the United States should consider beginning to withdraw some troops to increase the pressure on Maliki to take decisive action.

Bush and his aides, however, say he won't retreat from his vision of a united, stable, secure and democratic Iraq.

"Our goal in Iraq is clear and it's unchanging: a country that can sustain itself, a country that can govern itself, a country that can defend itself, and a country which will be an ally in the war against these extremists," Bush said Friday at a Republican fundraiser.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that Bush has rejected two of the most frequently mentioned options: a phased U.S. withdrawal or a partition that would divide Iraq into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. He said that Bush is open to changes in tactics that could help achieve his goals, but won't consider any deviation from his core strategy.

"Leaving is not going to work, and partition is simply off the table," Snow said. "The strategy's going to be the same, which is an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself."

That leaves senior American officials and commanders in Iraq in a tough place. They've acknowledged that the current approach isn't working, and that they're looking for an alternative. But the decision ultimately is the president's.

Lawmakers in both parties agree that Bush will face more pressure to change course if Republicans lose control of Congress next month.

Calls for change by the independent Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker, a Bush family friend, might sway the president. Baker, who's said that the group won't release its findings until after the Nov. 7 elections, has pledged to consider all options, but Snow already has made it clear that Bush won't be bound by the group's advice.

"This is something you listen to seriously, but we are not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq," he said. "The president is the commander-in-chief. And simply because you have a blue ribbon panel, it does not mean that he hands it off to them."

The pressure for change - from commanders in Iraq, from voters and from Bush's fellow Republicans - is building, and a flurry of meetings has prompted speculation that some changes may be afoot.

DOJ_NMG_0084007

Bush invited Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the region, to the White House Friday for an update on Iraq, and the president will hear from commanders in the field in a videoconference on Saturday that will include Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

A senior defense official said that Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also has begun taking a more active role in shaping discussions about Iraq strategy, meeting regularly with military commanders and retired officers who've returned from the region.

But the official, who declined to be named because he wasn't authorized to speak on the record, was skeptical that the discussions would lead to "a major overhaul" of Iraq strategy, even though Pace acknowledged at a luncheon with reporters last week that the current strategy hasn't worked.

"I think conceptually the strategy is correct," the official said, "and I think operationally there may be a need for some adjustment to achieve the desired results."

At a Pentagon news conference Friday, Rumsfeld declined to say whether he'd offer any new ideas, but he stressed the current goal of transferring security responsibility to Iraqi forces.

"It's their country. They're going to have to govern it," Rumsfeld said. "They're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later. And that means they've got to take pieces of it as they go along."

U.S. officials in Iraq, however, concede that the handoff to Iraqis hasn't gone as planned.

On Thursday, Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. spokesman in Iraq, announced that a two-month effort to stabilize Baghdad has fallen far short of its goals. Shiite death squads continue to operate with near impunity, other officials said, and sectarian violence is increasing - up 22 percent in the first three weeks of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan over previous weeks, Caldwell said. The Iraqi government is plagued by corruption and ineffectiveness.

Earlier this week, Iraqi forces lost control of the mostly Shiite city of Balad, months after U.S. forces handed control of the community to local leaders. U.S. forces had to intervene to stop tit-for-tat violence between the residents of Balad and neighboring Sunnis.

On Friday, hundreds of Shiite militiamen took over three police stations in the southern city of Amara. British troops joined Iraqi security forces in trying to restore order.

U.S. officials were particularly frustrated by Maliki's recent decision to order the release of Sheik Mazin al Saidy, a top associate of fiery Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is thought to be responsible for much of the sectarian killings.

U.S. officials had planned to trumpet the arrest as a significant step toward stopping the surge of sectarian violence. But Maliki intervened and demanded Saidy's release, pointing out that he was the elected leader of a democratic Iraq.

To Iraqi Sunnis, the decision was more evidence that the Iraqi government is aligned with Shiite death squads. To U.S. military officials, it was a troubling development in their campaign to crack down on sectarian violence.

Some senior officials in Washington, all of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity because their reports are classified and their advice to the president and the defense secretary is confidential, echoed the frustrations in Iraq.

Some have concluded that current U.S. troop levels and deployments aren't sufficient to stem the rising sectarian violence, but that sending additional troops wouldn't change the equation. Some say that the U.S. effort to train Iraqi police and troops to take over security has failed because the Iraqi forces are either overwhelmed by or in league with sectarian militias.

Earlier this week, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage suggested a gradual reduction of U.S. troops, perhaps at a rate of about 5 percent every few months.

"We can't win on the battlefield," said Armitage, who served throughout Bush's first term. "The problem is that this is now a political struggle being carried out amid chaos, and we can't wish stability on the Iraqis. They have to be willing to fight for it."

Asked if he thought that staying the course remains an option, Armitage replied: "If the definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result, then clearly it isn't. The problem is that you can change tactics in an hour, but it takes time to change strategy, and it's too late for that now."

One senior official said advocates of change have mounted a "low-wattage mutiny" to try to convince Bush to try a new approach.

DOJ_NMG_0084008

So far, though, it seems to have had little impact on the president.

"All these proposals have one thing in common: they would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done," Bush said on Thursday at another Republican fundraiser, after summing up the various options offered by his critics. "America will stay, we will fight, and we will win in Iraq."

Hutcheson reported from Washington, Youssef from Baghdad. McClatchy correspondents Drew Brown and John Walcott in Washington contributed to this report.

Bush: I Won't Change Strategy In Iraq (AP)

By Deb Riechmann And Kevin Freking

AP, October 21, 2006

President Bush conceded Friday that "right now it's tough" for American forces in Iraq, but the White House said he would not change U.S. strategy in the face of pre-election polls that show voters are upset.

With Republicans anxious about the potential loss of Congress — and with conditions seemingly deteriorating in Iraq — Bush addressed the question of whether he would alter his policies.

"We are constantly adjusting our tactics so that we achieve the objective, and right now it's tough, it's tough," Bush said in an Associated Press interview.

Bush met with Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, at the White House for a half-hour Friday afternoon. The White House said Abizaid already was in town and Bush asked him over. The president also will consult by video conference on Saturday with Abizaid at U.S. Central Command in Tampa, Fla., and with Gen. George Casey, who leads the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, to determine if a change in tactics is necessary to combat the increasing violence.

Despite calls for change, Bush said, "Our goal has not changed. Our goal is a country that can defend, sustain and govern itself, a country that which will serve as an ally in this war. Our tactics are adjusting."

There were fresh signs of Republican doubts about the war. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, who holds a seat deemed safe for the GOP, said in a campaign debate Thursday she would have voted against the war had she known ousted Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein possessed no weapons of mass destruction.

Democrats also kept up the pressure on Bush. In a letter to the president, a dozen House and Senate Democratic leaders urged him to bring home some U.S. troops and force the Iraqis to take more responsibility for their security. The Democrats said Bush should do more to pressure Iraqi leaders to disarm militias and find a political solution that would curb violence.

"The steadily mounting sectarian violence, growing insurgency and escalating casualty figures in Iraq are unacceptable and unsustainable," the Democrats said. "We urge you to change course, level with the American people and join with us to develop a policy that will work before the situation in Iraq is irretrievable."

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow said that while Bush might change tactics, he would not change his overall strategy.

"He's not somebody who gets jumpy at polls," Snow said of Bush.

Bush, at a political fundraiser in Washington for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, railed against Democrats who criticize the war. Calling the Democrats the party of "cut and run," Bush said voters need to ask: "Which political party has a strategy for victory in this war on terror?' "

As of Friday, the U.S. combat death toll in Iraq during October stood at 75 — possibly heading for the highest for any month in nearly two years. Now in its fourth year, the war has claimed the lives of at least 2,786 Americans. Approval of Bush's handling of Iraq has dipped to 37 percent among likely voters in the AP-Ipsos poll early this month, down slightly from 41 percent last month.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said the Iraqi government must become less reliant on the United States to handle security. He also said U.S. officials are working with the Iraqis to develop projections on when that might happen.

"It's their country, they're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later," Rumsfeld said.

"The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part, instead of developing strength and capacity and competence," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0084009

Doubts about the effectiveness of current tactics have risen, and the U.S. military has said its two-month drive to crush insurgent and militia violence in Baghdad has fallen short. Attacks in Baghdad rose by 22 percent in the first three weeks of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, compared with the three previous weeks.

On Friday, the Shiite militia run by the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr briefly seized control of the southern Iraqi city of Amarah in one of the most brazen acts of defiance yet by the country's powerful, unofficial armies. Tom Casey, deputy spokesman at the State Department, said the United States was urging the Iraqis to make sure that security in Amarah was returned to the government.

"The flare-up of violence in Amarah points out that our strategy to quell the violence in that country is failing," said Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee.

Bush Sees Support Ebb Away For Military Strategy In Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce And Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

Support for George W. Bush's strategy of "staying the course" in Iraq appears to be crumbling, with a growing number of fellow Republicans and senior military figures questioning how long the US can sustain its presence.

The US president got a jolting reminder of the deteriorating situation when the Mahdi army of hardline Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr took control of the southern city of Amara. The putsch raised more questions over the stability of Iraq's coalition government under Nouri al-Maliki, who is nominally supported by the Sadrist group that carried it out.

It follows some of the worst violence in Iraq since the US-led invasion, with more than 100 civilian deaths a day over the past three weeks and more than 70 US military casualties. Major General William Caldwell, US military spokesman in Baghdad, acknowledged on Thursday that the strategy of "clear and hold" in Baghdad was failing.

Mr Bush conceded yesterday that he was increasingly flexible about America's military strategy. In the past few weeks he has abandoned talk of achieving "victory" in Iraq - previously a stock-in-trade of presidential announcements. "We are constantly adjusting tactics so we can achieve our objectives," Mr Bush said. "And right now, it's tough."

Domestic pressure on him is mounting ahead of a widely predicted Republican defeat in the November 7 mid-term elections.

"We are now way past the tipping point on the ground in Iraq," said Gary Samore at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "But it is doubtful there will be any change of course until we see the results of the mid-term elections."

Mr Bush's difficulties have been exacerbated by growing dissent within his own party, with Republican congressional candidates distancing themselves from Washington's "stay the course" line. In what analysts see as a sign of growing desperation, some even support a widely-distrusted plan to partition Iraq into separate Kurdish, Shia and Sunni entities.

Attention is increasingly focused on the Iraq Study Group, an independent body led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic lawmaker, which is expected to recommend a drastic change of course. Some think it could lead to the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, defence secretary, soon after the polls.

"A lot rides on the outcome of the elections," an ISG member in Washington said last night. "If the Democrats win, the pressure on Mr Bush to start drawing down the troops could be overwhelming. If the Republicans retain control of Congress, then you could see more US troops sent there in a last-ditch effort to stabilise the violence."

Amara Violence Increases Strains On Unified Iraq Idea (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson And Daniel Williams

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- A Shiite militia clashed with Iraqi police today in an effort to take over the southern Iraqi city of Amara, raising questions about whether the U.S.-backed central government and its army can keep the country whole.

Hooded gunmen wearing black uniforms seized Amara for a few hours, and 25 people died in gun battles before the Iraqi Army moved in to retake the city of 750,000, the Associated Press reported.

The fighting involving the Mahdi Army militia broke out yesterday after a police intelligence officer linked to a rival militia was killed. In retaliation, a brother of the Mahdi Army commander in the city was abducted, and demands were made for the official's killers to be handed over, according to AP. Mahdi Army gunmen, loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, carried out the assault on Amara. Al-Sadr made an appeal for calm.

DOJ_NMG_0084010

The violence in Amara demonstrates how events may be overrunning the U.S. policy of supporting a unified Iraqi government, and also driving a de facto division of the country along ethnic and sectarian lines. President George W. Bush has so far rejected any recommendation to divide the country, saying it would only lead to more violence.

``You don't want to create the Balkans," Bush spokesman Tony Snow said today in Washington. Ethnic conflicts erupted in the Balkans after the breakup of Yugoslavia in the 1990s, killing tens of thousands of people. The U.S. will continue urging Iraqis to identify themselves as one people, recalling how 12 million citizens turned out a year ago for the first democratic election in decades, Snow said.

At least three police stations and several other facilities were attacked in Amara, Sheik Abdul Kareem al-Muhammadawi, a tribal leader, told the New York Times in a telephone interview. He said the Iraqi police were outgunned and lacked sufficient weapons and ammunition.

Status of Amara

The Iraqi police in Amara are able to ``contain" the fighting, according to the U.K. Ministry of Defense, which has responsibility for southern Iraq. CNN broadcast pictures of masked men toting automatic weapons on the streets of Amara as black smoke billowed behind them.

An independent commission set up by Congress and led by former Secretary of State James Baker III is set to make recommendations on Iraq before the end of the year. Baker has said Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government is running out of time to demonstrate that it can get control of the country. He has also said creating three Iraqi states in a loose federation is one of the ideas that the panel is reviewing.

Republican Rift

As the idea of creating semi-autonomous states for Kurds and Shiite and Sunni Muslims gains attention, splits are emerging between President George W. Bush and Republican lawmakers.

The break was highlighted this week when Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Texas Republican, endorsed greater autonomy for Iraq's main groups.

``We have to step back and stop trying to put our American ideas onto this problem and start trying to get an understanding of their views, and strong-held prejudices," Hutchinson told the Houston Chronicle.

``There are many Republicans who are privately saying they want to see the decentralization idea tried," Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations and an advocate of decentralizing Iraqi power, said today in a telephone interview.

Gelb said these Republicans will not go public until after the midterm congressional elections a few weeks away. Until then, Gelb said he is ``honor-bound" not to name the dissenters.

Government Model, Poll

The Iraqi Constitution already allows regions to exercise limited self-government while giving the central government authority over common interests, such as border defense, foreign affairs and oil revenues.

Iraqis favor the centralized form of government in place now, according to a poll released last month by the University of Maryland. Asked whether their new system ``grants the central government too much power, too little power or about the right amount," only 37 percent of the 1,150 Iraqi adults questioned said it gave too much power.

Senator Joseph Biden of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, joined Gelb last May to recommend amending the Iraqi Constitution to establish independently governed Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions with a central government in Baghdad to manage common interests.

`Emerging Reality'

Under the proposal, Sunnis would be guaranteed 20 percent of oil revenue to match their share of the population. In a New York Times commentary they cited the success of Bosnia's Dayton Accords a decade ago that brought peace to that part of the Balkans.

``At least this idea has a chance because it fits the emerging reality on the ground," Gelb said today.

Iraq's Arab neighbors, along with Turkey, all oppose partition or federalism. Several states have minorities within their own borders and regard partition in Iraq as a bad precedent. Arab states, ruled mostly by Sunni Muslim administrations, are reluctant to see Shiites and Kurds benefit from partition, due to their control of the southern and northern oil fields, while Sunnis in the center of Iraq are left without oil.

The traditional rivalry between Arabs and Iranians makes any partition of Iraq problematic. Many Arab governments view such a partition as an opportunity for Iran to gain influence in the Arab Middle East.

As early as 2003, Egypt's president Hosni Mubarak expressed opposition to ``trends towards partitioning the country." Last April, Mubarak went further and warned that Iran's influence in southern Iraq was poisoning the region.

An Old Bush Hand Takes On A New Role On The Iraq War (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20 — For years, James A. Baker III was asked to explain why the first President Bush, whom he served as secretary of state, did not oust Saddam Hussein in 1991 at the end of the Persian Gulf war.

“Guess what?” Mr. Baker says these days. “Nobody asks me that anymore.”

Of course, Mr. Baker is still asked about Iraq. But the questions now focus on what strategies he and the Iraq Study Group, which he helps lead, will propose to deal with the Iraq war that the current President Bush started, taking on a job that his father began but cut short.

In a telephone interview on Friday, Mr. Baker said he was reluctant to take the job as the Republican co-chairman of the bipartisan group when Congressional leaders and members of the Bush administration urged him to do it, suggesting that was what Mr. Bush wanted. “My attitude was that if the president wants me to do this, he’ll look me in the eye and say, ‘Please do it,’ ” Mr. Baker said. “And that’s what he did. The point being, I wasn’t going to get involved in an intramural contest about what the policy on Iraq should or shouldn’t be without his approval.”

Asserting that Mr. Bush has an unwarranted reputation for not listening to dissenting views, Mr. Baker added: “It seems to me that this project demonstrates one heck of a lot of flexibility. He’s very interested in what this panel has to say.”

Mr. Bush has opened himself to the new ideas when the war is presenting some of the problems the elder Mr. Bush and his aides, in their own memoirs, have said they worried about in 1991. They feared that Iraq would be torn by sectarian strife and that the United States would face worldwide resentment and a backlash at home.

Mr. Baker leads the study group with Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana who is now director of the Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars in Washington. Its work is to be completed in December or January, a timetable set up at the group’s beginning to keep its conclusions out of the current election campaign.

Few outside the group know what it will recommend. Speculation has centered on the possibility of a phased military withdrawal from Iraq; a possible separation of Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish areas; some kind of international protectorate to secure Baghdad; and greater involvement in Iraq and the region by Iran and other neighbors.

But as a personal drama, the study group has set off fevered talk in Washington, ranging from the political to the psychological, especially now that Mr. Baker has declared that neither Mr. Bush’s “stay the course” message nor what the White House calls the “cut and run” approach of critics offers a way out.

“There are other options other than just those two,” Mr. Baker said recently on National Public Radio while promoting his new book, “Work Hard, Study and Keep Out of Politics.” His group’s proposals, Mr. Baker added, will probably not please the administration or its foes.

Mr. Baker’s long association with the Bush family has often led to his coming to the rescue in bad situations. But the talk in Washington about the panel’s work is filled with rich historical antiphonies.

In late 1992, for example, he resigned as secretary of state to try to save the first President Bush’s faltering re-election campaign; Mr. Baker was openly reluctant to leave the citadel of diplomacy at the end of the cold war to return to the petty world of political handlers.

DOJ_NMG_0084012

Family associates have said that George W. Bush was among those who resented Mr. Baker at the time for his mixed feelings about leaving when his father needed help. Running for president eight years later, the younger Mr. Bush, by then governor of Texas, turned to many longtime Republican strategists, including former Secretary of State George P. Shultz, but not Mr. Baker. "That was O.K. with me," Mr. Baker wrote in his book.

But in the crisis over the vote count in Florida in 2000, the younger Mr. Bush was prevailed on to reach out to Mr. Baker. People close to the family said Mr. Baker's brilliant managing of the team of lawyers and political experts in that fight banished the younger man's doubts about his loyalty.

"My perception is that Baker feels that with Florida he recouped his relationship with the family," said a friend of Mr. Baker's. "That's very important to him personally."

That friend as well as others who spoke for this article did not want to be quoted discussing Mr. Baker's relationship with the Bush family, a subject that Mr. Baker himself refuses to talk about.

The friendship between Mr. Baker and the elder Mr. Bush is legendary among their friends. The two men had been friends for years when Mr. Baker's wife died of breast cancer in 1970, leaving him close to despair. Mr. Bush offered Mr. Baker refuge from his grief by asking him to join his Senate campaign in Texas, though Mr. Baker had to change his registration from Democrat to Republican.

The Senate campaign failed, and Mr. Baker went on to more failures and successes: managing Mr. Bush's first presidential run in 1980, serving as President Reagan's chief of staff and treasury secretary, then as manager of Mr. Bush's successful White House campaign in 1988 and later as Mr. Bush's secretary of state.

For some time, Mr. Baker now acknowledges, he shared the limited regard that many people had of George W. Bush. Like others, he attributes Mr. Bush's eventual success to the discipline and Christian faith that led him to turn his life around in his 40's. In his book, Mr. Baker said he has tremendous admiration for the current president.

But reading between the lines, it seems that admiration may not extend to others in the Bush administration.

The Iraq Study Group, for example, may not recommend a change of personnel in the administration along with a change of course, but many doubt that those associated with the current approach could carry out a new one.

It is well known that Mr. Baker is not a great fan of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Baker said in his book that Mr. Rumsfeld "engineered" the elder Mr. Bush out of contention as a vice-presidential candidate under President Ford in 1976.

Mr. Baker wrote of the "costly mistakes" of the war, including the lack of adequate troops and the dismantling of the Iraqi Army. But he attributed those failings to the Defense Department, not the White House.

The one hallmark of Mr. Baker's efforts, associates said, is that he would not undertake a project destined to sit on a shelf and be ignored. "Jim Baker knows that Iraq is a mess," said Dennis B. Ross, the longtime Middle East envoy who remains a close adviser to Mr. Baker. "But this is not going to be an academic exercise. He's going to try to come up with a solution that also allows him to persuade the president that this is the right way to go."

If there is an analogy to Mr. Baker's enterprise, it could be the Social Security commission of the early 1980's under President Reagan. There was an impasse between Mr. Reagan and House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., the Democratic lion and opponent of Mr. Reagan's desire to overhaul the system.

Alan Greenspan, the retired chairman of the commission, recalled in an interview that he had remained in constant touch with Mr. Baker, then White House chief of staff, while the commission's top Democrat was in constant touch with Mr. O'Neill.

The eventual compromise preserved the Social Security system, but subjected benefits of the wealthy to taxation.

"Jim is one of the best negotiators I've ever seen," Mr. Greenspan said. "Were he not involved in the Social Security commission, I seriously question whether we could have pulled it off."

Bush Pins Label Of 'Defeat' Party On Democrats (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

President Bush yesterday said Democrats became the party of "doubt and defeat" during the fight against communism in the Cold War, and said it shows today in their calls for withdrawal from Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0084013

The president also said terrorists are trying to influence the debate in the United States by making images and video clips of their attacks on U.S. troops available to cable news networks "and opinion leaders throughout the West."

"The Democrat Party that has evolved from one that was confident in its capacity to help deal with the problems of the world to one that is doubting, today still has an approach of doubt and defeat," Mr. Bush said in a campaign speech to donors to the National Republican Senatorial Committee at the Mayflower Hotel near the White House.

He said that shift began in 1972, with the nomination of George McGovern to run for president, continued into President Jimmy Carter's administration and characterized Democrats during Republican President Ronald Reagan's administration.

"They'd gotten to the point where they didn't think that we could win," Mr. Bush said. "Many of their leaders fought the Reagan defense buildup; they fought his Strategic Defense Initiative; they opposed the liberation of Grenada; they didn't like America's support for freedom fighters resisting Soviet puppet regimes."

He contrasted that with Presidents John F. Kennedy and Harry S. Truman, who he said "understood the challenges of their time and were willing to confront those challenges with strong leadership."

Mr. Bush finds himself trying to rally support for the war in Iraq in the face of declining support for both the war and for his own presidency, and with congressional elections little more than two weeks away.

He also is facing more questions from inside his party, as well as from Democrats, over specific tactics and strategy during a violent month for both U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians.

In an interview with the Associated Press yesterday, Mr. Bush acknowledged "tough" times in Iraq, but said the United States is always changing tactics.

The president met yesterday with Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. Central Command, and is scheduled today to hold a briefing with military commanders and top civilian officials.

Democrats said the current flare-up in violence means Mr. Bush's strategy is failing.

"The eruptive situation in Iraq reflects that we are reaping the ultimate results of perils of the amateur strategy formulated by our civilian leaders in the early phases of this conflict," said Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee.

Mr. Skelton, a respected Democratic voice on military matters, said there needs to be "a major change in strategy that will shift the military mission to the Iraqis, allowing for the redeployment over time of American forces, and that will pressure the Iraqi government to disarm the militias."

Meanwhile, the Democratic leadership in the House and Senate wrote a letter urging Mr. Bush to tell the Iraqis the U.S. commitment is not limitless.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld seemed to agree yesterday, saying in a briefing with reporters that U.S. officials are working with the Iraqi government to try to set a schedule for turning over responsibility for the country's security.

"It's their country, they're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later. And that means they've got to take pieces of it as we go along," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Over the past two days, the Bush administration has argued that the increased violence is an attempt to influence U.S. opinion, particularly in the run-up to the midterm elections. Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the multinational force in Iraq, raised that possibility Thursday, as did White House spokesman Tony Snow.

And yesterday Mr. Bush said the terrorists exploit the press by filming their attacks and e-mailing images and video clips "to Middle Eastern cable networks like Al Jazeera, and opinion leaders throughout the West."

Mr. Snow later pointed to CNN as a network that "has shown pictures of snipers hitting Americans, which was used as a propaganda tool," as evidence of that claim.

But Mr. Snow said those videos are one-sided, and don't do justice to the state of the war.

"I'm sure the editors are savvy enough to know that when they get a video like this, it's designed less to give you a full and complete view of what's going on in the country than to create a sense of triumphalism for the killers of Americans," he said. "That's the intention of that. I think that's hard to dispute."

Hutchison: WMD Info Swayed Vote On Iraq (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0084014

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP, October 21, 2006

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, one of President Bush's most ardent loyalists on the war in Iraq, voiced her strongest criticism yet of the administration's reasons for going to war.

In a debate with her challenger in the Nov. 7 election, Hutchison, R-Texas, said she would not have voted for war had she known there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. But she also made it clear she does not support troop withdrawal.

"If I had known then what I know now about the weapons of mass destruction, which was a key reason that I voted to go in there, I would not vote to go into Iraq the way we did," Hutchison said. "But I have to say, I don't think the president would have asked for that vote, either. We had intelligence that we relied on."

Her comments Thursday night come as a small but growing number of Republicans are suggesting a change in the Iraq strategy may be necessary.

She recently has been edging slightly away from President Bush on the war. This week she told Texas newspapers the option of partitioning Iraq into semiautonomous regions should be considered.

The White House said it has rejected that option.

In July 2004, the bipartisan Senate Intelligence Committee found key U.S. assertions leading to the Iraq war — that Saddam Hussein had chemical and biological weapons and was working to make nuclear weapons — were wrong or based on faulty CIA analyses.

A September report by a Democratic Senate panel said the White House painted a portrait of Iraq of having ties to al-Qaida based in part on intelligence it knew was flawed.

Republicans attacked the report as recycled information and accused Democrats of election-year politicking on the eve of the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks.

Hutchison's opponent, Democrat Barbara Radnofsky criticized the senator's debate statement, saying it was evidence the U.S. should not be in Iraq.

"It's clear the Senate papers reflect a lack of consensus or decisiveness that there was weapons of mass destruction. They were there, she just didn't read them," Radnofsky said.

Allen Faces Questions On Iraq War Stance (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, October 21, 2006

Republican Sen. George Allen called for "changes in tactics" in how the U.S. is fighting the Iraq war on Friday as he continued to face questions about his morphing position on the war.

"The situation there is one that needs adjustments, that needs changes in tactics. We need to adapt to the situation on the ground," Allen said at a campaign event Friday morning with GOP leaders of the state legislature.

Even so, Allen, whom polls show to be in a tight Senate race with Democratic candidate Jim Webb, has yet to reject or criticize the hard line on Iraq that he had touted for months and that President Bush repeated Thursday at an Allen fundraiser.

Allen and Webb appeared separately later Friday in Hampton at a forum of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, where each signed up for lifetime membership.

Allen used the event to try to put behind him allegations that he has been insensitive to racial concerns, recounting efforts to provide money for historically black colleges and universities, as well as his trip to Selma, Ala., with Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., to honor the bloody civil rights march there 40 years ago.

Once regarded only as a warm-up race for a presumed 2008 Allen presidential bid, the race became competitive in August after Allen singled out a man of Indian descent before a mostly white crowd at a rally and called him "macaca," which can be considered a racial slur.

Webb couched the coming election as "a choice between those who have power and those who will stand up to power."

DOJ_NMG_0084015

Webb has been a critic of the war since 2002, before the U.S.-led invasion, when he wrote that it would mire the United States in a bloody and protracted quagmire and destabilize the oil-rich region. He cited the war, in part, for his decision to leave the GOP. He was asked no questions about Iraq at the Friday event.

Allen began shifting his public position on the unpopular war two weeks ago after fellow Virginia Sen. John Warner, a five-term moderate and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, returned from an Iraq visit saying the war was "drifting sideways," with Iraq's fledgling government unable to disarm its deadly sectarian militias.

Allen continued to hedge his views on the war at the NAACP event.

"Progress in Iraq has not been sufficiently fast as far as I'm concerned," Allen said. But he added, "to leave Iraq a safe haven for terrorists is not an acceptable risk."

On Friday, Allen began televising a new ad in which John Warner says, "George and I stand for a safe and strong America."

Even in conservative Virginia, polls show lagging support for the war. A recent Washington Post poll of 1,004 likely Virginia voters showed that 44 percent believed the war worth fighting considering its costs to the U.S., and 54 percent said it was not worth fighting.

But Allen won't stiff-arm the president, who on Thursday raised an estimated $600,000 for him in a paid media campaign that is costing both sides well over $1 million a week in television time alone.

"I think the point of the matter we ought to take into consideration is the risk here, the risk facing our country, how we need to improve, how we need to adapt, how the Iraqi people have to stand up for their own sovereignty and control their own destiny," Allen said Friday.

A Washington Post poll released Sunday showed Allen favored by 49 percent of voters surveyed last week, while Webb had 47 percent support. The results were within the poll's margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Take Over Security (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, October 21, 2006

The Iraqi government is going to have to take over its country's security "sooner rather than later," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Friday, as the violence there continued to escalate.

Rumsfeld said U.S. officials, including Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility. He provided no detail.

"The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part, instead of developing strength and capacity and competence," said Rumsfeld. "It's their country, they're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later. And that means they've got to take pieces of it as we go along."

Rumsfeld has made similar comments before about gradually turning control of the country from American forces to Iraqi authorities.

But Friday's remarks came less than three weeks before elections in which Democrats are threatening to recapture control of Congress. A leading issue in the campaign is the war, which is widely unpopular with voters. U.S. deaths have surpassed 2,780, and President Bush is under growing pressure from lawmakers of both parties to alter his policies.

The secretary also said military commanders will speak with Bush on Saturday to discuss the situation in Iraq, although he said such discussions are not unusual.

He also said the biggest mistake would be to not continue turning regions of the country over to the Iraqis, even if that means the U.S. has to go back and retake control because the Iraqis are overwhelmed.

In recent weeks, the security situation in Iraq has continued to spiral out of control. Shiite militia stormed police stations in Amarah Friday, seizing that southern Iraqi city. Bush noted he was scheduled to speak with U.S. commanders to determine if a change in tactics is necessary to combat the escalating violence.

Bush told The Associated Press that the situation is Iraq is "tough" and that the Iraqi government is going to have to deal firmly with the militias.

DOJ_NMG_0084016

On Thursday the U.S. military acknowledged that the latest two-month operation to quell the violence had not met expectations and defense officials were rethinking their strategy there. There are currently 144,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

Rumsfeld spoke to reporters at the conclusion of meetings with South Korea's defense minister, Yoon Kwang Ung, to discuss a number of issues. They included North Korea's recent nuclear test and the ongoing U.S. commitment to defend the region against a nuclear threat.

Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Stand Up 'Sooner' (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 21, 2006

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told reporters Friday that Iraq must take responsibility "sooner rather than later" for its own security.

At a briefing, Rumsfeld refused to say whether a "course correction" is needed in U.S. strategy. He said he prefers to give his advice directly to the president, the Washington Post reported.

Rumsfeld is scheduled to confer Saturday with President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command. Gen. George Casey, the head of U.S. forces in Iraq, is to join the discussion from Baghdad by video.

October has been an especially deadly month for U.S. forces in Iraq and for Iraqis. Last weekend, sectarian violence erupted in Bladad, a city north of Baghdad, while U.S. troops in a massive base nearby did nothing for several days, the newspaper said.

Exit Vibrations (WT)

By Clarence Page

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

President Bush says it's not true, but recent events related to Iraq indicate the administration is leaning toward the George Aiken option: Declare victory and come home.

Mr. Aiken is the late Republican senator from Vermont who is credited with offering that advice early in the Vietnam War. It could have saved us Americans and the Vietnamese a lot of grief.

A number of observers in recent years, including your humble column-scrivener, have suggested a similar answer to our worsening, no-win situation in Iraq. The White House has not listened, and the Iraq debacle has gotten worse. Iraq has sunk deeper into what looks like a civil war and the Bush administration has sunk deeper into denial.

But recent events indicate that, despite Mr. Bush's mantra about "staying the course" in Iraq, he's looking for an exit strategy.

Former Secretary of State James Baker, a savvy negotiator and reliable Bush family friend, has re-emerged as the Republican co-chairman with former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. With the administration's support, the study group was created at the urging of Congress last March to reassess the war and come up with suggestions.

The group is withholding its report until after the November elections. But Mr. Baker's remarks in recent interviews offer important hints.

For example, Mr. Baker teased our curiosity in an ABC-TV interview last Sunday with this: "I think it's fair to say our commission believes that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives -- the ones that are out there in the political debate -- of 'stay the course' and 'cut and run.'"

Amid the cacophony of Washington's polarized shouting matches, Mr. Baker's words sounded like the voice of reason Americans took for granted in the years of President George H.W. Bush. Mr. Baker stood with the elder Mr. Bush against those who wanted the U.S. to invade Baghdad during the Persian Gulf war, in defiance of the United Nations mandate. The regional instability Mr. Baker feared from such an invasion has happened with today's Iraq war.

Obviously, the younger Mr. Bush should have listened to Mr. Baker's advice before embarking on his Iraq adventure. Instead, he went along in the heat of post-September 11 passions with Vice President Dick Cheney and other eager neo-conservatives who thought U.S. soldiers would be greeted with flowers and candy.

DOJ_NMG_0084017

Author-journalist Bob Woodward and other close observers say the younger Mr. Bush steadfastly avoids turning to his dad for advice, for reasons all his own, despite his father's superior international expertise. Yet, though the younger Bush's often vows to "stay the course" against those who want to "cut and run," he also says he is willing to "change tactics" in Iraq if the Baker-Hamilton group recommends it.

If so, the Baker group could offer cover for the younger Mr. Bush to do something he is loathe to do in public: change his mind.

His promise to "stay the course" in Iraq until "the job gets done" could undergo subtle alteration. If Mr. Baker's group defines a new "job" for America in Iraq, it could "get done" in whatever way the president says it should. Americans could declare victory and come home.

But what next? If Mr. Bush's softened stance offers a light at the end of Iraq's long, dark tunnel, to borrow a Vietnam-era metaphor, let us hope the light is not that of an oncoming train.

In interviews, Mr. Baker has rejected a quick withdrawal from Iraq, fearing "the biggest civil war you've ever seen." Unfortunately, the mounting casualties amid factional fighting indicate Iraq already has a growing civil war.

In fact, Iraq's best direction may come through a partitioning of the country between its dominant Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish factions. President Bush rejected that option this week in expressing support for Iraq's embattled Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

But that's just as well. An American endorsement of partitioning probably would doom its acceptance by Iraqis and their regional neighbors. If Iraq is to be partitioned, responsible Iraqi leaders will have to work that out.

Mr. Baker is right to say Americans cannot be the sole deciders of Iraq's future. There are no perfect or peaceful solutions for Iraq in the short term. There are more hard days to come. But, whether in war or in peace, Iraq's future ultimately must be decided by Iraqis. As that happens, the best thing that Americans can do is to declare victory and get out of the way.

Clarence Page is a nationally syndicated columnist.

Sadr Militia Briefly Seizes Southern City (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Deadly Fighting Reflects Rifts Among Iraqi Shiites

BAGHDAD, Oct. 20 -- Members of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia headed by firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, briefly took over the southern Iraqi city of Amarah and battled with the local Shiite police before withdrawing on Friday, in a bloody feud that illustrated deepening rifts within Iraq's largest sect and the growing turmoil in the south.

As many as 25 people, including 10 policemen, were killed in street fighting and mortar attacks that raged in Amarah, a predominantly Shiite city about 190 miles southeast of Baghdad, from midday Thursday until about 2 p.m. Friday. The militia attacked the headquarters and two stations of the city police department, which is reportedly aligned with the Badr Brigades, an arm of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite religious party.

Each side blamed the other in a cycle of retaliatory clashes with tribal overtones.

Residents reached by telephone said the conflict began when a police intelligence chief with the Supreme Council was assassinated, and police responded by arresting the brother of a local Mahdi Army chief.

Negotiations to release him broke down, they said, and at about 1 p.m. on Thursday members of the Mahdi Army attacked three police facilities with mortar fire and rocket-propelled grenades. The militia imposed a curfew and patrolled the streets with loudspeakers, ordering residents to stay inside.

The takeover ended, according to Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a British military spokesman, "when Moqtada al-Sadr told them to stop. The situation now is calm but tense."

Burbridge said about 200 to 300 gunmen were involved in the attacks. He said the local police chief said that 10 of his men were killed and that police killed 15 members of the militia and wounded 90.

Burbridge said police officers were back in their stations and in control of the streets. He said 220 Iraqi army troops were in the town supporting them, and that 700 more Iraqi soldiers and 500 British troops were on standby to go if requested.

DOJ_NMG_0084018

British troops withdrew from Amarah, the capital of Maysan province, two months ago after their camp came under repeated mortar fire from Shiite militiamen identified by local residents as members of the Mahdi Army.

Southern Iraq, a Shiite stronghold, has generally been spared the intense bloodletting that terrorist attacks and sectarian violence have brought to much of the rest of the country. But the Mahdi Army's takeover of Amarah, even if only temporary, is another sign that the south is becoming more restive as the rest of the country slips toward open civil war.

It also is a stark illustration of the deepening tension among Shiite leaders as the United States pushes the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to rein in militias, particularly Sadr's. The Mahdi Army has openly fought U.S. forces and has been accused of ruthlessly attacking Sunni Arabs and forcing them from their homes and towns. The fierce struggle between Shiite factions at the local level mirrors that at the national level, where the same groups are flexing their political and military muscle in a battle for control.

Maliki, who heads a government led by Shiite religious parties and was backed by Sadr, sent a ministerial team led by Sherwan al-Wailli, minister of state for national security, to the province to help settle the conflict.

"This was a very serious incident, but the silver lining is that Iraqi security forces were able to deal with it without the need of multinational forces to intervene," Burbridge said. "The Iraqi police and army resolved the situation, and it was conducted through negotiations instead of armed violence."

In Baghdad, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf Kinany, said the clashes were not driven by intra-Shiite conflict, but by tribal differences.

"The clashes in Amarah were not between the police and the Mahdi Army," he said. "Police had in fact interfered to settle a tribal dispute between the tribe of the police officer, the head of the intelligence division . . . and the tribesmen of the suspects who were arrested by the police on suspicion of carrying out the assassination."

Burbridge described the gunmen as "a rogue element of one militia" who gave up the fight about 2 p.m. Friday after "their leadership told them to come back into line, and the violence stopped."

Special correspondent Saad al-Izzi contributed to this report.

Siege Of Amarah Reflects Trouble In Baghdad (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Deadly clashes between Shiite fighters and police ebb. But two days of mayhem show the Iraqi government's difficulty reining in militias.

BAGHDAD — As hundreds of masked, black-clad men descended on a normally quiet southern city Friday and gunfire echoed outside, Ahmed and Roqayah Jasim locked the doors of their modest home. They prayed for themselves and their three young children.

Then they heard a knock on the door. Ahmed, a 33-year-old teacher, reluctantly opened it. A fighter no older than 20 stood holding a sniper rifle.

"He didn't threaten me," Ahmed said later, still stunned. "He just asked me, like a favor, 'Can I use your roof to shoot from ?' And I said, 'No you can't. I have a family.' He seemed to understand, and so he left."

By Friday evening, two days of fighting in the southern city of Amarah between police and the Al Mahdi army militia, which is loyal to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, had eased. The national government rushed soldiers and a high-level security delegation to the city, led by national security minister Sherwan Waili. Sadr also sent representatives. Government officials and tribal elders met into the evening, trying to negotiate a solution to the conflict.

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said in Washington that he believed Iraqi security forces had regained control of the area.

But the two-day offensive by the Al Mahdi army highlighted how difficult it has become for the central government and its security forces to rein in Shiite Muslim militias, both in the capital and in the south.

DOJ_NMG_0084019

The militias fired mortar rounds at police stations where officers had barricaded themselves. When police ran out of ammunition and fled, Al Mahdi militiamen blew up at least two of the stations. During 48 hours of ferocious street battles in the oil-rich city of 300,000, 22 people were killed and almost 100 were injured.

Prime Minister Nouri Maliki visited Sadr this week in the holy city of Najaf to ask for his support in clamping down on bands of militiamen who kill with impunity. But Maliki also depends for political support on Sadr, who controls 30 seats in the Council or Representatives, or parliament. And despite Sadr's intermittent calls for calm, violence has continued unabated.

Amarah residents said they were worried.

"Today we have those delegations, but what about tomorrow?" asked Khalil Rasheed, a 55-year-old shopkeeper, who said his city was beset by armed thugs bent on enforcing religious rule. "The situation is more dangerous than people imagine."

"I'm worried, seeing those people taking control," said Haitham Sadek, Ahmed Jasim's colleague. "The future will be horrible if these people are going to control" Amarah, he said.

Shiite militiamen have whipped those caught drinking alcohol and killed women accused of adultery, Sadek said. He said he recently saw the funeral of a nurse who was killed after she was accused of adultery.

British troops abruptly pulled out of a base in the city in late August, to hand power to Iraqi security forces and free up the soldiers to patrol the Iranian border. Their camp was promptly pillaged and burned by looters, some of them carrying pictures of Sadr.

At the time, Sadr's militia broadcast messages over loudspeakers throughout Amarah proclaiming victory.

"This is the first Iraqi city that has kicked out the occupier," one announcement said. "We have to celebrate this occasion."

Handing over control to the Iraqi army and police is key to the strategy of U.S.-led military forces, but the Iraqis often have proved inadequate, especially when facing Shiite militias.

During a similar battle between Iraqi forces and Shiite militiamen in the southern city of Diwaniya in late August, American troops eventually had to come to the aid of beleaguered Iraqi soldiers.

Rumsfeld told reporters in Washington that there would be setbacks when U.S. and British forces handed control to Iraqi forces, and that the U.S.-led coalition would step in and try to restore order.

"It is never going to be a straight, smooth, steady path," Rumsfeld said at a news conference. "The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part instead of developing strength and capacity and competence."

Police officers in Amarah, nearly 200 miles southeast of Baghdad, stood their ground in some cases, defending stations until their ammunition ran out. But in other cases, they simply ran when faced with the heavily armed attackers, witnesses said.

Assailants overran three police stations in the city, blowing up at least two of them. Unknown gunmen burned down the local Sadr office in apparent retaliation, witnesses said.

The fighting began Thursday afternoon. Carrying AK-47s, the black-clad militiamen fanned out across the city. The gunmen stopped one police patrol, telling officers to get out of the car. Watching the officers flee, leaving guns and equipment behind, one doctor said he was sickened by how powerless he felt.

Men using loudspeakers on cars and at mosques advised residents to stay inside.

Like others, Jasim became a prisoner in his house.

"Even standing at the gate, even looking through the window, was impossible because bullets were flying in all directions," he said. When the sniper knocked on the door Friday morning, Jasim and his wife were huddling with their children, Hussein, 5; Zainab, 3; and Fatma, 1; inside the most secure room in the house.

"We were afraid but, thank God, he showed understanding," Jasim said of the sniper.

The fighting was spurred by the killing this week of the provincial head of intelligence, Col. Ali Qassem Tamimi, who died in a roadside bombing along with five of his guards. Members of his tribe accused Sadr's militia and took revenge by kidnapping the brother of the local Al Mahdi army leader.

Shahib Amiri, a Sadr official in Najaf, said the cleric had sent his delegates to try to quell the violence because he "does not accept such acts."

As elsewhere in the south, the security situation has lately deteriorated in Amarah.

DOJ_NMG_0084020

When British forces first arrived, southern Iraq was relatively peaceful and troops patrolled the streets without flak jackets, wearing soft hats instead of helmets. But the calm slowly evaporated as Shiite militias became more assertive.

By August this year, just before their departure, British troops were constantly barraged by mortar fire and rockets in their camp in Amarah.

Hamid Rashi, a government official, longed for the days when the British patrolled the city. "They are the only force who can stand in the face of the Mahdi army," he said. "I don't think that the Iraqi army can settle the situation."

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday, at least 10 people were reported killed in mortar attacks north of the capital near Balad, where sectarian fighting erupted last week. In Baghdad, four people were killed the previous night in a mortar attack, according to police officials. The American military also announced that a soldier died Friday when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb in southwest Baghdad.

louise.roug@latimes.com

Times staff writers Raheem Salman and Saif Hameed in Baghdad and Julian E. Barnes in Washington and a special correspondent in Amarah contributed to this report.

Shiite Militias Attack Iraqi Government Forces In Amara (MCT)

By Zaineb Obeid And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Hundreds of members of Shiite cleric Muqtada al Sadr's militia seized control of three police stations in a southern Iraqi city Friday, in another sign that Iraqi government forces are unable or unwilling to subdue rogue elements.

As many 20 people were killed and another 90 were injured.

Amara residents said the attack was the latest battle in a long fight for control of the city among government forces, Sadr's Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, which is backed by a rival Shiite party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. Sadr's forces and the Badr Organization receive support from Iran.

Iraqi and British officials said the city was back under control by the end of the day, but many remain worried that sectarian violence is escalating across the country as Shiite militias battle government forces, Sunni Muslim fighters and sometimes one another.

Sadrists appear to have gained considerable influence in several cities in Iraq's largely Shiite south, where they attacked government forces earlier this month in the city of Diwaniyah.

Earlier this week, Shiites and Sunnis killed each other in retaliatory violence around the northern city of Balad, a Shiite community surrounded by Sunni towns. U.S. officials, who'd handed over control of Balad to Iraqi forces last April, had to intervene to stop the violence.

Likewise, British officials had returned control of Amara - the capital of Misan province, which borders Iran - to Iraqi forces in August. They, too, had to help quell an outbreak of fighting Friday.

It's unclear how much control Sadr has over some members of his militia, which has expanded and splintered since he founded it in 2003. During Friday's fighting, some militiamen appeared to defy the firebrand cleric's orders for calm.

"I am asking all to keep quiet and not to be dragged (into) the occupation schemes, which aim to escalate strife," Sadr said in a statement. "Anybody who does not obey this order should consider himself disavowed from the Mahdi Army and bear responsibility for what he did."

The killing Wednesday of the head of police intelligence in Amara spurred a full-scale battle. Police charged that Sadrists killed Lt. Ali al Tamami, a member of the Badr Organization. The next day, his family captured the brother of a local Mahdi Army leader, charging that he was responsible for Tamimi's murder, said Abdul Mahdi Omar, a member of the provincial council.

The Mahdi Army said it would attack if police didn't release the captive by 2 p.m. Friday. When he wasn't freed, hundreds of gunmen stormed the city's two police stations and its major crimes unit, setting them ablaze and destroying the buildings.

"All the police stations in the city and the suburbs and the outskirts have fallen into the Sadrists' hands," Wahid Hammed, 38, a worker in Amara, said in a midday interview with McClatchy Newspapers. "The Sadrists control the city."

DOJ_NMG_0084021

Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki sent a delegation to the city to try to calm tensions, and it was negotiating a peace deal along with tribal leaders. After they began meeting and Sadr issued a statement, the situation began to calm down, residents said. But a Mahdi Army Web site said militiamen had to defy Sadr's orders briefly to reclaim control of their Amara office from the police.

In other news, U.S. officials announced that a soldier was killed Friday by a homemade bomb in southern Baghdad, bringing the monthly death toll for the American military in Iraq to at least 74. If the trend continues, October could be the deadliest month for the U.S. since November 2004, when American forces launched an offensive in the mostly Sunni western city of Fallujah.

Amara Unrest Strains Plans For Unified Iraq (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent, And Agencies

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

A radical Iraqi militia group stormed police stations in a bid to take over the southern provincial capital of Amara on Friday, in a move that threatens to set back British plans to hand over control of the area to local security forces.

Fighters from the Mahdi Army, a movement that is nominally loyal to the Shia radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, seized and demolished three police stations, news agencies quoted witnesses and police as saying. Others patrolled the streets and commandeered police vehicles or set up checkpoints on the outskirts of town. At least 15 people were reported killed. The fighting, which appears to be a feud between rival Shia factions, comes amid US attempts to force the government of prime minister Nouri al-Maliki to clamp down on militia activity. Complicating the situation is the fact that a number of seats in Mr Maliki's Shia-led coalition are occupied by politicians loyal to Mr Sadr.

The Iraqi government dispatched an emergency delegation to Amara, a town of 75,000 people, headed by Shirwan al-Waily, minister of state for national security, and also reinforced army units in the region.

"We're still studying the situation [in Amara] and trying to figure out exactly what's going on," Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said.

Rival groups reportedly clash frequently in Maysan, the lawless province of which Amara is the capital, although Friday's fighting appeared to be far larger than any previous incident. According to wire reports, the fighting broke out after a high-ranking policeman affiliated with another militia, the Badr Brigade, was killed by a roadside bomb, and his family kidnapped the teenage brother of the Mahdi Army's local commander.

The fighters, however, reportedly withdrew from some of their positions after an envoy from Mr Sadr neg-otiated a temporary ceasefire.

The BBC reported that the British Ministry of Defence said UK troops in the area could intervene if the Iraqi government requested it.

The fighting threatens to disrupt British plans to complete the handover of the four Shia-majority provinces in their area of responsibility to local authorities. British and other coalition forces had already pulled out of two of the four provinces in their zone in June and September and withdrew from Amara in August.

A key criterion for full withdrawal would be the ability of local security forces to maintain control of the province themselves, without falling back on foreign troops or the Iraqi army.

Conflicts between Shia militias are also blamed for a surge of lawlessness in the first half of this year in the neighbouring governorate of Basra, the fourth province in the British zone.

The Mahdi Army is also blamed for much of the sectarian killing that has left thousands dead in Baghdad and central Iraq in recent months, although US officials say much of the militia has fractured into smaller cells that do not necessarily answer to Mr Sadr.

The Amara upheaval provides a further sign that the main ethnic and sectarian blocs are not only warring against each other but are fractured internally as well.

Shiite Militia Briefly Seizes Iraqi City (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084022

Black-uniformed, hooded gunmen loyal to an anti-American Shiite cleric briefly seized the major southern city of Amarah on Friday in an audacious drive against local security forces, largely controlled by Iraq's other main Shiite militia.

Twenty-five gunmen and police died in gunbattles before the Iraqi army moved in to retake the city of 750,000 people at the head of Iraq's famous marshlands where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers draw close together. Amarah is 30 miles from the border with Iran, where the Shiite theocracy is said to be funding, arming and training both rival militias.

The Amarah showdown between the two virtual private armies highlighted the potential for an all-out conflict between them and their political sponsors, both with large blocs in parliament and important to the survival of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's shaky 4-month-old government.

It also underlined the deep underlying rift that exists between the firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's faction, whose forces took Amarah on Friday, and that of the more traditional but powerful Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, headed by key power broker Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who spent decades in Iranian exile during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The U.S. exit strategy depends on returning military and political control to the Iraqi government, but outbreaks of civil conflict raise doubts about how long that will take and add urgency to a policy review under way among Bush administration political and military officials.

President Bush conceded Friday that "right now it's tough" for American forces in Iraq, but the White House said he would not change U.S. strategy in the face of pre-election polls that show voters are upset. Bush said the war was at a difficult stage and that he was preparing to consult about a change in tactics with key generals — Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, who leads the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that despite the violence in Amarah, it was not a strategic error for the British to turn over control of the city to the Iraqis in August.

"The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part, instead of developing strength and capacity and competence," Rumsfeld said.

The clashes marred the Muslim day of prayer for the second Friday in a row in cities where American and British forces had only recently ceded military control to Iraqi security forces and the army. More than 100 people were slain in Balad this past week, most of them by Shiite deaths squads drawn largely from al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

The Mahdi Army held Amarah for several hours in an embarrassingly strong showing against the local police and security forces, controlled by the Badr Brigade militia loyal to SCIRI, the country's dominant political force with deep and historic links to Iran.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday, police reported the deaths of 34 people, including 10 killed in mortar attacks overnight in Balad, an hour north of the capital, and a family of nine Shiites shot to death when gunmen burst into their home in Aziziyah, 35 miles southeast of Baghdad.

A U.S. soldier was killed when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb southwest of the capital. A Salvadoran Army captain was killed and four soldiers were wounded when their convoy hit an explosive device in Wasit province, El Salvador's defense department said.

Until recently, Baghdad had been the focus of sectarian and Sunni insurgent killers, prompting the United States to launch a drive in August to rid the capital of the gunmen and torturers. An additional 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces were put on the streets for the task.

But two months into the operation, the U.S. combat death toll in October alone stood at 75 — likely to be the highest for any month in nearly two years. Attacks on Americans jumped by 22 percent in the first three weeks of the holy month of Ramadan, when compared to the three previous weeks. The U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said the bid to cleanse the capital was failing and needs to be refocused.

Against that background, the Amarah turmoil and killings looked more ominous, especially as it marked one of the first serious armed confrontations among Shiites. Most recent killings in Iraq involved tit-for-tat attacks between Shiites and Sunni Arabs, the minority sect in Iraq that dominated the country until Saddam's ouster.

DOJ_NMG_0084023

Amarah is a major population center in the resource-rich yet impoverished south and a traditional center of Shiite defiance to successive Iraqi regimes. Its marshlands were drained by Saddam during the 1990s in reprisal for the city's role in the Shiite uprising after the Gulf War. Saddam ordered the killing of tens of thousands of Shiites in retribution.

The British military spokesman in Basra, headquarters for Britain's 7,200 soldiers in Iraq, sought to play down the seriousness of Friday's fighting, noting that 600 Iraqi soldiers were able to force Mahdi Army fighters off the streets, arrange a truce and return quiet to the city by Friday afternoon. Estimates of the number of Mahdi Army fighters ranged between 200 and 800.

"It's like when you take the training wheels off a bike. There are some wobbles. This was a pretty big wobble, but it's still moving in the right direction," said spokesman Maj. Charlie Burbridge.

"They (Iraqi security forces) have applied a solution and at the moment it's holding," he said. "At the moment, it's tense but calm."

Five-hundred British soldiers were on standby if the government called for help. Burbridge said 25 gunmen and police were killed, adding that a British drone overhead the city recorded the events all day.

At the height of the fighting Friday, AP Television News video showed thick, black smoke billowing from behind barricades at a police station, much of it from vehicles set on fire inside the compound. Hooded gunmen roamed the streets with Kalashnikov automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. Most of the streets were deserted except for the gunmen.

The militiamen later withdrew from their positions and lifted their siege under a truce brokered by an al-Sadr envoy as the Iraqi forces entered the city.

The fighting came just days after al-Maliki met with al-Sadr at the cleric's Najaf headquarters to enlist support for capping sectarian violence and to bolster his government, which is increasingly at odds with the United States for not disbanding the militias, among other issues.

The timing of the violence may have indicated al-Sadr and other Mahdi Army commanders did not have full control over individual units, lending weight to speculation that Shiite gunmen were splitting off from the main organization to pursue their own agendas. The U.S. military said it counts 23 separate militias in Baghdad alone.

The Amarah fighting was believed to have begun over the killing Thursday of Qassim al-Tamimi, the provincial head of police intelligence and a leading member of the Badr Brigade militia.

In retaliation, his family kidnapped the teenage brother of the Mahdi Army commander in Amarah, Sheik Fadel al-Bahadli, and demanded he find and hand over al-Tamimi's killers. The Mahdi Army then stormed into the city overnight and held it for several hours Friday. It was not clear if al-Bahadli's brother was released.

Many Iraqis Look To Gunmen As Protectors (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 20 — Behind the maze of men with guns in Iraq is a very simple truth: their barrels offer protection, something Iraqis say the government has never given them.

On Friday, the web wound tightly around the southern city of Amara, where the two largest and best-armed militias, both made up of religious Shiites, were fighting for control of the city.

But when the prime minister speaks of disarming militias — those mushrooming armies of men with guns that carry out most of the killing here — Iraqi brows begin to furrow.

“He’s just talking,” snapped Fadhil Sabri, a 37-year-old generator repairman in a grease-stained shop in Sadr City, a Baghdad stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia.

“Not now. Not even in 10 years. You need arms to defend yourself,” he said.

Iraq is awash in killings, and many are blamed on the Mahdi Army, the militia commanded by a glowering Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr. An indignant Mr. Sadr called his men to fight against the American military twice in 2004. It was bloodied, but survived. Since then the Mahdi Army, and a growing criminal breakaway element, have grown into one of the government’s biggest problems and are a major obstacle to the success of the American enterprise here.

DOJ_NMG_0084024

Despite its new rogue fringe, Iraqi Shiites see the Mahdi militia as their most effective protector against the hostile Sunni groups that have slaughtered Shiites and driven them from their homes. Shiites say that as long as the government cannot keep them safe, they cannot support the disarming of militias.

That paradox confronts the American military as it presses the Iraqi government to contain militias like Mr. Sadr's: how is it possible to control a militia when trust among Iraqis has vanished and the government is incapable of containing the spiraling violence?

Mr. Sadr and his Mahdi Army have emerged as one of the biggest puzzles of the war. The cleric controls a large and crucial bloc of seats in Parliament. At the same time, 92 percent of the mortar and rocket attacks in August and September on the Green Zone — the protected area in Baghdad that houses the American military and the Iraqi government — came from Sadr City.

As the recent fighting in Amara shows, the group and its rogue elements have settled deeply into the crevices of Iraqi society, filling college security offices and student unions, as well as the ranks of the police and the army. It is often at the center of spasms of sectarian killing, like the violence last weekend in Balad, and it frequently battles rival Shiite groups, as in Amara, and earlier this month in another southern city, Diwaniya.

But in a measure of just how complex Iraq has become, it is impossible to tell where loyalties to Mr. Sadr end and criminal activity begins. Rogue groups of his former followers now run underground fiefdoms of sectarian killing and kidnapping — and even a special market for victims' cars. One of his senior aides was arrested by the American military earlier this week on suspicion of having directed the killing and torture of Sunnis. The Americans later reluctantly released him at the request of the Iraqi government.

The changes in the Mahdi Army are so profound — the American military estimates that as much as a third of it has fallen away — that it is becoming a generic term for Shiite militia. A senior American military official estimated there were 23 militias operating in Baghdad alone.

"It's hard to understand the amount of groups who are moving around and where they are getting their funding," said Col. Thomas Vail, the American commander in charge of eastern Baghdad. "It's very complex right now, more than when we first came."

The mechanisms for killing have become more sophisticated. A senior coalition intelligence official at a briefing last month detailed an example of a Mahdi Army death squad. Group leaders are issued instructions on order forms listing a target person and an address, the official said. A group can consist of special forces, intelligence units and punishment committees, complete with clerics who impose sentences. Some of the leaders may be inside the Interior Ministry, the official said. Others may work with their contacts within the ministry to obtain equipment such as cars.

The American military's task has been vastly complicated by the sheer relentlessness of the violence. Ever larger portions of the Iraqi population have been radicalized in three years of war, chopping ground out from under the moderates. Now, even those whose job requires them to take a position against militias reluctantly back them.

"Right now I support the presence of the Mahdi Army," said a senior judge on Iraq's criminal court, who declined to be named out of concern for his safety. "I know this is unacceptable in law, in politics, in society, but in this unusual time we are living in, this is the reality."

It is a broadly held view among Shiites that the American military has unfairly focused on Shiite militias and has largely forgotten the Sunni militias that they say launched the sectarian war. Groups like the Omar Brigade, formed to kill Shiites and carry out lethal suicide bombings, went unchecked, prompting a Shiite response, they say.

Just how far Shiite sentiment has shifted can be seen in the words of Qasim Dawood, the national security minister under former Prime Minister Ayad Allawi during Mr. Sadr's fight against the Americans in 2004.

"The support of the militias within the Shiite community comes from the failure of the Ministry of Interior, the Ministry of Defense and the coalition forces to provide security," he said. "The creation of these militias comes as a reaction."

But that reaction spilled over into open carnage in February, when Shiite mobs rampaged through Baghdad, dragging Sunnis out of their homes and mosques and killing them. Shiites' patience had snapped, and they began to take systematic revenge.

DOJ_NMG_0084025

As the killing spun off in strange new directions, the Mahdi Army, or those associated with it, was at the forefront.

The Mahdi Army's victims are sad, struggling figures, often stuffed into the trunks of cars. This tactic became so widespread that Iraqi soldiers at checkpoints have been known to stop cars that are playing loud, thumping music, mistaking the sound for a person trying to get out.

In the eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Ur, which is connected to Sadr City by a fast and largely empty road, a worker counted 14 victims on a particularly bad day in August, shortly after an attack on a procession of Shiite pilgrims. He said four were shot in front of him on a dirt road near a high school. The bodies of another 10 were dumped there later that day. Police cars, like hearses, later picked them up.

The killing took place openly, often silently, and without fanfare. Gunmen did not bother to hide their faces. One resident sardonically referred to Ur as gbour, which means graves in Arabic.

Iraqis began referring to the victims, often Sunnis, as sheep. Most condemn the killing, which they attribute to the Mahdi militia.

"I know they are killing Sunnis now — none of us likes this," said Firas al-Saeidi, a 29-year-old Shiite resident of Sadr City, who works in the Ministry of Defense. "But it keeps balance in our sensitive areas. We need that."

"Life was not just cheap, it was free," said Ibrahim, a Shiite from Ur who asked that his last name not be used.

Despite the carnage, Ibrahim sees the militia as providing important protection.

His sparely furnished guest room was subdued last week, after the killing of his brother and the brother's 15-year-old son by Sunni gunmen in September. At the funeral, Mahdi members approached him and offered to kill Sunnis to avenge the deaths. He declined, but said he would draw on their intelligence to find the killers. He could not go to the police station where his brother was shot because the policemen are Sunni, he said.

"If I find who killed my brother, I will tell Mahdi Army to kill him," he said.

The government, on the other hand, refused to even pick up the body of an acquaintance of his in a Sunni neighborhood recently, because the area was too hostile.

"If a government is too scared to pick up a body, is it a government?" Ibrahim asked.

A protector for most Shiites, the Mahdi Army can also be a persecutor. Mahdi members first approached Edrice al-Aaraji, a Shiite, shortly after he moved to a Shiite area in northern Baghdad this spring. The men acted chummy and asked if he and his brother would pitch in on overnight watch shifts on the block.

Mr. Aaraji pretended to be interested, but avoided them. He even traveled to a different neighborhood to make it look as if he was serving on guard duty somewhere else.

The men become more aggressive, particularly after the killing of his uncle, apparently by Mahdi-affiliated gunmen, in August. Later Mr. Aaraji learned that the men had been eyeing the house he moved into as a weapons storage space.

"Now they are after us," he said. "They watch our comings and goings."

In Sadr City, in a darkened room off a sun-splashed courtyard hung with laundry, Sayeed Abdul Zahra, a member of Mr. Sadr's social service committee, dismissed any suggestion of the Mahdi Army disarming: "Impossible."

Besides, he said, Mr. Sadr does not own the guns. "I bought my weapons with my own money."

A short drive north, in Ur, mourners were gathering for the funeral of a man and his 6-year-old son. A bombing on Monday in a nearby market killed them both. The family blamed a puritanical Sunni Islamic sect, the Wahhabis, whose name has become the Shiite codeword for Sunni extremists.

A boy around the age of 8 took money from his father to buy candy at a market across the street. As he walked away, his father called after him: "Be careful of the Wahhabis."

When asked why he had said it, his reply came fast and cold.

"I want to teach him whom to hate," he said.

Iraq's Religious Figures Issue Edicts (AP)

By By

AP, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084026

In a bid to stop sectarian bloodshed, Shiite and Sunni religious figures met in Mecca, Islam's holiest city, and issued a series of edicts Friday forbidding violence between Iraq's two Muslim sects.

It is uncertain, however, whether the edicts, or fatwas, will find resonance among the country's Sunni and Shiite militants whose tit-for-tat attacks have created a deadly cycle of violence that gains momentum and brutality daily.

Previous attempts to reconcile Iraq's rival sects have failed to stanch the violence.

While Shiites and Sunnis in Iraq usually abide by fatwas issued or endorsed by their top clerics, the sectarian violence is largely perpetuated by militants who abide only by the strict interpretations of the Quran, Islam's holy book, and Hadith, sayings of Islam's prophet Muhammad, that are offered by radical clerics outside Islam's mainstream.

The Mecca meeting had lowered expectations from the outset, with its organizers maintaining that they did not seek a truce in Iraq, where a Sunni insurgency continues to target U.S. and Iraqi forces, but only to stop sectarian killings between rival Sunnis and Shiites.

A final communique, heavy on quotations from the Quran and Hadith, was issued at the end of the two-day meeting. It contained 10 points, the majority of which were edicts forbidding kidnappings, incitement of hatred, attacks on mosques and Shiite places of worship. It also prohibited forcing members of the other sect from their homes and called for the release from detention of Iraqis not charged with specific crimes.

It also stated that differences between the two sects did not touch on the basics of the faith.

Participants included Shiite and Sunni clerics, representatives of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and clerics from the Shiite holy city of Najaf, the former leader of Iraq's largest Sunni party and a senior official from the largest Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

None was among the country's top clerics, but spokesman Salah Abdul-Razaq, speaking to The Associated Press from Mecca, said the fatwas were vetted and approved by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's top Shiite cleric, and radical anti-U.S. Shiite leader Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Sadr is not a high-ranking cleric but he runs the Mahdi Army, a militia blamed for much of the violence against Sunni Arabs.

At the end of the signing ceremony, which was carried live by Iraqi TV stations, a presenter read a message from al-Sistani and other top Shiite clerics supporting the final communique. He also read a letter of support from Sheik Mohammed Sayed Tantawi, the grand sheik of al-Azhar in Cairo, Egypt, Sunni Islam's top seat of learning.

The Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential hard-line Sunni group, did not formally take part in the Mecca meeting, Abdul-Razaq said.

In an interview with the Saudi daily al-Watan, the association's leader, Harith al-Dhari, said he did not expect the Mecca meeting to make a difference on the ground.

"I don't believe ... it will contribute to the narrowing of the gap (between the Shiites and Sunnis) or reduce the suffering of the Iraqi people today," he said. "I am not optimistic." However, a message from al-Dhari read at the end of the signing ceremony said the Mecca meeting was "a step in the right direction."

The root of the current bout of Sunni-Shiite violence dates back to 2003, when the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime ended decades of domination by the minority Sunnis and empowering the long-oppressed Shiite majority.

The destruction of a major Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra north of Baghdad last February ignited the worst bout of sectarian violence, and the bloodletting is little diminished.

Differences between the two sides were exacerbated when parliament adopted a Shiite-backed law this week allowing provinces in the Shiite and oil-rich south to establish an autonomous region like the Kurdish one in the north. Sunni Arabs and some Shiites opposed the law, arguing that federalism would lead to the eventual breakup of Iraq.

Underlining the challenges facing any bid to end Iraq's violence and lawlessness, a Sunni organization reported in Baghdad within minutes of the signing ceremony in Mecca that the son of one of the signatories, Mohsin Abdul-Hamid, was kidnapped Thursday by gunmen at a checkpoint in Baghdad.

The son, Yasser Mohsin Abdul-Hamid is the deputy head of the Sunni government department that looks after Sunni mosques and seminaries.

DOJ_NMG_0084027

Islamic Clerics Decree A Halt To Sectarian Bloodshed (WT)

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

From combined dispatches

BAGHDAD -- Dozens of Iraqi Shi'ite and Sunni clerics meeting in the Muslim holy city of Mecca yesterday called for an end to sectarian violence that many fear could lead to civil war in Iraq.

Sponsored by the 57-nation Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), the meeting approved a declaration prohibiting the killing of Muslims in Iraq and called for safeguarding the unity of the country.

It also urged the release of Muslim and non-Muslim hostages.

It was not clear what impact the document signed by the dozens of clerics would have on militias that appear to be outside the control of both Shi'ite and Sunni religious authorities, and others that are affiliated with al Qaeda.

Nevertheless, it marked an unprecedented effort by Iraqi religious leaders -- who gathered in the Saudi Arabian city where Islam was born -- to speak out against the bloodshed that has increased daily throughout the holy month of Ramadan.

Yesterday was no exception as black-uniformed, hooded gunmen loyal to anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr briefly seized the major southern city of Amarah.

Twenty-five gunmen and police died in gunbattles between rival Shi'ite factions before the Iraqi army moved in to retake the city of 750,000 people.

The city is famous for its marshlands along the Tigris river 30 miles from the border with Iran, where the Shi'ite theocracy is said to be funding, arming and training both Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi Army and the rival Badr Brigades.

The Amarah showdown highlighted the potential for an all-out conflict between them and their political sponsors, both with large blocs in parliament and important to the survival of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's shaky four-month-old government.

It also underlined the deep underlying rift that exists between Sheik al-Sadr and the more traditional but powerful Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI).

SCIRI and its Badr Brigades are headed by key power broker Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who spent decades in Iranian exile during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The clashes marred the Muslim day of prayer for the second Friday in a row in cities where American and British forces had only recently ceded military control to Iraqi security forces and the army.

More than 100 persons were slain in Balad, a small city north of Baghdad, this past week, most of them by Shi'ite death squads drawn largely from Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi militia.

The Mahdi fighters held Amarah for several hours in an embarrassingly strong showing against the local police and security forces, controlled by the Badr Brigade.

Elsewhere in Iraq yesterday, police reported the deaths of 34 persons, including 10 killed in mortar attacks overnight in Balad.

Gunmen burst into a Shi'ite home in Aziziyah, 35 miles southeast of Baghdad, killing a Shi'ite family of nine.

A U.S. soldier was killed when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb southwest of the capital.

Amarah is a major population center in the resource-rich yet impoverished south and a traditional center of Shi'ite defiance to successive Iraqi regimes.

Its marshlands were drained by Saddam during the 1990s in reprisal for the city's role in the Shi'ite uprising after the Persian Gulf War.

At the height of the fighting yesterday, Associated Press Television News video showed thick, black smoke billowing from behind barricades at a police station, much of it from vehicles set on fire inside the compound.

Hooded gunmen roamed the streets with automatic assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. Most of the streets were deserted except for the gunmen.

The militiamen later withdrew from their positions and lifted their siege with a truce brokered by an al-Sadr envoy as government forces entered the city.

At the meeting in Mecca, clerics drafted a document they said was inspired by historic Islamic texts prohibiting infighting among Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0084028

"This document takes effect from this moment. ... We hope [religious] authorities and clerics spread the message of the document in mosques ... and that local media make sure it reaches all Iraqis," said Saudi-based OIC Secretary-General Ekmeleddin Ihsanoglu.

He said the document draws its strength from the symbolism of the signing venue.

Neither Sheik al-Sadr nor Iraq's top Shi'ite leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani sent representatives to the meeting.

U.N.: 914,000 Have Fled Homes In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Frank Jordans, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

At least 914,000 Iraqis have fled their homes since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than a third since an increase in sectarian bloodshed at the start of this year, the U.N. refugee agency said Friday.

The overall number is likely to be much higher, said Ron Redmond, chief spokesman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The agency has concluded that 754,000 displaced Iraqis remain in the country, while tens of thousands more have sought refuge abroad.

"We remain extremely concerned about the rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq and the ongoing displacement this is creating both inside and outside Iraq," Redmond told reporters.

Redmond told The Associated Press that at least 40,000 Iraqis have arrived in Syria every month for the last four months.

Most of those who have fled their homes since the start of the war came from central areas of the country around Baghdad, Redmond said.

"There are some in the north and south as well, but the majority are in the center. A lot of them are going to Sunni areas, or Shia areas, where they have family, relatives, other social groups that will help them and take care of them," Redmond said.

About 365,000 people — nearly half of those who have fled to other areas within Iraq — have left since sectarian fighting intensified after the bombing of an important Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra in February, Redmond said.

Redmond said the figures were compiled by UNHCR staffers from information provided by government offices and other aid agencies. According to Iraqi government information, 1.5 million people are currently classed as internally displaced, though that includes 800,000 from before the 2003 invasion.

Unlike casualty figures, which vary widely and have been the subject of much criticism from governments and non-governmental organizations working in Iraq, nobody has disputed the overall number of internally displaced, Redmond said.

The flow of refugees into neighboring countries also increased sharply after the Samarra attack, but the governments have so far failed to provide the agency with overall numbers, Redmond said.

UNHCR estimates that there are 1.6 million Iraqis in other countries in the region, mainly Jordan and Syria, but some of those have been outside Iraq for more than a decade.

914,000 Iraqis Displaced By War, U.N. Says (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

GENEVA — At least 914,000 Iraqis have fled their homes since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than a third of them since sectarian bloodshed increased early this year, the United Nations refugee agency said Friday.

The Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees has concluded that 754,000 people are displaced in the country, and tens of thousands more have sought refuge abroad.

"We remain extremely concerned about the rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq and the ongoing displacement this is creating both inside and outside Iraq," said Ron Redmond, chief spokesman for the agency.

Redmond said that at least 40,000 Iraqis had arrived in Syria in each of the last four months.

Most of the Iraqis displaced by the war came from central areas around Baghdad, he said.

About 365,000 people — nearly half of those who have fled to other areas within Iraq — have been displaced by sectarian fighting that intensified after the February bombing of an important Shiite Muslim shrine in the north-central city of Samarra, Redmond said.

DOJ_NMG_0084029

He said the figures were compiled by UNHCR staffers using information provided by government offices and other aid agencies.

According to Iraqi government information, 1.5 million people are classified as internally displaced, though that includes 800,000 who left their homes before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Unlike casualty figures, which vary widely and have been the subject of much criticism from governments and nongovernmental organizations working in Iraq, the overall number of internally displaced has not been disputed, Redmond said.

U.N. Says Iraq Seals Data On The Civilian Toll (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 20 — The United Nations office in Baghdad says that Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, has ordered the country's medical authorities to stop providing the organization with monthly figures on the number of civilians killed and wounded in the conflict there, according to a confidential cable.

The cable, dated Oct. 17 and sent to United Nations officials in New York and Geneva by Ashraf Qazi, the United Nations envoy to Iraq, says the prohibition may hinder the ability of his office to give accurate accounts in its bimonthly human rights reports on the levels of violence and the effect on Iraqi society.

Concern over the numbers of civilians who have died in Iraq has risen sharply at a time when organized attacks by insurgents are swelling the numbers of victims and when a new report from a team of Iraqi and American researchers shows that more than 600,000 civilians have died in violence across Iraq since the 2003 American invasion.

Mr. Qazi, a former Pakistani diplomat, says that the order to let the prime minister's office take over the release of the numbers came down a day after a United Nations report for July and August showed a serious upward spike in the number of dead and wounded. The leader of the Health Ministry in Iraq appealed to be allowed to continue supplying the figures to the United Nations but was turned down according to a subsequent letter from the prime minister's office, Mr. Qazi's cable said.

The existence of the cable was reported Friday by The Washington Post.

Feisal al-Istrabadi, Iraq's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, said he had not seen the cable and therefore could not comment on its specifics. "But what I can say is what the prime minister is aiming for is to have one voice reflecting accurate information about the statistics of those who are dying every day," he said. "So, the concern was that the Ministry of Health, which has had accurate figures to date, be the official source of the information.

"It is trying to avoid a situation where different agencies, which may have different perspectives, put out sets of numbers that are, in fact, not as accurate as they should be."

The most recent United Nations report, published in September, showed that 3,590 people were killed in July and 3,009 in August in violence across the country. Compiled by statistics from Baghdad's central morgue and from hospitals and morgues countrywide, the report posited an average death rate of 97 people per day.

The United Nations reports have been cited by independent researchers as reliable indicators of the incidence of violence in Iraq and were not disputed by the Iraqi government until the September report that showed sharp rises in the figures.

In his cable, Mr. Qazi described a process by which his office tried to compile the most reliable statistics.

He said that initially his office had been able to overcome Iraqi government reluctance to release figures by obtaining statistics from the Health Ministry's Medico-Legal Institute in Baghdad.

The institute records the number of unidentified civilians killed violently whose bodies are taken to the morgue in Baghdad, but not those killed violently whose bodies are taken to hospitals and later handed over to families for burial. Therefore, Mr. Qazi said, the institute's figures represented only "an indicator, albeit imperfect, of the growing number of civilian victims in the capital."

To come up with a more thorough account, Mr. Qazi said, the United Nations combined the institute's findings with figures from the Department of Operations at the Ministry of Health, which records those killed or wounded as a result of violence from hospitals across almost all parts of the country.

Mr. Qazi noted that the figures "may have contributed to an increased international awareness regarding the severe consequences that the conflict in Iraq is having on civilians."

DOJ_NMG_0084030

The cable said that following the release of the last United Nations human rights report on Sept. 20, the prime minister's office "expressed doubts" about its accuracy.

The next day, the Ministry of Health was told that it should no longer release its figures but instead channel them through the prime minister's office. Mr. Qazi said he learned of this on Oct. 12.

Mr. Qazi said the United Nations would continue to seek figures from the Department of Operations at the Ministry of Health and "use our contacts to see what measure of verification may be possible."

Republicans Call CNN Tape 'Enemy Propaganda' (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- CNN cable news has become "the publicist for an enemy propaganda film" by broadcasting a tape showing an insurgent sniper apparently killing an American soldier, said the chairman of the U.S. House Armed Services Committee here Friday.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., called for the Pentagon to oust immediately any CNN reporter embedded with U.S. troops in Iraq.

"I think Americans like to think we're all in this together," Hunter said. "The average American Marine or soldier has concluded after seeing that film that CNN is not on their side."

CNN said its decision to show the brief tape was motivated by a desire to show the public the growing threat insurgent snipers pose to U.S. troops.

"Whether or not you agree with us in this case, our goal, as always, is to present the unvarnished truth as best we can," wrote CNN producer David Doss in a blog on the network's Web site.

Tony Snow, President Bush's press secretary, said the insurgents were hoping to "break the will of the American people" by slipping the tape to CNN.

The tape was shown first on CNN's "Anderson Cooper 360" program, where Doss is executive producer, and then on several news shows. It remains on the network's Web site.

Doss said CNN Baghdad correspondent Michael Ware in Iraq received the tape after communicating through intermediaries with Ibrahim Shimar, a spokesman for the Islamic Army.

Doss said the decision to use the sniper tape came after hours of "intense editorial debate" at CNN. One compromise was made: The moment when the bullet hits the soldier's head is blacked out. The soldier's face and unit patches are not clearly visible and so identifying him was impossible, the network said.

Rep. Brian Bilbray, R-Calif., who joined Hunter and Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., in sending a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, called the film "nothing short of a terrorist snuff film."

Snow, at his regular news briefing in Washington, said the video was misleading because it made it appear that Americans were "sitting ducks" and the insurgents were winning. In fact, the insurgents "are dying in much greater numbers and suffering much greater damage," he said.

The Pentagon had no official reaction to the CNN video. Though embedded reporters are made to sign pledges not to show the faces of dead Americans until their families are notified, nothing prohibits the use of pictures where identities are not discernible.

Plea Deal Reported In Iraqi Murder Case (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, October 21, 2006

A Camp Pendleton Marine will plead guilty next week for his role in the killing of an Iraqi man last April, his father said Friday.

Pfc. John J. Jodka, 20, of Encinitas will plead guilty to assault and obstruction of justice, his father, John Jodka, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0084031

The elder Jodka said murder, kidnapping and other charges would be dropped in exchange for the plea, but later said it was premature to discuss details of the arrangement.

Attorney Joseph Casas, who represents Jodka, said he could not disclose details of the negotiations but said the deal was "in the best interests of my client and the best interests of justice and the best interests of the Marine Corps."

Casas said that Jodka would testify at his court-martial and that the judge was not expected to sentence his client until Nov. 15.

"J.J. will have his chance to talk about his account of what happened in Hamdania," Casas said, adding he would be calling witnesses during the court appearance.

Jodka is one of seven Marines and one Navy corpsman who were charged in the murder of Hashim Ibrahim Awad in the town of Hamdania, west of Baghdad. As part of a separate plea negotiation, the corpsman recently testified about what he remembers from the incident.

Jodka would be the first Marine to plead guilty in the case.

Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson J. Bacos, a Navy corpsman on patrol with the Marines, pleaded guilty Oct. 6 to kidnapping and conspiracy under a deal with prosecutors. He agreed to testify at his court-martial and during upcoming proceedings about what he witnessed.

Details of Jodka's plea negotiations were not disclosed by order of the judge in the case, Jodka's father said. He added that his son would not be sentenced next week.

Marine Corps spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said it would be inappropriate to discuss any potential negotiations between the government and the defense.

Marine To Plead Guilty In Killing Of Iraqi Man (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

ENCINITAS, Calif. — Marine Pfc. John Jodka III will become the second defendant accused in the shooting death of an unarmed Iraqi man in April to plead guilty in the case, Jodka's father said Friday night.

Jodka is one of eight troops with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Regiment, who were charged with murder and kidnapping in the shooting death of a disabled 52-year-old Iraqi in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad. The eight were accused of dragging Hashim Ibrahim Awad, whom they suspected of having ties to the insurgency, from his home, tying his hands and feet and shooting him to death.

Under the plea arrangement, Jodka will plead guilty to lesser charges.

"I remain as proud of my son as the day he enlisted in the Marine Corps," said John Jodka II, who lives in Encinitas. "He is my hero."

In the original indictment, Jodka, who was 19 and on his first tour in Iraq, was listed among the five Marines accused of shooting Awad. He was the youngest and lowest-ranking.

Navy corpsman Melson Bacos, who was a comrade of the troops in the 5th Regiment's Kilo Company, has pleaded guilty to lesser charges and agreed to testify against the Marines. He was sentenced to a year in the brig; with credit for time served, Bacos is expected to be free within five months.

Jodka, who is expected to enter his plea Thursday, is a graduate of San Dieguito Academy, a highly competitive Encinitas high school, and he attended UC Riverside before enlisting.

Jodka was moved from the brig at Camp Pendleton to the Miramar Marine Corps Air Station brig two weeks ago to separate him from other defendants.

Other attorneys in the case have asserted that their clients will not plea-bargain. Victor Kelley said his client, Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, would "never testify against his brothers."

Officer Awaits Fate In Abu Ghraib Case (AP)

By David Dishneau

AP, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084032

An Army colonel began deliberating Friday whether to recommend a court-martial for an officer accused of abusing Abu Ghraib prisoners by ignoring their mistreatment and then lying to investigators about it.

A decision is expected by early November on whether Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, an Army reservist from Fredericksburg, Va., will stand trial for any of the 12 charges against him, including one count of cruelty and maltreatment and three counts of dereliction of duty.

Col. Daniel Cummings, who presided over Jordan's five-day Article 32 investigation, will make a written recommendation to Gen. Guy C. Swann, commander of the Military District of Washington. Swann will decide whether a trial is warranted.

Jordan, 50, is the highest-ranking U.S. soldier, and the first officer, charged with crimes stemming from the physical abuse and sexual humiliation of Abu Ghraib detainees. He faces up to 42 years in prison if convicted of all counts.

Prosecutors offered little direct evidence at the hearing that Jordan oppressed detainees in fall 2003 by "subjecting them to forced nudity and intimidation by dogs," as alleged in the lone count of cruelty and maltreatment.

The strongest eyewitness evidence that he ignored abuses came from Capt. Donald Reese, the former commander of the 372nd Military Police Company who testified that Jordan was a daily visitor to the prison's "hard site," where some prisoners were stripped naked as an interrogation technique.

Instead, prosecutors relied largely on documents and soldiers' statements to investigators to support the government's claim that Jordan, as titular director of the prison's interrogation center, knew of the abuses and didn't stop them.

"He didn't do the job, which resulted in criminality," Lt. Col. John P. Tracy said in closing arguments Friday.

Defense attorneys said Jordan wasn't in charge of interrogators, despite his director's title, and therefore wasn't responsible for any abuses they committed.

"No direct line, certainly, no dotted line, no blurry line — there has been no line drawn between Lt. Col. Jordan and detainee abuse," Maj. Kris Poppe said in his closing argument.

Jordan, a civil affairs officer with a military-intelligence background, was sent to Abu Ghraib in September 2003 by top intelligence commanders in Iraq to run the newly established Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center.

But according to witnesses for both sides, Jordan devoted himself mainly to improving soldiers' safety and welfare, introducing himself to incoming interrogators as "the civil affairs officer" and as a liaison between the JIDC and U.S. commanders in Baghdad.

Jordan's case is the last remaining active investigation in the Abu Ghraib scandal, said Lt. Col. Patricia Lewis, deputy staff judge advocate at the Military District of Washington. Eleven enlisted soldiers have been convicted of crimes at Abu Ghraib, and a number of officers have been reprimanded.

Gunmen Execute 8 Afghan Laborers (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — Gunmen ambushed a carload of Afghan laborers heading home from a remote U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan and executed eight of them, a police official said Friday.

The killings occurred as a statement purportedly issued by fugitive Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar called for stepped-up attacks on Afghan and foreign troops. It told the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to leave Afghanistan, saying alliance members were "losing their soldiers only for America."

The victims, who worked for the U.S. military in the mountainous Korangal area of Kunar province, were killed Thursday, said Abdul Saboor, the provincial deputy police chief.

Gunmen stopped the workers' car, searched them and took about $6,000 before gunning them down, said Salehzai Didar, Kunar's governor. Two workers escaped, he said.

"This was a shocking attack against these poor people," said Saboor, who did not identify the attackers other than to describe them as "the enemy."

Afghanistan this year has faced its deadliest surge in violence since U.S.-led forces ousted the fundamentalist Taliban regime five years ago for sheltering Osama bin Laden.

DOJ_NMG_0084033

The statement attributed to Omar was forwarded by e-mail to the Associated Press by Mohammed Hanif, who claims to speak for the militia. It warned that the Taliban would increase its attacks against foreign and Afghan troops, "which would be a surprise to many."

"I would again ask mujahedin to intensify their attacks, but they should avoid any harm to innocent people and children," said the statement, which was issued just before the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr, which marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan.

The statement's authenticity could not be verified.

It said that democracy in Afghanistan had failed and that the Western-backed government of President Hamid Karzai was seeking an "exit."

Total Says Executive Questioned Over Iraq Oil Deals Is Innocent (NYT)

By James Kanter

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 20 — The French oil company Total rallied on Friday to the defense of its second in command and designated chief executive, Christophe de Margerie, after he was taken into custody and questioned about possible illegal payments for Iraqi oil.

Mr. de Margerie, 55, and a former Total executive, Bernard de Combret, 63, were released on bail on Thursday after being held for 48 hours. The two men were questioned by Judge Philippe Courroye, who is investigating possible kickbacks linked to the United Nations-supervised oil-for-food program in Iraq.

“The judge has to prove that he is or is not guilty, and we think he’s not guilty,” said a Total spokeswoman, Catherine Enck.

She said the Total board remained committed to elevating Mr. de Margerie, who is head of exploration and production, to the top job in February.

The oil-for-food program allowed the government of Saddam Hussein to sell oil while the country was under sanctions imposed by the United Nations after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990. The oil money was supposed to be used to buy necessities for Iraq’s civilians, but reports of corruption in the program prompted several inquiries.

An independent investigation by Paul A. Volcker, former chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, reported a year ago that Russia and France received favored treatment from the Hussein government.

In France, a former interior minister, Charles Pasqua, is among those under investigation.

Ms. Enck said Total had negotiated with the Hussein government to develop the oil-rich Majnoon and Nahr Umar fields in southern Iraq, the site of the world’s third-largest oil reserves, after Saudi Arabia and Iran. She insisted that the company had never signed contracts with the government, and that development of the fields could only have gone forward once the sanctions were lifted.

“The group has never purchased, either directly or indirectly, oil that has been smuggled illegally from Iraq,” Total said in a statement on its Web site.

A Citigroup analyst, Jonathan Wright, brushed off the seriousness of the development, writing in a research note that he expected business as usual at the company.

Total Chief Charged In Oil-for-food Scandal (FT)

By Martin Arnold

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

A Paris investigative judge has charged the incoming chief executive of Total, the French oil and gas group, with corruption during the scandal-plagued United Nations’ oil-for-food programme in Iraq.

Christophe de Margerie, Total’s head of exploration and production, was imprisoned for 48 hours, questioned by judicial police and a judge, before being charged with aiding and abetting corruption of foreign officials and misuse of company property.

He was released from custody on Thursday night. The surprise move cast a shadow over plans for Mr Margerie to replace Thierry Desmarest as chief executive when the latter steps up to non-executive chairman after the group’s annual results in February.

DOJ_NMG_0084034

But Total insisted the succession would proceed as planned. “Presumption of innocence is absolute and so life goes on,” said Catherine Enck, spokeswoman at Total. The French judicial system can often put people under investigation for years, sometimes without ever going to trial.

“The group would like to reassure Mr de Margerie of its solidarity. Total confirms that at no time did the group circumvent the United Nations embargo against Iraq and strictly adhered to the rules of the oil-for-food programme,” the company said on Friday.

The move is a setback for the image of France’s biggest company with a market capitalisation just short of €130bn. It employs 95,000 staff and had profits of €12bn and sales of €143bn in 2005. Yet analysts shrugged off the news and Total shares rose €0.50 to €53.70.

Mr de Margerie, 55, was head of Total’s activities in the Middle East between 1995 and 1999. He is well respected in the industry as an affable and outspoken expert on the Gulf region’s oil sector. His lawyer, Olivier Rosenfeld, said the charges were “without foundation”.

Bernard de Combret, Total’s former head of trading, who quit in 2001, was taken into custody with Mr de Margerie and charged with the same crimes. The charges add to growing discomfort in Paris political and business circles about the damage being done to France’s prestige by the inquiry. Mr de Margerie is due to accompany President Jacques Chirac on next week’s state visit to China.

He is suspected of participating in kickbacks to the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein from 1996 to 2002. Total is suspected of making the payments via Telliac, the Swiss trading company, to gain better access to Iraqi oil during the UN embargo.

Total said: “All oil acquired by the company, without exception, was purchased officially with the required authorisations under UN within the framework of the oil-for-food programme put in place in 1996. The group has never purchased, either directly or indirectly, oil that has been smuggled illegally from Iraq.”

The group has only recently recovered from a big corruption scandal at Elf, the former state oil group it acquired in 1999. The “Elf affair” lasted eight years, becoming France’s biggest corruption trial and exposing rampant corruption in the final years of the Mitterrand presidency.

Judge Philippe Courroye has already charged a handful of more junior Total executives with similar offences, as well as leading French diplomats and politicians, most notably Charles Pasqua, former interior minister, and Jean-Bernard Mérimée, France’s former UN ambassador.

An independent report by former Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker last year accused some 2,253 companies of paying kickbacks to Saddam Hussein’s regime, while officials and middlemen around the globe were accused of receiving illicit oil allocations in return for political support.

The payments were in contravention of international law and the rules of the oil-for-food system. Politicians and executives in countries from Germany to India have been snared by the scandal. But France’s strong ties to Saddam Hussein’s regime seemed to mean it was more involved than most.

The Real 'New Iraq' (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Christians are being targeted in Iraq. It's not because they are one of the dominant groups vying to run the country. They aren't. Their clerics also are not part of Iraq's religious elite, although Christianity has deep roots in that country.

As the New York Times reported this week, since the Bush administration launched the invasion of Iraq 3 1/2 years ago, church bombings, assassinations, kidnappings and threats have become a daily part of Christian life. And the persecution of Christians began even before Pope Benedict XVI called attention to the words of a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who had some unkind things to say about Islam. Many churches in Baghdad have been forced to cancel services, the Times reports, and some have not met since.

Why? Because religion is moving front and center in Iraq, and to be a Christian in that Islamic nation has become dangerous.

DOJ_NMG_0084035

But it's equally risky to be a Shiite living among Sunnis or a Sunni residing in a province dominated by Shiites. These days, if you happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time, religion can get you kidnapped, tortured and beheaded.

If that isn't enough, toss into this cauldron Americans in military uniform, many in the flower of their youth. Most have no idea why religious extremists are tearing each other apart. Trained to fight wars and combat terrorism, American troops have instead been engaged in sweeps through Baghdad's slums in an effort to uproot religiously chauvinistic death squads hellbent on destroying each other. For rendering that service to the Iraqi people (who should be doing the job themselves), America has been paying a high price in blood and treasure, and with little apparent success.

Instead of the violence being reduced, sectarian bloodshed and attacks in Baghdad have shot up 22 percent in the past three weeks. American military fatalities are occurring at the highest rate in more than a year, reports The Post. And toward what end?

Look at the post-Saddam Hussein Iraq taking shape.

In the eyes of the Bush administration and its foreign policy allies in Washington, Iraqi reconstruction and the march toward democracy are just a matter of time. All that's needed is for the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the Iraqi armed forces to quell the sectarian violence. Put together the right alliances and the problem is solved, they believe. They see the answer to Iraq's problems in political terms.

But there are other aspects of Iraq that bother those of us who aren't as smart as the brilliant Washington thinkers who got us where we are today.

Some of us can't forget the prewar talk about weapons of mass destruction and Saddam Hussein's partnership with al-Qaeda, and how wrong the foreign policy elite were about that.

Then there was the rosy post-Hussein world portrayed by the Bush administration, in which Iraqis, liberated from the grip of fear and imbued with a deep and abiding respect for human rights and freedom, would be busy building a better future for themselves.

Now let's return to the Christians.

From Tuesday's New York Times: "Conditions have been especially bleak for Christians in Basra, the southern city that is dominated by radical Shiite militias. Christian women there often wear Muslim head scarves to avoid harassment from religious zealots trying to impose a strict Islamic dress code." An Iraqi woman who attends the country's only Anglican church told the Times that she wears a head scarf anytime she goes outside her neighborhood. "I am afraid of being attacked," she said.

A priest was beheaded last week. A bomb blast at a Baghdad church killed two worshipers recently. From this mayhem, however, the Bush administration averts its gaze.

But the truth has been present all along for those who would dare to see it.

Within months of the U.S. invasion in 2003, The Post's Anthony Shadid and Rajiv Chandrasekaran were reporting on religious fissures in Iraq. The deepening divisions among Iraq's principal religious and ethnic groups were a regular theme in their writing.

But the White House and its cheerleaders would have had us think otherwise -- that the source of trouble was solely foreign infiltrators and remnants of Hussein's Baathist Party.

There is a new Iraq emerging before our eyes.

It is an Iraq that torments Christians, that indulges in unrelenting sectarian bloodbaths, that cheers for Hezbollah, that is no more a friend to Israel than is Iran, all despite the lies sold to the White House and Pentagon by self-serving, power-hungry Iraqi expatriates.

The new Iraq is not what George W. Bush talks about. But that's the Iraq he's got. And, worst of all, that's the Iraq we are in.

kingc@washpost.com

Bush Exploited Americans' Urge For Safety (AJC)

By Cynthia Tucker

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 21, 2006

Americans wanted to believe.

DOJ_NMG_0084036

In the weeks and months following the terrorist atrocities of Sept. 11, Americans wanted to believe that we could find our way back to a time when terrorism didn't happen here. They might strike U.S. embassies in east Africa, U.S. Navy destroyers in Middle Eastern waters or tourist hotels on faraway islands, but we wanted to believe we could keep them from reaching us here a second time. So when President Bush offered military invasions against two distant countries as the way back to safety at home, most Americans supported him enthusiastically. Not only did most Americans support the strike against Afghanistan, which had offered a safe haven to al-Qaida, but a majority also backed the invasion of Iraq, which had no link to Sept. 11.

Some armchair hawks supported the effort to topple Saddam Hussein because they wanted cheap revenge, whether or not Saddam had any link to Osama bin Laden. The United States has the strongest military in the history of the world — the most destructive bombs, the fanciest fighter jets, the fiercest tanks. What good is all that high-priced hardware if you don't use it every now and then?

Just this June, conservative pundit John Derbyshire confessed in a National Review column that he regretted his early enthusiasm for the invasion of Iraq. Quoting a harsh passage he had written earlier, he admitted that his support for that war was hardly based on humanitarian or strategic impulses:

"[M]y attitude to the war is really just punitive, and Iraq was a target of opportunity. I am not a Wilsonian nation-builder. I don't want to 'bring democracy to Iraq.' I don't, in fact, give a fig about the Iraqis. I am happy to leave barbarians alone to practice their unspeakable folkways, so long as they do not bother civilized peoples. When they do bother us, though, I want them smacked down with great ferocity."

Derbyshire was hardly alone. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was eager to attack Iraq because it presented better targets for our advanced weaponry than primitive Afghanistan, according to several White House insider accounts.

Perhaps, though, most Americans supported the president because they believed him when he said Saddam had weapons of mass destruction that he'd give to terrorists. Americans also believed Bush when he said repeatedly that Saddam had crucial ties to al-Qaida, ignoring intelligence reports that Saddam and Osama had no relationship.

Bush had a major advantage in persuading Americans to support his Iraqi misadventure: Voters wanted to believe that ousting Saddam would take care of terrorists. The president offered the certainty that the nation craved. It's easier to believe in a highly unlikely proposition if you desperately want it to be true.

But 3 1/2 years after the invasion, with bloodshed escalating, the spell has worn off. A CNN poll this month showed 64 percent of respondents opposed to the war. And while a handful of Republican congressional candidates still try to justify the decision to topple Saddam, most GOP candidates try to avoid the subject.

Meanwhile, we are less secure than we were five years ago. Terrorists are using our invasion of Iraq as a recruiting tool. While Saddam had no weapons of mass destruction, North Korea apparently now has nukes. Iran is on its way to nuclear capabilities. And we have few soldiers left to handle a conflict anywhere else. Even if Bush wanted to invade Iran, he has no brigades to send. They're bogged down in Iraq. Moreover, our international alliances are frayed — where they're not ripped to shreds.

All in all, we've paid a high price for our refusal to see ourselves as we really are, not the way we want to be seen. We wanted to be "the shining city on the hill," set apart from the rest of the world, immune to its problems, better, safer, smarter than anybody else.

The United States is a strong and capable nation, but we are vulnerable to bird flu from Singapore, suitcase nukes from the old Soviet empire and suicide bombers from Saudi Arabia. Our best strategy for protecting ourselves will always be a nuanced and multifaceted approach using diplomacy, strategic alliances, intelligence-gathering, law enforcement and, as a last resort, military force.

That nuanced approach doesn't appeal to the bully boys who want to send other people's children out to blow up a country. But we should have learned by now to stop listening to them.

DOJ:

U.S. Prosecutors Honored (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, October 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department honored five federal prosecutors in Maryland yesterday with 2006 Director's Awards from the department's executive office for United States attorneys.

Roann Nichols was recognized for her work in negotiating the civil settlement of fraud charges against Serono Laboratories Inc. in connection with illegal schemes to promote, market and sell its AIDS drug, Serostim.

A. David Copperthite and Charles J. Peters, who serve in the U.S. attorney's narcotics and organized crime section, were recognized for their work on the prosecution of Baltimore police detectives William King and Antonio Murray. Stuart A. Berman and Barbara S. Skalla received Director's Awards for their work on the prosecution of international drug dealers from Pakistan, a trial handled in the U.S. District Court in Greenbelt.

[Matthew Dolan]

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Rachets Up Stock Options Scandal (AP)

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Chief executives caught in the stock-options scandal may find it harder to keep their jobs now that a CEO as mighty as UnitedHealth's William McGuire has fallen.

The scandal rattling corporate America has claimed more than three dozen executives and board directors at 19 public companies so far. McGuire, whose retirement was announced Sunday, is arguably the most prominent.

The move was quickly followed this week by news that the chairman and founder of computer chip supplier KLA-Tencor Corp. was retiring over options, the top two executives of encryption specialist SafeNet Inc. had resigned, and consulting firm Sapient Corp.'s co-founder had quit as chief executive and co-chairman in a broad management shakeup.

Last week saw the abrupt departures of two well-known Silicon Valley CEOs: George Samenuk of McAfee Inc. and Shelby Bonnie of CNet Networks Inc. McAfee, a leading maker of computer antivirus software, also fired its president, Kevin Weiss.

The spotlight in the scandal has turned from lesser known executives like Jacob "Kobi" Alexander - the fugitive former CEO of Comverse Technology Inc. now in Namibia awaiting extradition to face charges - to more mainstream, established corporate leaders at blue-chip companies.

"Not only are the dominoes falling, but the dominoes are getting bigger," said Anthony Sabino, a business law professor at St. John's University in Queens.

The fall of a big domino like McGuire - the man who engineered UnitedHealth's rise from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest - can spark the descent of others like him, Sabino maintained. "Everybody else who's involved is at risk," he said.

A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square. With more than 100 companies under options investigations by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, many likely are eager to show their cooperation with the authorities and willingness to take remedial action - like firing executives believed to be implicated or responsible and possibly recouping some of their options money.

"The companies are doing their best to anticipate the concerns that the government will raise," said Tim Coleman, a former federal prosecutor who is an attorney at Dewey Ballantine in Washington. Companies' actions "are with a view to what's going to happen on the day of reckoning," he suggested.

At issue in many of the investigations is a practice known as backdating. Stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, potentially fattening profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can falsely inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0084038

For executives and directors, "If there was knowing and willful participation by individuals, ... there's potential criminal liability for those individuals," said Michael Himmel, also an ex-federal prosecutor now in private practice, at Lowenstein Sandler in New York.

Falsifying documents related to options grants, concealing information from the board - those would be signs of potential criminal conduct by executives, experts say.

Some company officers and directors may contend that lawyers and other advisers gave their blessing to the options dating.

"It isn't criminal to basically end up giving bad advice," said Lawrence Barcella, a former Justice Department prosecutor who specializes in white-collar cases at Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker. It's another matter, he said, if the attorneys or advisers "knowingly and willfully enabled" the company executives to carry out a deceptive options scheme.

Yesterday, Costco Wholesale Corp., the nation's largest wholesale club operator, said that President and Chief Executive Jim Sinegal and Chief Financial Officer Richard Galanti won't get what would would have been almost $300,000 in combined bonuses this year because they were responsible for irregular stock options awards.

Ruling On Convictions Could Help Skilling (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 20 (Bloomberg News) — A federal appeals court has refused to consider reinstating the convictions of four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit denied a government request for a hearing before all its 15 judges, the online court docket said yesterday. A three-judge panel in August threw out the fraud convictions of the bankers, finding flaws in the prosecution theory that they deprived Enron of their "honest services" in the transaction.

The decision may help Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, in his bid to have his guilty verdicts thrown out. Mr. Skilling, 52, had cited the ruling in asking the judge in his case to cancel his fraud convictions. His sentencing begins Monday.

"If the government's theory of prosecution was based on the same theory that's now been overturned and affirmed by the appellate court, we can expect Skilling's lawyers to make this the centerpiece of their appeal," said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor.

Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment yesterday.

The Merrill executives were convicted of improperly inflating Enron's 1999 fourth-quarter earnings by disguising a loan as proceeds from the sale to the investment bank of power-generating barges moored off the Nigerian coast.

Prosecutors said the bankers deprived Enron of their honest services by acting against its interest.

The appeals court disagreed, saying the theory cannot be applied when an employer "aligns the interests of the employee with a specified corporate goal" and the employee acts accordingly.

SKILLING MAY GET 20 YEARS IN PRISON (NYPOST)

By Paul Tharp

The New York Post, October 21, 2006

October 21, 2006 -- Jeff Skilling, the last remaining disgraced boss of Enron, faces 20 years behind bars at his sentencing Monday - while his lawyers face an unpaid legal tab of $30 million.

Skilling, 52, is among eight executives snared in the infamous $60 billion collapse of Enron four years ago, and is likely to be in his 70s by the time he leaves prison.

He's already nearly broke, say his lawyers.

But prosecutors say he's got many millions left from his ill-gotten gains, and must fork over $182.9 million in penalties and restitution to his victims.

Thousands of investors and former Enron employees lost more than $2 billion from holding worthless Enron shares wrecked in the cooked-books scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0084039

About a dozen of the victims have been permitted to speak at Skilling's sentencing in Houston federal court to admonish him.

Skilling's partner in the crimes, former CEO Ken Lay, was to have been sentenced with Skilling on Monday but Lay cheated justice by dropping dead of a heart attack July 5, six weeks after his conviction.

A judge wiped Lay's record clean earlier this week, since his death leaves him unable to complete an appeal of his conviction.

Skilling also is appealing to have his conviction thrown out because four Merrill Lynch bankers involved in the schemes had their convictions tossed earlier this year by a three-judge appeals panel.

It hasn't stopped prosecutors, however, from going after Skilling to shoulder Lay's $43.5 million penalty plus Skilling's own separate penalties of $139.4 million.

Prosecutors say Skilling still has about $60 million in assets, which have been frozen.

Skilling's lawyer, Dan Petrocelli, said Skilling owes his legal defense team more than $30 million, not counting the $23 million that the Justice Department earlier allowed Skilling to set aside for his defense before his assets were frozen.

Feinstein Asks Justice To Appeal Ruling Vacating Lay Conviction (FRESBEE)

Fresno Bee, October 21, 2006

Sen. Dianne Feinstein is urging the Justice Department to appeal a ruling this week vacating the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Enron founder Kenneth Lay.

Feinstein, D-Calif., sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday criticizing the decision to erase the conviction. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in Houston made the ruling because Lay died before getting to pursue appeals.

"I urge the Justice Department to seek an appeal of Judge Lakes' decision, so that the government can fight to preserve Enron victims' hard-fought right to obtain restitution," Feinstein wrote.

The government wants to recover some $42.5 million in what it says were Lay's ill-gotten gains and the ruling complicates that. Fraud by Enron and other companies drove up energy costs in California by billions during the state's 2000-2001 energy crisis.

A Justice Department spokesman, Bryan Sierra, said the department was considering whether to appeal.

Feinstein also criticized the handling of legislation drafted by the Bush administration to change how the law handles the death of a criminal defendant while his or her appeal is pending. The Justice Department sent the proposed legislation to House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Vice President Dick Cheney, who is formally president of the Senate, in early September, but it was not brought to the floor before Congress recessed for the midterm elections.

Feinstein, who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee, told Gonzales she was "dismayed" that the proposed legislation was not circulated to other lawmakers.

Sierra said the legislation was referred to the Judiciary Committee and widely reported in the press.

Feinstein said she planned to introduce legislation of her own once Congress reconvenes to address issues arising from the death of a defendant pending appeal.

Senator Wants Justice Department To Appeal Lay Decision (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., called on the Justice Department on Friday to appeal a Houston judge's decision to vacate the late Ken Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions.

U.S. District Court Judge Sim Lake earlier this week wiped out the one-time Enron Corp. chairman's convictions because Lay died before his appeals had been exhausted. Lake's decision followed a precedent set in another case in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Feinstein, in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, called on the government to appeal the ruling so "the government can fight to preserve Enron victims' hard-fought right to obtain restitution."

Feinstein argued the 5th Circuit's ruling went beyond a doctrine in common law that does away with punishments after a defendant's death.

"The Supreme Court has never held that it also must wipe out a victim's right to compensatory relief such as restitution," Feinstein wrote.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said: "We have received the letter, and it will be sent to the appropriate persons for review."

Feinstein, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said she plans to introduce legislation during Congress' lame duck session after the elections to try to address the decision.

Lay died July 5, just weeks after a jury found him guilty on six charges of fraud and conspiracy.

Lake also found him guilty of bank fraud.

Grasso Braces For Long Battle Over Pay Ruling (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

Judge's Decision Means Victory For Foes of Former NYSE Chief; A Legal Monster Is Spawned

The fight over one of Wall Street's biggest paychecks -- the $187.5 million compensation package amassed by former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso -- is headed for yet another round of nasty court battles.

A judge's decision on Thursday that Mr. Grasso needs to give back as much as $100 million significantly changes the landscape of the battle, handing Mr. Grasso's enemies a key victory.

Mr. Grasso vowed to keep pressing his case. "I believe it was right when I started, and nothing has changed my mind," Mr. Grasso said Friday in an interview.

Mr. Grasso, 60 years old, lost his job at the NYSE in 2003 because of the controversy over the rich pay package. Mr. Grasso says he was paid the bulk of the money in 2003 and about $80 million was left after taxes. He says that cash is "prudently managed in a mix of stocks and bonds." He and his wife also own five homes and apartments in New York and Florida. "There are no boats, no planes," he said.

The case has become a many-headed legal monster. There are no fewer than six separate legal claims being made against Mr. Grasso in New York State courts pertaining to his pay. That proliferation of claims has produced some strange legal twists: For instance, a five-judge panel is already hearing appeals to some parts of the dispute -- even though the case itself has yet to go to trial.

Currently, the trial is slated to start sometime next year.

New York state, which is suing Mr. Grasso, contends that he was overpaid as the chairman of a not-for-profit institution. Back then, the NYSE was set up as a not-for-profit, although since then it has converted itself into a public company, NYSE Group Inc.

Justice Charles E. Ramos, a New York state-court judge, found that Mr. Grasso withheld details about the scope of his pay from the exchange's board of directors. The ruling was a big victory for Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who made a name for himself a few years ago by waging a war on Wall Street abuses and is now running for governor.

He is up against the feisty Mr. Grasso, who hails from a mostly working-class neighborhood in the New York City borough of Queens, where his mother was a housekeeper. Mr. Grasso has fought Mr. Spitzer at every step. "If he wants to give us a jury trial tomorrow, we'll be there," Mr. Grasso said.

Mr. Spitzer sued Mr. Grasso in May 2004 after settlement discussions between the two sides went nowhere.

Mr. Grasso turned around and sued the NYSE, claiming he actually was owed another $50 million and also that he was defamed after he left the exchange. Over the past two and half years, he has filed numerous motions to have parts of the case against him tossed out, asking at one point for the judge to be replaced and arguing for a trial before a jury -- something he isn't guaranteed under state law.

All of those motions were denied by Justice Ramos and then sent to the New York appellate court, which is expected to hear arguments next month.

DOJ_NMG_0084041

"The motion, cross-motions and appeals are really indicative of what a pitched battled it is," says Zachary Hummel, an attorney at Bryan Cave LLP who has followed the matter.

Mr. Grasso defended his legal tactics as necessary for getting a fair trial. "We were ready to start" months ago, said Mr. Grasso. "What we're not ready to do is give up my right to justice under the law."

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Spitzer said "there will be no settlements" with Mr. Grasso. "These defendants deserve to have their repeated lies and misrepresentations brought out into the open."

Ken Langone, a former Big Board director who ran the compensation committee and was also named by the Attorney General as a defendant in the case, disputes Mr. Spitzer's assertions . "Mr. Langone has been straightforward and upfront from day one about the decisions he made as a director, and those facts have been brought into the open time and again in every deposition," a spokesman for Mr. Langone said in a statement. "Mr. Spitzer's cheap disparagements, while typical, cannot alter the obvious reality that Mr. Langone acted properly in his duties and stands behind his conduct."

Justice Ramos's latest ruling will be the subject of Mr. Grasso's next appeal, which will be heard by New York's appellate court, the second-highest court in New York under the Court of Appeals. If Justice Ramos's opinion stands, Mr. Grasso will have to give back the money, the exact amount of which has yet to be determined.

At that point, Mr. Spitzer could claim victory and call it a day. He has previously said that he felt Mr. Grasso should pay $100 million or more back to his former employer.

The same appellate court is expected to hear arguments after Thanksgiving on Mr. Grasso's motion to have the case decided by a jury. Justice Ramos doesn't support a jury trial for major parts of the case. The main legal question to be decided is whether Mr. Grasso's $187.5 million pay package was "reasonable" under the state laws governing not-for-profits.

Mr. Grasso has also requested that Justice Ramos remove himself from the case, in part because the judge had twice previously sought a board seat on the NYSE. If the appellate court agrees, a different judge will hear the case.

Mr. Spitzer said Mr. Grasso is grasping at straws on this claim: "The last refuge of the guilty is to impugn the integrity of the court," he said.

Legal experts say Mr. Grasso has strong grounds to appeal the Ramos ruling.

"Any time a judge usurps the legal process and makes a summary judgment, the appeals court will take a close look at it," says Thomas Curran, a former Manhattan assistant district attorney.

A settlement seems unlikely. Mr. Grasso "has very little leverage right now," Mr. Curran said. "And Mr. Spitzer is not interested in being conciliatory at this stage. Maybe after January [when Mr. Spitzer leaves office], there will be room for discussions."

Write to Aaron Lucchetti at aaron.lucchetti@wsj.com1 and Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com2

CRIMINAL LAW:

Foley Case A Test For Ethics Panel (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Despite an uncharacteristic spurt of activity, the House ethics committee is unlikely to complete its investigation of the Mark Foley page scandal before the election, but it may issue an interim report on Foley's activities and how the GOP leadership responded to warnings, according to sources.

A committee panel has spent two weeks hearing from an array of witnesses. These included former House clerk Jeff Trandahl, who helped supervise the pages, and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who said he warned House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) this spring about Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former page from Louisiana.

Foley (R-Fla.) abruptly resigned his House seat Sept. 29 after being confronted by ABC News with copies of sexually explicit instant messages he had sent to male former pages. The FBI has launched a criminal investigation into Foley's actions, and the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, which has been largely dormant for the past two years, is investigating what, if anything, House GOP leaders did in response to repeated warnings about Foley's conduct.

Next week, the panel is likely to depose members of Hastert's staff, including chief of staff Scott Palmer and counsel Ted Van Der Meid, and possibly the speaker himself.

It may also interview Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who is the subject of a preliminary Justice Department inquiry into a camping trip he took with male former pages and others in 1996.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who sits on the ethics committee but is not on the four-member task force investigating the Foley matter, said both political parties have a stake in seeing that the probe is completed as soon as possible. The scandal has become an issue in several races and has cast a pall over the House, an institution that had already suffered a serious decline in public approval, according to polling.

"There's no upside for anybody in dragging this out," Cole said. "It serves us well and it serves [the Democrats] well to actually just do the right thing."

The committee's sudden flurry of activity -- its members have taken sworn depositions from key players in the Foley scandal four days a week for the past two weeks -- contrasts with its failure to respond to a rash of lobbying and political corruption scandals over the past two years. Evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, the committee sat idle while the two parties feuded over staffing and procedural issues. Some ethics watchdog groups say the outcome of the Foley probe will demonstrate whether Congress can police itself.

"This is a crucial test institutionally," said Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), the top Democrat on the ethics committee and the Foley investigative panel. "If we can't divorce ourselves from the political consequences and come to a bipartisan conclusion, it speaks poorly for the future of peer review in the House."

In April, the ethics committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) stepped aside when it became known that he was under federal investigation for funneling federal funds to home-state foundations and possibly enriching himself. A month later, the committee finally announced that it was investigating three people: former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) and Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio). Cunningham and Ney have pleaded guilty to accepting bribes, and Cunningham has begun serving a long prison sentence. Jefferson is the subject of another federal bribery probe. The committee has not issued reports in any of those cases.

"Regardless of what happens in the Foley investigation, the ethics process in the House is a failed process and must be fixed," said Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer, a congressional watchdog who supports establishment of an independent investigative body that would answer to the ethics panel. "We have had the most congressional corruption scandals in three decades, and we have had a House ethics committee that did nothing about it."

But Berman and the committee's chairman, Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), have managed to resuscitate the panel to some extent in recent months, doling out private advice to lawmakers behind closed doors and taking on the politically sensitive task of probing whether Hastert and his deputies failed to act quickly enough to stop Foley.

In a statement, Hastings said the task force's "primary focus is on how individuals holding positions of authority in the House -- as well as the overall system, if you will -- handled information concerning improper interaction between members and House pages."

Earlier this month, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) offered a resolution demanding that the panel issue a preliminary report on its work within 10 days. GOP leaders referred the measure to the ethics committee, and it is now clear that the panel will not release its findings that quickly.

The committee has not decided whether to issue an interim report, sources said, but members will weigh the option after concluding depositions in the case.

Hastings said that although he and his colleagues hope to conclude the probe soon, "the American people are entitled to the entire truth about how this incident was handled, and we'll take as long as necessary to make sure they get it.

"You simply cannot pledge to go wherever the evidence takes you and, at the same time, set some self-imposed deadline and expect to be taken seriously," he said.

The task force needs to depose only about half a dozen additional witnesses and does not need to engage in a lengthy document review, but GOP ethics lawyer Jan Baran said it will be nearly impossible for the committee to issue a final report before voters go to the polls.

Priest Named By Foley Is Barred From All Religious Duties (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

MIAMI, Oct. 20 — The Archdiocese of Miami on Friday barred the Rev. Anthony Mercieca from functioning as a priest anywhere in the world after confirming that he was the clergyman who Mark Foley said molested him in the 1960's.

Father Mercieca, who now lives in Malta, can no longer publicly celebrate Mass, administer the sacraments or wear priestly clothes, said Mary Ross Agosta, a diocesan spokeswoman.

Ms. Agosta apologized to Mr. Foley in a statement and described as repugnant Father Mercieca's intimate contact with him, which the priest disclosed to a Florida newspaper this week. Father Mercieca, 69, worked in South Florida for almost 40 years and remains under the auspices of the archdiocese.

"Such behavior is morally reprehensible, canonically criminal and inexcusable," Ms. Agosta said.

Mr. Foley, 52, resigned from the House of Representatives last month after the release of sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages. Soon after, his lawyer announced that Mr. Foley is gay, had gone into treatment for alcoholism and had been molested by a clergyman when he was 13 to 15.

"An apology is due to Mr. Foley for the hurt he has experienced," Ms. Agosta said.

So far, she said, no one else had reported sexual misconduct by Father Mercieca. He worked in at least eight parishes in South Florida since 1966, most recently at Blessed Trinity Catholic Church in Miami Springs from 1993 to 2003. Ms. Agosta said he left Florida to retire.

"There were absolutely no other problems," she said in an interview.

Ms. Agosta said the Archdiocese of Miami had begun an internal investigation that could result in further sanctions against Father Mercieca. A spokesman for the archbishop of Malta said an investigation was under way there, too.

Though retired, Father Mercieca was still saying Mass every morning at a cathedral on Gozo, the Maltese island where he was raised and now lives with his brother, also a priest.

The Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, an advocacy group, said that both diocesan actions were insufficient and that Father Mercieca should be put in a secure treatment facility while the police investigated.

The Herald-Tribune of Sarasota, Fla., reported Thursday that Father Mercieca said he had skinny-dipped and lounged naked in saunas with the young Mr. Foley, massaged him and roomed with him naked on overnight trips. He said that once, on tranquilizers, he might have gone further with Mr. Foley but could not recall details.

Father Mercieca repeated the claims in interviews with other news outlets, but also said his relationship with Mr. Foley was not sexual.

The survivors group has urged Mr. Foley to press charges, but the statute of limitations has probably expired. His civil lawyer, Gerald Richman, said Friday that he had no idea whether Mr. Foley would pursue the matter.

Mr. Richman identified Father Mercieca to Palm Beach County prosecutors this week as Mr. Foley's molester. Prosecutors shared the information with the archdiocese, but said they would do nothing more unless other victims emerged.

Ms. Agosta said the archdiocese, which includes Broward, Miami-Dade and Monroe Counties, would encourage any other victims to come forward by asking every parish to make an announcement about Father Mercieca.

Just A Quiet Retiree Leading Mass In Malta (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

VICTORIA, Malta, Oct. 20 — He is known here as Father Tony, though he does not seem to be known very well, for the Rev. Anthony Mercieca spent his career as a priest far from Gozo, the tiny Mediterranean island where he grew up. And he is not sociable anyway, say people who know him.

"He is a very solitary man," said George Borg, 52, a teacher who described himself as a family friend. "He walks alone."

DOJ_NMG_0084044

That quiet ended after Father Mercieca, 69, gave several telephone interviews admitting that he had had possibly inappropriate encounters in Florida in the 1960's with Mark Foley, the congressman who resigned over explicit electronic messages to pages.

In the interviews, Father Mercieca admitted to massaging the boy, skinny-dipping with him and staying in the same room with him on overnight trips. He said, perhaps, too much — and on Friday, he refused to speak to reporters camped out on the narrow street where he lives with his brother, George, also a priest. As the diocese here investigated the accusations, many of those closest to Father Mercieca did not want to address the subject.

"Leave me alone for five minutes," his brother begged reporters as he left the family house here in the main town on Gozo, the smaller of two principal islands of Malta, a Roman Catholic nation of 400,000 south of Sicily.

The sketchiest of portraits emerged from neighbors and church officials: Father Mercieca retired here a few years ago, having spent his career mostly in Brazil and the United States, and has not been officially active here as a priest. But he said Mass at 9 every morning for several dozen worshipers at the main church here.

While abroad, he returned to Gozo several weeks a year for vacation.

One church official, who requested anonymity because he did not have the authority to speak publicly, said that until the interviews on Thursday the diocese had not known of Mr. Foley's accusations — or indeed any against Father Mercieca concerning abuse.

There seemed to be little anger at Father Mercieca among his neighbors. "There are a lot of people like this," said one, Carmel Grech, 80. "Everybody has sins. What is the big fuss here?"

After 3 Attempts To Convict Gotti, Prosecutors Decide Against Making It 4 (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

John A. Gotti, who three times in just over a year has escaped conviction on federal racketeering charges, will finally be able to pursue what he claims he has long desired: an ordinary life.

After three trials in Manhattan, each ending in a hung jury, federal prosecutors have announced that they will not seek a fourth trial on those charges for Mr. Gotti, a decision federal officials had indicated was likely. It enshrines him as a defendant even trickier to convict than his father, the Gambino family don, John J. Gotti, who beat the rap three times himself before being found guilty in 1992 and dying in a federal prison hospital 10 years later. (The younger Mr. Gotti is not invulnerable: He was convicted in a previous case and served prison time.)

In a terse statement issued yesterday, Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, said this particular case was over. "The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case," it read. "Accordingly, we submitted a proposed order which the court has signed and which ends this prosecution."

That left Mr. Gotti, who has acknowledged through his lawyers that he ran the Gambino family during stretches of the 1990's, to return to a life as normal as his name will allow — for now.

This decision does not preclude the F.B.I. or other authorities from developing new evidence for a different case some day.

At the end of his third trial in September, Mr. Gotti told reporters he wanted to "move on" and expressed a desire to work with children.

His lawyer, Charles F. Carnesi, said Mr. Gotti may turn to academe. "He's interested in pursuing a degree," he said. "In social work or counseling or maybe something with the schools." With the indictment dismissed, he is free to go as he pleases, and the liens on his property securing his bail will soon be lifted, Mr. Carnesi said.

Mr. Gotti's triumph was a stinging defeat for Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk show host whom prosecutors said was a victim in the case. While the jury agreed that Mr. Gotti ordered the abduction and attack of Mr. Sliwa in 1992 after he called the elder Mr. Gotti a drug dealer on the air, they could not agree on the overall charge that this was part of a racketeering conspiracy.

In a statement from the newsroom of WABC radio, Mr. Sliwa called Mr. Gotti a criminal and a drain on society. He also called Mr. Gotti's father a serial killer and a disgrace to the human race. He said he intended to sue Mr. Gotti "for not only the bullets that he ordered put into my body, but for the fear and abuse he has heaped on our law-abiding society over the past 20 years."

DOJ_NMG_0084045

He ridiculed Mr. Gotti's plan to "turn over a new leaf" as a charade.

"He claims that he has moved on with his life and just wants to live in peace," Mr. Sliwa wrote. "He wants to write books for children and raise money for charity, he claims. But part of moving on in life is acknowledging the innocent people hurt in the past. The people he extorted, stole from, had beaten and shot."

Federal Prosecutors Decline To Pursue Fourth Racketeering Case Against Junior Gotti (AP)

By LARRY McSHANE, Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Three mistrials added up Friday to one huge victory for second-generation mobster John A. "Junior" Gotti.

Federal prosecutors announced they would not pursue a fourth racketeering case against Mr. Gotti, son of the late Gambino head John "Teflon Don" Gotti.

"The decision wasn't unexpected, but obviously it's great to have confirmation," said Mr. Gotti's attorney, Charles Carnesi. "It's a terrific relief."

Mr. Carnesi had not yet spoken with Mr. Gotti, who said after last month's third mistrial that he wanted to take his wife and six children to the Midwest, attend college and lead a quiet life away from the region where his name became synonymous with organized crime.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement that retrying Mr. Gotti "is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case."

But more legal problems could lie ahead: Radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa promised a civil suit against Mr. Gotti over his near-fatal June 1992 kidnapping allegedly ordered by the mob scion. Mr. Sliwa was allegedly targeted for his incessant on-air criticism of the elder Mr. Gotti. He survived by diving out the window of a moving cab after suffering a pair of gunshot wounds.

The jury in the third trial unanimously found that Mr. Gotti, 42, had ordered the kidnapping, and the defendant admitted to a lengthy criminal career. But that was insufficient to convict the younger Mr. Gotti of racketeering because the panel was split on his claim of quitting the mob before July 1999.

Mr. Gotti's assertion was the key to the case, because the five-year racketeering statute of limitations expired if he had stopped mob activity by that date. The latest case had a jury divided 8-4, with most believing Mr. Gotti never swore off the mob before the Sept. 27 mistrial was declared.

In Mr. Gotti's September 2005 trial, a jury deadlocked 11-1 in favor of conviction. This spring, a second trial produced the same result - although that panel favored acquittal.

We Give Up On Jr., Say Feds (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, October 21, 2006

For John A. (Junior) Gotti, the third mistrial was the charm.

Federal prosecutors announced yesterday they will not retry Gotti for racketeering and will abandon efforts to nail him for trying to kill radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement that a fourth trial was "not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries."

That means for the first time in eight years, Gotti, 42, is a free man with no criminal charges hanging over him. That didn't sit well with Sliwa, who vowed to bring a lawsuit against Gotti seeking damages for the 1992 shooting, which allegedly was in retaliation for his on-air attacks on the late Gambino crime boss John Gotti.

"I feel as disappointed as a Mets fan today," Sliwa told the Daily News. "I would have hoped they would have prosecuted him four or five times. But I understand they have to deal with legal technicalities."

DOJ_NMG_0084046

Late yesterday afternoon, Gotti - whose father's ability to beat the rap earned him the moniker the Teflon Don - returned to his gated mansion in Oyster Bay Cove, L.I., with one of his sons in a chauffeured sedan, declining to speak to a reporter.

The mob scion has expressed interest in moving out West, returning to school to study child psychology and writing a book, but he needs permission from the feds because he's still on supervised release for his 1998 federal conviction.

"He's been talking about plans for the future and now John has the freedom to go on with his life," sister Victoria Gotti said. "His only option, I think, is to get off the [government's] radar and go off and live somewhere else, like the Midwest or down South."

She said the entire Gotti clan is "beat up and tired" after three trials that have taken a heavy emotional toll on her brother. Gotti already had heard the good news on the radio by the time defense lawyer Charles Carnesi reached him.

"He was thrilled," Carnesi said. "As much as it was expected, it's still different when you finally have confirmation.

"He wants to leave New York as soon as it can be arranged," Carnesi added.

Sliwa said he's owed monetary damages - "I can't tell you the pain I suffer as a result of the rearrangement of my internal plumbing" - and promised to donate any proceeds to charity.

But his lawsuit is probably dead on arrival, legal experts say, for the very same reason the feds failed to convict Gotti - the statute of limitations has passed.

Although the jury in the last mistrial agreed to convict Gotti in the Sliwa attack - which might have created an exception to the one-year statute of limitations for filing a civil suit - there was no verdict because they were hung on the racketeering charge.

Gotti's mother, Victoria, didn't think much of Sliwa's threatened suit.

"I think the victims of all his hoaxes should sue him," she said, referring to Sliwa's admissions that he had staged publicity stunts to get media coverage of the Guardian Angels, including a fabricated claim that he had been kidnapped by a city transit cop.

Though Gotti insists he left the Mafia behind in 1999, one law enforcement source said it's "pretty impossible" to believe he's going to move away and go straight.

"He sitting on a ton of money which is all ill-gotten gains," the source said. "He knows one life and it's called organized crime. Plus he has to look over his shoulder with the Gambino family because he really upset a lot of people."

But mob expert Jerry Capeci said he doesn't think anyone is gunning for Gotti for speaking to prosecutors, which at one point was a serious Mafia no-no.

"He never hurt anyone, never became a cooperating witness," Capeci said. "Even though three juries could never agree on whether he quit the mob, his Gambino crime family days are gone, if not forgotten."

With John Lauinger

Junior Gotti Won't Face Retrial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 21, 2006

The government dropped the other shoe Friday and said it won't retry John A. Gotti, the son of the late crime boss, on racketeering charges.

It was widely expected that federal prosecutors in Manhattan would drop efforts to convict Gotti after three mistrials. Gotti, 42, of Oyster Bay, the son of the late Gambino crime boss John Gotti, has been free on bail since the latest mistrial on Sept. 27.

"The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case," said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in a statement released Friday morning. Garcia said Manhattan federal court Judge Shira Scheindlin signed papers that ended the prosecution of Gotti.

"It was just wise to stop," said one federal law enforcement official who asked not to be named.

"It wasn't unexpected, but it is great to have confirmation," said Gotti's defense attorney, Charles Carnesi, of Garden City. "It was the right and responsible thing to do."

"He fully intends to move out of New York" to get away from his former associates, Carnesi said of Gotti.

DOJ_NMG_0084047

But Gotti was blasted by Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio personality whose 1992 kidnapping was ordered by Gotti, prosecutors charged. Sliwa, who was seriously wounded in the incident, also said he planned to sue Gotti for the attack. But such a suit could run up against the statute of limitations.

During his last trial, Gotti told Newsday that he planned to continue his college studies and work with children. With the dismissed indictment, Gotti's multimillion-dollar bail has been cleared.

Though Gotti couldn't be reached for comment Friday, his sister Angel said her brother might explore the idea of going into a food business with both her and sister Victoria.

"We are all relieved," Angel Gotti said. "Hopefully, they will leave him alone."

Gotti was accused in the indictment of various racketeering offenses, including conspiracy, extortion conspiracy and witness tampering. He faced 20 years in prison on the racketeering charge alone. But in three trials between August 2005 and this year, the government failed to convince a unanimous jury. In the last trial, jurors told reporters the panel sometimes was evenly split on some of the charges.

The only unanimous decision by the jury came in its finding that Gotti was involved in the Sliwa kidnapping, jurors said. But the Sliwa charge was only one racketeering act, of which two had to be proved to sustain a conviction.

Gotti maintained that he left the mob in July 1999, a date that would have put the indictment outside the statute of limitations. Some jurors said Gotti's withdrawal defense was credible.

Sliwa, who said he still suffers from the effects of being shot during the kidnap attempt, vented his anger and frustration in a statement released Friday.

"Today, John Gotti was given a gift he didn't deserve -- release from federal criminal charges, which included his ordering of the plot to kidnap and shoot me in 1992," Sliwa said.

Sliwa said he plans to bring a lawsuit against Gotti "for the harm he has caused to me and my family" as well as "fear and abuse he heaped on law-abiding society."

But intentional tort claims are governed by a one-year statute of limitations, and unless Sliwa has some other legal theory, any lawsuit against Gotti could not go forward, said Robert Kelner, a prominent personal injury attorney in Manhattan.

GIDDY GOTTI JR. DEFEATS THE FEDS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 21, 2006

October 21, 2006 -- Prosecutors in the John "Junior" Gotti case threw in the towel yesterday, announcing they won't seek a fourth racketeering trial for the mob scion.

The son of the late Gambino boss John "Teflon Don" Gotti - who earned his nickname by beating a trio of prosecutions before he was jailed for life in 1992 - got his good news less than a month after his third mistrial in the span of a year.

"The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries," U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said yesterday.

"We're very pleased," said Gotti lawyer Charles Carnesi. "The decision wasn't unexpected, but obviously it's great to have confirmation. It's a terrific relief, and I'm very, very pleased for John, his wife and his children."

But Gotti's legal woes are far from over if radio host Curtis Sliwa and the feds have their way.

Sliwa, who was kidnapped and shot in a chilling 1992 plot allegedly hatched by Gotti, yesterday announced plans to hit the former Gambino crime family leader with a civil suit.

"John Gotti was given a gift he didn't deserve," Sliwa said. "I'm bringing a lawsuit against Gotti for the harm he has caused to me and my family. For not only the bullets that he ordered put into my body, but for the fear and abuse he has heaped on our law-abiding society over the past 20 years."

Prosecutors made a written request to have the charges nullified, which was authorized by Manhattan federal Judge Shira Scheindlin - a strategic decision by the feds that could allow them to pursue portions of the case in a future indictment.

The move pre-empted plans by Gotti's lawyers to seek permanent dismissal of the racketeering charges, which included kidnapping, a 2003 witness-tampering plot, loansharking and other crimes.

The sticking point for the divided jury at Gotti's latest trial in September was his claim that he retired from the Mafia in 1999 - before the five-year statute of limitations on most of the charges in the case - splitting the anonymous panel eight to four in favor of conviction.

One charge the jury did agree on unanimously was that Gotti ordered a pair of Gambino goons to kidnap Sliwa, founder of the Guardian Angels, in a stolen taxi.

This wasn't enough for a conviction under racketeering laws, however, since prosecutors must prove at least two criminal acts.

"I'm now convinced that the trial must have occurred in some small, uneducated country, and not in New York City in 2006," said mob-busting former federal prosecutor James Walden. "The notion that John Gotti Jr. withdrew from the Gambino family based on the evidence presented in that trial is gullible in the extreme."

Defense lawyer Gerald Shargel, who represented Gotti, said: "The government had a very weak case, and every time they tried to make it better, it just got worse."

Paul Callan, legal analyst and former deputy chief of homicide at the Brooklyn DA's office, called the failure to convict Gotti a "travesty of justice."

"The prosecution tried him too often and too late," he said.

Sliwa, who nearly died from the bullet wounds after he escaped his attackers by throwing himself out of the speeding cab, said any money he receives from a suit would go to other victims of the Gambino family.

"Knowing John Gotti Jr., the biggest way to hurt him is to force him to give up his money. He's like a miser. He throws nickels around like manhole covers," Sliwa said.

Gotti has vowed to leave the Northeast if the feds abandoned the prosecution.

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Mr. Gotti, You're Free To Go (STNIA)

By Jeff Harrell, STATEN ISLAND ADVANCE

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 21, 2006

After 3 mistrials, prosecutors say they're done trying him

There won't be a fourth trial of John A. (Junior) Gotti.

After three hung juries, federal prosecutors yesterday dropped racketeering charges against the one-time head of the Gambino crime family.

"The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case," said U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, whose office first tried Gotti on a series of racketeering charges in August last year -- ending with a hung jury voting 11-1 for conviction.

"Accordingly, [on Thursday] we submitted a proposed order which the court has signed and which ends this prosecution," Garcia said.

Gotti, 42, was tried three times on charges ranging from racketeering and construction extortion to ordering the 1992 abduction of Curtis Sliwa, in which the radio-show host and Guardian Angels founder was shot and wounded in a rigged taxicab.

Had he been convicted, he faced 35 years in prison.

The dismissal -- signed by Garcia; Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou, lead prosecutor during the third trial, and U.S. District Judge Shira A. Scheindlin -- was made public yesterday.

Gotti's attorney Charles Carnesi greeted the news with relief.

"It was not unexpected," Carnesi said. "We were thrilled when we got the outcome that we did -- the excitement was when we got the hung jury.

"We are relieved to get the confirmation."

Carnesi said yesterday afternoon that he had yet to speak with Gotti about the decision.

Jennie Carmona, who served as the defense team's legal assistant during all three trials, said word that the feds would not seek a fourth trial had reached members of Gotti's family, including his mother, Victoria Gotti, and his sister, Angel.

DOJ_NMG_0084049

"I'm glad that all the charges have been dismissed," Ms. Carmona said. "And now John Gotti can return and have a normal life, as normal as can be, with his children and family, who he adores."

Following the third mistrial, which was declared on Sept. 27, Gotti maintained that he wanted to take his wife and six children out of New York, perhaps to the Midwest, where he might attend college. He also mentioned Florida, North Carolina and the Pacific Northwest as possible destinations.

"Just let us go," was Gotti's mantra as he stood in the courtroom waiting for court officers to remove the electronic bracelet that he wore for nearly a year as a condition of house arrest. "Let me move on with my life."

In the first trial, only one juror believed that Gotti's defense. In the second trial, held in the spring, eight of 12 jurors voted for acquittal. In his third trial, the jury was unanimous only in finding that Gotti ordered the abduction of and attack on Sliwa as payback for on-air blasts against the elder John Gotti, who was sent to prison for life.

While the feds appear to be done with Gotti, Sliwa isn't.

"I'm bringing a lawsuit against Gotti for the harm he has caused to me and my family," Sliwa said yesterday. "He didn't deserve this break, because a jury found him guilty of nearly killing me."

Throughout the trials, Gotti was held on $7 million bail. That money, put up by family and friends, will be returned.

Jeff Harrell is a news reporter for the Advance. He may be reached at harrell@siadvance.com.

`Junior' Gotti Kidnap Case Is Dismissed By U.S. (Update2) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin And Patricia Hurtado

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. government dropped its racketeering case against accused gangster John A. ``Junior'' Gotti, who was charged with ordering the 1992 kidnapping of radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa.

The dismissal of the case came after jurors deadlocked and a U.S. judge on Sept. 27 declared a third mistrial of the case for Gotti, the son of the late Gambino crime family boss. Gotti faced up to 30 years in prison had he been convicted of racketeering and conspiracy charges.

``The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries,'' U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement today in New York that announced the dismissal, which was approved by a judge yesterday.

The announcement mirrored Garcia's dismissal of several other high-profile cases. Prosecutors in August said they'd withdraw obstruction-of-justice charges against former Credit Suisse Group banker Frank Quattrone if he remains out of trouble. Quattrone's conviction had been reversed by an appeals court. Prosecutors also dismissed charges this year against two New York Stock Exchange specialists accused of illegal trading.

Lauren McDonough, a spokeswoman for Garcia, declined to comment beyond the statement.

Gotti lawyer Charles Canesi didn't have an immediate comment. Gotti lives with his wife and six children in Oyster Bay, New York.

Sliwa

Federal prosecutors said Gotti personally ordered the kidnapping and assault of Sliwa in retaliation for disparaging remarks he made on the air about Gotti's father.

Prosecutors claimed Joseph D'Angelo, a soldier in the Gambino crime family, posing as a taxi driver, picked up Sliwa near his apartment in Manhattan's East Village in a stolen cab.

Sliwa testified that a second man hiding in the front seat opened fire and shot him repeatedly while they struggled in the moving cab. Sliwa, founder of the Guardian Angels anti-crime group, escaped through the window of the cab with serious wounds in his leg and torso.

The defendant's father, John J. Gotti, who led the Gambino family until his 1992 conviction for racketeering, spent the last 11 years of his life in a federal prison hospital in Springfield, Missouri. He died of throat cancer on June 10, 2002. He was 61.

Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME)

By Timothy J. Burger, Washington

Time, October 22, 2006

The Department of Justice is investigating whether Rep. Jane Harman and the pro-Israel group worked together to get her reappointed as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee

Did a Democratic member of Congress improperly enlist the support of a major pro-Israel lobbying group to try to win a top committee assignment? That's the question at the heart of an ongoing investigation by the FBI and Justice Department prosecutors, who are examining whether Rep. Jane Harman of California and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, according to knowledgeable sources in and out of the U.S. government.

The sources tell TIME that the investigation by Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has simmered out of sight since about the middle of last year, is examining whether Harman and AIPAC arranged for wealthy supporters to lobby House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Harman's behalf. Harman said Thursday in a voicemail message that any investigation of — or allegation of improper conduct by — her would be "irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous." On Friday, Washington GOP super lawyer Ted Olson left voicemail messages underscoring that Harman has no knowledge of any investigation. "Congresswoman Harman has asked me to follow up on calls you've had," Olson said. "She is not aware of any such investigation, does not believe that it is occurring, and wanted to make sure that you and your editors knew that as far as she knows, that's not true... . No one from the Justice Department has contacted her." It is not, however, a given that Harman would know that she is under investigation. In a follow-up phone call from California, Olson said Harman hired him this morning because she takes seriously the possibility of a media report about an investigation of her, even though she does not believe it herself.

A spokesman for AIPAC, a powerful Washington-based organization with more than 100,000 members across the U.S., denied any wrongdoing by the group and stressed that it is not taking sides in regards to the committee assignment. Spokespersons for Justice and the FBI declined to comment. The case is a spin-off of a probe that has already led to charges under the Espionage Act against two AIPAC lobbyists, whose case is still pending, and to a 12-and-a-half-year prison sentence for former Defense Intelligence Agency official Lawrence A. Franklin. Franklin pleaded guilty a year ago to three felony counts involving improper disclosure and handling of classified information about the Middle East and terrorism to the two lobbyists, who in turn are accused of passing it on to a journalist and a foreign government, widely believed to be Israel. The two lobbyists, who have denied any wrongdoing but were dismissed by AIPAC in April of 2005, were indicted on felony counts of conspiring with government officials to receive classified information they were not authorized to have access to and providing national defense information to people not entitled to receive it.

Around mid-2005, the investigation expanded to cover aspects of Harman's quiet but aggressive campaign to persuade House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to reappoint her to the prestigious position on the House intel panel. The alleged campaign to support Harman for the leadership post came amid media reports that Pelosi had soured on her California colleague and might name Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, himself a major supporter of Israel, to succeed Harman.

The sources say the probe also involves whether, in exchange for the help from AIPAC, Harman agreed to help try to persuade the Administration to go lighter on the AIPAC officials caught up in the ongoing investigation. If that happened, it might be construed as an illegal quid pro quo, depending on the context of the situation. But the sources caution that there has been no decision to charge anyone and that it is unclear whether Harman and AIPAC acted on the idea.

AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton denies that the organization has engaged in any improper conduct. "Both Congressman Hastings and Congresswoman Harman are strong leaders on issues of importance to the pro-Israel community and would be exemplary Democratic leaders for the House intelligence committee," Dorton said. "AIPAC would never engage in a quid pro quo in relation to a federal investigation or any federal matter and the notion that it would do so is preposterous. AIPAC is not aware that the Justice Department is looking into issues involving the intelligence committee, and has not been asked any questions or contacted by the government on this matter, but certainly would cooperate with any inquiry." Dorton added that AIPAC has previously been assured that the organization and its current employees are not being investigated. In this same investigation, the Justice Department has previously suggested that AIPAC had questionable motives in trying to help a valued government contact remain in a sensitive national security post. The Justice Department alleges in its indictment of Franklin that he asked one of the two AIPAC lobbyists to "put in a good word" for him in seeking assignment to the National Security Council. The document says the AIPAC official noted that such a job would put Franklin "by the elbow of the President" and said he would "do what I can."

AIPAC lists praise from Pelosi among a series of quotes from world leaders on its website: "The special relationship between the United States and Israel is as strong as it is because of your [AIPAC's] fidelity to that partnership..." But congressional sources say Pelosi has been infuriated by pressure from some major donors lobbying on behalf of Harman. In a story touching on tensions between Pelosi and Harman, an alternative California publication, LA Weekly, reported in May that Harman "had some major contributors call Pelosi to impress upon her the importance of keeping Jane in place. According to these members, this tactic, too, hasn't endeared Harman to Pelosi."

A congressional source tells TIME that the lobbbying for Harman has included a phone call several months ago from entertainment industry billionaire and major Democratic party contributor Haim Saban. A Saban spokeswoman said he could not be reached for comment. A phone call pushing for a particular member's committee assignment might be unwelcome, but it would not normally be illegal on its own. And it is unclear whether Saban — who made much of his fortune with the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers children's franchise — knew that lobbying Pelosi might be viewed by others as part of a larger alleged plan.

Saban has donated at least $3,000 to Harman's campaign, according to Federal Election Commission records, and the Saban Center for Middle East Policy, which he sponsors at the prestigious Brookings Institution, boasts Harman among its biggest fans. "When the Saban Center talks, I listen," Harman said at a Saban Center briefing in February on U.S. strategy in Iraq. Harman quipped that, in order to attend the session at Brookings, she had to "blow off" a senior intelligence official's appearance before a House committee.

Rep. Harman Reportedly Under Investigation (WT)

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department is trying to determine whether Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., got improper help from an Israeli lobbying group.

Harman of California is the senior Democrat on the House intelligence committee. Time Magazine reports she may have received a boost from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi wanted to remove her from the committee.

Harman left a voice mail for the magazine calling any suggestions of improper conduct "irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous." She has retained Ted Olson, the lawyer who formerly served as President George W. Bush's solicitor general.

Olson told Time Harman did not know of any investigation but decided to retain him after news reports of a probe.

The investigation appears to stem from another probe involving AIPAC. Two former employees have been charged with receiving classified information from Lawrence Franklin, a former Defense Intelligence Agency employee who has pleaded guilty in the case.

Abramoff To Do Time In Cumberland, Md (NBC)

By Joel Seidman, Producer

NBC News, October 21, 2006

.Disgraced lobbyist still cooperating in influence-peddling probe

WASHINGTON - Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff will report Nov. 15 to a federal prison in Cumberland, Md., to serve a 70-month sentence for fraud and conspiracy charges in connection with the purchase of Florida-based SunCruz Casinos.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck granted a request by prosecutors and Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, that Abramoff serve his time at the Cumberland facility because it is within driving distance of Washington. They said in a court filing that Abramoff was cooperating in the Justice Department's Washington influence peddling investigation and would continue to assist prosecutors while in prison.

The Cumberland facility, about a two-hour drive from Washington, "will facilitate the government's access" to Abramoff, according to court papers. The government said the proximity to Washington would help prosecutors reduce costs and travel time.

Story continues below ? advertisement

If the Cumberland prison is full, Huck recommended that Abramoff be housed at the federal corrections facility in Morgantown, W.Va., which "is also within driving distance of Washington, D.C."

Abramoff and his partner, Adam Kidan, pleaded guilty in January to defrauding lenders of more than $60 million in the SunCruz gambling casino scandal in Florida.

Abramoff is scheduled to appear at a court hearing Dec. 8 in Washington regarding his guilty pleas in January to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

Ney pleaded guilty last week to two counts of conspiring to commit fraud and to making false statements. He is expected to serve 27 months based on a Justice Department recommendation.

Ney is the only member of Congress to be charged in the Abramoff lobbying scandal. He has vowed to resign from Congress in the "next few weeks," but as of now he remains in the House.

TAX BREAK: Legislator Lobbied Him On Behalf Of Marlow, Borough Mayor Says. (ADN)

By Lisa Demer, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News, October 21, 2006

Kohring's work for developer criticized

Last year, state Rep. Vic Kohring sat down with the mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, Jim Whitaker, to talk about changing a state law to increase a tax break for an Anchorage-based developer.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, wasn't there to represent a constituent. He was on the payroll of the developer, Marc Marlow, for whom he had been working since November 2004.

To Whitaker, himself a former legislator, Kohring was acting like a lobbyist, not a lawmaker.

The Fairbanks borough had already approved a tax break for Marlow should he buy and renovate the Polaris Hotel, a boarded-up derelict building that is to Fairbanks what the old MacKay Building was to Anchorage.

But in the meeting in Whitaker's office on Nov. 3, Kohring wanted to see if the borough would agree to a change in state law to make the tax break even more beneficial to Marlow, according to Whitaker.

"As far as I could tell, he was functioning as a lobbyist, and lobbyists do that all the time," said Whitaker, who served alongside Kohring from 1999 to 2003 as part of the Republican majority in the state House. "I thought it was inappropriate."

The bill was eventually introduced in the Alaska Legislature by Fairbanks Rep. Jay Ramras, who said he was asked by Kohring to advance the legislation. Marlow said in an interview recently that he drafted the bill.

"I wrote the original language," Marlow said.

TWO-YEAR RELATIONSHIP

Kohring has worked on a half-dozen projects for Marlow since being hired by him in 2004. Several of the projects, including a proposed electrical generating plant in the Mat-Su, are subject to government approvals.

Now their relationship is coming under new scrutiny as part of an FBI investigation into legislators, influence peddling and the oil field service and construction company Veco Corp.

Kohring is one of six Alaska legislators whose offices were searched by the FBI on Aug. 31. Agents took a folder of information on Marlow along with other items, according to a copy of the receipt for property provided by Kohring's attorney.

No one has been charged with a crime. The FBI has said the investigation is continuing.

Kohring, 48, is a Republican seeking his seventh term representing the Wasilla area. He rode the wave of conservatism that swept through the Mat-Su Borough in the 1990s. He is among a handful of state lawmakers who have found work with companies that have business before the Legislature or state agencies. Kohring's business, Vic Kohring Enterprises, has one client, Marlow, according to required financial disclosures. Marlow paid him $38,100 last year and $5,400 in 2004. Kohring won't have to disclose his 2006 income until March, but he said in an e-mail that his pay from Marlow has dropped because he's taking time off for campaigning.

Kohring says he's abiding by all the ethics rules for legislators.

Outside employment is to be expected for part-time legislators, he wrote in one of several e-mails to the Daily News.

"I trust the voter's judgment to evaluate my activities and my constituents are the ultimate judge," Kohring wrote. "I firmly believe I have never compromised my obligations to them or the state because of my personal employment."

The alternative, he said, is either full-time legislators or "those who are rich or retired."

Kohring declined to sit for an interview and answer detailed questions about his relationship with Marlow.

Kohring, who had a drywall business until back surgery four years ago, says he's qualified for his job with Marlow regardless of his role as legislator. He has a master's degree in business administration from Alaska Pacific University and served stints as vice chairman of the board of the Alaska Housing Finance Corp. and chairman of the Wasilla Planning Commission.

'GOOD HORSE SENSE'

Marlow said he hired Kohring because of his "good horse sense," work ethic and contacts in the Valley from spending his adult life there -- not because he's a legislator.

"There's not a lot of hand holding for him to get things done and analyze situations and figure out ways around roadblocks and that sort of thing," Marlow said. "The things I have him working on primarily are controlled by the state or a public utility."

Marlow, 49, has a knack for projects supported by tax breaks, grants and government-backed loans. The Oregon native came to Anchorage in 1983 as an electrical contractor. He soon branched out.

Marlow rescued the old MacKay building in downtown Anchorage after it had sat empty and ugly for nearly a quarter century and reopened it this year as a fashionable apartment house, McKinley Tower. A city property tax break, plus government loans and guarantees, made it possible. Over the past decade, he's developed a dozen low-income senior housing projects in Alaska with federal grants. He's a part owner of the old Knik Arm Power Plant on Ship Creek and plans to seek a property tax break once he firms up plans to get it running again.

Marlow said there's nothing wrong with hiring a legislator. He's known Kohring since about 1991, three years before Kohring was first elected to the House.

"The rules don't preclude it from happening, and the rules have been followed to the letter," Marlow said. "So if somebody has a problem with it, then they need to change the rules. They don't need to attack the people that are following the rules."

Marlow sounded offended that anyone would take issue with a lawmaker working for a developer and linked his situation to that of an oppressed minority.

"Some people don't like Muslims either or black people or homosexuals, but it doesn't make them right," Marlow said. Asked what that had to do with his situation with Kohring, Marlow said, "There's all kinds of different prejudices or people's different reasons for not liking one thing or another."

In 2002, a couple of years before he started working for Marlow, Kohring sponsored a bill to extend an existing state law allowing tax breaks to developers of deteriorated properties. Without the legislation, the opportunity for such tax breaks would have expired that July 1. The bill passed.

The next year, Kohring introduced a bill sought by Marlow to extend a lease for Alaska Railroad land on Government Hill from 55 to 75 years. The longer lease was necessary, Marlow testified, so a senior housing project proposed for the site would qualify for a government grant. The bill passed the House but stalled in a Senate committee.

In November 2004, Kohring started working for Marlow. He estimates he worked 800 hours last year setting up meetings, making phone calls, developing plans and conducting research on about a half-dozen projects.

In late 2005, Kohring called then-Anchorage municipal attorney Fred Boness on behalf of Marlow. At issue was an untried tax mechanism that Marlow hoped to use to pay for water and sewer lines on land in South Anchorage, around Minnesota Drive and C Street. Boness said he told Marlow the mechanism wouldn't work in Anchorage.

The concept, provided for in state law, is almost a "chicken and egg thing," said the municipality's chief fiscal officer, Jeff Sinz. A local government would issue revenue bonds to pay for improvements that are then repaid through higher taxes generated by the new development.

Asked what he wanted Kohring to accomplish for him, Marlow denied that the legislator ever worked for him on that project.

Kohring also said he didn't remember doing anything regarding any South Anchorage project.

DOJ_NMG_0084054

But Boness said in an e-mail to the Daily News that Kohring contacted him for an explanation. He figured Kohring was making the kind of inquiry a legislator would typically make to find out why a law didn't work. Boness said he doesn't recall Kohring disclosing he was on Marlow's payroll.

On Dec. 29, Boness sent a detailed e-mail to Kohring explaining why the tax mechanism wouldn't work even though state law provided for it. Boness referred to Marlow three times in the e-mail. The short answer is that in Anchorage, property taxes are designated for specific services; police taxes shouldn't be used for sewer lines.

FOCUS ON POLARIS BUILDING

In Fairbanks, the tax break at issue was for the infamous Polaris building. The old hotel is Fairbanks' tallest building, but it's been empty for years, a boarded-up embarrassment across the street from the new courthouse.

Marlow doesn't own the Polaris but said he's looking to buy it -- if the finances work out. He said his option has run out; talks continue.

The tax break approved by the Fairbanks borough in September 2005 exempted all but $10,000 a year in property taxes for 10 years and deferred normal property taxes for the five years after that.

Marlow thought he wouldn't have to pay the deferred taxes unless he sold the property. The borough expected the taxes when those five years were up, or when the property sold -- whichever happened first.

In stepped Kohring, said Whitaker, the borough mayor. Kohring made it clear he was working for Marlow, Whitaker said, and at a Nov. 3 meeting, Kohring wanted to know whether the borough would agree with a change in state law to match Marlow's view. His answer, Whitaker said, was no -- not if it meant the deferred taxes didn't come in as expected.

Kohring then approached Ramras, R-Fairbanks, and asked him to sponsor the legislation. The Polaris is in Ramras' district.

Why not just sponsor the bill yourself? Ramras recalled asking him.

He couldn't, because he had taken consulting fees from Marlow, Ramras said that Kohring told him.

"I further informed Jay that even though the rules would have allowed me to draft and file a bill, I had made a personal decision to limit my involvement with any legislation," Kohring wrote to the Daily News in an Oct. 15 e-mail.

Ramras said he was glad to sponsor the bill if it helped bring back to life the once glamorous hotel. He said he tried to keep his distance from Marlow and told him not to send a card, a campaign donation or anything else.

Fairbanks officials say the bill that passed doesn't provide as lucrative a tax break as Marlow wanted, allowing the taxes to be deferred until the building sells. Marlow insists it does. The final wording says the due date will be as specified by the municipality. The bill also eliminated the expiration date for the law.

On the House floor April 5 and again May 9, Kohring asked to be excused from voting on the measure because he worked for a developer who could benefit. He was directed to vote anyway, standard when conflicts are declared in the Legislature.

Just recently, Marlow said the legislation didn't even benefit him. On Oct. 9, Marlow battled talk radio host Dan Fagan over the issue. The exchange on KFQD went like this:

Marlow: "You said on the radio that I was going to have a direct benefit by the legislation, which is not true."

Fagan: "So that legislation did not in any way save you any money?"

Marlow: "Absolutely not one dime. All that legislation did is set up a situation in Fairbanks wherein the Polaris building could be renovated like the McKinley (the old MacKay) building was ..."

But as the 10-minute duel ran its course, Marlow admitted that he needed the legislation to even consider buying the building.

"You just made my point!" Fagan exclaimed.

Daily News reporter Lisa Demer can be reached at ldemer@adn.com and 257-4390.

Bills helping Marlow

State Rep. Vic Kohring has sponsored two bills that benefited developer Marc Marlow and, after he began working directly for Marlow, asked another legislator to sponsor a third. The bills are:

DOJ_NMG_0084055

• HB 389: Sponsored by Kohring in 2002 to extend an existing state law allowing tax breaks to developers of deteriorated properties. Without the legislation, the opportunity for such tax breaks would have expired July 1, 2002. The bill passed, extending the tax breaks to 2006.

• HB 97: Sponsored by Kohring in 2003. Would have allowed Marlow to extend a lease of Alaska Railroad land on Government Hill from 55 to 75 years. Passed the House but stalled in the Senate.

• HB 334: Sponsored by Fairbanks Rep. Jay Ramras this year at the request of Kohring, who said he couldn't sponsor it himself because he was being paid by Marlow. Bill concerned tax breaks to developers of deteriorated properties. Marlow wanted to specify that deferred taxes only came due when the property sold. Bill passed, says that the taxes will be due as specified by the municipality. Also eliminated the expiration date.

FBI Said To Be Investigating Ex-official (APP)

By Keith Brown, COASTAL MONMOUTH BUREAU

Asbury Park Press, October 21, 2006

Records on Tinton Falls' Abrams reportedly sought

TINTON FALLS — The FBI served a subpoena at borough hall late Friday afternoon requesting all records relating to a former Planning Board member's activities while a borough official, a source said.

The source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the FBI is investigating the activities of Paul J. Abrams and his relationship with the developer of the proposed Heather Glen development, intended for the Tinton Avenue site of the former Communications-Electronic Command building.

Borough officials were tight-lipped Friday.

Borough Administrator W. Bryan Dempsey referred all questions regarding the subpoena to James E. Berube Jr., borough attorney.

Berube would not say whether the borough was served with an FBI subpoena, but he said there was "a development" regarding Abrams, who in 2002 contracted with a New York developer to further plans for an upscale housing development on the 39-acre property.

"We are cooperating fully with the authorities," Berube said.

Berube would not say which authorities the borough is cooperating with but referred other questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office and the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office.

Mike Drewniak, a U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman, and Peter Warshaw, first assistant Monmouth County prosecutor, declined to comment.

News of the subpoena apparently had not reached Abrams on Friday.

"I have no idea what you're talking about," he said.

Abrams' lawyer, Mitchell Ansell, also said that he had no knowledge of the subpoena but that Abrams did nothing wrong during his tenure as a borough official.

"Paul Abrams committed no crime," said Ansell, of the Ocean Township law firm Ansell Zaro Grimm & Aaron. "Paul Abrams did nothing illegal and conducted himself at all times in a professional and lawful manner, and any allegation to the contrary we deem to be libelous."

Project approved in '05

An Asbury Park Press investigation published in March found that Abrams, a Realtor, in 2002 negotiated a deal worth up to $200,000 with New York developer Abraham Leser to be Leser's consultant in the approval process for the 151-unit housing development that became known as Heather Glen. The development was approved by the Planning Board in 2005.

Abrams worked the deal through his Ocean Township realty company, Saymark Realtors.

He was a Planning Board member from 1997 to November 2002. He also was a member of the Zoning Board of Adjustment until 2005 and the Environmental Commission until 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0084056

Under a contract between Saymark Realtors and Tinton Telecom LLC, a company owned by Leser, Abrams' responsibilities included pushing for the zoning change to allow the development and attempting to buy adjoining properties to more than double the project size.

Through his company, Abrams negotiated with adjoining landowners to sell their properties for the project. According to his consultant contract, he also provided "direction to professionals for the proposed development of the property."

In addition to a $10,000 retainer — paid by check to Saymark Realtors on Nov. 19, 2002 — Abrams' firm was to have been paid $20,000 when the property was rezoned, $20,000 when the project was approved by the Planning Board and $1,000 per home once the houses were sold, according to the contract. The total contract could be worth $201,000 if all the homes were sold.

Abrams resigned from the Planning Board Nov. 20, 2002, a day after he received the retainer for his work as Leser's consultant. He remained a member of the environmental commission and the zoning board.

Planning Board suing

The Press also reviewed planning board minutes and application files from late 1997, when Abrams was appointed to the board, through November 2002. That review revealed Abrams took actions that furthered the applications for three developments, homes in which Abrams' realty company later helped sell.

Abrams' involvement with the Heather Glen development prompted the Planning Board in May to sue the former board member, saying Abrams was "unjustly enriched" by his financial arrangement with Leser.

It also says Abrams breached his "duty of trust" to "the people of Tinton Falls" by accepting, through his company, payment from a developer while still a borough official. The lawsuit seeks hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines and the dissolution of Abrams' realty company. It also names Leser, six "John Does" and six "John Doe businesses" that ostensibly knew of the financial relationship among Abrams, Saymark, Leser and Tinton Telecom.

Ansell, Abrams' attorney, has said the claims in the lawsuit are shocking, meritless and "wholly without any type of basis in fact."

No work on the Heather Glen project has begun, pending the resolution of the planning board's suit against Abrams and other lawsuits involving the development.

Video: FBI Examines Records At West Warwick Town Hall (WJAR-TV)

WJAR-TV, October 21, 2006

NBC 10 has learned that the FBI has subpoenaed records from the West Warwick Town Hall and confirmed that the records taken involve land deals that Senate President Joseph Montalbano conducted for the town.

The land deals include two parcels in the West Warwick industrial park.

The state Ethics Commission is still looking into a complaint accusing Montalbano of failing to disclose legal work he did for West Warwick before a vote on a constitutional amendment that would allow a casino to be built in the town.

The complaint, filed by Operation Clean Government, a citizens group, accused Montalbano of failing to disclose more than $86,000 that his law firm received for work done for West Warwick town authorities.

The complaint also accused Montalbano of having a conflict of interest while the Senate debated and ultimately passed a constitutional amendment allowing the Narragansett Indian tribe to open a casino in West Warwick.

"Montalbano did this work while at the same time voting on the casino up on the General Assembly as senate president and urging passing of the bill," said Bob Arruda, president of Operation Clean Government.

While Town Manager Wolfgang Bauer confirmed the records were subpoenaed, he emphasized that none of the properties that Montalbano handled fell within the footprint of the Harrah's casino plan.

Arruda said he wasn't surprised that federal officials are now looking into the case.

"I think at this stage of the game, the only time that anything substantive is done in Rhode Island is when the feds come in," he said. "The feds need to be involved in this to make certain that has been no criminal activity. And I'm not alleging that there has been. But this needs to be cleaned up one way or another."

Montalbano said he had no comment.

FBI Grabs Montalbano Records In W.W. (PAWTIMES)

By Tracy Scudder, Special to The Times

Pawtucket Times, October 21, 2006

WEST WARWICK - The FBI has seized documents related to work that state Senate President Joseph A. Montalbano (D-Dist. 17, Pawtucket, North Providence, Lincoln) has done for the town, according to West Warwick Council President John J. Flynn.

Flynn confirmed that records like tax titles were turned over to the FBI by Town Manager Wolfgang Bauer, who received a confidential subpoena last week.

Montalbano worked on the tax title for property that is adjacent to the proposed Narragansett Indians casino site; however, town officials would not confirm if the documents subpoenaed included that property.

News of the FBI's interest in the records came as a report began spreading that the FBI had seized the records in Town Hall.

Several town employees Friday denied reports of FBI agents serving a subpoena for records. Flynn said he also received a call about a report that the FBI raided the town hall early yesterday afternoon.

"I have talked to both the town manager and the town clerk, who would obviously be in charge of the records," said Flynn. "There was no FBI presence in town hall and there certainly wasn't a raid."

"There hasn't been an FBI agent in West Warwick Town Hall in I don't know how long, unless they were here in disguise," he said. "Nothing has been seized and everything is still intact."

The FBI would not confirm or deny if or what documents were subpoenaed from the town.

"We can only speak to what is public record. I have nothing in my records that indicates any activity that is of public record," said FBI spokesperson Gail Marcinkevich.

Television news reports, however, said that Bauer confirmed it was the FBI that subpoenaed records from town hall. And Flynn said the documents were related to Montalbano's work.

"The records were turned over in a timely manner. I'm confident when all the records are reviewed they'll find no criminal activity," said Flynn.

Montalbano's spokesman would not comment on the matter. Montalbano and Bauer could not be reached for comment.

The Secret Life Of An Informant (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

To secure a lighter sentence, Garland Hardeman taped friends, associates and a lover Surviving a .22 caliber shot to the head

Garland Hardeman had many awkward moments in his four-year career as a government informant, such as the time he got shot in the face, and the time he wiretapped one of his oldest friends. He also recorded a conversation with his girlfriend in their hotel bedroom, deactivating the device only when their pillow talk turned steamy.

Mr. Hardeman, a Los Angeles cop-turned-lobbyist, was "working off a beef," as prosecutors say -- hoping to reduce his own jail time by acting as a government witness. Earlier, he had been busted for attempted bribery in a Los Angeles garbage-hauling scandal. He continued to work as a lobbyist, using the job as cover to trick friends and business associates into admitting their part in one of the most widespread cases of public malfeasance in the U.S., spanning nine cities and five states.

The double life of an informant is a peculiar one, filled at the same time with tedium and betrayal. Mr. Hardeman wore a wire to record 17 people, many of whom were subsequently convicted. That included his girlfriend. He testified in four grand juries and three trials and accounted for a "substantial" part of the evidence used in "the most pervasive corruption case this district has ever seen," says Tom McConville, a federal prosecutor in the Central District of California. Many of the cases involved paying bribes and kickbacks in return for municipal contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0084058

Mr. Hardeman also complained about the petty indignities of life undercover. He had to pay for most of his travel costs before filing expenses to his boss, in this case, the Federal Bureau of Investigation. "It took them up to three months to reimburse me sometimes," he griped during one of a series of interviews this summer.

The feds are now among Mr. Hardeman's few remaining supporters. In February, Mary Butler, a top prosecutor from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., took the unusual step of speaking on his behalf in court. She praised his meticulous record-keeping and noted that he stood up under "serious cross-examination" when he took the stand.

Mr. Hardeman's account of his double life is largely confirmed by three current or former federal prosecutors, two of his defense lawyers, FBI officials, court documents and transcripts.

The government has long relied on informants and wiretapping to pursue drug rings and organized crime syndicates. But the government's use of cooperating witnesses spiked after 1987 when Congress enacted federal sentencing guidelines that largely usurped judges' discretion in doling out prison time.

Defendants quickly learned that the only way to escape the rigid penalty structure was to cooperate in return for a lenient sentence. In fraud cases, snitches are especially valuable because they can give life to the sometimes complex documents that lie at the heart of many cases. These days it is standard procedure in white-collar cases for the government to try to "flip" defendants if they have something to offer.

Cooperators' testimony is most useful when prosecutors can corroborate it with hard evidence; juries aren't predisposed to like or trust such witnesses. Mr. Hardeman, 49 years old, was ideal in this regard. He provided the feds with hotel receipts, old photos and secret recordings that backed up his version of events.

Mr. Hardeman grew up in a tight-knit African-American Catholic family in Detroit with two brothers, including a twin, and three sisters. He was an altar boy.

Carlos Jones, Mr. Hardeman's college roommate, and a family friend for 30 years, remembers the young Mr. Hardeman as "very gregarious," athletic and popular. "I was surprised he was caught up in that because for the most part he was an up-and-up type of person," says Dr. Jones, who is also Mr. Hardeman's dentist.

After graduating from Michigan State in 1982, Mr. Hardeman moved to L.A. and became a policeman, remaining on the force for 14 years. In 1987, while still part of the Los Angeles Police Department, he won the first of three terms as a councilman in Inglewood, a working-class area in southwestern L.A., where he earned a reputation for being outspoken. Risking retribution from colleagues, he testified about discrimination in the force at a commission set up after the beating of black motorist Rodney King.

After Mr. Hardeman lost his seat in 1999 -- he supported closing the local fire department -- he switched to lobbying. Using his knowledge as a public official, he helped companies bid for municipal contracts. Two big-name clients were M.R. Beal & Co., a minority-owned New York investment bank, and Waste Management Inc., a giant garbage-hauling company based in Houston.

Municipal contracting has expanded rapidly in recent years as cities turned to private companies to provide basic services. Last year municipalities issued $408 billion in bonds to pay for filling potholes, laying sewers, wiring street lights and picking up trash -- nearly double the sum of a decade earlier.

It is a business notorious for corruption, in part because of the clubby nature of city governments. As federal authorities cracked down on no-bid contracts and payrolls padded with employees who don't work, corruption shifted to areas that had escaped federal scrutiny, such as minority set-aside programs. In such programs, which expanded rapidly in the 1970s and 1980s, cities seek out firms owned by women or minorities, or those with a substantial minority staff. Most of the cases in which Mr. Hardeman testified directly or indirectly related to this area, prosecutors say.

Cases involving minority set-aside contracts are little different from earlier forms of wrongdoing. "African-Americans and women did not invent municipal corruption in this country," says Steve Dettelbach, a partner at Baker & Hostetler LLP in Cleveland. Mr. Dettelbach, a former federal prosecutor, tried one of the cases involving Mr. Hardeman.

As Mr. Hardeman began his lobbying career, he became adept at introducing companies to local, often African-American politicians who could help them win business. After barely a year, he found himself on the wrong side of the law.

DOJ_NMG_0084059

The FBI was investigating the mayor of City of Carson, Calif., as part of a wide-ranging corruption probe. Based on a tip from someone in the city council, agents started looking at consultants and lobbyists who did business with the city, including Mr. Hardeman.

Mr. Hardeman says he often thinks back to the events leading up to the day he was busted. "I should have followed my inner voice," he says, the one that told him "to go the road less traveled." Instead, he says, "I fell prey to the temptations of money."

The sting operation that nabbed him could have been written by a Hollywood scriptwriter. To play the part of the corrupt official extorting bribes, the FBI recruited Manual Ontal, a City of Carson councilman. He volunteered to cooperate with the government after he was caught in a previous municipal-bribery scandal.

First, Mr. Ontal tried to interest Mr. Hardeman in participating in a gun-smuggling venture he claimed to be running out of the Philippines. When that didn't work, Mr. Ontal introduced him to "Uncle Jerry," a burly white man who wore a ponytail and gold-plated jewelry, and traveled by limousine. "He looked like a white Mr. T," recalls Mr. Hardeman.

Uncle Jerry was working in some way for the FBI, which won't explain his exact role or identity. Uncle Jerry spent lavishly on Mr. Hardeman and, after putting his target at ease, tried coaxing the lobbyist to talk about criminal acts he might have committed, such as paying bribes. Uncle Jerry paid for expensive dinners at Josh Slockum's, a restaurant owned by basketball star Dennis Rodman, and took Mr. Hardeman marlin fishing off Marina Del Rey. But Mr. Hardeman didn't say anything incriminating.

Eventually, the FBI recorded Mr. Hardeman -- in a roundabout way -- offering Mr. Ontal a $50,000 bribe to steer city contracts to two clients, Waste Management and Klistoff & Sons, another trash-hauling company.

Nine people were convicted in what the FBI dubbed "the trash-talkin' case," including the City of Carson mayor. Neither Waste Management nor any of its employees were charged with a crime. In a written statement, the company's lawyer says Waste Management cooperated with the probe, "including providing information on Mr. Hardeman's activities." Klistoff & Sons was hit with a big fine in another corruption case and no longer exists. Waste Management later bought its assets.

In June 2005, a judge sentenced Mr. Ontal to one year probation. He couldn't be reached for comment and his attorney didn't return calls.

Facing up to three years in prison for attempted bribery, Mr. Hardeman swiftly agreed to cooperate. Soon he was wearing a recording device disguised as a pager and was reporting daily to an FBI agent.

To begin with, however, he was a reluctant snoop. "He didn't take to it well initially because he was mad that he got caught," says Craig Howland, the FBI special agent who worked with Mr. Hardeman during his cooperation with the government. "There was always that inner struggle with him on snitching out his friends."

Among his first assignments was to betray Tyrone Smith. Mr. Smith was a director of the West Basin Municipal Water Authority, the City of Carson's water district. The pair had been friends for 15 years.

The two had met when they were young city councilmen moving in Los Angeles's close circle of African-American politicians. Later, not knowing he had been betrayed by Mr. Hardeman, Mr. Smith continued to introduce business clients to Mr. Hardeman, recalls Mr. Hardeman. "Our kids went to school together," Mr. Hardeman says. "It wasn't a good position to be in."

The FBI wanted to hear Mr. Smith talking about a bribe Mr. Hardeman had given him a year earlier. According to both men, Mr. Hardeman paid Mr. Smith $25,000 -- half of a $50,000 payment from Mr. Hardeman's client, investment bank M.R. Beal. In exchange, Mr. Smith agreed to vote to award a $142 million debt-restructuring contract to M.R. Beal's partner on the deal, Rice Financial Products Co., another minority-owned finance firm in New York.

During a May 2002 conference in Palm Springs, Calif., Mr. Hardeman recorded about 10 conversations with his friend, during which he chatted about family matters to relax Mr. Smith and "ease it out of him," Mr. Hardeman recalls. Eventually Mr. Smith described on tape how he had given the money to his wife.

In August 2003, Mr. Smith pleaded guilty to extortion and money laundering; he was one of 12 defendants who were convicted in the City of Carson and West Basin cases. In March 2005, he was sentenced to two years in prison. His lawyer, Mark Albrecht of Ivie McNeill & Wyatt, declines to comment. Mr. Smith, who is in Lompoc Federal Prison Camp in Lompoc, Calif., couldn't be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0084060

An M.R. Beal spokesman says, "M.R. Beal was not aware, did not authorize, and does not condone illicit payments to elected officials." Rice Financial, which is contesting a related civil suit in Superior Court of the State of California, County of Ventura, declines to comment on Mr. Hardeman.

As a former policeman, Mr. Hardeman knew how cooperators could be reviled by their peers -- and even by some cops. He scoured his memories to justify his actions. Revenge turned out to be a good motivator.

"I knew I was doing something to betray these people, but they weren't very good to me either," he says. Mr. Smith, for example, hadn't voted in his favor when he was bidding for a consulting contract with the water district.

In June 2002, a month after he taped Mr. Smith, Mr. Hardeman came close to getting uncovered as a snitch. He was sitting in a new, red pickup truck with a low-level former Waste Management official. The driver of the pickup seemed nervous, Mr. Hardeman recalls. The former official cranked up the music to drown out conversation. Then, he grabbed a pen and scribbled out a note to his passenger: "Are you going to snitch?"

After writing the note, the driver ripped it up and tossed it out the window as the pair drove through Inglewood. A few minutes later, Mr. Hardeman says, he returned to the scene with Mr. Howland, his FBI case agent, who had been tailing the pickup. The two men searched in vain for the scraps, which they wanted as evidence.

That summer came the most complex betrayal: Mr. Hardeman had to tape his girlfriend.

Monique McGilbra was a newly divorced mother of two when the pair met in April 2000 at a convention for African-American public administrators in Charlotte, N.C. Statuesque and an immaculate dresser, she held a senior job in the Houston mayor's office, running the city's energy and environmental business.

"I fell in love," says Mr. Hardeman. "She had power and influence in government. I was very attracted to her."

At the time, Ms. McGilbra was being wined and dined by consultants who wanted Houston contracts. Nate Gray, a lobbyist based in Cleveland, treated her to $1,000 dinners, Super Bowl tickets in New Orleans, and a $700 Louis Vuitton wallet, according to her later court testimony. Mr. Hardeman accompanied her to some of the events.

Ms. McGilbra later steered a city contract toward Honeywell Inc., a big industrial conglomerate that was a client of Messrs. Gray and Hardeman. (Honeywell gave up the work when the scandal broke.)

Investigators in Cleveland had been wiretapping Mr. Gray for months, during which time Mr. Gray was recorded complaining about Ms. McGilbra's expensive tastes. They wanted Mr. Hardeman to record his girlfriend admitting to taking the gifts, which were considered bribes by prosecutors because she was a public official. Prosecutors say Mr. Hardeman broke down in tears when they told him he would have to wear a wire.

In August 2002, Mr. Hardeman met Ms. McGilbra in Houston. During their evening out, they talked briefly about the gifts. Later, alone in their hotel, Mr. Hardeman brought up the topic again. He says Ms. McGilbra playfully patted him down, as if checking for a wire, before talking about her pay-to-play relationship with Mr. Gray.

"Before sex, there was some good information," Mr. Hardeman recalls.

Mr. Hardeman says he drew the line at keeping the recording device running once things got too steamy. The trick, he says, was to find an excuse to slip into the bathroom to stop the tape, a task that required sticking a paper clip into a button at the bottom of the fake pager. "I was always thinking, how do I get back to the bathroom to turn it off?" he says.

Ms. McGilbra, through her attorney Robert Rotatori, says she didn't detect anything suspicious about Mr. Hardeman's behavior when he was wearing the wire. She says she couldn't believe Mr. Hardeman was capable of "using her that way," Mr. Rotatori says, adding: "The government went to bed with Garland Hardeman. He's a scoundrel, a liar, a thief and a cheat."

Based in part on the taped conversations, Ms. McGilbra pleaded guilty last year to conspiracy to commit various types of fraud in Houston and Cleveland, and was sentenced to three years in prison. At her sentencing, Ms. McGilbra told the judge she was led to break the law because of her relationship with Mr. Hardeman. She says she accepted the gifts to help her boyfriend get to know Mr. Gray. "I loved him very much," she testified. Mr. Gray, one of nine people convicted in this case, was sentenced to 15 years in jail.

At the trial, Mr. Hardeman again suggested revenge as a reason for his cooperation with authorities. Ms. McGilbra had demanded he hand over a $3,000 monthly retainer he had won from one of her consultant friends, Mr. Hardeman testified. "It felt really like I was being used," he said in an interview. Mr. Hardeman said in court that they eventually agreed she would receive a 20% cut.

DOJ_NMG_0084061

In April 2003, Mr. Hardeman was watching a Lakers basketball game on TV at Cabo's barbecue restaurant in Houston -- "I liked the shrimp at Cabo's," he says -- when he was suddenly knocked to the floor, unable to see. He had been hit directly above his right eye with a .22 caliber bullet. The shot was fired from a distance and caused no permanent damage after lodging in the space between his eyelid and his eyeball. Mr. Hardeman still has the bullet.

The shooting, rare in a white-collar crime case, threw prosecutors and the FBI into a tizzy. After an FBI investigation, no arrests were ever made and officials ultimately categorized it as a random event.

Mr. Hardeman doesn't buy that explanation. He thinks someone put a hit on him, perhaps Ms. McGilbra.

Ms. McGilbra's lawyer, Mr. Rotatori, denies it. "There are probably a million and one reasons someone would want to shoot him," he adds.

Despite the many anxieties of leading a double life, the subject to which Mr. Hardeman most often returns is the injustice of the FBI's expense-reimbursement system. A meticulous man -- he keeps business cards and receipts from every restaurant he visits -- the money issues gall him. "I was working full time, but I wasn't getting paid," he says.

He maintains a long list of affronts, including the time he was ordered to spend $85 at Radio Shack for a tape recorder, a special cord for recording phone conversations, and tapes. "I bought the best tapes, not cheap tapes," he says.

The FBI office in Los Angeles, which was responsible for reimbursing Mr. Hardeman, says the process may have seemed slow to him because he was often on the road and had to delay filing expenses.

Mr. Hardeman expected the real payoff to come when he was sentenced. He wanted probation, like Mr. Ontal, the councilman who lured him into giving a bribe in the first place. His prosecutors not only took the unusual step of recommending probation -- he was facing three years -- but also spoke out on his behalf at sentencing. Both Ms. Butler, the trial attorney from Washington, D.C., and Mr. McConville, the Assistant U.S. Attorney, said Mr. Hardeman deserved a break because of his extensive cooperation.

That didn't work out. This summer in Central District Court in Los Angeles, Judge Percy Anderson sentenced Mr. Hardeman to a year and a day in a federal penitentiary, plus three years of supervised release. The judge said he wanted to "send a very clear message" about public corruption.

"It's just totally unfair," Mr. Hardeman says. "I gave four years of my life to working for the government, and now I have to give another four."

The night before he had to report to the prison, Mr. Hardeman spent time with his dentist-friend in Detroit. Dr. Jones gave him a free, emergency root canal.

On Aug. 30, Mr. Hardeman was driven by an old friend to the Taft Correctional Institution federal prison camp, which is located in an isolated patch of California desert, to begin his sentence. Among Taft's other inmates are a former mayor and his onetime attorney, both of whom Mr. Hardeman helped put there.

Write to Karen Richardson at karen.richardson@awsj.com1

Columnist Settles Education Dept. Case (AP)

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Columnist Armstrong Williams has reached a settlement with prosecutors regarding payments he received by the Education Department to promote President Bush's agenda.

Under the settlement, Williams admits no wrongdoing but will have to pay $34,000. The deal was reached last week by Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications.

"The department is happy to see this matter come to a close," Katherine McLane, a spokeswoman for Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, said Sunday. "One of the first steps Secretary Spellings took when she came to office is to establish guidelines to prevent future occurrences of this type of situation."

A message left at Williams' office was not immediately returned Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0084062

The settlement brings to a close a yearlong investigation into the case after reports emerged that the Education Department contracted with several radio, television and print commentators to promote the No Child Left Behind Act.

Lawmakers criticized the contracts as an improper use of taxpayer dollars. Congressional auditors concluded the department engaged in illegal "covert propaganda" by hiring Williams without requiring him to disclose he was paid.

In the settlement, the Justice Department examined whether Williams actually performed the work that was promised in his $240,000 contract signed in late 2003 and cited in his monthly reports to the Education Department.

Ultimately, prosecutors determined he was overpaid $34,000. Their review did not examine whether he improperly promoted the Bush administration's agenda.

ON THE NET

Education Department: http://www.ed.gov/index.jhtml

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Glenview Man Linked To Cop Killing In Poland (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters. Tribune Staff Reporters Andrew Zajac And Dave Wischnowsky And Tribune News Services Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, October 21, 2006

Investor held in high-profile murder for hire

A Glenview businessman wanted in Poland for soliciting the gangland-style murder of a former national police chief was taken into custody Friday morning at his home, an arrest billed as a breakthrough in a case of enormous significance in that country.

A man identified in court records as Edward Mazur, 60, appeared in federal court in Chicago on Friday afternoon, and was ordered held pending an identification and extradition hearing Wednesday. The arrest came on the heels of a high-level meeting in Washington this month between Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales and Polish Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro.

Officials said Ziobro met with Gonzales to discuss Mazur's extradition for the 1998 murder of Marek Papala.

The wealthy investor is accused in Poland of scheming with organized crime figures to kill Papala, a one-time police commander general who was gunned down in front of his home in Warsaw as he got out of a car.

Mazur was arrested by federal agents Friday on a provisional warrant from the Polish government, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said.

A judge in Warsaw issued a warrant for Mazur's arrest in February 2005 on a charge of soliciting a man named Artur Zirajewski to carry out the murder with a third person in exchange for $40,000.

The case has been the subject of intense media scrutiny in Poland, where there has been much speculation about the crime and Mazur's possible connections to it. Mazur had been briefly arrested in Poland in 2002 in connection with the slaying, but was released.

His arrest Friday made national headlines in Poland.

Ziobro held a news conference there Friday to announce that prosecutors had gathered "hard evidence" against Mazur that includes statements from Zirajewski and other witnesses, and to call his arrest "good news."

In 2002, Mazur filed a libel suit in Chicago against a Polish-language publication in Washington that he claimed unfairly accused him of contracting Papala's murder and exercising undue influence over the prime minister of Poland.

"Mr. Mazur did not contract the murder of Mr. Papala and was not involved in Mr. Papala's murder in any way," his attorney, Michael Stiegel, wrote at the time.

Stiegel further wrote that Mazur has never been involved in or charged with involvement in any illegal activity or `shady dealings.'" The lawsuit was later dropped.

In an interview late Friday, Stiegel said he believed the accusations against Mazur were politically motivated. The recently victorious Polish conservative party won elections in that country in part on a promise to solve the Papala murder case.

Stiegel said he had "grave doubts" that Mazur was involved in the crime and understood that Papala was in fact a friend of Mazur's.

DOJ_NMG_0084063

"He had set up an opportunity for this guy to come to the United States and study English," Stiegel said.

In the suit, Mazur included a number of personal details. He stated he immigrated to the U.S. from Poland in 1962 and graduated from a school listed as "Chicago Tech" with a degree in electrical engineering.

His career involved working for a number of international companies as well as staking a claim in several businesses, from a medical products company to a yogurt manufacturer in Poland, the suit states.

Illinois records show Mazur was the president of a firm called Demarex Inc., which was registered at his Glenview home until it dissolved in May. A recent Securities and Exchange Commission filing showed Mazur has had multimillion-dollar dealings with a Canadian cable company that does a large amount of business in Poland.

Mazur also was involved in a number of Polish organizations locally and nationally, according to court records.

In the suit, Mazur stated that he was director of the American Center of Polish Culture in Washington, D.C., and was the president of WISLA, "a social and athletic club in Chicago founded by Polish immigrants in 1927."

In the 2002 suit, Mazur stated that he lived in Glenview and had three sons.

Neighbors on Mazur's upscale Glenview street said he lived in his home on Lawson Road with his wife, a son who is a junior in high school and the teen's grandfather.

A woman who answered the door there declined to comment as members of Chicago's Polish-language media waited outside.

The U.S. Embassy in Warsaw on Friday issued a statement that "Mazur is currently being held by U.S. authorities awaiting his formal extradition to Poland."

"I can assure the Polish public that this matter is receiving a great deal of attention from the U.S. government," the statement quoted U.S. Ambassador Victor Ashe as saying.

At the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse in Chicago, U.S. Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys delayed a proceeding to formally identify the man in custody as Mazur, because he did not have a criminal attorney to represent him.

A hearing will be held Wednesday afternoon for Mazur, "or whomever is under arrest in this case," Keys said.

The judge advised the man identified by prosecutors as Mazur of his rights, and ordered that he remain in custody until the hearing. If his identity is confirmed, Mazur would be extradited under a 1999 extradition treaty between the U.S. and Poland, officials said.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Mitchell Mars outlined the charges against Mazur. The man who appeared in court answered "I understood" when asked by the judge if the accusations were clear. Evidence against Mazur was spelled out in a 10-page complaint that was unsealed Friday.

The key witness, Zirajewski, allegedly has told authorities he met with an organized crime figure along with Mazur and another man a couple of months before the killing.

"The ensuing conversation lasted for about an hour, Mazur doing most of the talking," the complaint states. "Mazur said that he was interested in killing Papala, who `was a big obstacle to further business.'

"Mazur displayed a newspaper clipping featuring a picture of Papala," the complaint states.

Zirajewski allegedly told authorities Mazur told him Papala was under surveillance and asked questions about a hit man's skill.

Natalia Papala, daughter of the slain chief, was quoted on a Warsaw police Web site Friday.

"[The] arresting of Edward Mazur allows us to have hope that now will occur a turning point in the conducted investigation," the statement read. "Initiating the extradition procedure creates a chance to complete the investigation and press charges against other people who also stand behind this homicide."

---

jcoen@tribune.com
rrbush@tribune.com

FBI Arrests Businessman Wanted In Poland Over 1998 Police Official Slaying (AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A businessman wanted in Poland on charges of soliciting the murder of a former superintendent of police was arrested Friday at his suburban home, federal officials announced.

Edward Mazur, 59, was taken into custody by the FBI, Drug Enforcement agents and police without incident at his home in affluent north suburban Glenview, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said.

He appeared briefly before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys, who ordered him held in the federal government's Metropolitan Correctional Center pending an extradition hearing set for Wednesday.

Keys warned the defendant that if he proved to be the Edward Mazur named in an arrest warrant issued by a court in Warsaw, "the officials from Poland will come to Chicago and take you in custody to Poland."

Helen Kim, a federal defender who represented Mazur at the brief hearing, said she knew little about him and expected him to hire another attorney. A civil attorney, Bruce Tinkoff, said he and Mazur's wife were searching for a criminal defense lawyer to handle the case.

Tinkoff declined to answer questions about Mazur.

A complaint unsealed Friday said the arrest warrant issued by a Polish court in February charged that, in April 1998, Mazur had offered another man $40,000 to murder Warsaw's police chief superintendent Marek Papala.

Papers submitted by Polish authorities said that Mazur made the offer to an Artur Zirajewski at a meeting in a hotel in Gdansk, according to the complaint. It said that members of organized crime in Poland and narcotics traffickers might have been involved in plotting to murder Papala.

The Polish documents said that Mazur also solicited another man, Andrzej Zielinski, to kill the police official.

Papala, who was the commander general of the Warsaw Department of Police, was shot and killed on June 28, 1998, as he got out of a vehicle in front of his Warsaw home.

Before that, however, both Zirajewski and Zielinski had been arrested, according to the complaint. It said that the two men were among four witnesses who have given accounts of the case in statements to police.

The 10-page complaint traced a complex series of meetings between Zirajewski and an array of other alleged plotters at the Gdansk hotel and at a marina to solicit and plan the Papala killing.

"From the discussion at the marina, Zirajewski learned that the conspirators were waiting for a signal from someone at the Ministry of Internal Affairs, who was somehow connected to the policeman," it said.

It said that another man at the meeting told Zirajewski that "other highly placed persons were behind this murder plot."

There was nothing further in the complaint to suggest which highly placed officials, if any, might have been involved in such a conspiracy.

At a news conference in Warsaw, Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro said Polish prosecutors have gathered "hard evidence" that Mazur played a "very important role" in the killing of Papala.

Ziobro met with Justice Department officials in Washington earlier this month to present the evidence and request action in the case.

Papala's wife and daughter said that the arrest gave them hope that there could be a breakthrough in the eight-year investigation.

"Opening of the extradition procedure provides a chance for closing the investigation and bringing charges against other people who are also behind this killing," Malgorzata and Natalia said in a statement posted on the national police website.

Associated Press Writer Monika Scislowska in Warsaw contributed to this report.

YouTube Shared User Data With Studio Lawyers (MRKTWTCH)

By Ben Charny, MarketWatch

Market Watch, October 21, 2006

Video site helped Paramount Pictures track down and sue filmmaker

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- It's no secret that millions of Internet users every day watch copyright-infringing video clips on YouTube, the upstart Web site that Google Inc. has agreed to acquire for $1.65 billion.

What's less known is that YouTube has been watching the watchers.

YouTube's actions in response to a subpoena it received in May show that it has been keeping tabs on users who post copyrighted material to its site -- and in one case shared the name of a user with lawyers from a Hollywood film studio.

On May 24, lawyers for Viacom Inc.'s Paramount Pictures convinced a federal judge in San Francisco to issue a subpoena requiring YouTube to turn over details about a user who uploaded dialog from the movie studio's "Twin Towers," according to a copy of the document.

'I was happy to utilize YouTube when it was still not clearly established. It felt a bit utopian, even though the days for that were clearly numbered.'

— Chris Moukarbel, filmmaker

YouTube promptly handed over the data to Paramount, which on June 16 sued the creator of the 12-minute clip, New York City-based filmmaker Chris Moukarbel, for copyright infringement, in federal court in Washington.

That YouTube chose to turn over the data, rather than simply remove the offending video from its site -- as it did Friday when it agreed to take down 30,000 videos at the request of a group of Japanese media companies -- came as a surprise to copyright experts.

"YouTube seems to have given up too easily," said Laurence P. Colton, an intellectual-property lawyer at the firm of Powell & Goldstein LLP in Atlanta.

Its prompt legal capitulation suggests that YouTube users who post copyrighted material should not expect the company to protect them from media-business lawsuits, said Colton, whose firm wasn't involved in the Paramount subpoena or lawsuit and who learned of them from a MarketWatch reporter.

The "Twin Towers" episode is reminiscent of the way the entertainment industry vanquished the first version of Napster Inc. and other digital-music sites that made it easy to download copyrighted songs over the Internet.

Music company lawyers first warned and then sued individual users who downloaded their songs. Now it looks like piracy hunters for the movie studios are using the same technique against YouTube users.

YouTube's decision to help Paramount track down Moukarbel stands in stark contrast to the philosophy of Google, which has fought the U.S. Justice Department over attempts to access data about consumers who use its search services.

Google has balked at releasing even the most innocuous information about its users' behavior to the U.S. government in the past. Also, it's now battling requests for user details coming from Brazilian and Indian government investigators.

Google declined repeated phone and e-mail requests for comment for this story. Julie Supan, YouTube's senior marketing director, declined comment.

The end of 'utopia'

With more media companies signaling that they will come after YouTube for compensation over copyrighted material, Moukarbel's experience suggests that some of those among the Web site's 40 million users who post copyrighted material can expect legal trouble.

Moukarbel settled the suit after he admitted making the film and agreed to remove it from his own Web site and from YouTube, according to a copy of a court order that was part of the settlement. He also agreed to make an effort to remove it from other sites where it had been posted.

Moukarbel told MarketWatch in an interview that YouTube's actions signaled to him the end of an era for the video site.

"I was happy to utilize YouTube when it was still not clearly established. It felt a bit utopian, even though the days for that were clearly numbered," Moukarbel said.

It remains to be seen if this has any chilling effect on the phenomenal growth of YouTube, which was founded just 20 months ago by former executives of PayPal, the electronic payment firm that was eventually acquired by eBay Inc.

The freewheeling nature of the site - and its apparent cloak of user anonymity -- has helped the upstart become a top 20 Web site whose users watch up to 100 million video clips every day.

A slew of lawsuits like those filed against individual digital music pirates could change that atmosphere, and perhaps the growth rate, of YouTube's online community.

DOJ_NMG_0084066

"This community was built as a kind of free-for-all, where people could have a lot of fun and do it rather anonymously," Colton said. "You don't get that kind of community by saying, 'Here, sign up and at the simplest drop of a subpoena, we'll give that information away.' "

To be sure, Google, which hopes to close the YouTube purchase by year's end, has already taken steps to reduce the copyright liability it will inherit from the private firm. Just before it announced the acquisition of YouTube, the two companies signed licensing agreements with several large media firms, including Vivendi's Universal Music Group, Warner Music Group Corp., Sony BMG and CBS Corp.

Several large entertainment industry providers are now teaming up to request compensation from the site, according to The Wall Street Journal. Viacom , which owns Paramount, estimates that pirated versions of video clips from its MTV, Comedy Central and Nickelodeon channels are watched 80,000 times a day on YouTube, according to the Journal.

Paramount Pictures spokeswoman Nancy Kirkpatrick said that the company's actions against Moukarbel "in no way means we're targeting YouTube." She declined further comment on the lawsuit against Moukarbel.

When asked about YouTube, a spokeswoman for the Motion Picture Industry Association said "we continue to pursue those who violate copyright laws on all levels, and we will continue to monitor YouTube for copyrighted material."

That means YouTube users who post such material could face legal problems similar to Moukarbel's.

Moukarbel, meanwhile, said he harbors no hard feelings toward YouTube about the incident.

"I was happy with its run on YouTube, and, frankly, I was surprised it lasted as long as it did," he said. "That they eventually offered my information to Paramount doesn't bother me at this point." Ben Charny is a MarketWatch reporter based in San Francisco.

Former Youth Pastor Faces Child Porn Charges (SLPD)

By Sandi Villarreal

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 21, 2006

Authorities tipped off by someone from church

A former youth leader at Grace Baptist Church in St. Charles was indicted Thursday on federal child pornography charges.

According to the indictment, Michael Gulley, 45, of the 3600 block of Ehlmann Road in St. Charles, had seven files of child pornography on his computer.

Terri Dougherty, assistant to U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway, said the files were sent from Gulley's work computer to his home computer.

Capt. Gerry Pollard, spokesman for the St. Charles Police Department, said the investigation began in November 2005.

"A person involved with the church became alarmed at what was going on," he said.

Tom Bossch, a deacon at Grace Baptist Church, said it was church staff members who discovered what they believed to be a crime and immediately notified the police department. Bossch said the church has a system of checks that make sure that type of behavior is not tolerated.

The St. Charles County Sheriff's Department's computer forensics unit also was involved in the investigation. When a department seizes a computer, investigators in the unit process hard drives to uncover the information.

Gulley was indicted on one felony count of possession of child pornography. If he is convicted, he could face a maximum of 10 years in prison, fines up to $250,000 and supervised release for life.

Dougherty said Friday afternoon Gulley was in the process of being released on a $20,000 bond.

The case is part of Project Safe Childhood - a nationwide initiative created by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

According to the U.S. Department of Justice Web site, the project aims to protect children from exploitation on the Internet through coordinated and comprehensive efforts at a national and community level.

"Nothing we do is more important than protecting children from these predators," Hanaway said in a news release.

"We can only make these cases when we have the commitment of local law enforcement," she said. "I am very grateful to the St. Charles Police Department for their investigation in this case."

Federal $$ To Help Purchase Bulletproof Vests For NYPD (STNIA)

By Rob Hart, Advance Staff Writer

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 21, 2006

The NYPD is finally on course to receive a federal grant of more than $538,000 to purchase about 1,000 bulletproof vests, under a funding stream approved yesterday by the Department of Justice.

The money comes from the Justice Department's Bulletproof Vest Partnership Grant Program, funded at $30 million in the Fiscal Year 2006 Science, State, Justice, and Commerce Appropriations bill.

Earlier this year, the Bush administration proposed drastic cuts in the funding, from $30 million to $10 million.

Over two years, that reduction would have cost the city the money to buy 1,000 replacement vests. It was among a series of cuts the White House pushed to rein in spending and reduce the budget deficit.

However, a bipartisan effort in Congress opposing the cuts, joined by Rep. Vito Fossella (R-Staten Island/Brooklyn), was successful.

And Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.) submitted an amendment to the House, which was passed in June, which increased funding for the vest program to $32 million for Fiscal Year 2007.

"This funding will help ensure our law enforcement officers have necessary lifesaving equipment to do their jobs protecting the citizens of our city," Fossella said in a statement. "Cities like New York rely on federal assistance to purchase necessary equipment and resources for first responders."

"The Bulletproof Vest Partnership will ensure that we can provide the latest technology in protective vests to police and correction officers," Mayor Michael Bloomberg said.

Rob Hart covers state government for the Advance. He may be reached at rhart@siadvance.com.

Off-label Drug Marketing: Missing The Mark (MERCN)

By Steve Johnson

The San Jose Mercury News, October 21, 2006

The heart-failure drug Natrecor seemed sure to become a blockbuster after Scios of Fremont put it on the market in 2001.

Besides its use in hospitalized patients, many clinics began giving it to walk-in patients in weekly sessions dubbed ``tuneups." Some people -- including prominent heart specialist Dr. Eric Topol -- say Scios encouraged this with a hotline and brochure explaining how to bill Medicare for the sessions.

There was only one problem: Some medical experts contend Natrecor was never approved for such tuneups. Some also say it may not be as safe as initially thought.

Scios says studies show the drug is safe. And it has launched a campaign to clarify to doctors that the drug is not recommended for repeated use in patients in a clinic setting.

Nevertheless, the drug's sales have sagged and the company is under investigation by the U.S. attorney in San Francisco for allegedly engaging in ``off-label" marketing, promoting drugs for uses not approved by the government.

Since this case came to light, critics in two major medical journals have cited Natrecor as an example of how easy it is for drug companies to peddle their medicines for unapproved purposes. Although doctors are allowed to prescribe drugs for off-label treatments, companies are forbidden from promoting their drugs for such uses.

``The system is faulty, and there are numerous leaks in the pipe," said Aaron Kesselhelm, one of three Harvard medical specialists who published an article this summer in the journal Health Affairs that criticized the use of Natrecor for tuneups.

But executives at Scios -- which Johnson & Johnson bought for $2.4 billion in 2003 -- maintain they and Natrecor have been unfairly tarnished.

Scios spokeswoman Chris Ernst wouldn't comment about the off-label claims, except to say the company is cooperating with the federal probe. But she stressed that ``patients are our first priority" and noted that 15 studies of Natrecor in people turned up no cause to believe the drug is risky.

Nonetheless, Scios said in June it will do another massive study over the next couple of years to definitively assess Natrecor's safety.

DOJ_NMG_0084068

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration approved Natrecor for treating patients with congestive heart failure who have trouble breathing even while doing minimal activity or resting. It has been given to hundreds of thousands of people and its sales hit $395 million in 2004. But since then, the drug has run into trouble.

After reanalyzing past studies of Natrecor, New York heart specialist Dr. Jonathan Sack- ner-Bernstein published two reports in 2005, warning the drug seemed linked to worrisome rates of kidney problems and death.

In disputing Sackner-Bernstein's conclusions, Scios has reported finding only a slightly increased death rate among those taking Natrecor after 30 days. Moreover, after tracking some Natrecor patients over six months, the company said it found virtually no difference in their death rate compared with patients on other medicine.

Although many patients are given drugs for off-label uses, the practice worries some critics. Doctors often prescribe medicines for purposes not approved by the government based on preliminary studies suggesting they might be effective for such uses. But one expert has said the evidence supporting off-label use is questionable.

A study published in May by Dr. Randall Stafford, an associate professor of medicine at Stanford University, found about 20 percent of the drugs in a national prescription database were given for off-label purposes. And in most of those cases, he determined, there was little or no evidence the drug was effective for those uses.

Companies, on the other hand, can face heavy fines for promoting drugs for off-label purposes. But the FDA's ability to halt abuses is limited, said Dr. Sidney Wolfe, who directs Public Citizen's Health Research Group.

``They do not have anywhere near the budget they should," Wolfe said. ``That is a major reason the drug industry is able to get away with what they do."

FDA and Justice Department officials said they don't track how many companies have been prosecuted for off-label marketing. But Ioana Petrou, chief of major crimes for the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said federal authorities have been paying increasing attention to such practice, given the grave danger it can pose to the public.

``In the vast majority of the cases prosecuted, there are misleading statements being made to the medical community by the pharmaceutical companies," she said. ``So the patients can't rely on their doctors to tell them what is safe and effective."

Petrou said the first off-label case the Justice Department ever prosecuted involved Protropin, made by Genentech of South San Francisco. Although Protropin was approved for treating children with a growth hormone deficiency, the company was accused of promoting it for healthy short children. Genentech denied the charges, but paid $50 million to settle the case in 1999.

Now Genentech is under investigation for off-label marketing again, this time over Rituxan. In 1997, the FDA approved the drug for treating non-Hodgkin's lymphoma and in February this year also approved its use for rheumatoid arthritis.

It's unclear what the current investigation by the U.S. Attorney in Philadelphia involves. But a lawsuit by a former Genentech employee has accused the firm and its partner, Biogen Idec, of promoting Rituxan for rheumatoid arthritis before it was approved for that purpose.

Genentech spokeswoman Caroline Pecquet said the company is cooperating with prosecutors, who she said are expected to call current and former Genentech employees before a grand jury.

``We are committed to ethical and legal promotional practices," Pecquet added.

Yet another Bay Area company accused of off-label marketing is InterMune of Brisbane. In July, its executives announced they had created a $30 million reserve in hopes of settling a federal investigation into claims the firm improperly promoted Actimmune. The drug is approved for treating a bone disorder and a condition that makes people prone to infections. But InterMune also was accused of marketing it as a treatment for lung disease.

InterMune spokeswoman Pam Lord said the probe focuses on former employees.

The marketing of Natrecor has aroused particular concern because of questions about its safety, especially given the claims that people were receiving repeated injections of the drug in tuneups.

Using Natrecor occasionally to treat people in out-patient clinics wouldn't necessarily be considered an off-label use of the drug, said Dr. Norman Stockbridge, who directs an FDA division overseeing heart and kidney drugs. But he said giving such patients frequent doses of Natrecor would be an unapproved use.

DOJ_NMG_0084069

Responding to the criticism, Scios convened a panel of medical experts last year to review Natrecor's safety. The group concluded more studies of the drug were warranted. But until then, it recommended that Natrecor should be given only to the seriously ill in hospitals and not in frequent doses to people in outpatient clinics.

Since the Natrecor controversy erupted last year, doctors familiar with the drug say its use has dropped dramatically. That troubles some doctors who swear by Natrecor, also known as nesiritide.

``I am absolutely enthusiastic," said Dr. John Luber Jr., a Tacoma, Wa. heart specialist involved in a Scios-sponsored study this year that found Natrecor lessened the likelihood of death among heart surgery patients.

But in the New England Journal of Medicine last year, Topol, former chair of the Cardiovascular Medicine Department at the Cleveland Clinic in Ohio, cited Natrecor as an example of a serious and widespread public health issue.

``We need a tuneup of our procedures to eliminate indiscriminate use of drugs, such as nesiritide, when there is not proper evidence of their safety," he warned.

CIVIL LAW:

Naval Shipyard Kickback Suit Settled For $4.2M (DPHR)

By Peter Dujardin 247-4749

Newport News (VA) Daily Press, October 21, 2006

The suit originated with a complaint filed by the head of a freight forwarding firm in Newport News.

NEWPORT NEWS -- An Illinois transportation firm has agreed to pay $4.2 million to settle U.S. Justice Department accusations that it deliberately overcharged Norfolk Naval Shipyard for delivering cargo.

The original whistle-blower - who runs a competing freight forwarding firm in Newport News - is sharing the winnings.

AIT Worldwide Logistics of Itasca, Ill., had been accused of scheming with its agent in Hampton Roads and a transportation officer at Norfolk Naval Shipyard to bilk the government in exchange for giving kickbacks to the transportation officer. Paul Watkins runs the Oyster Point division of Target Logistic Services, a Baltimore-based company that competes with AIT for freight forwarding contracts. He was the original whistle-blower, gathering evidence of the scheme three years ago and reporting it to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

Under the terms of the federal whistle-blower act, Watkins and his lawyer will split 18 percent of the amount of the Justice Department winnings.

Watkins will get $502,000, or 12 percent of the total, before taxes. Bryan Schempf - an attorney with the Newport News firm of Jones Blechman Woltz and Kelly - and his firm will get the remaining 6 percent, or $251,000 before taxes.

The Justice Department alleged that Thomas A. Perry Jr. - owner of Air Cargo Expediters Inc., as AIT's agent in Hampton Roads - provided illegal gratuities to people working in the transportation office at Norfolk Naval Shipyard. Those included Gene Boyce, the yard's transportation officer.

Perry, of Virginia Beach, and Boyce, of Elizabeth City, N.C., pleaded guilty last year to conspiracy in the scheme, which the Justice Department described as Boyce getting gratuities in return for awarding freight contracts to AIT between 1999 and 2004.

Boyce was sentenced to 44 months in prison and ordered to pay $543,055.36. Perry was sentenced to eight months in prison and ordered to pay $543,055.

Watkins said he heard rumors for years about kickbacks at the shipyard and always found it difficult to win contracts forwarding its air and truck cargo. "I couldn't ever get it," he said.

But then - simply by looking at public records at a government freight management Web site - Watkins began noticing that AIT was, at times, charging Norfolk Naval Shipyard as much as five or 10 times the going rate to ship spare aircraft and ship parts around the world.

There were thousands of shipments, with various levels of overcharging. In some cases, for example, a 10,000-pound air shipment delivered by AIT might be costing $50,000 - or $5 a pound - when it should have been costing only about $10,000, or $1 a pound, Watkins said.

"They were outrageous numbers, compared with what I would've charged," he said.

At first, Watkins said, "all the reasons were selfish - I was trying to grow my own business. But I finally got so disgusted in it. It was going on continually. Maybe daily."

He started printing out and tabulating what he found - at one point determining how many armored kits for soldiers in Iraq that the government could buy with the savings.

In the fall of 2003, Watkins e-mailed a Navy inspector general fraud line that he found on the Web and contacted several other Navy officials. He never heard back. But he persisted, calling the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which began investigating immediately, he said.

"I talked to the head of it over there in Chesapeake," Watkins said.

"He told me, 'Hang up the phone. Someone will call you in 10 minutes.' And so I showed it all to them, ... and they responded."

The investigation was aggressive from the beginning, Watkins said, with the Justice Department getting involved in October 2005. Payments of gifts and cash payments were uncovered in the probe.

In addition to paying the fine, AIT has also been barred from providing federal freight forwarding to the government.

Tentative Settlement Reached In Va. Jet-noise Case (NAVYT)

By William H. McMichael, Staff writer

Navy Times, October 21, 2006

The U.S. government has reached a tentative settlement with more than 3,000 southern Virginia homeowners over their claims that excessive Navy jet noise reduced the value of their properties beginning in 1999, according to a court order filed Tuesday.

The published order cancels the trial that was scheduled to start Thursday in Chesapeake, Va., under the auspices of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. Judge Victor J. Wolski also halted all proceedings in all the matters and ordered that the parties file a joint status report on the settlement process within 90 days.

Settlement details or proposals for same have not been released. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson cautioned that “nothing has been finalized.”

A total of eight cases are covered by the ruling and involve a total of 3,400 property owners, Magnuson said. That figure likely includes husband-and-wife co-owners, according to Kieron Quinn, one of the attorneys representing the plaintiffs, who said that 2,098 properties are affected.

The claims vary slightly based on the level of exposure alleged by each plaintiff. But the general government and plaintiff positions are set out in motions filed in April and May in Carole and Robert Testwuide et al v. the U.S.

The Testwuide complaint is based on a claim of excessive jet noise in the areas around Virginia Beach’s Oceana Naval Air Station and nearby Fentress Auxiliary Landing Field in Chesapeake, to the south of Oceana. The noise increased dramatically, the plaintiffs allege, when 10 squadrons of F/A-18 Hornet fighter jets were transferred from Cecil Field in Florida to Oceana between December 1998 and June 1999, the result of a federal base-closing decision.

The plaintiff response in the Testwuide case held that the transfer “caused an enormous increase in noise in the neighborhood” surrounding Oceana and that residents have recorded backyard noise levels “that are at the threshold of pain.”

The brief cited the experience of former Virginia Beach resident Betty Capps, who lived in the city from 1981 to 2005. Capps said she formerly had no problem with the jet noise but as a result of the increased noise in 1999, “she cannot conduct phone conversations or hear the television,” according to the brief.

The government’s motion to dismiss that case argued that the plaintiff claims are “factually unsupported.” It argued that overflight rights — known as avigation easements — should have been taken and in place at least since 1981, when, the government said, flight activity was far greater than in 1999. As a result, the asserted claims should be barred under the six-year statute of limitations that governs claims made before the Court of Federal Claims, it said. The government also argued that some plaintiffs didn’t own their property at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0084071

The plaintiffs in the Testwuide case responded that the government provided no proof that a “taking” of overflight rights occurred in 1981 and that the selection of that year is arbitrary and based on the number of aircraft estimated to be flying out of Oceana at that time.

Feds Getting Tough On Utah Bankruptcy Fraud (SLT)

By Steven Oberbeck, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 21, 2006

Shortly after emerging from a Chapter 7 bankruptcy in 2000, Deseree Dyer of West Valley City borrowed $26,000 from Wells Fargo Bank and purchased a new Jeep Grand Cherokee.

In less than a year, she defaulted on the loan.

Wells Fargo repossessed and sold the vehicle, then went after the 29-year-old Dyer to collect the rest of the money she owed. To get out of paying that debt, Dyer mailed the bank a copy of her bankruptcy papers, fraudulently dated to indicate the court had freed her from paying Wells Fargo.

She pleaded guilty to one count of bankruptcy fraud last week, days before the U.S. Department of Justice announced the result of a nationwide investigation aimed at rooting out similar bankruptcy fraud cases nationwide.

Prosecutors have filed criminal charges against 78 people in 36 judicial districts nationwide. Three of them were in Utah.

"Bankruptcy fraud must not be tolerated, if our bankruptcy system is to serve its purpose of helping the honest debtor in need of financial relief," Clifford White, acting director of the Executive Office of U.S. Trustees, said in announcing the results of the probe dubbed "Operation Truth or Consequences."

Among those charged as a result of the nationwide sweep were nine attorneys, two bankruptcy petition preparers and a former law enforcement officer. The Justice Department estimates fraud is involved in approximately 10 percent of all bankruptcy petitions.

Advertisement

Collectively, the charges alleged defendants concealed more than $3 million in assets, used false Social Security numbers and identities, submitted fraudulent documents and fraudulently received government loans and benefits, the Justice Department said. In many states such bankruptcy fraud prosecutions are rare, but that's not the case in Utah.

Three years ago, the U.S. Attorney's office in Utah teamed up with the U.S. Trustee's office to make bankruptcy-fraud prosecutions a priority. The result: Over the past several years attorneys from those offices in Utah have brought a big percentage of the indictments filed nationwide.

"We made a conscious decision to make it a priority," said Barbara Bearnson, chief of the Criminal Division at the U.S. attorney's office in Utah. "In other districts, though, bankruptcy fraud cases are regularly brought."

To bolster the government's investigation and prosecution efforts, then U.S. Attorney Paul Warner in 2003 named Assistant U.S. Trustee Cy Castle in Salt Lake City as a special assistant U.S. attorney.

Castle's presence brought an additional element of experience and manpower to the U.S. attorney's office, which takes the lead in prosecuting bankruptcy-fraud cases referred to it by the courts or U.S. trustee's office. As a special assistant U.S. attorney, Castle has taken the lead in prosecuting the cases as well.

Dyer will be sentenced in January and faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Among the three Utahns charged in the sweep were Kathleen Heath, 51, of West Bountiful, indicted on one count of concealing assets and two counts of filing a false bankruptcy oath.

She filed a Chapter 7 bankruptcy in May 2005 and listed assets worth just $230. But prosecutors say she failed to disclose she owned a 2001 Honda Accord and a home in which there was approximately $80,000 in equity.

"We've been seeing fewer bankruptcy cases filed [this year], but the fraud hasn't decreased," Bearnson said. "And we're going to continue to make [prosecutions] a priority."

Response Rates To FOIA Requests Improve (FEDT)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084072

Agencies are improving the way they disseminate information to the public thanks to a presidential directive that requires them to review and revamp how they respond to Freedom of Information Act requests.

The executive order "has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wrote in a report issued Oct. 16. However, he noted that a large backlog at many agencies "still remains an area of concern."

The order, issued by the president in December 2005, requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers at the assistant secretary level and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of requests. The order also directs agencies to establish one or more service centers and designate one or more public liaisons to this effort.

Gonzales said agencies, in their FOIA improvement plans, have embraced a number of critical elements — expanded use of technology, active disclosure of information, improved customer service and backlog reduction.

In reviewing agency improvement plans, Gonzales said he discovered a number of best practices worth sharing. He said some agencies, including the Small Business Administration and Energy and Defense departments, have implemented in-house, training programs for both FOIA and non-FOIA employees.

Other examples include the Commerce Department's use of intranet FOIA sites so agency personnel can share information and the General Services Administration's plan to simplify the standard acknowledgment letter and send out postcards to FOIA requestors instead.

In his recommendations, Gonzales suggested all agencies switch to postcards.

"The simple use of postcards rather than standard written letters for this basic, universal step in the FOIA process could save countless hours (and funding), freeing FOIA personnel for more substantive activities," he wrote.

Gonzales also recommended agencies work together to maximize the use of technology in order to make responding to FOIA requests more timely and cost-effective.

Rep. Todd Platts, R-Pa., said he was glad to see that the report discussed the issue of FOIA backlogs. Platts, who chairs the House Government Reform subcommittee on government management, finance and accountability, held a hearing in July to examine the executive order.

"Improving the operational aspects of the Freedom of Information Act has been an important goal of the subcommittee," Platts said in a statement. "I'm pleased to see that the attorney general's report provides a fair accounting of actions that federal agencies have taken to help citizens in their quest for information."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Candidate's Office, Home Raided (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

AP, October 21, 2006

Garden Grove, Calif. (AP) -- For two days, a Republican congressional candidate had promised to explain how a threatening letter was sent by his campaign without his knowledge to thousands of Hispanic immigrant voters. As about 200 people gathered Friday in front of his campaign headquarters seeking answers, Tan D. Nguyen was a no-show at his own news conference. Instead, 10 uniformed California Department of Justice police officers arrived with a search warrant and pounded on the glass of Nguyen's storefront headquarters.

Agents spent two hours sifting through cabinets, boxes and computers. They left carrying several boxes and plastic bags of evidence.

Hours later, they searched a home in nearby Anaheim listed as belonging to one of Nguyen's staffers, emerging with a computer hard drive and a small box. Nguyen's neighbors in a gated community in Santa Ana said law enforcement officers also spent several hours searching his home.

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant trying to unseat a popular Democratic incumbent, has acknowledged his campaign sent the letter, which wrongly said immigrants could be jailed if they voted. He blamed an unidentified staffer whom he said he has fired.

DOJ_NMG_0084073

Nguyen has resisted calls from leaders in his own party to quit the race, saying he did not approve the letter and did not know about it.

Many mulling around his office Friday were supporters.

"He's the No. 1 man because his No. 1 issue is kicking out all the illegals," said Ernie Sqarlata, 86.

State and federal officials have been investigating the mailing for possible violations of election or civil rights law. It is illegal to use threats to try to dissuade anyone from voting.

The letter, written in Spanish, was mailed to an estimated 14,000 Democratic voters in Orange County. It warns, "You are advised that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time."

In fact, immigrants who are adult naturalized citizens are eligible to vote. Secretary of State Bruce McPherson said Friday his office will send letters to homes that received the mailing to clarify voters' rights.

Nguyen's attorney, David Wiechert, cautioned against jumping to conclusions.

"A search doesn't mean the person whose office is being searched is guilty," said Wiechert, standing outside Nguyen's office. "This is a political firestorm of high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation they have no knowledge of."

Orange County Republican Chairman Scott Baugh has said that after speaking with state investigators and the company that distributed the mailing, he believes Nguyen expedited the "obnoxious and reprehensible" letter. The party's executive committee voted unanimously to urge Nguyen to drop out, he said.

State Democratic Chairman Art Torres said party leaders were planning a rally for Orange County on Tuesday. "It's a hate crime as far as we are concerned," Torres said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said he planned to visit the country and meet with Hispanic leaders Saturday.

Phil Angelides, the Democratic candidate for governor, said: "They've got a real problem. They've got to clean it up because it's not good for California."

Illegal immigration has been a centerpiece of Nguyen's campaign to oust Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a five-term congresswoman.

Nguyen was born in 1973 in Vietnam, where his family fled the communist regime. In 2004, he unsuccessfully ran in the Democratic primary to challenge GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher. He later changed his party affiliation and declared his bid to upset Sanchez.

On Friday, Hispanic and Vietnamese leaders joined the chorus condemning the letter, saying it should not become a wedge that drives their communities apart.

"This letter reminds us of what we were running away from in Vietnam, where people can't vote the way they want," said Xuyen Dong, who heads the Orange County chapter of the Vietnamese Professional Society.

Associated Press writers Michael R. Blood in Los Angeles, Don Thompson in Sacramento and Ana Beatriz Cholo in Santa Ana contributed to this report.

Nguyen's Campaign Office Raided (OCR)

By NORBERTO SANTANA Jr., The ORANGE COUNTY REGISTER

Orange County (CA) Register, October 21, 2006

State investigators take computers from the workplace and search the candidate's home.

News media converged on Tan Nguyen's Garden Grove campaign office Friday expecting to hear from the Republican congressional candidate about a mailer sent out this week warning immigrants against voting in the November election.

Instead, the media horde got a front-row seat to a half-dozen agents from the state Attorney General's Office serving search warrants and combing through Nguyen's office.

Officers confiscated three computer hard drives, checked for fingerprints, leafed through files and interviewed Nguyen's attorney. Agents also searched Nguyen's Santa Ana home and a campaign worker's Anaheim home.

DOJ_NMG_0084074

Despite burgeoning state and federal probes into the flier, Nguyen's attorney said Nguyen has no plans to withdraw as the Republican nominee for the 47th Congressional District race against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez.

Dave Wiechert, an attorney representing Nguyen, said: "Mr. Nguyen has indicated that he did not authorize or approve the mailing" and would not discuss specifics because of the investigation. Wiechert said misinformation was fueling "a political firestorm."

That firestorm has included widespread condemnation from GOP leaders such as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Orange County Republican Party Chairman Scott Baugh. On Thursday, Baugh accused Nguyen of being directly linked to the letter.

Wiechert, citing his experience as a former prosecutor, said: "You see statements by high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation that, I'm sure, based on my experience, that they have little or no knowledge about."

The controversy was fueled Friday when county officials halted Registrar of Voters Neal Kelley from sending out a letter setting the record straight to the 14,000 households targeted by Nguyen's mailer. The state attorney general and the secretary of state had contacted Kelley as part of discussions about sending out such a letter.

Several Republican county supervisors argue that the Registrar of Voters Office should not get involved in correcting campaign mailers.

"The registrar of voters is not supposed to be the arbiter of truth in elections," Board of Supervisors Chairman Bill Campbell said.

Campbell added that having the county elections office track and respond to such fliers would set a bad precedent.

Supervisor Lou Correa, the board's lone Democrat, argued that "ignoring this type of letter is a precedent that I'm concerned about being set."

Correa has demanded that supervisors publicly debate the issue at their meeting Tuesday. He wants a letter sent out. "This, in my opinion – this is not like every other mailer," Correa said. "The issue here is voter suppression, especially given the history here in Orange County."

On Friday, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, whose office is also conducting an investigation into the suspect mailer, announced he would send out a letter.

"I want all eligible voters in California to cast their votes without fear or misinformation. I am outraged that anyone would try to rob eligible Californians of their right to vote. Any attempt to intimidate voters is unacceptable" McPherson said.

Santa Ana Councilman Jose Solorio indicated Friday that the voter-intimidation efforts may extend beyond the mailer. Solorio presented a copy of a sign he said was distributed throughout Delhi Park that read: "Are you a resident or illegal? If you vote, you'll get deported." The signs also carried the moniker of a group called Alizanda Pro-imigrados (Pro-Immigrants Alliance).

Solorio said he had forwarded the signs to the Attorney General's Office and has been assured that they would be investigated.

"(The signs) shows that it's more widespread than this one single rogue incident," Orange County Democratic Party Chairman Frank Barbaro said.

Meanwhile, pressure for a federal probe into the mailer continued to mount.

Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., wrote U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday seeking a full report from the Department of Justice on its probe.

"This shameful and dishonest scheme to discourage Latino citizens from voting is a blatant violation of the Voting Rights Act, and all those involved should be held accountable as soon as possible," Kennedy said.

CONTACT US: Register staff writers Annie Burris, Dena Bunis, Jeff Overley and Martin Wisckol contributed to these reports.

State Police Raid Home Of California Congressional Candidate (MCT)

By Norberto Santana Jr., The Orange County Register

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084075

SANTA ANA, Calif. - News media converged on Tan Nguyen's campaign office Friday expecting to hear from the Republican congressional candidate about a mailer sent out this week warning immigrants against voting in the November election.

Instead, the media horde got a front-row seat to a half-dozen agents from the state Attorney General's Office serving search warrants and combing through Nguyen's office.

Officers confiscated three computer hard drives, checked for fingerprints, leafed through files and interviewed Nguyen's attorney. Agents also searched Nguyen's home and a campaign worker's home.

Despite burgeoning state and federal probes into the flier, Nguyen's attorney said Nguyen has no plans to withdraw as the Republican nominee for the 47th Congressional District race against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez.

Dave Wiechert, an attorney representing Nguyen, said that "Mr. Nguyen has indicated that he did not authorize or approve the mailing" yet declined to discuss specifics because of the ongoing investigation. Wiechert added that misinformation was fueling what he called "a political firestorm."

That firestorm has included widespread condemnation from GOP leaders such as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Orange County Republican Party Chairman Scott Baugh. On Thursday, Baugh accused Nguyen of being directly linked to the letter.

Wiechert, citing his experience as a former prosecutor, said, "You see statements by high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation that, I'm sure, based on my experience, that they have little or no knowledge about."

The controversy was fueled Friday when county officials halted Registrar of Voters Neal Kelley from sending out a letter setting the record straight to the 14,000 households targeted by Nguyen's mailer. The state attorney general and the secretary of state had contacted Kelley as part of discussions about sending such a letter out.

Several Republican county supervisors argue that the Registrar of Voters Office should not get involved in correcting campaign mailers.

"The registrar of voters is not supposed to be the arbiter of truth in elections," Board of Supervisors Chairman Bill Campbell said.

Campbell added that having the county elections office track and respond to such fliers would set a bad precedent.

Yet Supervisor Lou Correa, the board's lone Democrat, argued that "ignoring this type of letter is a precedent that I'm concerned about being set."

Correa has demanded that supervisors publicly debate the issue at their weekly meeting Tuesday. He wants a letter sent out.

"This, in my opinion - this is not like every other mailer," Correa said. "The issue here is voter suppression, especially given the history here in Orange County."

On Friday, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, whose office is also conducting an investigation into the suspect mailer, announced he would send out a letter.

"I want all eligible voters in California to cast their votes without fear or misinformation. I am outraged that anyone would try to rob eligible Californians of their right to vote. Any attempt to intimidate voters is unacceptable" McPherson said.

Santa Ana Councilman Jose Solorio indicated Friday that the voter-intimidation efforts may extend beyond the Nguyen campaign mailer. Solorio presented a copy of a sign he said was distributed throughout Delhi Park that read: "Are you a resident or illegal? If you vote, you'll get deported." The signs also carried the moniker of a group called Alizanda Pro-imigrados (Pro-Immigrants Alliance).

Solorio said he had forwarded the signs to the Attorney General's Office and has been assured that they would be investigated.

"It (the signs) shows that it's more widespread than this one single rogue incident (the letter). This stuff does not happen in a vacuum," Orange County Democratic Party Chairman Frank Barbaro said.

Meanwhile, pressure for a federal probe into the mailer continued to mount.

DOJ_NMG_0084076

Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., wrote U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday seeking a full report from the Department of Justice on its investigation.

"This shameful and dishonest scheme to discourage Latino citizens from voting is a blatant violation of the Voting Rights Act, and all those involved should be held accountable as soon as possible," Kennedy said.

Raids Widen 'Immigrant' Letter Probe (LAT)

By Jennifer Delson, Christopher Goffard And Mai Tran, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Agents take evidence from candidate Tan Nguyen's home and office, seeking details of note about voting status sent to O.C. residents.

Even as he prepared to step before the cameras Friday in an effort to mend his tattered candidacy for Congress, the worst week of Tan Nguyen's political life got bleaker still, as state agents raided his Garden Grove campaign headquarters and Santa Ana home, hauling off computers and bags of evidence.

The investigation by California Department of Justice agents stems from a racially charged letter that Nguyen admits his office sent to about 14,000 registered voters in central Orange County. The letter, which warned "immigrants" they could be jailed or deported if they tried to vote, has spurred condemnation across the political spectrum and an investigation into possible voting rights violations.

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant who is running to unseat Democratic U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, maintains that he neither wrote nor authorized the instantly infamous letter, claiming it was the work of a campaign manager he refused to name. According to the head of the Orange County Republican Party, however, the mailing house that sent the letter said Nguyen had a direct hand in it.

State agents arrived both at Nguyen's campaign office and his home about 1 p.m. Friday with search warrants, scouring files, plumbing cabinets and bagging evidence.

Nguyen had to cancel a planned afternoon news conference, which his lawyer, David Wiechert, said would be rescheduled for next week.

"I do not believe he'll be arrested," said Wiechert, who specializes in white collar criminal defense work. "My belief is he'll be cleared. He's asserted his innocence."

The lawyer said agents from the state attorney general's office had questioned Nguyen for two hours Thursday and that he was cooperating fully with their investigation.

"A search doesn't mean the person whose office is being searched is guilty," Wiechert added. "This is a political firestorm of high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation they have no knowledge of."

According to a source close to the investigation, the attorney general's office has determined that an LAPD officer, who is a friend of a worker in Nguyen's office, paid $4,000 on a credit card for the bulk mailing of the letter and used an alias.

In addition to the letter, the attorney general's office is investigating a racially charged poster that was recently hung in Santa Ana's Delhi Park. Translated from Spanish, the poster reads, "If you are a resident or are illegal, if you vote, you will be thrown out."

Park regulars say there were dozens of the posters hanging in the park for nearly a week. "They were put on just about every tree and pole around here," said Juan Cabrera, who was visiting the park Friday.

Santa Ana Councilman Jose Solorio found one of the posters on the ground in the park Friday and passed the information on to the attorney general's office. Solorio wondered whether there was a link between the letters sent out by Nguyen's office and the park posters. "The rhetoric in the signs sounds similar to the letters, so I have my suspicions," Solorio said.

State attorney general spokesman Nathan Barankin said the posters were "under review" but would not say whether that probe would be tied to the letter investigation. "We can't rule [the posters] in or out," he said.

Javier Gonzalez, executive director of Strengthening Our Lives, a union-based voter drive campaign, said the poster's use of the word "resident" was deceptive. He said his mother, a naturalized U.S. citizen, considers herself a U.S. resident, and might think from reading the letter that she should not vote.

DOJ_NMG_0084077

Meanwhile, the letter from Nguyen's office, which has prompted the GOP to disown him, continues to generate howls of indignation. "When you tell immigrants who have become citizens they can go to jail for voting, you are spreading lies, not liberty," said an ACLU news release, calling for Orange County Registrar Neal Kelley to send out letters correcting misinformation in the original letter.

Said Mai Cong, president of the Vietnamese Community of Orange County: "I was distressed to learn that someone in our immigrant community is involved in a case of voter intimidation. This is like 'a single worm that spoils that soup,' as we Vietnamese Americans used to say."

Among the recipients of the letter was Kristen Panagua, a Disneyland Hotel worker, who said it angered her. "I respect and love this country," said Panagua, who registered to vote six years ago after becoming a U.S. citizen. "They are trying to intimidate us to keep us from being part of it."

Isabel Procopio, a janitor and volunteer for Strengthening Our Lives, said she was knocking on doors in Garden Grove on Saturday as part of a campaign to encourage voter participation. Of the 30 doors she approached, she found 10 residents who had received the letter. "Many people told me they are really afraid," she said. "They also said they were angry. I'm telling them not to let racist Republicans intimidate us."

Gustavo Arellano, the OC Weekly staffer who writes the syndicated "Ask A Mexican!" column, said the letter would generate a massive backlash among Latino voters, who would be galvanized to defeat Republicans in local elections in November.

"Latinos are going to hear about this [and say], 'Oh, Republicans: anti-immigrant,' " he said. "They're not going to pay attention to the fact that the Republican Party has denounced the letter, or that Gov. Schwarzenegger has called it a hate crime. They're just going to chalk it up as another instance of GOP xenophobia."

jennifer.delson@latimes.com

christopher.goffard@latimes .com

mai.tran@latimes.com

*

Staff writer Christine Hanley contributed to this report.

California: Offices Searched Over Letters (NYT)

By Cindy Chang

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

State investigators searched the offices of a Republican Congressional candidate, a day after he acknowledged that a campaign worker was responsible for a letter sent to as many as 14,000 Latino residents in an effort to keep them from the polls. The candidate, Tan Nguyen, left, will stay in the race against the incumbent, Loretta Sanchez, even though the Republican Party has urged him to withdraw, said his lawyer, David Wiechert. Mr. Nguyen has denied having any knowledge of the letter, which stated that immigrants could be jailed if they voted.

Discrimination Claims Hurt Business Even If False (TSSC)

By Jim Duplessis

The State (SC), October 21, 2006

Experts say Cracker Barrel gained one more business risk when the mother of comedian Chris Rock accused Cracker Barrel of racial discrimination for her treatment at a restaurant Tuesday.

The risk isn't so much that Lebanon, Tenn.-based Cracker Barrel might lose a lawsuit, if one is filed.

The real risk is that it will set back the company's ability to lure one of the most lucrative sources of increasing its business: drawing more minority customers.

In customer relations, perceptions can be just as dangerous as reality for a company, said Jerome D. Williams, professor of advertising at the University of Texas at Austin.

"Whether they're true or not is irrelevant: They're true in the minds of the customer," Williams said. "Companies cannot stick their heads in the sand."

DOJ_NMG_0084078

How restaurants — or any other business — treat minorities became a major topic in business circles 12 years ago when the Spartanburg-based Denny's restaurant chain reached a consent decree with the U.S. Justice Department that required it to take a series of steps to prevent discrimination.

Similar lawsuits led Cracker Barrel to reach a consent decree in 2004. The Justice Department cited widespread discrimination within the chain. In some restaurants, black diners routinely were given tables apart from whites, were seated after white customers who arrived later and were given inferior service.

The decree led Cracker Barrel to establish a discrimination policy. It now handles customer complaints, regardless of race, by:

• Reporting the complaint to the manager on duty

• Requiring the manager to listens to the complaint

• Requiring complaints to be reported to company headquarters

• Requiring complaints to be investigated thoroughly

The company also posts its anti-discrimination policy on wall signs, in their menus and on its Web site. The postings include a toll-free number that customers can call to reach a company representative 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

But one of Cracker Barrel's 19 S.C. restaurants left Rose Rock and her daughter feeling they had been singled out for bad service because of their race.

Rock, who lives near Georgetown, and her daughter arrived at Cracker Barrel in Murrells Inlet May 14. They were seated, but waited about 30 minutes before a server or manager spoke with them.

Rock alleges racial discrimination, noting that she and her daughter were the only black customers in the restaurant, and they watched as white customers at other tables were served.

Diana Wynne, senior vice president of corporate affairs for Cracker Barrel, explained Rock and her daughter were seated during a shift change, and no server picked up their table. As a result, no one gave her a menu or took her order.

After Rock got the attention of the manager, he apologized and offered to expedite her order. She declined. The manager followed up with a letter of apology, a gift basket and free meal coupons.

"Ms. Rock is a valued guest of Cracker Barrel," Wynne said. "This is not a case of discrimination. We let a customer down."

"I can assure you we will take appropriate action, including termination if our policies were violated," she said. "We do not tolerate discrimination of any kind."

Blacks and other minorities represent about 30 percent of the nation's population — and base of potential customers.

"Companies can no longer afford to operate business as usual. They're going to lose future opportunity for growth," said Geraldine R. Henderson, associate professor at Northwestern University.

But many companies still do just that, Williams said.

"You have people in management from that generation who allow people to get away with it, or give them a slap on the wrist," Williams said.

Spartanburg-based Denny's set a new standard for coping with racial discrimination after 1993, when it reached a consent order with the U.S. Justice Department over a series of complaints of poor service given to black customers.

Shortly after the consent decree, Denny's conducted a poll that found about half of black respondents said they would never eat at a Denny's restaurant again. But by 2004, company polling found that number had fallen to 15 percent.

"Denny's is an excellent example of a company that turned things around," Williams said. "They made changes and the minority community was very receptive."

Danielle Holley-Walker, an assistant law professor at the University of South Carolina, said companies should establish practices to prevent discrimination, and respond to allegations immediately.

That starts with apologizing.

"Most people don't settle their everyday disputes by filing lawsuits," Holley-Walker said. "For most people, getting an apology or a voucher for a free meal is enough."

DOJ_NMG_0084079

Incidents in which customers report bad service should be reported up to top management, including the company's lawyers, so that the company can adjust its policies to better prevent discrimination and improve overall service, Holley-Walker said.

"In order to learn from your mistakes, you have to have some reporting," she said.

"From an economic, capitalist standpoint, you would not want to alienate anybody and leave money on the table because of the way you treat people," Williams said.

Reach DuPlessis at (803) 771-8305.

ABOUT CRACKER BARREL

Cracker barrel has 548 restaurants in 41 states, including 19 in South Carolina. Each store serves about 1,100 guests per day. Most of its restaurants are by interstate highways, and all are company owned.

Nevada: Street Solicitation (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

A federal appeals court in San Francisco struck down a Las Vegas ordinance barring solicitation on city streets, calling it unconstitutional. The decision, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, stems from a 1997 case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union and several religious and political groups challenging Las Vegas ordinances that barred certain groups from distributing leaflets or using vendor tables along a five-block pedestrian promenade. The court also ruled that the city violated the A.C.L.U.'s constitutional right to free speech when it forbid it to set up a vendor table. "We hold that the erection of tables in a public forum is expressive activity protected by our Constitution to the extent that the tables facilitate the dissemination of First Amendment speech," Judge Richard A. Paez wrote.

FBI: No Hate Crimes Recorded In Alabama In 2005 (MR)

By Susan Daker, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), October 21, 2006

No hate crimes were recorded in Alabama in 2005, according to statistics released this week by the FBI, but law enforcement agencies representing about 10 percent of the state's population were the only ones providing information for the survey.

Alabama and Mississippi were the only states in the nation that reported zero hate crimes, according to the FBI. Hawaii did not participate in the study, which included 49 states and the District of Columbia.

"The idea that Alabama had no hate crimes is not believable," said Mark Potok, a director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which is based in Montgomery and tracks hate crimes and monitors extremist groups.

The FBI reported that nationally more than 7,000 criminal incidents recorded in 2005 occurred as a result of bias toward a particular race, religion, sexual orientation, ethnicity/national origin, or physical or mental disability. In 2005, California reported the most hate crimes, recording 1,379. New Jersey reported the second most with 738, according to the FBI.

A more accurate survey of hate crimes, according to Potok, is the U.S. Department of Justice's "Hate Crimes Reported by Victims and Police" publication, which was released in Nov. 2005.

In contrast to the FBI's report, the Justice Department found that between 2000 and 2003 there was an annual average of 191,000 hate crime incidents nationally involving one or more victims.

The Justice Department's survey shows "a serious social problem," Potok said.

Thirty-two jurisdictions from Alabama submitted information to the FBI; these agencies represent a population of about 455,247. The state population is nearly 4.5 million.

Citronelle, Atmore, the University of South Alabama and Loxley were the only southwest Alabama police agencies that reported, according to the FBI. All those agencies reported zero hate crimes. The Mobile Police Department, the Prichard Police Department, the Mobile County Sheriff's Office and the Baldwin County Sheriff's Office did not participate in the study, the statistics show. Participation is voluntary, according to the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0084080

Potok said the difference between the Justice Department and FBI numbers shows the "ludicrous" nature of the FBI's report.

"I'm not attacking the FBI," he said. The FBI is only reporting what is reported to it.

Potok said the FBI study's numbers fall short for a variety of reasons.

Many hate crimes are never reported to the police, he said. Some district attorneys will not prosecute under the enhanced penalties for hate crimes, so police do not bother to investigate whether race, sex, sexual orientation or religion were the motive for the crimes, Potok said.

Many law enforcement personnel do not agree with the idea of hate crimes. To them, murder is murder and all crimes are hate crimes, Potok said.

Some local law enforcement officials said they did not report to the FBI because they did not believe they had any hate crimes to report.

Hate crimes are "something that we obviously monitor," said John Murphy, spokesman for the Baldwin County Sheriff's Office. "We've been fortunate in Baldwin County not to have any."

In Mobile, police spokesman Officer Eric Gallichant said, "We did not report because we did not have any in that reporting period."

Kate Johnson, the spokeswoman for the Mobile County Sheriff's Office, said that the sheriff's department does not know of any hate crimes last year in the county. She said, however, under the new administration of Sheriff Sam Cochran, who was appointed to the post this year, the department will participate in the study.

Citronelle police Chief Conrad Reid said that he submitted the report because the FBI needs to know where hate crimes are and are not occurring so that it can provide extra support where needed.

"Any agency that asks me for something like that, I try to do it," he said.

Reid said he cannot recall Citronelle ever having had a hate crime, but he noted that the hate crime designation has existed only since 1994 when Alabama passed a law mandating longer minimum sentences for crimes committed because of a victim's race, color, religion, national origin, ethnicity, or physical or mental disability. The Alabama law does not include sexual orientation.

For the 2004 FBI report, Alabama law enforcement agencies submitted three hate crimes to the FBI. One of them occurred in Atmore, the report showed. A call for the Atmore police chief was not returned. Other instances of Alabama hate crimes occurred in Jefferson County and in the city of Greensboro in Hale County.

U.S. Asked To Watch Election In Chesterfield (RTD)

By Tyler Whitley, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 21, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia asked the U.S. Justice Department yesterday to send election observers to Chesterfield County on Election Day. The ACLU claims the county's actions could discourage minority voters.

Kent Willis, director of the ACLU, cited four incidents over the past two years, including a new allegation that the registrar, Lawrence C. Haake III, refused to issue an absentee ballot to a registered voter because the prospective voter would not give his Social Security number.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the department has received the letter from Willis. It does not disclose which localities it will monitor until 24 hours before an election, she said.

Haake said he believes he is following the law.

But the State Board of Elections yesterday said Social Security numbers are not required. It said the Chesterfield Electoral Board, which supervises the registrar, should meet as soon as possible to consider the matter.

In a news release explaining his letter to John Tanner, chief of the Justice Department's Voting Rights Section, Willis said, "Chesterfield seems to be Virginia's No. 1 trouble spot for irregular voting procedures."

DOJ_NMG_0084081

He cited Election Day practices two years ago that the ACLU said disproportionately affected minority voters, such as the registrar asking for armed guards at the polling places. Haake said that because of heavy voting, he just wanted to maintain order.

Willis also said that in the same presidential election, county election officials misinformed voters that they must show identification to vote. If voters don't have identification, they are allowed to cast a provisional ballot after signing an affidavit that they are who they say they are.

Last year Haake refused to count provisional ballots submitted by people who had registered on time but whose applications were not processed in a timely manner.

Haake said he disagrees with the State Board of Election's interpretation of the law on Social Security numbers.

"The state board deals in abstract concepts, and we deal in realities," he said.

Contact staff writer Tyler Whitley at twhitley@timesdispatch.com or (804) 649-6780.

Citing Minority Voting Concerns, ACLU Seeks U.S. Poll Observers (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

CHESTERFIELD, Va. -- The Virginia chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union is asking federal officials to monitor the Nov. 7 elections in Chesterfield County because of what the ACLU called a pattern of minority voter intimidation.

"My request stems from several recent incidents in Chesterfield, indicating that officials there may implement voting procedures that will have an adverse impact on minority voters," the ACLU's Kent Willis wrote to John Tanner, chief of voting rights for the U.S. Justice Department. The letter was sent Friday.

Willis cited several actions since 2004: --In October 2004, the county's general registrar, Lawrence Haake III, announced plans for security reasons to place armed guards at every polling precinct, a tactic Willis said was used in the past to intimidate black voters. --In November 2004, ACLU officials received complaints that county poll workers were restricting voters lacking identification. Willis said Virginia law allows voters to cast ballots without identification, provided they sign an affirmation of identity. --Requiring absentee voters to provide Social Security numbers. The State Board of Elections has said registrars can ask for Social Security numbers, but they cannot deny a ballot. --Refusing to count provisional ballots of voters who registered through the state Department of Motor Vehicles prior to registration deadlines, but whose applications had not been forwarded to the registrar.

"Chesterfield seems to be Virginia's number one trouble spot for irregular voting procedures," Willis said Friday of the suburban Richmond county. "The Justice Department ought to be present on Election Day in Chesterfield to ensure that racially fair procedures are in place."

Haake called the claims baseless and insisted he has followed state laws.

"We actually worked with the (U.S.) Department of Justice over the summer in a training program," he said.

"Federal observers can come or not, it doesn't matter," Haake said. "Everything we've done is consistent with the law."

Arizona May Use Voter-ID Law, High Court Says (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that Arizona may enforce a new state law requiring voters to show a photo identification card at the polls on Election Day this year, despite a pending lawsuit by opponents who say the measure will disenfranchise the poor, minorities and the elderly.

In its unanimous five-page ruling, the court did not decide whether the Arizona law was constitutional. Rather, it overturned a federal appeals court in San Francisco that would have blocked enforcement of the law until the opponents' suit could be decided.

That would take too long, the court said, noting that, "in view of the impending election," Arizona needed "clear guidance."

The actual impact of the Arizona law, which was approved in a statewide referendum two years ago but has not yet been applied, was still too unclear to justify changing the state's plans so close to Nov. 7, the justices said.

DOJ_NMG_0084082

Most states permit voters to present alternative forms of identification such as a bank statement or utility bill.

But Arizona, which borders Mexico and has seen a surge in migration in recent years, is one of several states that have recently enacted a photo-ID requirement in response to reports that illegal immigrants and other ineligible voters have been casting ballots.

The Arizona law requires voters not only to present proof of citizenship when they register but also to present a photo ID when they go to the polls. Those without a photo ID may cast a provisional ballot, but their votes do not count unless they can produce a valid identification card within five days.

Similar statutes in Georgia and Missouri have been struck down in court. An Indiana law was upheld, but a federal appeals court in Chicago is currently considering an appeal by opponents.

The Republican-controlled House recently approved the Federal Election Integrity Act, which requires voters in federal elections to present a photo ID at the polls. It also requires states to make such an ID available free of charge.

Because of the various lower-court cases, the Supreme Court may soon have to rule on the constitutionality of the photo-ID requirements.

The justices emphasized the limited scope of their decision yesterday. There are good arguments both for and against the Arizona law, the court said, but "we express no opinion here on the . . . ultimate resolution of these cases."

Opponents say that the ID requirement imposes an extra burden on minorities, the poor and the elderly, who are less likely than other citizens to have a driver's license, the most common form of state-issued photo ID. Opponents say that because states charge fees for photo IDs, requiring one to vote is tantamount to an unconstitutional poll tax.

Supreme Court Allows Arizona To Use New Voter-ID Procedure (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20 — The Supreme Court ruled unanimously late Friday that Arizona could put its new voter-identification rules into effect for the Nov. 7 election while challenges to those rules proceed in the lower federal courts.

In an unsigned opinion, the court granted Arizona's request to overturn an injunction issued this month by a two-judge federal appeals panel. The judges, A. Wallace Tashima and William A. Fletcher of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, had acted at the request of a group of Arizona Indian tribes, the League of Women Voters and other groups who have joined to challenge the constitutionality of the rules.

The Supreme Court opinion made clear that it was not ruling on the merits of the case, in which the plaintiffs contend that Proposition 200, adopted by Arizona voters in 2004, places an unconstitutional burden on members of minorities and others who do not have ready access to the forms of identification required to register and to vote.

Justice John Paul Stevens filed a one-paragraph concurring opinion that offered an explanation for the court's action. "Allowing the election to proceed without enjoining the statutory provisions at issue will provide the courts with a better record on which to judge their constitutionality," Justice Stevens said.

The opinion criticized the appeals court judges for not providing "any factual findings or indeed any reasoning" in their four-sentence order granting the injunction, which had previously been denied by the federal district court in Phoenix.

Proposition 200 requires proof of citizenship before a person can register to vote. To receive a ballot at the polls, a voter must present a single form of photo identification or two forms of identification with the voter's name and address like a bank statement or utility bill.

Voters without proper identification can cast provisional ballots and provide identification within five days. No identification beyond a signature is required for those who cast an "early ballot."

Court: Ariz. Can Seek Photo ID For Vote (AP-Y)

By Mark Sherman

AP, October 21, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled Friday that Arizona may require voters to provide photo IDs when they cast their ballots next month.

DOJ_NMG_0084083

The justices cautioned that they were not issuing a ruling on the constitutionality of Arizona's law. "As we have noted, the facts in these cases are hotly contested," the court said in an unsigned five-page order.

The ruling merely allows the Nov. 7 election to proceed with the photo ID law in place. Federal courts still will have to resolve a lawsuit contending that the law will disenfranchise numerous voters, particularly the elderly and minorities.

"This decision eliminates all confusion about what rules will be followed for the Nov. 7 general election," Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said.

Courts in Georgia and Missouri have blocked similar laws.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in a brief concurring opinion, said the high court's action makes it more likely that the constitutional issues "will be resolved correctly on the basis of historical facts rather than speculation."

The law requires voters to prove citizenship when registering to vote and to show photo IDs when they go to the polls. The law was meant to make sure illegal immigrants weren't casting ballots.

Opponents of the law contend it discourages some people from voting, including the elderly, poor and disadvantaged who don't always carry IDs. Nina Perales, an attorney for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said the ruling "means many voters will be turned away from the polls on election day" because they lack the required ID.

Arizona residents, Indian tribes and community groups filed suit in May.

A federal judge ruled the state could enforce the law. But the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later blocked it from taking effect for the Nov. 7 election.

In his bid to allow the state to go forward, Goddard told the justices that "voter registration at the polls is an emerging issue of national importance. States have a compelling interest in curbing fraud and protecting the integrity of elections."

Voters without proper ID may cast provisional ballots and furnish identification within five business days of the election.

Lacking photo identification, voters still can cast ballots during the state's early voting period. State officials said there is ample time to compare signatures on the ballot with those on registration rolls.

—

Associated Press writer Paul Davenport in Phoenix contributed to this report.

High Court Allows Arizona To Enact New Voter ID Law (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

The ruling reverses one by the 9th Circuit. It is expected to benefit Republicans at the polls.

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court cleared the way Friday for Arizona to enforce a new rule for next month's election that requires most voters to show proof of identification before casting a ballot.

In an unsigned and apparently unanimous opinion, the justices reversed a ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that had blocked the Arizona law from taking effect this year.

The justices emphasized that they were not ruling on the still-pending constitutional challenge to the law. They also noted that the law included some exceptions for eligible voters without photo identification.

Nonetheless, Friday's order is likely to be seen as a benefit for Republican candidates and a setback for Democrats.

In recent years, Republicans in Congress and in many state capitals have pressed for voter-identification requirements at the ballot box. They say these rules are needed to combat fraudulent voting.

These laws have been opposed by Democrats and civil rights advocates. They say that there is little evidence of such fraud and that the requirements are designed to suppress voting by poor, elderly, disabled or minority persons who do not have a government-issued photo identification, such as a driver's license.

Courts in recent weeks have blocked new voter ID laws in Georgia and Missouri. A challenge to an Indiana law is before an appeals court.

The Arizona measure was approved in 2004 by 56% of the vote as part of Proposition 200. Most of the controversy over this initiative involved its provisions for cutting off public benefits to immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0084084

Under Arizona's law, eligible voters who do not have the required identification may vote as many as five days before election day. This gives election officials time to match their signatures with voter rolls. Voters without identification may cast a provisional ballot on election day, but their vote will be counted only if they furnish the required identification within five days.

In May, the American Civil Liberties Union, the League of Women Voters and several other civil rights groups sued to block the voter identification rule from being enforced Nov. 7. They called the rule a "21st century poll tax" because it could force some poor voters to purchase photo ID cards. Some voting rights experts also said this requirement could significantly depress voting by the state's Navajos.

A federal judge refused to block the law from taking effect, but on Oct. 5, a two-judge panel of the 9th Circuit issued an order saying the law could not be enforced for the upcoming election. The appeals court did not explain its ruling.

Arizona's attorney general asked the Supreme Court to intervene. And on Friday afternoon, the high court issued a six-page opinion that set aside the 9th Circuit's order. It noted that the 9th Circuit's "bare order" did not give a good reason for blocking the law from taking effect.

The court, however, said its decision was not intended to express an opinion on the outcome of the case, which must still be argued.

The opinion cites arguments on both sides. A state has "a compelling interest in preserving the integrity of its election process," the court said. At the same time, it noted that the "possibility that qualified voters might be turned away" required careful consideration of a challenge to the law.

david.savage@latimes.com

ANTITRUST:

Groups Balk Over Buyout (AP)

By John Dunbar

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Consumer groups say concessions offered by AT&T Inc. as it seeks government approval of its buyout of BellSouth Corp. fall far short of what's needed for the deal to be in the public interest.

The Justice Department has signed off on the deal, but the Federal Communications Commission has not voted on it.

AT&T contends it has offered a full range of accommodations, including $10-a-month Internet access, free modems, promises to temporarily freeze prices for competitors that use the company's networks and even a program to return to the United States some jobs that were shipped overseas.

Gene Kimmelman, vice president of federal and international affairs for Consumers Union, the publisher of Consumer Reports magazine, described AT&T's conditions as "things they think make them look good" and part of a marketing strategy rather than a sincere effort to preserve competition.

Opponents of the deal, whose views often closely track those of the commission's two Democrats who managed to delay a planned FCC vote, would like to see AT&T beef up its offer in three main areas:

• Stronger assurances by the company that it will not discriminate against certain kinds of Internet traffic, a concept known as "network neutrality."

• Offer "naked DSL," or stand-alone digital subscriber line service, that is priced competitively.

• Lower prices for "special access" customers -- service offered to capacity-hungry customers, such as large businesses and Internet service providers, that guarantee a dedicated high-capacity link to distribute voice and data.

Robert Quinn Jr., AT&T's vice president for federal regulatory affairs, briefed reporters Friday to defend his company's offer in advance of a Tuesday deadline for comment. He said AT&T has put a "full slate of conditions on the table" tailored to satisfy the public interest.

He pointed to two major benefits of the BellSouth buyout: greater availability of low-priced high-speed Internet access to customers in the AT&T-BellSouth service area, and the future benefits of video services for BellSouth customers to compete with the cable industry.

The deal would unite AT&T, which dominates much of California, Texas and the Midwest, with BellSouth, whose home base is in Atlanta and provides local phone and Internet access to the Carolinas, Florida, Georgia and Louisiana.

A vote is expected at a commission meeting on Nov. 3, though it does not appear that AT&T and consumer groups agree on the three major issues.

On network neutrality, AT&T says it has promised to adhere to a set of FCC principles that bar discrimination in the handling of Internet traffic.

On "naked DSL," Quinn said the company doesn't want to make guarantees about pricing that might hurt it competitively.

AT&T also says its rates for special-access customers are competitive and have even dropped in some areas.

AT&T To Fight Calls To Jettison Airwaves (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

They will be used to carry wireless high-speed Internet service.

AT&T Inc. will fight calls by opponents of its $81 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. to divest airwaves intended for wireless high-speed Internet service, a company lobbyist said.

AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, plans to use the airwaves for emerging "WiMax" broadband services, Senior Vice President Robert Quinn said Friday.

"Mobility is a feature that people are going to want to have," Quinn said. "We have every incentive in the world to utilize that spectrum."

Clearwire Corp., a wireless Internet service provider founded by mobile-phone pioneer Craig McCaw, is among the companies urging the U.S. Federal Communications Commission to force AT&T to sell WiMax spectrum that it would gain through the BellSouth deal. Without divestitures, the combined company could thwart independent carriers seeking to offer nationwide advanced broadband service, Clearwire told the FCC in an Oct. 18 letter.

Spectrum divestitures weren't among the conditions that San Antonio-based AT&T proposed last week in an effort to persuade at least three of the FCC's five members to support the BellSouth purchase.

"The commitments we put on the table were basically to expand the WiMax trials that we have," Quinn said. "We can't both divest spectrum and expand our offerings in those markets."

FCC approval is the last regulatory hurdle AT&T must surmount to finish the transaction. The Justice Department and 18 states have cleared the deal without conditions.

Judge: Petco Vote Can Go Ahead (SDUT)

By Frank Green, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 21, 2006

Dissident shareholders fail to stop meeting

A judge declined yesterday to block a Monday meeting at which Petco shareholders will vote on the proposed sale of the company to two private investment firms.

Attorneys representing dissident shareholders had wanted a temporary injunction halting the meeting so that shareholders could, among other remedies, be provided with additional information on how the company's board chose Leonard Green & Partners and Texas Pacific's $1.8 billion bid over a higher offer from PetSmart.

In turning down the injunction request, San Diego Superior Court Judge John S. Meyer said there was not enough time “to add some discrete information to the proxy” with Monday's meeting looming.

He added that he was not sure whether an injunction was appropriate. He voiced concern during the hearing about possible damage to Petco's stock price if there should be a delay in the vote.

Petco shares rose a penny yesterday to close at $28.84 on the Nasdaq.

The San Diego-based pet supplies firm, which has more than 800 stores, announced July 14 that it had a $1.8 billion stock and assumed debt deal with Leonard Green and Texas Pacific, which had previously owned Petco.

Petco would be bought for $29 a share – a 49 percent premium over the trading price of $19.45 a share the day before the announcement. The two private equity firms plan to make Petco a private company.

During the negotiating process, Petco's board passed on a $33-a-share offer by rival Pet-Smart, which has about 860 stores, because of what Petco said were concerns that antitrust questions could delay a deal indefinitely.

Darren Robbins, a partner in the law firm of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins representing shareholders, expressed disappointment in the judge's decision to allow the shareholders' meeting to go forward.

He said that the class-action lawsuit brought by his clients against Petco's directors and executives in July would proceed. It seeks between $300 million and $400 million in damages from the company, claiming that Petco's board and management were unduly influenced in their decision by their close ties to Leonard Green and Texas Pacific. A trial date has not yet been set.

Some Petco directors and executives have been with the company for many years, and several were on hand when the two private equity firms spent $600 million to acquire Petco stock in October 2000 to take the company private. Petco said in its proxy statement that it anticipated its current managers would hold similar positions following the sale.

Analysts expect shareholders to overwhelmingly approve Petco's sale to the two firms. The meeting is scheduled for 10 a.m. Monday at Homewood Suites by Hilton, 11025 Vista Sorrento Parkway, San Diego.

“I don't see any point in shareholders voting this down,” said Joan Storms, an analyst who covers Petco for Wedbush Morgan Securities in Los Angeles.

After taking Petco private, Leonard Green and Texas Pacific are likely to pare costs as they prepare the firm for a possible sale or a new public offering in the next several years, analysts said.

The deal is being financed largely by debt that Petco will repay, so it will need to maintain a strong cash flow to make the payments, added analysts.

In a typical leveraged buyout, the buyer “sees some asset that is undervalued,” said Paul Kedrosky, executive director of the von Liebig Center for Entrepreneurism and Technology Advancement at the University of California San Diego. “They aren't buying the company because it's efficiently run.”

Regions, AmSouth Merger Wins Fed Approval (HT)

By Wayne Smith, Times Business Editor Wayne.smith@htimes.com

The Huntsville Times (AL), October 21, 2006

$10 billion deal expected to close in early November

Regions Financial Corp. and AmSouth Bancorp. said late Friday that the Federal Reserve Board has approved their planned merger.

The announcement came one day after AmSouth said it had reached an agreement with federal regulators to sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. That agreement resolved antitrust concerns raised by the Department of Justice after the two Birmingham-based banks said last spring they planned to merge.

The offices for sale include five in Madison County, one in Decatur and one in Fayetteville, Tenn.

"We are pleased we have received the key regulatory approvals required for this merger and expect to complete the transaction in early November," Jackson W. Moore, Regions chairman, president and CEO, said in a prepared statement. "This moves us one step closer to creating a top regional financial services provider."

The combined bank will keep the Regions name. Moore will serve as chairman of the new Regions.

AmSouth and Regions announced plans in May to merge, and shareholders of both companies approved the $10 billion deal earlier this month.

The combination will create a bank holding company with more than $140 billion in assets, about $100 billion in deposits and nearly 2,000 branches in 16 states across the South, Midwest and Texas.

"Once we complete this merger, we can begin providing our customers with a wider range of products and services as well as more convenient locations," C. Dowd Ritter, chairman, president and CEO of AmSouth, said in a prepared statement. Ritter will serve as president and CEO of the new Regions.

Combined, the two companies employ about 37,000 people.

Officials have said as many as 10 percent of the employees of the combined bank, or some 3,700 workers, could lose their jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0084087

Ripplewood Ponders Bid For Delphi (WSJ)

By Ianthe Jeanne Dugan

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

Offer for Auto-Parts Maker Could Surpass $10 Billion; Stallkamp Leads the Effort

Ripplewood Holdings LLC, a large New York-based buyout firm, is preparing a likely bid for Delphi Corp., the auto-parts giant that filed for bankruptcy protection last year, according to people familiar with the matter.

Ripplewood has examined the possibility of taking over the entire auto-parts maker, but a bid for just part of Delphi also is possible, these people said. The effort is being led by Thomas Stallkamp, a Ripplewood partner who formerly was president of Chrysler Corp.

A bid for all of Delphi likely would far surpass $10 billion, people involved in the discussions said. Delphi's enterprise value -- the value of all its stocks and bonds combined -- is estimated to total between $13 billion and $14 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy protection, according to stakeholders and officials who have been negotiating a restructuring for several months.

If Ripplewood makes a bid, it will join a short list of official contenders jockeying for stakes in Delphi. Appaloosa Management, a hedge fund that owns more than 9% of Delphi, has proposed pumping in several billion dollars in a deal that would give that firm more than a third of Delphi's stock after it emerges from bankruptcy. Also jockeying for a significant stake is Cerberus Capital Management LP, a large private-equity firm. It is unclear whether these investors could work out a deal in which they coexist or if one investors' bid would put the others out of the running.

No deal is likely to come together before mid-November. Delphi has indicated it is trying to come to an agreement with unions and General Motors Corp. by Nov. 8 over proposals to cut costs. It is working closely in that effort with GM, Delphi's former parent. GM also has provided financial assistance to Delphi, which has offered buyouts and early-retirement incentives that have been accepted by about two-thirds of its workers. in offering buyout. It's unclear what full role GM may play in assessing any bids for Delphi.

Any proposal would have to be approved by Delphi's board, which is meeting in early November. The board would likely seek input from creditors, shareholders and union representatives, who have been negotiating for months over the framework for the company's restructuring. Any deal will also need approval of the bankruptcy court. Delphi has said it intends to emerge from bankruptcy protection by early 2007.

Write to Ianthe Jeanne Dugan at ianthe.dugan@wsj.com1

Tops Sale Of Stores To Rival Defended (CLPD)

By Janet H. Cho, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, October 21, 2006

Ohio groceries lacked viable buyer, official says

Tops Markets LLC insists there was never a financially viable offer to buy all 46 of its grocery stores in Northeast Ohio.

John Barrett, a senior vice president for Tops Markets in Williamsville, N.Y., said if Tops had received what it considered a legitimate proposal to keep all its stores open and hire all 4,000-plus employees, it would have taken it.

"We have a responsibility to our employees and our landlords to sell the stores to someone who has a business plan, a track record" and financial backing to ensure the deal wouldn't fall through, Barrett said. "There was nobody who could do it, nobody who had a track record of operating even one store successfully."

Barrett's remarks came at a meeting Friday with U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who is raising antitrust questions about Tops' decision to sell 18 of the stores to its principal competitor, Giant Eagle Inc.

Kucinich said he knows of at least two groups that have offered to buy all 46 stores and honor existing union contracts. When he pulled out a letter dated Oct. 18 from a private equity fund, Retail Group Partners Inc. of Kennesaw, Ga., Barrett said that group submitted its bid 10 days after Tops announced the Giant Eagle deal.

Barrett also hand-delivered a letter to Kucinich from Max Henderson Jr., Tops' executive vice president and general manager, explaining Tops' decision to exit Northeast Ohio after years of declining sales.

DOJ_NMG_0084088

Barrett said Tops was increasingly being squeezed between mass discounters like Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and local competitors such as Marc's Deeper Discount Stores, Aldi, Save-A-Lot and Heinen's Fine Foods.

"The competition will become even more fierce as Wal-Mart moves forward with its planned Supercenter expansion into the area," Henderson wrote, referring to Wal-Mart's planned opening next year at the Steelyard Commons shopping center under construction in Cleveland. "Tops suffered considerably from the competitive environment, which contributed to declining sales. This, coupled with extremely high labor costs, made it impossible for Tops to continue to be operated in the area, especially in light of the oncoming onslaught from non-union operators, like Wal-Mart."

Barrett said "legacy labor contracts" in the Cleveland market meant it paid higher labor costs here than in its other union markets in New York, Boston and Washington, D.C. He said Tops couldn't afford to keep offering premium wages and benefits and compete with supermarkets that pay much lower salaries, offer fewer benefits and no pensions.

Tops watched its market share shrink and its net sales decline "in the double digits" in Northeast Ohio to the point where it had no alternative but to withdraw from the market, Henderson said.

Although Henderson did not directly address Kucinich's antitrust charges, he said the agreement to sell 18 stores to Giant Eagle "ensured that customers will have excellent stores in which to shop; has protected good jobs for the vast majority of employees . . . and has contributed to the ongoing economic well-being of the communities where these stores are located."

Barrett said Tops has 1,770 employees in the 18 stores Giant Eagle is buying, and Giant Eagle plans to hire 2,300 people, including butchers and bakers. He said Giant Eagle has received more than 3,000 applications from Tops employees for those jobs.

Tops aims to sell the remaining 28 stores to buyers who will keep the businesses as supermarkets and hire Tops employees.

"We're close to some agreements to get more stores sold," Barrett said.

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

jcho@plaind.com, 216-999-5069

States Battle Weyerhaeuser Argument (OREG)

By Dylan Rivera, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, October 21, 2006

Competition - The U.S. Supreme Court will hear the timber giant's appeal for a tighter test on predatory bids

The U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments next month about a ruling that Oregon and seven other states say is critical in stopping big companies from getting away with illegal monopolies in forest products, agriculture and high-tech goods.

Attorneys general from Oregon, California, Arizona, Iowa, Louisiana, Montana, West Virginia and Wisconsin recently submitted a court brief that comes down against an argument by Weyerhaeuser Co., the timber giant.

The case led to a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser, prompting settlements and judgments totaling about another $50 million.

The states did not explicitly support a 2003 Portland federal jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser had created an illegal monopoly in the market for alder sawlogs. But they wrote stridently against a tough new legal standard for antitrust plaintiffs that Weyerhaeuser is seeking. Rejection of Weyerhaeuser's argument and adoption of a more lenient one, the states wrote, could bar a single firm from dominating government timber auctions, protect small businesses and ensure competition for government contracts.

"It's always significant when a government body, especially a major government body, signs on in support of a private plaintiff," said Jack Kirkwood, an antitrust expert at Seattle University School of Law who has consulted for the case's plaintiffs. "The states represent a public interest that the private plaintiff may not."

The states' chiming in raises the profile of a case that was fought mostly in obscurity until the last year or so. In part, it caught little attention because it dealt with alder, a native Northwest hardwood species used in musical instruments and furniture. It is not nearly as widespread as softwood lumber, such as Douglas fir, used in home construction.

It also mainly affects instances in which one competitor has at least 55 percent market share, one of many prerequisites for antitrust concern.

The case has caught national attention as a rare antitrust case to make it to the nation's highest court. As with all cases before the Supreme Court, the Weyerhaeuser case could set a precedent governing business competition nationwide.

Other elements, legal and political, add to the interest. It will be among the first major antitrust cases to be decided by a court that includes Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, and so could point to their position on antitrust issues.

The Weyerhaeuser case also presents questions about business conduct in competition for supplies, what economists call "inputs," for industrial processes. Antitrust cases more commonly turn on whether a large company unfairly reduced prices to undermine competitors, with the aim of controlling a market and, in the long term, using that power to increase prices.

The New York Times editorial board, in a critique of Bush administration antitrust enforcement last week, cited the alder log case.

"Not only has the government failed to bring many significant cases, it is opposing one brought and won by a third party," the newspaper wrote.

Trial in Portland

In a federal trial in 2003 in Portland, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. of Longview, Wash., alleged that Weyerhaeuser's Portland-based hardwoods division unfairly forced Ross-Simmons out of business.

Weyerhaeuser officials crafted exclusive contracts that guaranteed it could buy logs from some of the Northwest's largest landowners, causing log shortages for competitors, Ross-Simmons alleged. Weyerhaeuser bought alder sawlogs, even when it didn't need them, in some cases letting the logs rot rather than letting them to go to competitors, Ross-Simmons said.

The timber giant established a dominant presence in the market for alder logs, and plaintiffs say internal Weyerhaeuser documents showed a long-term plan to use that presence to force down the price it paid for logs.

Weyerhaeuser has denied all allegations in the lawsuit. It has settled cases that used the Ross-Simmons case as a precedent.

The issue before the Supreme Court pivots on how juries should decide when a dominant company's purchasing practices constitute illegal "predatory bidding."

Two-part test

The court has a well-established test for "predatory pricing," a more common illegal strategy in which companies offer products for below-cost prices to pressure competitors. In a 1993 case called Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., the Supreme Court established that plaintiffs in predatory-pricing cases must meet a two-part test: They must show that a monopolist lost money by reducing prices and that it was likely to recoup its losses later by increasing prices.

Weyerhaeuser's attorneys say the Brooke Group test should apply to predatory bidding. But in the Ross-Simmons trial, they wrote, Judge Owen Panner used an unduly vague subjective test, like "throwing a marshmallow" at a jury.

Panner asked the jury to decide whether Weyerhaeuser bought more logs than it "needed" and whether it paid a higher price than "necessary" to prevent competitors from obtaining logs "at a fair price."

"Under the Ninth Circuit's wholly subjective rule, it is impossible for businesses to know what pricing decisions conform with the law," Weyerhaeuser wrote. "Firms accordingly will be forced to curb aggressive -- and desirable -- competitive bidding for fear of triggering unwarranted liability; and baseless litigation will be encouraged."

Other factors

The states attorneys general and Ross-Simmons' attorneys say the jury weighed more than just those few phrases, looking at Weyerhaeuser's dominance in the alder log market and evidence that the company intended to force competitors out of business.

The Brooke Group test is unworkable, the states argue. Monopolists could use other subsidiaries to offset losses in a given market so that they would not need to operate at a loss.

And, the states ask, what if the higher input cost is relatively small as a percentage of the product cost? Under that scenario, monopolists still could make profits while paying a much higher price for the input. And, if the input is essential to production of the end product, the increased price could cut off competitors and push them out of business.

Such a test would be too difficult for small companies to meet, the states wrote.

"You have a standard that we contend is not workable and will produce a lot of false negatives," said Emilio Varanini, deputy attorney general for California. "It will let a lot of people off who should not be getting off."

Varanini and Tim Nord, assistant attorney general for Oregon, co-wrote the states' brief, submitted Oct. 12.

Dylan Rivera: 503-221-8532, dylanrivera@news.oregonian.com

Feds Accuse Avaya In Antitrust Lawsuit (AP)

By LINDA A. JOHNSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, October 21, 2006

Communications company to appear at Nov. 14 hearing

TRENTON -- Business communications systems provider Avaya is accused in a federal antitrust lawsuit of illegally blocking competitors from providing maintenance and repairs to telephone equipment and software sold by Avaya.

Continuant of Fife, Wash., which operates a telephone system maintenance business throughout North America, said Wednesday that it countersued Bernards-based Avaya after the AT&T spinoff sued Continuant this summer.

The two parties are scheduled to appear in federal court in Trenton, where the two lawsuits were filed, for a hearing Nov. 14.

Avaya spokeswoman Lynn Newman declined to discuss the case.

Continuant's lawsuit asks the court to permanently bar Avaya "from continuing its anti-competitive conduct," including bundling service contracts with the sales of its telephones, cables and other telecom equipment, and keeping secret from competitors passwords necessary for maintaining the communications systems. Continuant also is seeking compensatory and punitive damages, legal fees and other costs.

"Avaya's the only company that has a policy like this," said Bruce Shelby, Continuant's vice president of sales.

"They say a customer doesn't have the right to access their system to perform maintenance."

Shelby said his company believes that is illegal and that Avaya is overcharging its customers for maintenance when its service level has declined because of a series of major layoffs.

Avaya filed suit against Continuant and two sister companies on June 5, accusing them of misappropriating trade secrets, interfering with contractual relations, misrepresentation, libel and other offenses.

Avaya later amended its complaint, and Continuant filed a countersuit on Aug. 21, but did not announce it until Wednesday.

Like other telecommunication equipment makers, Avaya has been trying to boost the continuing revenues that come from maintaining communication systems, rather than relying heavily on one-time sales. The company has been struggling with rising costs, falling profits and a depressed share price, culminating with the replacement of its president and chief executive, Donald K. Peterson, in July.

Update: Vista Security Discussions Off To Bad Start (IDG)

By Robert McMillan, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, October 21, 2006

Technical glitch keeps key security rivals from joining first online discussion of contentious Vista kernel seccurity

Security vendors looking to gain insight into Microsoft's plans for opening up the Vista operating system kernel were frustrated Thursday morning when a technical glitch kept many from joining the first online discussion of this issue.

"Oops," wrote Microsoft Senior Product Manager Stephen Toulouse in a blog posting on the subject. "We had a glitch where we sent out a messed up link. ... We're very sorry about that, it certainly was not intentional and we definitely see that was not a good thing for people to experience on such an important topic."

Microsoft set up the meeting to talk about how it plans to give security vendors access to Vista's kernel on 64-bit systems. This has been a contentious issue, as Microsoft had initially planned to lock software vendors such as Symantec and McAfee out of the kernel, claiming that this would make Vista more secure. The security vendors said this would harm their products, and Microsoft finally capitulated, after first being warned by European Union regulators.

DOJ_NMG_0084091

Microsoft rescheduled its Thursday morning Web conference after it realized it had sent out a bad LiveMeeting link to participants, but in the end some security vendors were shut out of the meeting.

Most of Symantec's team, for example, was unable to attend. "It turned out that everybody on our team was not able to make the first meeting but one guy," said Cris Paden, a Symantec spokesman.

Microsoft has set up a second meeting for later in the day Thursday to take questions from those who missed the first, Paden said. A further meeting is also planned for Monday, according to Toulouse.

Late Thursday, McAfee said there was "little indication" that Microsoft planned to live up to its promise, made late last week, to work with security vendors on several issues relating to Vista. "We have been greatly disappointed by the lack of action by the company so far and Microsoft has not lived up, either in detail or in spirit, to the hollow assurances offered by their top management," said Christopher Thomas, McAfee's outside legal counsel in Brussels, in a statement. Thomas is a partner with the Lovells law firm.

Sunbelt Software President Alex Eckelberry said that the mix-up was due to an honest mistake with Microsoft's conferencing software. "Someone at Microsoft accidentally sent out the LiveMeeting presentation invites as "presenter," which if you've ever used LiveMeeting, is an invitation to chaos," he said in a blog posting. "Realizing their error, the meeting was rescheduled for 30 minutes later, and that didn't all come together, because the meeting had been originally setup to end at 12:30, [Eastern time] so we were promptly all kicked off."

"While I have my disagreements with Microsoft on the PatchGuard issue, I must defend them in this instance," he added. "It was a case of a few honest mistakes made by well-intentioned people, probably working under a tremendous amount of stress."

Microsoft has said it expects to make new kernel APIs (application programming interfaces) for security products available as part of the first major, "service pack," update to Vista. Security vendors are pushing to have them included sooner.

Microsoft Partners Fume Over Vista Security Stance (AP)

By Jordan Robertson

AP, October 21, 2006

Microsoft Corp. is no stranger to antitrust skirmishes and complaints from competitors about unfair business practices.

But the latest fight over its upcoming Vista operating system pits Microsoft against an unlikely adversary: the security software vendors who are some of its most intimate partners in protecting its notoriously vulnerable systems from attacks.

As Vista's planned release nears, the company is facing a backlash from such vendors as Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc., which argue that even the concessions Microsoft recently made to appease European antitrust regulators won't do enough to help them best protect their customers.

"We've been talking to them for over two years on this issue," said Rowan Trollope, Symantec's vice president for consumer engineering. "And now (with) basically a very short amount of time before the operating system comes out, we're not in a good position to provide that security to our customers."

Ultimately, consumers will decide whether Microsoft's own security measures are adequate to combat increasingly sophisticated Internet threats and keep personal data safe from hackers and online criminals.

But the showdown also marks an important turning point in how computer users buy security software.

Microsoft now competes directly with Cupertino-based Symantec and Santa Clara-based McAfee with its own product, called OneCare, posing a substantial threat to vendors who have been vital to protecting generations of Microsoft operating systems.

European antitrust regulators have warned Microsoft not to shut out rivals in security software and other markets, and the European Union so far has fined the Redmond, Wash., company $970 million over the current flavor of Windows.

To quell EU concerns about Vista, Microsoft pledged to make key changes, but the vendors remain unsatisfied and have threatened antitrust lawsuits. McAfee issued a statement Thursday complaining of the company's failure to live up to "hollow assurances."

Industry analysts said Microsoft's new dual role could inadvertently make the operating system more vulnerable.

"Microsoft's priority should be simple: Fortify the operating system, make it secure, make it as impenetrable as possible, but work with the third parties," said Joe Wilcox, a senior analyst with Jupiter Research.

Vista will be Microsoft's first major upgrade to its flagship operating system since Windows XP's release in 2001. The company touts Vista's sleeker looks, improved search capabilities and simplified organization as key upgrades over previous systems.

But several key security changes prompted Symantec and McAfee officials to launch withering public attacks in recent weeks.

Executives accused Microsoft of unfairly promoting its own security software with a dashboard that couldn't be disabled by vendors. The company pledged technological information to turn off the feature, designed to help customers easily see what protections are switched on.

Vendors also howled over an icon on the welcome screen linking to Microsoft security products. Microsoft refused to remove the link but has vowed to link to other security companies.

The biggest - and currently unresolved - fight hinges on vendors' claims they have been locked out of access to the core, or kernel, of higher-end, 64-bit versions of Vista.

A new feature called PatchGuard is meant to protect the most sensitive information in the guts of the system. While blocking out hackers, PatchGuard also keeps out security vendors that have traditionally been allowed inside to retrieve necessary information.

Vendors said their products will thus lack advanced security features for 64-bit users (The 32-bit version that consumers are likely to get does not include PatchGuard and thus offers access to the disputed data).

Microsoft said the methods previously used were undocumented and unsupported and left the system less secure and less stable. Customers, the company said, demand better security.

The company has agreed to permit limited kernel access, but will not provide a "blanket exception" or turn off the feature entirely, said Stephen Toulouse, a senior program manager in Microsoft's Security Technology Unit.

"We did look at that, but we got consistent feedback that that wouldn't be a good option for the customer," he said. "We want to make clear that we will work with those vendors. It will take some time, but we're committed to making that happen."

Microsoft held online briefings with security vendors on Thursday to address their concerns, though technical difficulties booted some vendors out.

Security vendors said their engineers are going to have to scramble to update their software once the technical tools they need become available, which could be months away.

Vista begins shipping to computer manufacturers and larger businesses next month. Consumers should be able to buy the new operating system in January.

"We're turning blue holding our breath waiting for something to happen," McAfee chief scientist George Heron said in an interview. "And frankly so are the users. This is the 11th hour. Now is not the time to crack open the designs."

In the meantime, third-party vendors said their products will work but won't have maximum protection. Microsoft said its products will adhere to the same rules and won't have an unfair advantage.

Security experts said it's unclear whether Microsoft's stance on protecting the kernel will make Windows more secure, though it will likely challenge hackers to try to crack it.

"No matter how secure any operating system is, if it has been built by man, it can be broken by man," said Ken Dunham, director of the rapid response team at VeriSign Inc.'s iDefense Intelligence. "While it might be a major improvement, there is no silver bullet."

Vendors said customers are likely to agree.

"It's a little bit like the fox guarding the hen house," Symantec's Trollope said. "If Microsoft can control the ways that companies can innovate, if they can control the dialogue of security with the customer, you end up with a security monoculture. And that's unacceptable."

Gartner: Vista Antitrust Tweaks To Take Years (CNET)

By Joris Evers, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, October 21, 2006

Analyst firm says changes to the 64-bit version of the OS update could also cause compatibility trouble in the interim.

Antitrust related changes to security in Windows Vista 64-bit will take years to complete and will cause compatibility trouble in the interim, according to Gartner.

Users of security technologies such as host intrusion-prevention systems, or HIPS, should postpone buying 64-bit versions of Vista, Gartner analyst Neil MacDonald wrote in a research note published on Wednesday. MacDonald also noted that many integrated security products today include HIPS functionality.

"Recognize that many of these products will not deliver full functionality using 64-bit Vista," MacDonald wrote. "Do not plan for initial use of 64-bit Vista if you are using incompatible products for which no suitable alternative exists." People should ask their security vendor for Vista compatibility guarantees, he suggested.

In response to antitrust concerns from the European Commission, Microsoft last week said third-party security software will be able to interact with the kernel of 64-bit versions of Vista. Security companies had requested that capability, but Microsoft had denied it until it capitulated under pressure from regulators.

Security companies now have unfettered access to the core of 32-bit versions of Windows. But they complained that a kernel shield called PatchGuard in 64-bit versions of Vista, which is intended to stop hackers, blocks security products, too. 64-bit Windows is expected to eventually supplant 32-bit versions.

While Microsoft has promised to give its security rivals controlled access to the Vista kernel, the programming interfaces to do so still need to be developed.

"Our goal is to provide an initial set of documented, supported kernel interfaces in the Windows Vista SP1 (Service Pack 1) timeframe, recognizing that this will require collaboration from our industry partners," Ben Fathi, the outgoing corporate vice president of Microsoft's Security Technology Unit said in a statement late Thursday.

Gartner expects SP1 to be released in early 2008 and predicts that more programming interfaces related to the kernel will be delivered with SP2 or later. All these changes could have a negative effect on Vista, MacDonald wrote.

"Any kernel changes may have a 'ripple effect' up the software stack and will require retesting of all of Windows Vista applications," he wrote.

The timing is much to the dismay of some security companies, including McAfee. "Microsoft has not lived up, either in detail or in spirit, to the hollow assurances offered by their top management last week," Christopher Thomas, a partner at McAfee's Brussels-based law firm Lovells, said in a statement Thursday. Vista is scheduled for release to manufacturers in November and for sale to the public in January.

Access to the Vista kernel is one of two concessions Microsoft made. The Redmond, Wash., software giant has already provided security companies with a way to disable alerts sent out by the Windows Security Center, if their third-party protective software is installed.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Sunny Side Up (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

General Motors liked the idea of using the sun to power its buildings. But until recently, one immutable economic fact held G.M. back: The upfront costs were simply too high to justify the ultimate payoff.

G.M. is not alone. Even solar energy's biggest fans concede that the high investment costs have kept companies from pursuing what is arguably the cleanest, most renewable and least politically sensitive energy source around.

But now, G.M. and a small but growing number of other companies and municipalities are getting solar energy from systems installed by others. Even though the installations are right on their own roofs, they buy the electricity much as they would from a utility's grid. And because the companies that paid for the systems will get a steady income, they can provide power from the sun at competitive electricity rates.

DOJ_NMG_0084094

Since June, the roof of G.M.'s parts warehouse in Cucamonga, Calif., has been host to a photovoltaic array with the ability to generate as much as 1.5 million kilowatt hours of electricity a year. The installation, which G.M. expects will provide half of the building's electricity, cost G.M. nothing.

A solar developer called Developing Energy Efficient Roof Systems — commonly called Deers — bought the equipment with money it raised from private financiers. Deers and its investors own the cells; G.M. signed a long-term contract to purchase the solar-generated electricity from them, at a discount to the prevailing rate for electricity in the region.

These days, that rate is 9 cents to 10 cents a kilowatt hour; G.M. expects that the solar system will reduce its overall electricity costs by 10 percent a year.

"We assume the risk, because we know that companies like G.M. have budgets to buy electricity, not to spend millions of dollars generating it," said Jack P. DeLiddo, president of Deers.

G.M. is already negotiating with Deers to put a similar solar array on a warehouse in nearby Fontana. "The savings are small, but it's exciting to create such an environmentally sound project without any need to shell out capital," said Kamesh Gupta, manager of planning and programs for General Motors Energy and Utility Services, which purchases all the energy used by G.M.

Similar deals are cropping up elsewhere. Some specify that the users pay the solar developers a fixed rate for electricity, while others specify a fixed discount to the going rate.

Other factors are involved as well. The parties generally negotiate who will retain potential credits for reducing carbon emissions. When the developers and their backers keep the carbon abatement credits, they generally plan to sell them to companies that might otherwise have trouble complying with rules planned in California and expected elsewhere aimed at limiting global warming.

The electricity users could do that, too, but some of them might also use the credits to offset emissions from other parts of their operations.

But the same logic underpins all of the deals: The electricity users get a clean, reliable source of energy. The developers and their backers get an equally reliable return on their investment — which can be as high as $6,000 per kilowatt hour of capacity — as well as the tax credits and rebates that California and other states offer for renewable energy projects.

"Corporations like solar energy, but they would rather make sizable investments in their core businesses," said Craig Hanson, head of the Green Power Market Development Group, a consortium of large companies working under the auspices of the World Resources Institute to promote renewable energy. "But for the financiers, it's like buying the bond of a triple-A-rated company. It may not offer a 20 percent return, but it's a stable and secure investment."

The "solar services model," as Mr. Hanson calls the solar contracts, is drawing interest from a diverse group of companies and financiers.

Alcoa is negotiating with developers to put solar cells on a manufacturing plant, although it will not specify details. General Electric Energy Financial Services has installed solar roofs that provide half the electricity used by 23 San Diego schools.

Kevin Walsh, the G.E. unit's manager for renewable energy, said the company was installing another seven. "For a financier like us, it's a nice, steady stream of revenue with the risk virtually eliminated," Mr. Walsh said. His unit, he said, is negotiating with a "big box retailer" to install solar roofs on some of its stores.

Retailers, which normally operate with the kind of razor-thin margins that cannot support large capital investments on anything but the core business, have been particularly receptive to the solar services model.

Whole Foods Market, in a deal with SunEdison, a solar project manager financed by a group of investors that includes Goldman Sachs, has solar cells providing about 10 percent of the energy it uses in three stores and one warehouse, and plans many more. "There's just no downside," said Jennifer McDonnell, green mission specialist for Whole Foods.

Staples, which has two distribution centers in California that derive about 15 percent of their electricity from 280 kilowatt solar arrays installed by SunEdison, also plans new ones. It recently put a 120 kilowatt system on an office building in Englewood, N.J., and is planning a large solar array for a distribution center in Killingly, Conn.

DOJ_NMG_0084095

Mark Buckley, vice president for environmental affairs, said he had identified 140 stores that seemed to be prime candidates for similar installations.

"We are a frugal business with low margins, so we cannot justify the cost of a solar system," he said. "This way, we've got no capital investment, no operating expenses, and we're lowering our energy costs even as we reduce our carbon emissions. This is a true win-win."

That does not mean the deals are free of risk. They are not feasible in locations where the sun does not shine consistently through the year, or in states that do not offer tax incentives and rebates.

The economics do not work for the many industrial companies that have negotiated below-market electricity rates. Users must commit to buying a set amount of energy for at least 10 years.

Older buildings often have aged roofs that cannot support conventional photovoltaic cells (although Mr. Walsh of G.E. Energy Financial Services said his group used a technology that embedded the photovoltaic cells in a new, and removable, roof).

Companies must also persuade their own managements — or in the case of leased buildings, their landlords — to allow the installations. And, of course, the economics only make sense to people who think that prices for conventional energy will keep rising.

"We have an incentive to make sure the systems work well, because that's how we make our money," said Jigar Shah, who founded SunEdison in 2003 and is generally thought to have pioneered the solar services model. "But let's face it, we are putting a hole in their roof, so they have to trust we can do it properly. And if you think electricity rates will go down, these long-term contracts don't look good."

But few economists are predicting that electricity rates will plummet. And, even if they do, solar energy would still appeal to companies worried about carbon emissions and looking at ways to improve their public image.

"The energy is clean, and the fixed-price agreement doesn't fluctuate," Ms. McDonnell of Whole Foods said. "Seeing whether solar would work is now on our check list for every one of our new stores."

Future Forecast: Extreme Weather (WP/AP)

By Seth Borenstein

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The world -- especially the Western United States, the Mediterranean region and Brazil -- is likely to suffer more extended droughts, heavy rainfalls and longer heat waves over the next century because of global warming, a new study forecasts.

But the prediction of a future of nasty extreme weather also includes fewer freezes and a longer growing season.

In a preview of a major international multiyear report on climate change that comes out next year, a study from the National Center for Atmospheric Research details what nine of the world's top computer models predict for the lurching of climate at its most extreme.

"It's going to be a wild ride, especially for specific regions," said the study's lead author, Claudia Tebaldi, a scientist at the federally funded academic research center.

Tebaldi pointed to the Western United States, Mediterranean nations and Brazil as "hot spots" that will get extremes at their worst, according to the computer models.

Some places, such as the Pacific Northwest, are predicted to get a strange double whammy of longer dry spells punctuated by heavier rainfall.

As the world warms, there is likely to be more rain in the tropical Pacific Ocean, and that will change the airflow for certain areas, in much the same way that El NiÃ±o weather oscillations now do, said the study's co-author, Gerald Meehl, a top computer modeler at the research center. Those changes will affect the Western United States, Australia and Brazil, even though it's on South America's eastern coast.

For the Mediterranean, the issue has more to do with rainfall in the tropical Atlantic Ocean changing air currents, he said.

"Extreme events are the kinds of things that have the biggest impacts, not only on humans but on mammals and ecosystems," Meehl said. The study, to be published in the December issue of the peer-reviewed journal Climatic Change, "gives us stronger and more compelling evidence that these changes in extremes are more likely," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0084096

The researchers took 10 international agreed-upon indexes that measure climate extremes -- five that deal with temperature and five with precipitation -- and ran computer models for the world through 2099. What Tebaldi called the scariest results had to do with heat waves and warm nights. Everything about heat waves -- their intensity, length and occurrence -- worsens.

"The changes are very significant there," Tebaldi said. "It's enough to say we're in for a bad future."

The Population Boon (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

"How will we house the next hundred million Americans? . . . How will we educate and employ such a large number of people? How will we provide adequate health care when our population reaches 300 million?"

-- President Richard Nixon, 1969

President Nixon didn't live to see his questions answered, but this week the U.S. population surpassed the 300 million mark. And surprisingly, given the tenor of the reaction to the last hectomillion milestone, reached in 1967, the 300 millionth American was not greeted with the same wailing and gnashing of teeth as the 200 millionth. Call it progress.

Around the time the country's population hit 200 million, biologist Paul Ehrlich, always good for a bit of doom and gloom, compared "America's pride in her growing population . . . to a cancer patient's pride in his expanding tumor," according to Time magazine. Stewart Udall, a former Secretary of the Interior, thought 100 million sounded like a better number than 200 million. Messrs. Ehrlich and Udall are still among our 300 million, but their population bomb has conspicuously failed to explode, which may go some way toward explaining why, in the popular imagination at least, this week's milestone did not prompt widespread anxiety about the future.

HOT TOPIC

The United States: 300 Million and Growing1

In Japan and Western Europe, population implosion has become the crisis of the moment. Birth rates in most Western European countries are now so low that governments are busily looking for ways to avoid a very different kind of demographic catastrophe. The problem posed by Europe's aging population is exacerbated by its reliance on intergenerational transfer payments to support its public pension systems; America, with both a greater emphasis on wealth accumulation and a higher birth rate, is comparatively better off. Demographics and Social Security are on a collision course here as well, but Europe's difficulties in this regard make America seem fortunate by comparison.

China, thanks to its draconian one-child policy, also faces a demographic challenge, embodied in the oft-heard refrain that the Middle Kingdom risks becoming the first country ever to grow old before it grows rich. Population-control measures have resulted in a shortage of women and girls, one of many unintended consequences of the population-control hysteria of the 1960s and 1970s.

At bottom, the debate over population revolves around a single question: Are human beings a burden, or a resource? The former view is embodied by the Ehrlich and Nixon quotes above. More bodies mean more mouths to feed, house and provide for. At a certain point, in this perspective, you run out of stuff.

The latter view holds that people don't just consume things. They make them too. More bodies mean more minds, more innovation, more dynamism and more progress. The history of the world as America went from 100 million or 200 million to 300 million lends a lot more support to the humans-as-resource view than the humans-as-burden view. In the middle of the last century, the fathers of the population-control school of thought warned darkly that when world population reached seven billion, the "carrying capacity" of the planet would be reached. Mass starvation and political upheaval would be the inevitable result. Well, we're getting right up there, but the bread lines are getting shorter, not longer.

Simply put, the reason is prosperity. For decades, economic growth has easily outstripped population growth, giving the U.S., and much of the rest of the world, both more people and more prosperity, something presumed to be impossible by the Malthusians. Meanwhile, the slowdown in population growth brings a whole new set of challenges. To meet them, America and the world will need more minds generating new ideas. Four hundred million, here we come.

Court Limits U.S. Authority At Casinos (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0084097

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

The federal government can't make rules for the ways Las Vegas-style games are played at Indian casinos, an appeals court ruled Friday in a blow to efforts to regulate the booming, $22 billion tribal gambling industry.

The decision by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit arises from a dispute in Arizona between the Colorado River Indian Tribes and the National Indian Gaming Commission, the federal agency that oversees Indian casinos.

The commission tried in 2001 to audit the tribe's casino in Parker, Ariz., to ensure compliance with recently enacted federal standards for how games like blackjack and slot machines are run. The tribe objected, contending the commission was overstepping its authority under the National Indian Gaming Regulatory Act.

A federal district court sided with the tribe, and the appeals court agreed in an 11-page ruling. While federal law gives the gaming commission some authority over games like lotto and bingo on Indian land, the big moneymakers like blackjack and slots — classified as "Class III" games — are outside the commission's jurisdiction, said the ruling written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph.

"What is the statutory basis empowering the commission to regulate Class III gaming operations?" the ruling asked. "Finding none, we affirm" the lower court's decision.

Tribes can open Las Vegas-style casinos only after they sign a "compact" with their state's governor, and the court asserted there was no federal role in regulating the game-playing.

Tribal gambling has grown explosively since Congress established the legal framework for it in 1988, and there are now more than 400 Indian gambling facilities operated by 223 Indian tribes in 28 states.

With the growth have come conflicts as tribes have asserted their sovereignty as independent governments. Local and state governments have sought to sketch out some authority, and the federal government increasingly has attempted to regulate aspects of Indian gambling from labor to slot machine standards.

The National Indian Gaming Association welcomed the ruling as a victory for tribal sovereignty.

"Today, the federal court of appeals told us what Indian tribes always knew — it is not the NIGCs job to establish federal regulations that override the sovereign decisions of tribes and states made through Class III gaming compacts," the association's chairman, Ernest Stevens, Jr., said in a statement.

Officials with the National Indian Gaming Commission did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

___

On the Net:

The court: http://www.cadc.uscourts.gov/internet/internet.nsf

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Plead Guilty To Gun Trafficking Charges (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 21, 2006

Flea market dealers will be sentenced in Jan. to federal prison

Move over, Wal-Mart. Forget about it, Bass Pro Shops.

When it comes to peddling guns, these guys had a sales pitch the big retail boys just can't match - low prices and no questions asked.

There was only one hitch in the business plan for gun salesmen George Manus, 71, and Timothy Cobb, 49. It was illegal.

Now, this pair of flea market dealers is headed to federal prison.

Manus and Cobb pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court earlier this week to gun trafficking charges and face sentencing in January.

DOJ_NMG_0084098

In paperwork prepared as part of their pleas, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tracee Plowell described a profitable gun peddling business where the only thing that mattered was cash.

"Manus told (a police snitch) that he doesn't care so long as he gets his money out of it," Plowell wrote.

Manus and Cobb were nabbed as part of a U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives probe. It isn't the first time the ATF has gone after flea market gun dealers. The agency headed a roundup of more than a dozen unlicensed dealers in 2002.

But that case turned out to be a bit of a public relations nightmare for the ATF because many of the gun peddlers were gray-haired retirees with clean records who insisted they had no idea selling a few guns in their personal collections was a crime.

This go-around, the ATF built cases against Manus and Cobb that left little room for a casual-sales defense.

Plowell wrote that the agency used snitches to buy lots and lots of guns from the pair.

Cobb once met a snitch in the parking lot of a fast-food restaurant on Tazewell Pike to seal a deal, but most of the gun sales at issue in the case occurred at what has been identified as the 407 Flea Market in Sevier County.

The snitches made sure to tell Cobb and Manus they were criminals barred from owning or buying guns. One snitch made it clear he sold marijuana. Cobb and Manus made it equally clear they didn't care so long as the snitches masquerading as customers had cash.

Cobb and Manus also told the informants that the guns they were peddling were not part of their private stashes, Plowell wrote. Instead, the pair said they bought guns to resale at a profit, she wrote.

Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Limits On Aide In Leak Case Are Protested By Democrat (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The senior Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee yesterday sharply protested the chairman's decision to suspend a Democratic staff member's access to classified information in a leak inquiry.

The congresswoman, Jane Harman of California, called the action a groundless act of political retaliation.

Ms. Harman's complaint to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan, involved his internal investigation of the possible source of an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists.

Ms. Harman said she was appalled by Mr. Hoekstra's move against the staff member, Larry Hanauer.

"There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong," she said in a statement.

Ms. Harman said Mr. Hoekstra had admitted to her that his action against Mr. Hanauer was payback for her release on Tuesday of a report on actions by former Representative Randy Cunningham while he was on the Intelligence Committee. Mr. Cunningham, a California Republican, is serving an eight-year prison sentence for taking bribes.

"If you have a problem with me, why not deal with me directly?" Ms. Harman asked Mr. Hoekstra in a letter sent on Wednesday.

In his response sent yesterday, Mr. Hoekstra said he felt obliged to investigate the question. "This is an issue of national security," he wrote, inviting Ms. Harman to help decide how to conduct the inquiry.

The mutual accusations deepened the partisan tensions that have repeatedly gridlocked the House committee and its Senate counterpart for two years, a period of intense debate on intelligence policies.

On Tuesday, acting at the suggestion of another panel member, Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, Mr. Hoekstra banned Mr. Hanauer, the staff member, from the committee's high-security offices and from access to classified documents.

DOJ_NMG_0084099

Mr. LaHood said Mr. Hanauer had requested a copy of the National Intelligence Estimate and received it two days before the article in The Times appeared on the Web.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. LaHood conceded he had no evidence of a leak beyond the coincidence of timing.

"But some of us think it's more than a coincidence," he said.

Democrats on the committee and a lawyer for Mr. Hanauer said Mr. LaHood's sleuthing was off base.

Representative John F. Tierney, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in an interview that he requested a copy of the National Intelligence Estimate last month after The Times had called his office. When a committee security officer could not immediately locate it, Mr. Hanauer requested the document from the office of the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, and a copy was delivered.

"I didn't talk to The New York Times, and I don't think he did either," Mr. Tierney said of Mr. Hanauer. "I want the committee to clear his name as soon as possible."

Mr. Hanauer's lawyer, Jonathan Turley, said his client had nothing to do with any leak of the intelligence estimate and would offer a sworn statement to that effect. Mr. Turley said Mr. Hanauer was collateral damage in a pre-election squabble.

"He simply got the document and gave it to a member," the lawyer said.

Mr. Hanauer, who joined the committee staff last year after working for the Defense Department and the Booz Allen Hamilton, the consulting firm, remains on the panel payroll and retains his security clearance.

The estimate on terrorism had a relatively low-level classification, "secret," and was made available in May to hundreds of people in multiple agencies and Congressional committees. The Times has previously reported that its article about the estimate was based on interviews with more than 10 officials and outside experts.

The dispute on the panel appears to result from the argument over the report on Mr. Cunningham, which Michael Stern, a special counsel appointed jointly by Mr. Hoekstra and Ms. Harman, wrote. That report found that Mr. Cunningham had used his committee position to help steer $70 million in contracts to favored companies.

On Tuesday, when Ms. Harman released an unclassified summary of the counsel's report, Mr. Hoekstra called that "disturbing and beyond the pale." He wrote to Ms. Harman on Tuesday that he had suspended Mr. Hanauer, implicitly linking her releasing the report on Mr. Cunningham to the reported leak.

"It has become clear to me by your continuing and unauthorized release of information received and maintained by the committee," Mr. Hoekstra wrote, "that the Democrats are not willing to protect committee information."

Suspecting Leak, Chairman Suspends Panel Staffer (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The Republican chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence suspended a mid-level Democratic staffer Tuesday based on a suspicion that he may have been connected to the leak of a politically damaging intelligence report almost a month ago, according to Republican and Democratic congressional sources.

The action by Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), which has drawn sharp criticism from Democratic panel members, was described by legislators of both parties as another example of the increased partisan infighting that has damaged the workings of the intelligence panel during this election year.

"The chairman's unilateral action is without basis and an abuse of his power to provide security accesses," Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), ranking Democrat on the panel, said yesterday. "There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong," she added.

Late yesterday, Washington lawyer Jonathan Turley sent a letter to Hoekstra and Harman saying he represented the staff member involved, Larry Hanauer, whose name had been leaked to the media. Turley wrote that he wanted an expedited review of his client's role "to clear his name at the earliest possible date." He said there was "not a single scintilla of evidence suggesting that Mr. Hanauer had any role in the leaking of the NIE," or National Intelligence Estimate, and that he was drafting a sworn statement to that effect.

DOJ_NMG_0084100

Adding to the political overtones, several Republican lawmakers issued news releases yesterday condemning leaks and praising Hoekstra -- including House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio), House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.).

The initial accusation against Hanauer was made to Hoekstra more than three weeks ago in a letter from Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a committee member. The charge was based on a "coincidence" that the Democratic staffer obtained the document, at the request of a member, two days before stories about its contents were published. "I have no credible information to say any classified information was leaked from the committee's minority staff. . . . This may in fact be only coincidence and simply 'look bad,' " LaHood said in his letter, but he requested a formal inquiry.

LaHood defended his letter in a telephone interview yesterday. "Why was there this coincidence? . . . That's what the investigation should be about," he said.

LaHood also linked Hoekstra's decision to suspend the staff member on Tuesday to Harman's unilateral release that day of the summary of a special counsel's report about how former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) manipulated the committee to benefit contractors who had bribed him.

"We are in the political season. . . . If the ranking member wants to play politics," LaHood told Fox News yesterday, referring to Harman, "there are some of us on the other side that can play politics, and I'm not afraid to do it."

Yesterday, Hoekstra sent a letter to Harman saying he thought the suspension was necessary "given the current 'zero tolerance' atmosphere for any indication . . . that suggests the potential for wrongdoing." He also referred to the coincidence of timing as a "red flag" suggesting a leak of classified information. The special counsel's report criticized the committee for failing to act on "red flags" about Cunningham.

Three days earlier, on the day of the suspension, Hoekstra wrote Harman that he had "thought carefully about this and have come to the conclusion that I cannot assume that this was mere coincidence." Hoekstra added that the staffer "could have been involved in, or confirmed the leak of, the classified NIE information."

At issue is the leak of selected contents, harmful to the Bush administration, from a classified April 2006 National Intelligence Estimate titled "Trends of Global Terrorism." The New York Times first published a story about the NIE, with the headline "Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat," on Sept. 23 on its Web site and again in its Sept. 24 print edition.

Intelligence community sources, speaking anonymously because the NIE remains classified, have told The Washington Post that Times reporters were asking questions about the contents of that NIE weeks before publication of the story. In his story, Times reporter Mark Mazzetti wrote that over the weeks he had interviewed "a dozen United States government officials and outside experts . . . for this article." He added that all "had either seen the final version of the document or participated in the creation of earlier drafts."

Three days before publication of the Times story, on Sept. 20, Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), a member of the intelligence panel, received a media inquiry about the NIE, according to a statement his office released yesterday. Tierney said yesterday that he knew nothing about it but called over to the Democratic staff and asked whether such a report had been received. The staff member talked to the committee security officer, who said such reports had not been put on an internal, secure Web site because of technical problems, according to a committee staff member who asked not to be identified.

Hanauer and the security officer called the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, which had produced the NIE, and a copy of the secret document was delivered the next day, Sept. 21. The staff member took a hard copy to Tierney, and the committee security officer scanned it into the panel's classified Web site, making it available to all committee members. Tierney said that after he read it and saw it was classified he refused to discuss it with reporters.

"I don't know why they came down on this fellow," Tierney said.

Democratic Aide's Access To Intelligence Is Cut Off (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084101

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the House Intelligence Committee has suspended a Democratic aide's access to classified materials, citing concerns the staffer might have leaked parts of an intelligence assessment on terrorism to the media.

The highly unusual move drew sharp protest from the panel's ranking Democrat, Jane Harman of Venice, who said in a statement Friday, "There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong."

With an election in less than three weeks that could swing control of Congress, the exchange reflects a major deterioration in relations on a committee that traditionally has sought to avoid partisan clashes. One congressional official said the committee was in "meltdown."

Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) said he suspended the aide's access to secret intelligence documents after learning that the employee had requested a copy of a high-level intelligence estimate days before details of the document showed up in the press.

In a letter to Harman released by Hoekstra's office Friday, Hoekstra said, "I cannot assume that this was mere coincidence."

The aide was identified by other congressional officials as Larry Hanauer. The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of a pending investigation into the leak, said Hanauer had held positions with the departments of Defense and Homeland Security before joining the professional staff of Democrats on the House intelligence panel about two years ago.

A spokesman for Harman said Hanauer was not available to comment. His attorney, Jonathan Turley, expressed anger that Hanauer was named in news reports Friday and said there was no evidence the aide leaked the intelligence report.

Turley wrote to committee leaders, "When a staffer can become fodder for politics in this way, it discourages qualified people from seeking to join public service."

Other Democratic aides said Hanauer was familiar with rules surrounding classified materials and said they were skeptical he would leak information.

The document he requested — on behalf of committee member John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), according to Turley — was a National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism trends that suggested the Iraq war had exacerbated terrorism. Disclosure of the analysis last month was a political embarrassment to the Bush administration.

The analysis was disseminated to government officials and multiple congressional committees months before some of its findings were reported Sept. 24 in the Los Angeles Times and New York Times.

Hoekstra's suspension of Hanauer's access was the latest in a series of showdowns between the committee's senior members. Hoekstra was angered earlier this week when Harman publicly released an unclassified summary of an internal committee investigation into abuses by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who served on the panel and is now in prison for taking bribes.

In his letter to Harman, dated Tuesday, Hoekstra alluded to the release of the Cunningham report and said he had suspended Hanauer's access in part because he was concerned that "Democrats are not willing to protect committee information." Hoekstra said Hanauer's suspension would remain in effect until a panel investigation of the Iraq analysis' leak was complete.

Writing to Hoekstra on Wednesday, Harman said the suspension of Hanauer was "in retaliation for my decision to release an unclassified summary" of the Cunningham probe.

"If you have a problem with me, why not deal with me directly?" she wrote.

A Democratic aide familiar with the Hanauer matter agreed: "He didn't do anything. He is a pawn in a retribution."

An aide to Harman said Hanauer remained on the committee payroll, working outside the main committee offices on unclassified matters.

Democrats Back Staffer Suspended Over Iraq Leak (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, October 21, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Democrats say the Republican head of the House intelligence committee had no grounds to suspend a staff member who has come under scrutiny for the leak of a secret intelligence assessment.

The unidentified staff member, a Democrat, was suspended this week by Chairman Peter Hoekstra and is being denied access to classified information pending the outcome of a review. Mr. Hoekstra yesterday said the step was the least aggressive he could take while the committee investigates.

The Michigan Republican said the committee aide will be interviewed and other information will be collected. That could include correspondence, phone records and interviews with people who interacted with the aide.

For now, Mr. Hoekstra said, he has not involved the FBI, which would normally handle investigations into leaks of classified material.

"We ought to be able to resolve this very, very quickly," he said.

The House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence's top Democrat, Jane Harman of California, said Mr. Hoekstra's "action is without basis and an abuse of his power" in overseeing security access.

"There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong," she said. She depicted Mr. Hoekstra's move as political payback, saying the chairman was angry that Mrs. Harman had released a report about a former Republican congressman jailed for taking bribes.

The leak to the New York Times of a National Intelligence Estimate on global terror trends caused a political uproar last month. In the assessment, completed in April, analysts from the government's 16 spy agencies concluded that the Iraq war has become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists, breeding deep resentment of the United States.

President Bush, who suggested the document was leaked for "political purposes" weeks before the midterm elections, later made public four pages of the estimate's key findings.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday would not discuss whether the Justice Department is investigating who leaked the information about the intelligence assessment. But he described the government as "concerned about the disclosure of classified information, particularly during a time of war."

"Certain kinds of information are protected by law and should remain so," he said.

In a letter to Mr. Hoekstra dated Sept. 29, Rep. Ray LaHood, Illinois Republican, a committee member, said the Democratic staffer requested the document from Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte three days before a Sept. 23 story by the Times on its conclusions.

"I have no credible information to say any classified information was leaked from the committee's minority staff, but the implications of such would be dramatic," Mr. LaHood said in the letter, a copy of which was obtained by the Associated Press. "This may, in fact, be only coincidence, and simply 'look bad.' But coincidence, in this town, is rare."

A conference call to the committee's nine Democrats on Wednesday to inform them of the aide's suspension prompted outrage, said two congressional officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about internal committee business.

The officials said that the National Intelligence Estimate was marked "secret," rather than "top secret" or another more restrictive classification. Mrs. Harman said thousands of people across government would have had access to it, and noted the assessment was also posted on the committee's internal Web site days before the story was published.

Mr. Hoekstra said he does not think that any committee Republicans had access to the intelligence assessment before it was leaked, citing a computer malfunction that prevented committee members and staff from realizing it had been transmitted to them.

"We are pretty confident that the number of people on the committee who had access to this report is very, very limited," he said.

Bush Urges GOP On Medicare Drug Benefit (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, October 21, 2006

President Bush said Friday that Republicans are missing an opportunity if they're not talking up the Medicare drug benefit while campaigning this election season.

"I think this is a fantastic program, but more importantly, so do the seniors," he said in an interview with The Associated Press.

The drug program was rife with problems at the outset, but reports indicate that in recent months it has been operating smoothly. The administration estimates that the average elderly or disabled person will save about $1,100 annually on medicine.

Polls indicate that most participants are satisfied.

"My own view is our candidates and the people who voted for this ought to be out there traveling to senior centers all over their districts and their state saying, 'Look what we did,'" Bush said.

Democrats, however, say revising the plan would be a first order of business if they regain control of Congress.

The program allows seniors and the disabled to enroll in private plans that negotiate drug prices with manufacturers. The program is subsidized by the federal government and is expected to cost taxpayers about $30 billion this year.

Democratic lawmakers say the government should do the price negotiations, using its considerable purchasing power to lower the cost for seniors. Also, many Democrats would like to simplify the program by letting the government administer a plan instead of relying on dozens of private insurers.

Seniors would flock to the government-administered plan, Democrats say, because it would more closely resemble how they use Medicare to pay for visits to the family doctor.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., promises that Democrats would move quickly to give the secretary of health and human services negotiation powers, similar to the way the Veterans Affairs Department negotiates prices for the drugs that it covers.

"As pharmaceutical companies reap record profits, it's clear the president's flawed prescription drug plan is working better for drug companies than it is for America's seniors," Pelosi said Friday. "It is no wonder that the Republican prescription drug bill actually bars Medicare from negotiating lower drug prices for seniors."

But the president said that he likes having dozens of private insurance plans competing for business — that the competition leads to better prices and service.

"There is a fundamental disagreement and that is: Who should be making decisions for consumers?" Bush said. "Obviously there's a group of folks that feel like the government can do a better job than the consumers themselves. We strongly believe that empowering consumers is the appropriate way to promote quality in health care."

"As a matter of fact, we will resist any changes to weaken the program."

Bush participated in a small roundtable on the drug benefit with a couple from Springfield, Va., pharmacy representatives, a caregiver who helped her aunt enroll and the administrator of a non-profit agency that helps low-income beneficiaries enroll.

Karen Smith, a pharmacist in Washington, told Bush that she believes the program has helped many of her customers.

"I would actually have customers who could only buy five pills at a time because of the cost of their medication. Since Medicare, I don't see that any more," Smith said.

Dr. William "Barker" Hardison and his wife Lois estimated they had saved about $1,700 through September on the cost of their medicine. The rate of savings will decline because Lois is now in the coverage gap known as the doughnut hole. Still, the couple estimated they will have save about $2,000 for the year.

"There's been a doughnut hole forever. It just used to start at zero," Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said.

Bush asked Medicare officials about 630,000 seniors and disabled people who were recently notified that they would not be considered dual-eligibles, which means they would not be automatically enrolled in a plan that covers virtually all of their prescriptions for almost no cost.

Leslie Norwalk, the acting administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, told Bush that the people will remain in the plans they are currently enrolled in. But if they want extra help in paying for their medicine, as they receive now, they need to apply for the low-income subsidy.

The Kaiser Family Foundation says its polling shows more than eight in 10 seniors who are enrolled in a Medicare drug plan are satisfied, although almost two in 10 say they have encountered a major problem in using it.

Michael Gerson Mr. Compassionate Conservatism (WSJ)

By Naomi Schaefer Riley

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Amid the cut and thrust of the midterm elections, two questions have frothed up within the recesses of the GOP -- almost as an arcane distraction from the squalid business of holding on to House and Senate: Has compassionate conservatism worked? And should Republicans try it again?

Former House Majority Leader Dick Armey has made his position plain. In a recent open letter from his organization, Freedomworks, he assailed some leaders of the religious right, suggesting that if Republicans lose in November it would be because they have abandoned the principle of limited government in favor of embracing government for supposedly conservative ends. Meanwhile, David Kuo, former deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, has complained in recent interviews and op-eds that the biggest promises of compassionate conservatism, especially the support of faith-based initiatives, have been broken.

Perhaps the best person to sort out this business is Michael Gerson, George W. Bush's chief speechwriter from the beginning of his presidential campaign through the end of his first term, and then White House senior policy adviser until June. Now a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, Mr. Gerson is plotting a book about the future of conservatism. He has been giving a lot of thought to its history.

Known around the White House as "Mr. Compassionate Conservatism," Mr. Gerson tells me: "I think it's a political truth that one reason we won the 2000 election was that Republicans finally had a message on education and welfare. In 2008, they will have to have something other than a simplistic antigovernment message." In Mr. Gerson's view, "compassionate conservatism is the theory that the government should encourage the effective provision of social services without providing the service itself." It was, in effect, a conservative twofer: limiting the scope of government and empowering faith-based institutions by entrusting to the latter services that had traditionally been performed by the former. Or so the thinking went. * * *

We're in the sparsely decorated living room of Mr. Gerson's modest Alexandria home. An unassuming man who sits on the edge of his seat and nervously shakes his legs, he is regarded by people on both sides of the aisle as one of the most influential modern speechwriters. His rhetoric, they say, didn't just describe the president's policies, it helped shape them.

Mr. Gerson acknowledges that the antigovernment impulse "has a lot of intellectual energy" and has produced some "very healthy institutions and smart people with important policy prescriptions." But he is more interested in the strain of conservatism that is drawn from Catholic social thought, which stresses that human beings are responsible for others' welfare, and that the functions of society ought to be performed by the most local authority possible.

Yet Mr. Gerson is an evangelical, not a Catholic. And before being hired by the president, he worked for two other prominent evangelicals, both of whom he counts among the pioneers of compassionate conservatism: Prison Fellowship founder Chuck Colson and Sen. Dan Coats of Indiana. Mr. Colson plucked Mr. Gerson from Wheaton College (Billy Graham's alma mater) in 1986, where he studied theology. Wheaton has no Catholics on its faculty, but has led an intellectual charge to get evangelicals to think more about Catholic teachings. "It's almost a shame to say," Mr. Gerson laments, "but evangelicalism doesn't have that rich a tradition, and so you look for other sources that represent an authentic Christian witness in society."

Mr. Gerson's debt to Catholic teachings is also apparent on issues such as immigration. I asked him why, when most religious groups lined up this year to support the president's immigration proposals, evangelicals were noticeably absent. "There has been a significant history of Catholic reflection on immigration," Mr. Gerson says. He believes that a more "conspicuously global church" like the Catholic one is more likely to realize "that human beings in every culture and across every border have a radical equality before God." He also believes that evangelicals (and many secular Republicans) have succumbed "to one of the traditional temptations of conservatism": defining our national identity in terms of culture instead of ideals.

Mr. Gerson sees this temptation "reflected in our argument about democracy in the Middle East." Must there be a "democratic culture" before one can have a democracy? Mr. Gerson says that democracy took hold despite Confucianism in Asia, Catholicism in southern Europe and Orthodoxy in Eastern Europe. "All of these," Mr. Gerson notes, "were regarded as cultural impediments to democratic progress. In fact our ideals, the ideals of freedom, turned out to be more appealing than we thought." Mr. Gerson is confident that the same will prove true in Iraq and Afghanistan. "I have a deep belief that liberty improves human life. . . . People eventually find that to be true, but that doesn't mean they immediately find it to be true."

DOJ_NMG_0084105

Mr. Gerson looks back on the last few years of trying to spread freedom as "a time of exhausting international engagement on a variety of fronts." And he doesn't see it ending any time soon. But if the war on terror is really going to occupy our focus for the foreseeable future, why should Republicans run on improving education and ending poverty? Did 9/11 spell the end of compassionate conservatism?

Mr. Gerson believes the answer is no; the administration's foreign policy, he says, represents an expansion of the philosophy of compassionate conservatism. Bringing freedom and democracy to other parts of the globe has required military action, but Mr. Gerson is annoyed by Mr. Bush's critics on the left who say the president only uses force to solve global problems. "The administration's increases in foreign assistance have percentage-wise been the largest since the Marshall Plan," he notes.

He is more defensive, though, when it comes to domestic spending. Mr. Gerson justifies the ballooning federal budget in two ways. First, he notes that a lot of the spending has been on security: "I think it's largely and unfairly ignored that much of the spending increases that have occurred took place in the first term as a reaction to 9/11."

But Mr. Gerson also acknowledges that "there is a genuine argument about the role of government that is going on." And he asserts that the president has been nothing if not honest about where he comes down in that argument. "It should not have surprised anyone that President Bush was going to sign on to the Medicare prescription-drug benefit because he campaigned on it in 1999. And it should not have surprised anyone that he was going to define a federal role in education to raise standards because it was one of his main promises as a candidate."

Other proposals, though, like Social Security reform, which would have appeased the party's more libertarian wing, have fallen by the wayside. He suggests that the country's polarization is a significant part of the problem. The war has contributed to this embittered atmosphere, but Mr. Gerson believes that religious divisions in this country are also a factor. "I think religion raises the temperature of a lot of debates, and it becomes a cultural clash." He blames the religious right for "taking Republican policy prescriptions and baptizing them -- making them into requirements of conscience."

Of course, this "baptizing" has helped Republicans, not least the president, to garner votes. But he also observes "an abdication on the part of the Democratic Party, [which has] an almost active hostility to people of faith and religiously informed reasoning in public debate."

As a young man -- I picture a slightly more awkward and more agitated version of the one sitting before me -- Mr. Gerson was a fan of Jimmy Carter, but he broke ranks over abortion. Still, he believes that Democrats could win back religious folks some day. "There was a time in American history not too long ago where the most prominent evangelical was also the leading Democrat in the country. [William Jennings Bryan] didn't see any inconsistency in those things and I don't, to some extent."

Whatever its benefits for the Republicans, Mr. Gerson believes it is "unhealthy" that one party is secular and one party is religious. "My view" he tells me, "is summarized by Martin Luther King, Jr., who said that the church should not be the master of the state, or the servant of the state. It should be the conscience of the state."

He believes that conscience is especially needed for bioethical questions. He compares the utilitarian arguments of the president's critics -- "they believe that medical research should proceed with very few limits because it will benefit many people" -- with the supporters of popular sovereignty during Lincoln's time. "Yes we're a democracy," he acknowledges, "but we're a democracy that believes all men are created equal and endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights."

Mr. Gerson punctuates his speech, the way he punctuated the president's speeches, with biblical references, and he has been accused of making the president speak in a kind of religious code -- indeed, Mr. Kuo recently suggested this. But Mr. Gerson says he isn't trying to hide anything and there are "tens of millions of people" for whom references to the Bible are "very familiar." * * *

But the president's rhetoric has come under fire from the right as well. After the second inaugural, this newspaper's Peggy Noonan criticized what she saw as the president's utopianism: "Tyranny," she wrote, "is a very bad thing and quite wicked, but one doesn't expect we're going to eradicate it any time soon. Again, this is not heaven, it's earth." Mr. Gerson again has little patience for this argument: "There is always tension between the ideals of rhetoric and the messy circumstances of the world." But he argues, as our conversation reaches crescendo, "I have no idea why that would argue that you give up on setting out the ideals."

DOJ_NMG_0084106

And here is where you see Mr. Gerson's gift. The president's critics, he knows, decry America's use of power as hypocritical -- that this country claims to look out for the oppressed when really we're the oppressor. In reply, Mr. Gerson picks the Founder many now think of as the biggest hypocrite of all: Thomas Jefferson. "Even though he was inconsistent in his own life, he set out an ideal that improved and motivated and guided American history from that day to this." That, he says, "is the best role of political rhetoric."

The Woman Who Would Be Speaker (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

On election night 2004, Nancy Pelosi faced a painful reality: Her party was again a big loser, failing to win the presidency and losing three more House seats. Pundits were suggesting Pelosi should accept her fate as the leader of a permanent House minority.

But the California legislator had a different idea. Instead, she reached out to advertising executives, Internet moguls and language specialists to ask how Democrats could rise from the ashes and challenge President Bush and the Republicans. The advice that came back was unabashed: "You must take him down" and then hammer away at the differences between the two parties, Pelosi recalled.

Today the Democrats appear capable of taking back leadership of the House after 12 years in the minority, for reasons largely beyond Pelosi's control: an unpopular war, an unpopular president and a series of scandals that have left the Republicans highly vulnerable.

Nevertheless, if the Democrats win, experts say, much credit is due this 66-year-old woman, whose notable fundraising abilities (she raised $50 million this election cycle) and scorched-earth strategy of refusing to negotiate with the GOP have put her on track to become the first woman to be speaker of the House.

Dismissed by her critics as too liberal, too elitist and too lacking in gravitas, Pelosi, serving her 10th term, has proved to be a tough-minded tactician who has led her caucus from the political center and kept the fractious House Democrats in line. Pelosi and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) rarely work together, and the Democrats voted along party lines 88 percent of the time last year -- the most unified voting record in 50 years -- according to a Congressional Quarterly study. By hanging together, the Democrats have thwarted many GOP initiatives, including the centerpiece of Bush's second-term agenda, restructuring Social Security.

That approach, while emboldening the Democrats, has earned Pelosi the enmity of House Republicans, who claim she is an obstructionist. Pelosi, who is married to a wealthy San Francisco businessman and wears designer suits, is a favorite target of conservatives. Throughout the campaign, Republicans have sought to scare voters by portraying Pelosi as a liberal extremist who would be weak on national security and prone to raises taxes if her party were back in control.

On his Web site, Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) calls the prospect of Pelosi becoming speaker "just plain scary" and says: "While Republicans fight the War on Terror, . . . House Democrats plot to establish a Department of Peace."

Even before the Democrats' disappointing showing in the 2002 midterm elections, Pelosi began making calls to line up support for a minority-leader bid, in case then-Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) decided to step aside to run for president. Within days of Gephardt's decision to retire from the House, she locked up the post convincingly, by a vote of 177 to 29.

She took charge with a burst of energy and quickly developed a Democratic message that highlighted shortcomings in the Bush agenda. Later, she criticized the administration's decision to go to war in Iraq. Her strategy was to unite Democrats behind non-threatening, core issues such as the minimum wage, health care, Social Security and energy independence while steering clear of divisive social issues such as abortion rights and gun control.

While Pelosi appears at ease and chatty in informal gatherings, she often comes across as stiff and tentative in public, and she rarely projects well on television. After a halting performance on NBC's "Meet the Press" in May, Pelosi worked with media experts to polish her style and shorten her answers.

DOJ_NMG_0084107

Some conservative Democrats say she has given them a voice in forming policy by creating a number of advisory groups that focus on, among other things, rural issues and faith. "It's much easier to hold the party together if the people who feel the most disaffected feel well-treated," said David Rohde, a professor of political science at Duke University.

Rep. Collin C. Peterson (Minn.) is one of those conservatives. "I have always believed that it takes someone of the same political persuasion to convince the folks on the left that we're not going to be able to govern if we don't come to the center," he said.

This summer, as Republicans were demonizing Pelosi as a liberal liability, Peterson invited her to his rural district -- where she looked comfortable eating a pork chop on a stick and vowed to direct energy money to the Midwest, instead of the Mideast.

Colleagues say Pelosi's polished Pacific Heights exterior belies an iron-fist management style. One of her first moves as leader was to take control over who gets seats on the most coveted committees -- Ways and Means, Appropriations, and Energy and Commerce.

The newspaper Roll Call said in December that Pelosi threatened to remove Rep. Edolphus Towns (N.Y.) from the Energy and Commerce Committee for siding with Republicans on a key trade bill. And despite objections from the Congressional Black Caucus and others, she demanded the removal of Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.) from the Ways and Means Committee after authorities caught him on tape accepting $100,000, allegedly in bribe money. The ousting of Jefferson startled even Republicans.

Pelosi's biggest challenge was in trying to forge a consensus on the war in Iraq, a near-impossible task given the sharp divisions among Democrats in the House and Senate and the political danger of openly challenging Bush on the war. She had been highly critical of Gephardt's support for the war in the fall of 2002 and helped line up 126 Democratic votes against the resolution authorizing an invasion of Iraq.

But as the new minority leader, Pelosi knew she could not impose her views on her caucus and instead initially took the position that it was the Republicans' war, for the Republicans to fix. Privately, however, she spent months conferring with Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a decorated Vietnam War veteran and prominent voice on military matters, who had voted for the war but was now souring on it. Pelosi knew that her voice would not be as credible as Murtha's.

The two planned Murtha's surprise turnaround a year ago, when he demanded immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops. Two weeks later, Pelosi followed his lead.

Should the Democrats win in November, Pelosi said, their new majority will push for the immediate start of a phased withdrawal of troops, to be completed by the end of 2007.

At the same time, she said, the new majority would quickly move to raise the minimum wage, allow the government to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower prices for seniors, repeal corporate incentives to take jobs overseas, make college tuition tax-deductible, and implement all the recommendations of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, securing nuclear material from former Soviet states to keep it from terrorists.

Some Democrats complain that Pelosi relies on too tight a coterie of advisers, chief among them Reps. George Miller and Anna G. Eshoo of California. Others include Murtha, Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), Rosa L. DeLauro (Conn.), David R. Obey (Wis.), John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.) and Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The biggest complaint is that if you were not with her in the beginning you can't get in," a former leadership aide said.

Pelosi has signaled that she would not rely totally on seniority in appointing committee chairs. She has, however, told ranking members on the most powerful panels, Ways and Means, Rules, Energy and Commerce, and Appropriations, that she supports them.

And, after studiously avoiding cooperating with the Republican leadership for years, she has vowed to reach out to Republicans and be more inclusive. She said, for example, that she would allow Republicans to bring bills to the floor and have a say in conference committees. But many are skeptical.

"That would not happen," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga). "I have never seen Nancy Pelosi reach out to a Republican."

Pelosi was first elected to the House at 47, after she raised her five children. She grew up as a member of a prominent Maryland political family and developed an interest in politics at an early age. Her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., was mayor of Baltimore for 12 years, and her brother, Thomas J. D'Alesandro III, later served as mayor for four years.

DOJ_NMG_0084108

She attended Trinity College in Washington, a Catholic girls school, and met and married Paul Pelosi, today a millionaire investor. The couple settled in San Francisco, and Pelosi honed her political skills and developed a name while driving carpool -- as a fundraiser, state party chairwoman and Democratic National Committee member.

Markey said Pelosi was "no ordinary freshman" when she arrived through a special election. She was someone who could pick up the phone and call first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and raise millions when asked. Substantively, colleagues said she proved herself on key committees, including Appropriations and Intelligence.

In 2001, she successfully challenged the old boys' network by running for minority whip against the favored Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), because, she said, she saw "more of the same" ahead for Democrats.

She quickly consolidated her power, sending a strong message to those she saw as adversaries. "If someone is her enemy, she shuts them out. She closes them down," Murtha said.

Members took note when Pelosi gave $10,000 to former Democratic representative Lynn Nancy Rivers of Michigan, whom reapportionment had pitted against a Democratic lion of the House, John D. Dingell, who had voted for Hoyer. "She was with the people who supported her," said Miller, her friend.

Murtha and others said she never brought Hoyer into her circle, although he is her No. 2 in the House Democratic leadership. Hoyer said in an interview that "Nancy and I have worked very effectively together."

Pelosi said she holds no grudge against Hoyer, but members said there was no missing her intentions when she did not dissuade Murtha from challenging Hoyer for the No. 2 leadership post.

In describing her dealings with fellow Democrats, Pelosi said, "I expect a certain level of discipline when we have agreed on where we're going." Some members, she said, "mistake sometimes my courtesy for a lack of strength, and they ought not to do that."

Madam Speaker? Pelosi Likes The Sound (LAT)

By Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SEATTLE — It's only 9 a.m. and Nancy Pelosi has already had two breakfasts and a bowl of chocolate ice cream. The House minority leader has met with a couple of donors in a hotel dining room, run back up to her room for a live radio interview, down to the dining room again for a sit-down with the local newspapers, and up to her room for a phone strategy session.

She is, as ever, exquisitely dressed, in a stylish pale-green suit that she will wear three times in the next three days. Packing light saves time. Everything must fit into one carry-on and a garment bag, which she lugs herself, clacking across airports in her high heels.

With less than three weeks before an election that will decide control of Congress, the Democrats are within tantalizing reach of a House win that would almost certainly make Pelosi the first female speaker of the House — second in line to the presidency — and the first from California.

They need to gain 15 seats to take control, and Pelosi falls asleep at night crunching the numbers. It is her single burning obsession to lead her party to victory, and she devotes nearly every waking minute to it, coaching candidates, raising money and calculating in which districts to spend it.

In three years as minority leader she has raised record amounts of cash and preached party unity that has helped bring 201 unruly Democrats to the brink of power.

Yet Pelosi is not necessarily the public face most Democrats would have chosen to represent a party struggling to look strong in these unsettled times — a 66-year-old liberal congresswoman from war-protesting San Francisco who looks too demure to stand up for national security and isn't great on TV.

Republican ad campaigns cast her as a caricature of liberal excess; depicted with eyes bulging and mouth agape, she looks like she's about to pop a blood vessel or bite somebody.

"Look, if I weren't effective, I don't think they would try to take me down. You're in the arena, you're in the ring. That's what happens," Pelosi says on the way to another fundraiser as she crisscrosses the country, her cellphone affixed to her ear in the car, at breakfast and in the beauty salon, where she recently dropped it into a pedicure bowl.

DOJ_NMG_0084109

She has raised more money than any congressional Democrat — $100 million since she was elected leader nearly four years ago — half of it in this election cycle alone, tapping her wealthy ideological soul mates and cultivating small donors with direct mail and the Internet.

She brought vases of white lilies to the minority leader's office, but also a discipline that Democrats had not seen in years, threatening consequences for anyone who strayed from the party line. The result was unity 88% of the time on such votes as energy policy and President Bush's budget. The famously unified Republicans did only slightly better.

"Prior leadership did not discipline the troops in the way Nancy has," said Vic Fazio, a former Democratic congressman from West Sacramento, now a Washington lobbyist. "And she brought a lot of new donors to the table."

Pelosi proved herself in the backrooms and trenches of Washington, not on the Sunday morning talking-heads circuit. She tends to speak in scripted talking points — one columnist likened her delivery to "a compendium of bumper stickers." She leans toward mind-numbing alliteration: The only three excuses for breaking from the party line are "conscience, constituents, Constitution."

Most agree she has improved with practice and occasional guidance from media coaches to slow down and smile. She was more relaxed during a recent appearance on the "Late Show With David Letterman" and drew applause more than once with jabs such as: "Mr. President, 'stay the course' is not a strategy, it's a slogan, and we need more than that."

Unlike previous party leaders from both sides — Democrat Richard Gephardt and Republican Newt Gingrich, most notably — Pelosi isn't running for president. Her raucous but loyal district has sent her to Washington 10 times, by margins so huge that she doesn't campaign; she's never needed national exposure and says she would rather spend her time promoting her party than herself.

"I could stay in Washington all the time and go on Sunday morning shows, but I don't have time for that. I need to be traveling and raising money and be at home," she says from the back seat of a black SUV on her way to yet another fundraiser. "At the beginning of all this 23 months ago, we were told we were a permanent minority.... I'm fighting a battle here. I'm not getting my hair done."

Pelosi learned her political skills from her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., a New Deal congressman and revered mayor of Baltimore. He taught "little Nancy" — one of six children and the only girl — how to build a grass-roots campaign, cultivate relationships and call in favors. In the living room of their brick row house there were usually constituents looking for work or a financial assist — along with the now-famous "favor file" that kept track of every good deed; it was consulted when her father or the party needed help in return.

Her time-management skills were honed on another training ground: the San Francisco home where she and her husband, Paul Pelosi, a wealthy investment banker and her college sweetheart, raised four girls and a boy, born in six years. Nancy Pelosi was the driver, cook, Halloween-costume seamstress and disciplinarian — putting out fires and making every minute count, not unlike life in Congress.

While the children were small, Pelosi served as California state party chair and learned the art of raising money. People would ask how she managed to do so much with so many kids. "I told them I couldn't have done it without the children," Pelosi says now.

Each one had a job addressing envelopes, stuffing, sealing and stamping. Their hard work at the Democratic Party office earned them a bowl of French onion soup across the street at the old Liberty House department store in San Francisco. Not to mention occasional recognition at church, where they belted out: "He's got the stuffers and the sealers, in his hands ... "

Raising her children taught Pelosi to think strategically, whether putting together a puzzle with her grandchildren at the family's Napa Valley vacation home (sort by color and edges and consult the picture on the box) or plotting to foil Bush's plan to privatize Social Security (kick him in the shins and give him nothing to attack).

Acting on advice from marketing gurus after the 2004 presidential election, Pelosi ordered her ranks to assail the Bush privatization plan while offering nothing of their own that the Republicans could counterassault. Week after week impatient Democrats asked, "When can we propose a plan?" and week after week she intoned, "Never."

When the Bush team visited 60 cities in 60 days to sell Medicare prescription coverage — the centerpiece of his second term — Democrats were on the ground too, with a message of higher drug costs and industry perks.

DOJ_NMG_0084110

In eight months, support for Bush's idea among seniors had dropped significantly, marking the beginning of his decline in national public opinion polls.

"We had to make them pay … for trying to do that to the American people," she explains, displaying the bite that has made her reputation as a political pit bull.

It is a side of Pelosi that has earned her both admirers and detractors, depending on who happens to be on the receiving end of her wrath. She is known to have a long memory for slights. A bitter and protracted House leadership battle with Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) has left lasting divisions between her backers and his.

"About 75% of the caucus are her rabid supporters, the other 25% not so supportive," one senior Democrat said, asking to remain anonymous to avoid offending the leadership. "A lot of people just don't like to be led. And to some degree, people perceive her as being too focused on her enemies and not sufficiently willing to open up a new dialogue and move on."

Some believe Pelosi is held to a higher standard in maledominated Washington. When the men in the leadership stick to talking points, they are "on message." When Pelosi does, she is redundant and shrill.

"There is still a double standard," said Democratic strategist Anita Dunn, who has given Pelosi tips on media presence. "There have been some comb-over jokes about male members of Congress, but by and large people just accept what they look and sound like. That is still not the case with females."

Though she is probably the second most lampooned woman in U.S. politics — after Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) — Pelosi is far from a household name. "I don't think most people know who I am," she says.

That could change in one historic moment if Pelosi is pulled from the trenches and plopped into the spotlight.

She sees it as an opportunity to change the culture of Washington.

"I think the fact that I am a woman will raise expectations in terms of more hope in government, and I will not disappoint," she says.

"The gavel of the speaker of the House is in the hands of special interests, and now it will be in the hands of America's children. I don't mean to imply my male colleagues will have any less integrity.… But I don't know that a man can say that as easily as a woman can."

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Nancy Pelosi

1940: Born Nancy D'Alesandro in Baltimore; her father served five terms in Congress ending in 1947, then 12 years as Baltimore mayor

1962: Graduates from Trinity College (now called Trinity University), Washington, D.C.

1977-1981: Northern chair, California Democratic Party

1981-1983: State chair, California Democratic Party

1985-1987: Finance chair, Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee

1987-present: Elected by California's 8th Congressional District, which includes most of San Francisco; served for 10 years (until early 2003) on the intelligence committee

2001: Elected minority whip by House Democrats

Oct. 2002: Leads Democratic faction opposed to authorizing military force in Iraq, bucking the House Democratic leader

Nov. 2002: Elected minority leader by House Democrats

Nov. 2004: Democrats lose House seats as Bush wins reelection

Sources: Almanac of American Politics 2006; office of Nancy Pelosi

Los Angeles Times

Rank Would Guide Pelosi As She Chose Chairmen (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084111

If Democrats win control in November, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has decided to award committee chairmanships based almost entirely on seniority, ensuring that the House would feature far more minority faces, and some liberal firebrands, in key posts.

But, mindful of the growing power of an expanding band of Democratic moderates and conservatives, Pelosi has also vowed that she would keep her chairmen on a tight leash, according to leadership aides and current and former Democratic lawmakers. She has assured conservative Democrats that she would personally temper the legislative impulses of her most liberal chairmen while keeping close tabs on the investigations that could dominate the final two years of the Bush presidency.

House Democratic leaders and their would-be chairmen are careful to say in public that they are focused only on the Nov. 7 elections and have not begun to plan for a possible takeover. But privately, Pelosi has had several conversations with the senior Democrats on the House's most powerful committees, as well as with conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, who have sought assurances that they will have a voice after the polls close.

"We've inched our way back toward the majority by replacing Republicans with conservative-to-moderate Democrats, and you're going to see a lot more of that November 7," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), one of the leaders of the Blue Dog coalition. "Do I believe Blue Dogs will have a greater voice in the Democratic leadership? You betcha."

The Blue Dogs could hold the balance of power in a Democratic House. With 37 members, the group already has clout; 16 Democratic candidates have the Blue Dogs' endorsement, and a dozen of them could win. That would give them numbers surpassing the Congressional Black Caucus's 43 members.

Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), a Blue Dog co-chairman, promised that the group would be "a moderating influence on any excesses that might be brought forth by other wings of the party."

"That's not a threat," he said. "That's just the facts of life."

For Republicans in this campaign season, however, the face of the Democratic Party is not the Blue Dog wing but what Cardoza called those "other wings." Committee chairmanships would appear to be an unlikely campaign issue, but Republicans are using it with gusto, especially to rally dispirited conservatives to the polls.

Republicans have attacked Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), the senior Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, as a tax hiker. The Republican National Committee called Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the would-be chairman of the Education and Workforce Committee, "a liberal partisan" who "would launch criminal inquiries into the Bush administration."

In Topeka, Kan., last week, Vice President Cheney singled out three of the most liberal Democrats in the House as foils -- Reps. John Conyers Jr. (Mich.), the would-be Judiciary Committee chairman; Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), who is in line to take over the Government Reform Committee; and Barney Frank (Mass.), the senior Democrat on the Financial Services Committee.

"In all the decisions that will come in the next two years, it's going to matter a great deal which party has the majority on the floor and the gavel in committee," Cheney said.

In a debate between six-term Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.) and his challenger, Sheriff Brad Ellsworth (D), Hostettler warned that if Democrats take over, "Charlie Rangel will be the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee."

Some Republicans have steered clear of those lines of attack. House Government Reform Committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said he has "worked closely" with Waxman, the ranking Democrat.

Misgivings exist in Democratic ranks as well. Several moderate-to-conservative Democrats in the House, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of fraying party unity, specifically mentioned two members: Conyers, who has already laid out what he says are grounds to impeach President Bush, and Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.), a senior Democrat on the intelligence committee, who was impeached and removed from his federal judgeship in 1989 for conspiring to take a $150,000 bribe and give light sentences to two convicted swindlers.

Hastings has already become something of a campaign issue. At a recent event featuring Democratic challenger Heath Shuler, an aide to his opponent, Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.), called out that a Democratic majority would let Hastings into the inner sanctums of the intelligence world.

Such concerns have placed Pelosi in a squeeze between conservative Democrats, who could be responsible for swinging the balance of power next month, and minority lawmakers who are demanding that Pelosi respect the seniority system.

DOJ_NMG_0084112

For now, she is largely siding with the congressional black and Hispanic caucuses, whose ranks would provide at least half a dozen chairmen by seniority. Three black lawmakers have already received pledges: Pelosi aides gave strong assurances that Conyers would become Judiciary Committee chairman and that Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) would become chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. In a private meeting, Pelosi told Rangel that he would take over the Ways and Means Committee.

In the same meeting, she assured Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) that she would back his return to the chairmanship of the Energy and Commerce Committee, a post he used in the 1980s and 1990s to become one of the most powerful and feared figures in Congress.

She also told Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) that he would have her support to take back the reins of the Appropriations Committee.

But there are caveats. Parts of Dingell's former domain that Republicans took away from the energy committee, such as oversight over the Securities and Exchange Commission, will not be returned, leadership aides said. And Pelosi has made it clear that she wants Waxman, on the Government Reform Committee, not Dingell, to take the lead on investigations.

The intelligence committee remains the biggest problem. The senior Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), wants the chairmanship and has the strong backing of the Blue Dogs. But personal friction between Harman and Pelosi virtually ensures that Harman will not remain on the committee, according to lawmakers and aides close to Pelosi.

Hastings would be next in line, but conservative Democrats are adamantly opposed. Skipping over him would be problematic, however. Rep. Sanford Bishop (D-Ga.) was the last black lawmaker in line for the sensitive committee chairmanship. But to lure Harman out of retirement in 2000, Pelosi and then-House Minority Leader Richard A. Gephardt (Mo.) promised she would get the top Democratic slot on the panel. Bishop was eased off the committee with a plum seat on the appropriations panel.

In light of that history, skipping over Hastings might cause a real rupture with the Congressional Black Caucus, Pelosi aides fear. Tensions between Pelosi and the caucus flared earlier this year when she successfully pushed to remove the ethically tainted William J. Jefferson (D-La.) from the powerful Ways and Means Committee. Jefferson is under federal investigation as part of a bribery and corruption case.

Leadership aides have begun floating a compromise, Rep. Silvestre Reyes (Tex.), the third-ranking Democrat on the intelligence committee, hoping that a minority choice would soothe bruised feelings.

"Reyes would be a fabulous choice," said one Blue Dog lawmaker. "It would show no lack of sensitivity to minorities, and it would be a compromise that would take care of a lot of issues."

The Congressional Black Caucus, headed by Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), is having none of it, however.

"The CBC would not look kindly on that," said caucus spokeswoman Myra Dandridge. "The first order of business of the CBC chairman would be to protect his members, and Alcee Hastings has the seniority, the knowledge and the experience to be chairman of the intelligence committee."

Staff writer Juliet Eilperin contributed to this report.

At Play In The Realm Of Political Animals (NYT)

By Kayleen Schaefer

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

POOLESVILLE, Md.

THE gravel driveway for the Potomac Polo Club is unmarked, but the 200 young men and women who traveled here, 45 minutes from Washington, knew they were at the right place when they spotted the black Hummer limousine and saw the crowd at the beer bong.

They had arrived at the fall party, Swine on the Vine, of the Capital Club, a Washington group of 100 politically connected young men, who are known for partying like they're back at a fraternity kegger.

For a certain set of young Washington, the parties are a raucous antidote to the restrained fund-raisers and embassy cocktail gatherings that otherwise make up the district's social life.

"The Capital Club has no mission except to show its members and their many dates a good time," said Jayne Sandman, associate publisher of the Washington magazine Capitol File. "It's hedonistic relief from a city of suits and ties."

Among the club members and their guests, most in their 20's and 30's, were White House staff members, Capitol Hill aides, lawyers, publicists and lobbyists. About 90 percent of club members are Republican, and 80 percent work in government. Barbara and Jenna Bush have been known to show up at some of the parties, six a year, which provide a glimpse of Washington's young power elite with ties loosened, six years into the Republican domination of government.

When the cover band took a break at Swine on the Vine, guests crowded around the beer bong, eager to take their turn guzzling a can of beer poured down a funnel. A young man shook a portable outhouse because he knew his buddy was inside.

The dress code was preppy enough for a polo ground: women in pearl necklaces, lightweight wrap sweaters and jeans tucked into riding boots. Men favored oxford shirts with sunglasses strung around their necks. Jeff Kimbell, a lobbyist who is a former club president, wore a belt buckle made from a car's gearshift handle (with options for "drive and reverse," he said suggestively). Josh Overbay, who works for the United States Chamber of Commerce, wore a camouflage hat that said, "Support Wildlife. Drink Wild Turkey."

"Girls love to hate them," observed Bridget Bunner of the Capital Club's 100 men. Ms. Bunner, a 23-year-old fund-raiser for Democratic Congressman Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia, added, "They're the kind of guys their moms want them to marry."

This summer, members sent each other Internet links to a Smirnoff ad on YouTube that parodied every cliché of the WASP elite, down to their seersucker suits and the popped collars of their polo shirts. It featured three blondes in pearls and tennis clothes, with young men rapping "where my WASP's at?" and calling haters "jealous because our families run the nation." Capital Club members said it reminded them of themselves.

Members of the club have connections throughout government, and in some cases are wired right into the brain trust at the White House: the Republican lobbying firm DCI Group, which has strong ties to the Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman and the White House senior adviser Karl Rove, has sponsored its parties. But club members insist their gatherings are not about networking or advancing anyone's career or political agenda.

"If you want networking," said Jonathan Grella, 32, a public relations executive and Tom Delay's former press secretary, "go to a fund-raiser or a charity event, or go to Sally Quinn's house."

Even if this generation had a version of Ms. Quinn's house, the Capital Club partygoer would rather not drop by. "There's no one talking about issues in the beer line," said Jessica Clement, who dates a past president of the club and works for the DCI Group.

Jessica Cutler, the former congressional staff member whose blog, written under the pseudonym Washingtonienne, exposed several Washington men's sex lives, said she attended one party — uninvited — in 2004, and that was enough for her. But Washington is not like New York, she said, and there are not many opportunities for the young and ambitious to establish themselves on the social scene.

"Either you're dealing with college kids," she said of Washington's night life, "where you feel you're the oldest person there. Or you feel like you're way too young to be there because they're all old men."

Still, the Capital Club seems contrived, Ms. Cutler said. "It feels like these guys are young and they just came up with it, as opposed to it being an institution."

"That didn't appeal to me," she said, "but I can see why it appeals to the D.C. type. They do want to be on the board of the museum."

Many members do come from privileged backgrounds; Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour's son, Reeves, is a member, as are West Virginia Rep. Shelley Moore Capito's son, Moore, and Georgia Senator Saxby Chambliss's son, Bo, a lobbyist, all Republicans. Billy Bush, President Bush's cousin and a host of "Access Hollywood," is a former member, as is John Breaux Jr., a lobbyist whose father is the former Democratic Louisiana senator.

But the club is, in some ways, populist. Annual dues are only $250. Anyone who buys a ticket can come to the parties. The cost for Swine on the Vine for nonmembers was $50 for men, $40 for women. At the end of the year, the club donates about $5,000 to charities like the American Red Cross.

DOJ_NMG_0084114

"I hate when we get painted with that picture of a bunch of bratty kids or of a privileged young Republicans' club," said George Vincent, 25, a real estate developer. "I know a lot of the guys fit that, but not all. The Republican part works, but I'm not pretentious."

The club was formed in 1980 — the year Ronald Reagan was elected president — by five graduates of the University of Virginia and Washington and Lee, with the intent of recreating their fraternity parties.

"The first one, as it has been described to us, was three kegs of beer in a hotel ballroom in Crystal City, Virginia," said Mat Lapinski, 26, the current club president and a lobbyist with a Washington law firm.

The Clinton years were not good for the club; according to some members, it tried to become too exclusive, restricting access to its parties. It could hardly refill its membership ranks. The return of the Republicans to Congress in the mid-90's marked the club's resurgence.

The club says 60 to 70 men try to join each year for the dozen spots that open up. A thousand people went to the Sinatra Soiree in July, where the "summer ahoy" dress code must have prompted a run on the J. Crew catalog. More than one guest carried a polo mallet as a walking stick.

Even with the polls this month showing Democrats threatening the Republican majority in Congress, and the House leadership under attack, members insisted that a shift in the balance of power in Washington would not dim the club's appeal, or its party-hearty spirit. The next gathering, a Halloween costume affair on Oct. 28, is 10 days before Election Day. Some members said they were looking forward to it as a timeout from the tense political season.

"It wouldn't matter if the Democrats controlled Congress or if Ralph Nader were president," said Mr. Kimbell, 35, the former president. "The club isn't about politics. It is precisely the opposite, as it gives members an opportunity to get away from politics for at least a little while, listen to some live music, throw down a few shots of Patrón and have a few howls with the boys. And perhaps enjoy the fruits of some of our lady guests."

The parties aren't so wild that anyone will be forced to issue a public apology the next day. This being Washington, Capital Club members are aware that once you damage your reputation, it's not easy to repair it. A lesson was learned from an experience with the Madison, a women's club similar to the Capital Club, after a member told The Hill newspaper that she "would be the ultimate trophy wife."

The same article called the Madison the female equivalent of the Capital Club. The Capital Club rushed out an e-mail message to the Madison's board insisting they "do not want the Madison to be referenced as the female equivalent to the club."

Mr. Lapinski, the Capital Club's president, said: "We have always welcomed everyone to our events. And some members worried that referring to the organizations as equivalents would have a negative impact on attendance at our events by our friends in the Junior League and other non-Madison ladies."

When the sun went down at Swine on the Vine, a few couples retreated to blankets by the bonfire, but the majority jammed together in front of the stage to hear the band, as if they were at a high school dance. Men on the sideline fired up cigars.

At the end of the night, 10 empty kegs were lined up as people danced to the last song, Journey's "Don't Stop Believin'." A young man stumbled out of the darkness while rebuttoning his untucked white shirt. Guests left in pairs, holding hands, while some single women consoled each other. "He's a dirtbag," one said.

"I just want to get out of here," her friend said.

A boisterous group piled into the Hummer limo, and all of the cars headed back to Washington together.

U.S. Treasury's Paulson Sells New York Condo For $8 Million (BLOOM)

By Sharon L. Crenson

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the former chief executive officer of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., sold his 50th floor condominium near Manhattan's Lincoln Center for almost $8 million, according to public records.

Paulson paid a total of $2.88 million for two apartments he bought and combined on West 67th Street, one in 1996 and the other in 1998. Tax on the re-sale was about $112,000, according to the New York City Register.

DOJ_NMG_0084115

The median price for four-bedroom Manhattan apartments like Paulson's was just under $7 million in the third quarter, according to Miller Samuel Inc., the borough's largest appraiser. On the Upper West Side, it was about $7.2 million, and prices in that neighborhood may be poised to rise further, said Gregory J. Heym, chief economist for Terra Holdings, the parent company of New York City real estate brokers Brown Harris Stevens and Halstead Property.

``The West Side market in our latest report looked a little weak," Heym said ``The prices over there are going to shoot up.''

Goldman, the world's most-profitable securities firm, last year paid Paulson $38.3 million in salary, stock and options, making him Wall Street's most highly-compensated executive in 2005. After he was confirmed on June 28 as Treasury secretary, the firm said it would give him an $18.7 million cash bonus for the first half of 2006. As Treasury secretary, he earns $183,500 per year. Treasury spokeswoman Brookly McLaughlin didn't immediately return a call seeking comment from Paulson.

The apartment sale was first reported in the New York Post.

Nine-Room Condo

Paulson and wife Wendy J. Paulson sold their nine-room condo for $7,995,000 just as that type of apartment building is becoming more popular in New York. About 70 percent of the city's multi- family stock is in co-operatives where residents sit on boards that review the finances and private lives of potential buyers. Condos don't require such approval and are more likely to be newly constructed.

The number of Manhattan apartment sales, both condominium and co-op, rose 9.3 percent to 2,113 in the third quarter, gaining 5.8 percent from a year ago, according to the Miller Samuel report.

Fueled by Wall Street bonus money, New York apartment prices gained 73 percent over the past five years, making Manhattan the most expensive urban market in the U.S.

Investment banks such as Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley handed out a record $21.5 billion in bonuses at the end of 2005, according to New York State Comptroller Alan Hevesi.

The Paulsons have another home in Barrington, Illinois, according to New York City documents.

U.S. new-house prices will fall this year for the first time since 1991 and existing homes will have the smallest gain ever, the National Association of Realtors said this month. The U.S. median price for a new home probably will dip 0.2 percent to $240,500, the first decline since a drop of 2.4 percent 15 years ago. The price for previously owned homes likely will rise 1.6 percent to $223,000, the smallest gain on record.

Neil Binder, co-owner of Manhattan's Bellmarc brokerage, said media coverage of the slowing U.S. housing market has sparked sales.

``When the press came out that the world was coming to an end, it stimulated a lot of activity," he said.

Flexing Our Muscles In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The Bush administration has adopted a jingoistic and downright belligerent tone toward space operations. In a new “national space policy” posted without fanfare on an obscure government Web site, and in recent speeches, it has signaled its determination to be pre-eminent in space — as it is in air power and sea power — while opposing any treaties that might curtail any American action there.

This chest-thumping is being portrayed as a modest extension of the Clinton administration’s space policy issued a decade ago. And so far there is no mention of putting American weapons in space. But the more aggressive tone of the Bush policy may undercut international cooperation on civilian space projects — a goal to which the new policy subscribes — or set off an eventual arms race in space.

The new policy reflects the worst tendencies of the Bush administration — a unilateral drive for supremacy and a rejection of treaties. And it comes just as the White House is desperately seeking help to rein in the nuclear programs of North Korea and Iran. That effort depends heavily on cooperation from China and Russia, two countries with their own active space programs.

The administration regards the policy as a necessary update to reflect how important space is becoming for the American economy and defense. But outside experts who have parsed the language are struck by how forceful and nationalistic it sounds.

DOJ_NMG_0084116

Whereas the 1996 policy opened with assurances that the United States would pursue greater levels of partnership and cooperation in space, the new policy states: "In this new century, those who effectively utilize space will enjoy added prosperity and security and will hold a substantial advantage over those who do not. Freedom of action in space is as important to the United States as air power and sea power."

The only solace is that the new policy does not endorse placing weapons in space or fighting in, through or from space, as the Air Force has been urging. But neither does it rule out these activities.

In keeping with the more muscular stance, the administration is also opposing any negotiations on a treaty to prevent an arms race in outer space — arguing that it may impede America's ability to defend its satellites from ground-based weapons. That seems shortsighted. An international treaty to keep space free of weapons might well provide greater security than a unilateral declaration that we will do whatever we have to do to preserve our own space assets.

Michael Griffin, the NASA administrator, insisted he did not intend to sound jingoistic when he addressed a conference in Spain this month — but he sure came across that way. He wondered aloud what language future settlers of the Moon and Mars would speak. "Will my language be passed down over the generations to future lunar colonies?" he asked. "Or will another, bolder or more persistent culture surpass our efforts and put their own stamp on the predominant lunar society of the far future?"

We fear the old notion that space might provide the perfect arena for international cooperation may be yielding to a new era of competition — one not seen since the cold war race to the moon.

Farm Insurance Racket (WP)

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

IF WE ASKED Congress to spend billions making the newspaper business a risk-free enterprise, our editorial would be laughed out of the Capitol. Yet that is essentially the deal American farmers -- and the insurance companies that profit from their government-sponsored premiums -- get from the federal government every year. The result, according to a two-part Post investigation published this week, is billions of federal dollars wasted in unfair and uncompetitive handouts, many of which go to farmers working land that would be left fallow in a freer market.

The Post's study found that many farmers benefit not only from government-backed, cut-rate farm insurance but also from federal disaster relief funds. This double-dipping means that farmers who lose 35 percent or more of a crop can recoup up to 95 percent of the money they would have gotten from selling their harvest. Ironically, Congress approved a complex public-private scheme that offers cheap farm insurance to all comers in order to wean farmers off disaster aid. Yet even now that the federal government pays, on average, 60 percent of farmers' premiums, lawmakers continue to pass redundant emergency aid for afflicted farmers.

Because of the government largess, farmers in parts of the country that are less than hospitable to productive agriculture continue to plant -- and eat up federal money. Post investigators Gilbert M. Gaul, Dan Morgan and Sarah Cohen revealed, for example, that over the past four years, Mark Orebaugh, a farmer in parched southwestern Kansas, paid $81,730 in insurance premiums and received $295,796 back in claims, more than 3 1/2 times what he put in. He has also taken disaster aid on top of that, as significant portions of his crop were destroyed in four of the past six years. In the past 10 years, four of every 10 dollars in disaster relief went to only four states -- Kansas, North Dakota, South Dakota and Texas. More than half of all farm payouts are concentrated in 25 congressional districts.

Unproductive farmers are not the only ones taking advantage. The insurance companies that work with the government to provide farm disaster coverage have seen their profits balloon in recent years. The federal government sets the price for coverage, helps farmers pay it and reimburses insurers for administrative costs. The insurance companies then shift the liability for their most risky accounts onto taxpayers. Last year, these farm insurers posted profits of $927 million and took $829 million in administrative fees from the government.

Nevertheless, North Dakota farmer Terry Aronson unpretentiously defended the system to Post reporters. "Taxpayers are funding something good, the rural life." Yet most Americans -- removed from "the rural life" in urban and suburban communities -- pay not only the opportunity cost of funneling money to farmers but also the incalculable costs of failed trade talks, which hurt the American consumer. America has a sentimental attachment to its farmlands. But preserving the rural life of a few, unproductive farmers is not worth the price it pays to do it.

DOJ_NMG_0084117

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Closes Out Week Riding Crest Of 12,000 (WP/AP)

By Tim Paradis

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 -- Wall Street ended a record-setting week narrowly mixed Friday, with the Dow Jones industrial average falling to close at slightly more than 12,000 after a lackluster profit report and forecast from Caterpillar Inc. prompted many investors to retreat.

Caterpillar, one of the 30 blue-chip stocks that make up the Dow, unnerved investors who have bet that the slowing economy would pull off a soft landing rather than tip into recession.

"Caterpillar must have taken about 60 to 70 points off the Dow," said Stephen Carl, head of equity trading at Williams Capital Group.

It was optimism about the economy and rising hopes for strong third-quarter earnings that had lifted the Dow into uncharted territory this week. The blue chip index, reaching its first 1,000-point milestone in 7 1/2 years, traded past 12,000 for the first time Wednesday and had its first close above that mark on Thursday.

On Friday, the Dow closed down 9.36, or 0.08 percent, at 12,002.37. Broader stock indicators showed modest gains after spending much of the session with losses. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.64, or 0.12 percent, to 1,368.60. The Nasdaq composite index rose 1.36, or 0.06 percent, to 2,342.30 after a strong earnings report from Google Inc.

For the week, the Dow rose 0.35 percent, the S&P gained 0.22 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.64 percent. The Dow had shown triple-digit point gains in each of the previous three weeks.

Despite the overall gains in the market, the S&P stands about 10.4 percent below its high close of 1,527.46 and the Nasdaq is even further off, about 54 percent. All three indexes had peaked in early 2000 before plunging in response to the dot-com bust, recession and the aftermath of the 2001 terror attacks.

Joe Battipaglia, chief investment officer at Ryan Beck & Co., contends that while earnings reports have been sound over all companies are coming in with more guarded forecasts. He also is concerned that falling oil prices could indicate the economy is slowing too quickly.

"Caterpillar today was sort of a splash of cold water on the notion that this economy is in the perfect place and will continue to be in the perfect place," Battipaglia said.

Caterpillar fell $10.02 or 14.5 percent, to $59 despite a 15 percent increase in its third-quarter profit. Though the company sold more construction and mining equipment, it warned increased operating costs and weaker-than-expected sales would cut into its full-year profits.Movers

Merck rose $1.15, to $45.64, after reporting stronger-than-expected earnings and revenue, though earnings were down 34 percent and sales were flat.

Vical rose 53 cents, to $5.88. The developer of gene-based therapies said a trial of its bird flu vaccine effectively protected ferrets against a lethal strain of the virus. It hopes to begin testing the vaccine in humans soon.

SanDisk fell $12.59, to $49.15. The maker of flash-memory chips posted a 4 percent decline in third-quarter profit and forecast prices would fall as much as 20 percent in the fourth quarter.

Arch Coal fell $2.22, to $32.04, after the company lowered its full-year profit forecast because of weakness in the domestic market. Arch Coal also said that its third-quarter profit nearly tripled as its operating costs fell.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 1.22, to 8,702.03.

American Stock Exchange index rose 3.58, to 1,936.66.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks fell 5.26, to 762.13.Volume

NYSE: 2.57 billion shares, down from 2.65 billion on Thursday. Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 3 to 2.

DOJ_NMG_0084118

Nasdaq: 1.88 billion shares, down from 1.97 billion. Decliners outnumbered advancers.Commodities

Crude oil for November delivery: $56.82, down $1.68.

Gold for current delivery: $593, down from $599 on Thursday.

Blue Chips Pause For Oxygen At 12000 Level (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average paused in its march to new records but finished above the 12000 level for the second straight session -- just barely.

After trading lower for much of the session, the blue-chip average rallied in the waning minutes of trading Friday afternoon to finish at 12002.37, down 9.36 points, or 0.1%. It ended the week up 41.86 points, or 0.3%, and is up 12% for the year.

"The mood swings have been pretty intense," said Edward Yardeni, chief investment strategist for Akron, Ohio, money manager Oak Associates Ltd., "Nobody wants to believe that things are as good as they are."

After 10 upward moves in the last 14 trading sessions, some market watchers think the Dow industrials are poised to take a breather, at least for the short term.

The stock market is "still nervous and jittery and will likely be so for the next week or so, until we're done with earnings season," said Brian Reynolds, chief market strategist for M.S. Howells, a Scottsdale, Ariz., brokerage firm. "Eventually we'll work through that and start moving up again."

The blue-chip average was dragged down Friday by heavy-equipment maker Caterpillar, one of 30 Dow components, which fell nearly 15% after reporting earnings below analysts' expectations.

Other indexes rose yesterday. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.1%, or 1.64 points, to finish at 1368.60, up 0.2% for the week and 9.6% for the year. The Nasdaq gained 0.06%, or 1.36, to 2342.30, down 0.6% for the week but up 6.2% year-to-date.

Despite the disappointing earnings report from Caterpillar, most companies have been reporting solid numbers, according to data provider Thomson Financial. Earnings of companies in the S&P 500 are now projected to have jumped 16% in the third quarter over last year, Thomson said.

In major market action:

Stocks rose; bonds were mostly flat. The price of the 10-year Treasury note stayed pat, yielding 4.788%. The 30-year bond rose 1/32, or 31.25 cents for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.909%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 118.69 yen, compared with 118.16. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.2619 from $1.2618.

U.S. Stocks Rise As Google, 3M Beat Profit Estimates, Oil Falls (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks preserved their fourth straight weekly gain as earnings at Google Inc. and 3M Co. beat analysts' estimates and oil dropped below $57 a barrel, lifting companies that depend on consumer spending.

``Everyone's waiting for things to slow down here, but the information we are getting from corporate America is that things are fine," said Philip Tasho, who helps manage $450 million as chief investment officer at Tamro Capital Partners in Alexandria, Virginia.

Merck & Co. reached a two-year high after saying earnings will rise more than previously forecast. Coca-Cola Co. rallied after Merrill Lynch & Co. put it on a list of favored stocks.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell after Caterpillar Inc., the best-performing member during the past four years, said a slowing U.S. economy may reduce earnings growth. The average slid 9.36, or 0.1 percent, to 12,002.37. Caterpillar knocked 80 points off the measure for the day.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index rose 1.64, or 0.1 percent, to 1368.60. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 1.36, or 0.1 percent, to 2342.30.

DOJ_NMG_0084119

For the week, the S&P 500 increased 0.2 percent, while the Dow average gained 0.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.6 percent.

Google soared $33.61, or 7.9 percent, to $459.67 for the S&P 500's biggest gain. Net income at the world's most-used Internet search engine almost doubled to $733.4 million. Profit excluding stock-based compensation costs was $2.62 a share. On average, analysts predicted $2.42, according to Thomson Financial.

Google's Prospects

Citigroup Inc. raised its price estimate for Google shares by 9.1 percent to $600. ``If retail this holiday season shapes up to be exceptionally strong, then Google could be a major beneficiary," analysts including Mark Mahaney wrote.

3M, maker of products from Post-it Notes to electronic road signs, advanced $2.07 to $78.47. Third-quarter net income rose 6.4 percent on acquisitions and sales of optical film for flat- panel television screens. Per-share profit was $1.17 excluding some items, topping analysts' $1.12 average estimate in a Thomson survey.

Merck gained $1.15 to $45.64. It raised its 2006 earnings forecast for the third time this year, to $2.18 to $2.25 a share from the prior $2.10-to-$2.24 projection.

With today's rally, the drugmaker's shares reclaimed all of their losses after Merck in September 2004 withdrew Vioxx, the world's second-best selling painkiller at the time, because of a potential link to heart attacks and strokes.

Coca-Cola's Gain

Coca-Cola gained $1.84 to $46.75. Merrill Lynch added the shares to its ``Focus 1" list, a day after profit at the world's biggest soft-drink maker beat analysts' estimates. Merrill's Christine Farkas increased forecasts for 2006, 2007 and 2008 earnings.

Caterpillar, the world's biggest maker of earthmoving equipment, tumbled more than 14 percent, the most since October 1987. The shares lost $10.02 to $59.

The company's results come a day after financial companies including Citigroup posted disappointing earnings and a report on leading economic indicators signaled a slowdown.

A weakening economy may soon put an end to a streak of 10 percent-plus growth in quarterly earnings. S&P 500 profit will increase 8.8 percent in the first three months of 2007, according to Thomson today. Double-digit rises in the third and fourth quarters would push the winning streak to 14 quarters, the longest in five decades.

Caterpillar Forecast

In 2007, Caterpillar's revenue will be little changed to up 5 percent, with per-share profit little changed to up 10 percent from the middle of its 2006 forecast. The company's third-quarter profit rose less than analysts' forecasts.

Crude for November delivery declined 2.9 percent to $56.82 a barrel in New York, the lowest close since Nov. 29, as traders said the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will fail to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day as planned. Prices have plunged 28 percent from a record of $78.40 reached July 14.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, lost 18 cents to $69.55. Valero Energy Corp., the largest U.S. refiner, slipped 85 cents to $52.09.

Telephone, health-care and so-called consumer-staples companies, which have a reputation as havens in an economic slump, led the S&P 500's advance. The Russell Top 50, a gauge of 50 of the largest U.S. companies, added 0.6 percent on expectations the group will also weather a slowdown.

AT&T, Verizon

AT&T Inc., the biggest U.S. phone company, gained 69 cents to $34.44. Verizon Communications Inc., AT&T's closest rival, added 59 cents to $37.80.

Food, beverage and other consumer-staples stocks gained.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. added 88 cents to $49.37. The world's largest retailer is ``changing for the better, rapidly," Oppenheimer analyst Bernard Sosnick wrote.

Airlines gained following oil's decline and a debt-rating upgrade by Fitch Ratings for AMR Corp. and Continental Airlines Inc. The risk of a ``liquidity crisis" at the pair has been ``reduced dramatically," according to Fitch.

DOJ_NMG_0084120

The AMEX Airline Index rose 3.1 percent. AMR, the parent of American Airlines, advanced $1.42 to $27.70. Continental added $2.40 to $35.05. JetBlue Airways Corp. climbed 26 cents to $10.92.

Steelmakers in the S&P 500 declined 1.2 percent after India's Tata Steel Ltd. agreed to buy Corus Group Plc, creating the world's fifth-largest steel producer, for less than some investors expected. U.S. Steel Corp., the biggest U.S.-based steel company, fell $1.37 to $66.18.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, increased 3 cents to $136.84. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, added 10 cents to $42.

S&P 500 futures expiring in December advanced 0.60 to 1374.90 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures slipped 4 to 1718.75.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $642.7 million, fell 0.7 percent to 762.13. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, added 0.1 percent to 13,690.51. Based on its gain, the value of stocks increased by $23.9 billion.

AMR Corp. (AMR US) AT&T Inc. (T US) Caterpillar Inc. (CAT US) Coca-Cola Co. (KO US) Continental Airlines Inc. (CAL US) Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM US) Google Inc. (GOOG US) JetBlue Airways Corp. (JBLU US) Merck & Co. (MRK US) 3M Co. (MMM US) U.S. Steel Corp. (X US) Valero Energy Corp. (VLO US) Verizon Communications Inc. (VZ US) Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT US)

Oil Tumbles Below $57 On Skepticism OPEC Will Make Output Cuts (BLOOM)

By Mark Shenk

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Crude oil fell below $57 a barrel in New York for the first time this year as traders said OPEC members will fail to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day as planned.

The 4.4 percent reduction starting Nov. 1 will be based on how much members were pumping last month, rather than quotas, United Arab Emirates Oil Minister Mohamed al-Hamli, who will become president of the group in 2007, said after members met in Doha, Qatar. Prices have plunged 28 percent from the record of $78.40 a barrel reached July 14.

``I'll be surprised if we see them cut even half the volumes promised," said Michael Lynch, president of Strategic Energy & Economic Research in Winchester, Massachusetts. ``If prices stay at this level for a few weeks we'll probably see some of the weaker members such as Venezuela and Algeria forget about their pledges."

Crude oil for November delivery fell $1.68, or 2.9 percent, to $56.82 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, the lowest close since Nov. 29. Futures are down 3 percent this week and 6.9 percent from a year ago. The November contract expired today. The more-active December contract fell $1.17, or 1.9 percent, to close at $59.33 a barrel.

``The OPEC announcement may help explain why the spread between the November and December contracts grew today," said Jason Schenker, an economist with Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``OPEC's cuts may have an impact but we won't feel it until December at the earliest."

Expected Reduction

OPEC's cutback was larger than the reduction that ministers had been talking about for the past two weeks and was endorsed by OPEC's biggest producer, Saudi Arabia, which will trim output by 380,000 barrels a day.

``We needed more to stabilize the market," Algerian Oil Minister Chakib Khelil said after the meeting. Members are ``unanimous" that they need to ensure price stability, OPEC President and Nigerian Oil Minister Edmund Daukoru told reporters today in Madrid. OPEC ministers are concerned about falling prices and rising U.S. stockpiles, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, Qatar's oil minister, said in a phone interview on Oct. 11.

``When we advertised 1 million, the market didn't respond, so something more had to be done," Daukoru said in an interview.

OPEC may need to cut an additional 300,000 barrels a day when the group meets Dec. 14 in Abuja, Nigeria, Venezuelan Oil Minister Rafael Ramirez said today.

Appropriate Cut

DOJ_NMG_0084121

``The cut seems appropriate given the increase in stockpiles," said Aaron Kildow, a broker at Prudential Financial Derivatives LLC in New York. ``The most bullish thing to come out of the meeting was the announcement that they may cut again when they meet in December."

Prices may fall next week on doubts the producer group will cut production enough to reduce excess supplies, according to a Bloomberg News survey yesterday, before OPEC announced its decision. Twenty-one of 49 analysts, traders and brokers, or 43 percent, said prices will decline. Fourteen forecast an increase and 14 predicted little change.

``A cut of 1 million barrels was factored in so it looks like they decided to cut more to get the market's attention," said Rick Mueller, an analyst with Energy Security Analysis Inc. in Tilburg, the Netherlands. ``I doubt there will be a dramatic up-tick in prices because inventories are so high and uncertainty about what the members will actually cut."

U.S. crude oil inventories surged 5.02 million barrels to 335.6 million last week, the Energy Department reported Oct. 18. It was the biggest increase since March and left stockpiles 14 percent higher than the five-year average for the week, the department said. The U.S. consumes 25 percent of the world's oil.

Heating Season

``Demand should rise in coming weeks because of the approach of heating season," Kildow said.

Global consumption peaks during the Northern Hemisphere winter, when furnaces are stoked. The International Energy Agency, which advises 26 industrialized nations on energy policy, said OPEC's decision was ill-timed because demand will increase as the heating season nears.

``I think this cut comes at the worst time possible," IEA Executive Director Claude Mandil said today in a phone interview. ``I don't like the idea of OPEC trying to defend prices of $60 a barrel." That is not ``helpful" to consumer nations and poorer countries, he said.

Brent crude oil for December fell $1.19, or 2 percent, to close at $59.68 a barrel on the London-based ICE Futures exchange.

Oil Prices Drop Despite OPEC Call To Cut Output (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

If yesterday was a test of the power of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel flunked.

Hours after the world's leading group of oil producers vowed to cut output by 1.2 million barrels a day to stop a three-month-old slide in petroleum prices, oil prices on world markets continued to head downward. Crude oil slipped $1.68 a barrel yesterday to close at less than $57 a barrel in New York markets for the first time this year.

Oil traders and analysts said they remained unconvinced that OPEC members would have enough discipline to trim production by more than half the amount announced. And it remained unclear whether that smaller amount would be enough to stabilize prices as OPEC hopes.

"There's still a lot of skepticism about the extent to which they'll cut or not," said Adam E. Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank AG.

Meanwhile, the drop in oil prices continued to provide a boost to the U.S. economy, especially for companies sensitive to fuel prices. The shares of major airlines, for example, jumped after analysts boosted earnings estimates for several big carriers. They cited lower prices of jet fuel, one of the industry's biggest costs. Shares of American Airlines parent AMR Corp. rose $1.42 a share, or 5.4 percent, to close at $27.70. Continental Airlines Inc. set a new 52-week high for a second consecutive day.

Even if the cuts materialize, it will take weeks for them to work their way through the supply chain. OPEC said the cuts will take effect Nov. 1, but it would be several weeks before any change showed up on U.S. shores.

"The market is going to wait until it sees evidence that OPEC has cut back supply to a significant degree. And that's going to take time," said James Burkhard, managing director of the global oil group at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. He said that supply agreements for November had already been set. "So we're not likely to see much evidence of a cut until December," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0084122

In the absence of a measurable supply effect, the initial verdict on the production cuts was rendered by traders and investors based on psychology and expectations. "We are in the throes of momentum traders," said the head of commodity trading at a U.S. hedge fund, who requested anonymity so as not to disclose his position to competitors. "They don't care about demand for oil. All they care about is whether trends are broken. Those guys are in full control."

And the trend lines are pointing the opposite direction from the way they were looking earlier in the year. As a result, many of the speculative investors and hedge funds that were buying from February through August are now selling their energy positions.

"OPEC says it will defend a number and the assumption everyone makes is that $60 [a barrel] is that number," Sieminski said. "So there's a temptation to sell below that to force their hand and say, 'Let's see how many aces you're holding.' So what the Saudis and OPEC have to do to convince the speculators is to show that they have more than deuces in their hand."

Even analysts trying to look past today's market and calibrate real supply and demand two or three months from now were uncertain about what the balance would be. OPEC's own forecasts for next year are relatively pessimistic from the cartel's point of view. It sees world oil consumption rising by a relatively modest 1.3 million barrels a day and non-OPEC oil production rising by 1.8 million barrels a day, thus cutting demand for OPEC's oil.

But the Energy Department's Energy Information Administration sees a bigger increase in usage and a smaller increase in non-OPEC demand, resulting in a small increase in demand for OPEC oil.

Burkhard said that the uncertainty stems from an unclear picture of world economic growth and the conservation response to oil prices that have been very high for more than a year. Additional supplies next year will be coming from Canada; Brazil; West Africa, mostly Angola; and the Caspian Sea region, from Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan.

Even if OPEC succeeds in cutting world production below global consumption, which this year is running around 84.6 million barrels a day according to the International Energy Agency, ample inventories will soften the impact for a while. The IEA estimates that the 30 members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development have 55 days of oil in storage, up one day from last year and slightly more than usual.

Burkhard said that another factor in prices would be the gradual buildup of spare production capacity. In 2002, the world had about 7 million barrels a day of spare oil production capacity, about 10 percent of consumption then, that could be tapped if a geopolitical crisis disrupted supplies somewhere. By some estimates, that cushion had shrunk to about 1 million barrels a day while consumption had grown. That contributed to what many called a "fear factor" in the oil price, especially as tensions rose between the United States and Iran over Tehran's insistence on continuing its nuclear program without international restrictions.

Burkhard estimated that OPEC's current spare capacity is about 2.4 million barrels a day and would rise to 2.8 million barrels a day next year, without counting production capacity currently shut in by violence in Iraq and Nigeria.

"One of the reasons prices rose so high earlier this year was the fear about what could happen," Burkhard said. "It was driven by the thin cushion of spare production capacity. If OPEC now cuts back on production at the same time that it is adding capacity, then we are likely to see a bigger cushion of spare capacity, which would diminish the impact of geopolitical fears on the oil price."

Texas Justice Who Spoke For Bush Pick Is Cleared (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 20 — A Texas Supreme Court justice who championed a longtime friend and fellow Republican, Harriet E. Miers, for the United States Supreme Court last year was cleared Friday of charges that his efforts had violated state rules of judicial ethics.

The justice, Nathan. L. Hecht, 57, who is running for re-election, had received a public admonition, the mildest form of sanction, from the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. It said he had discredited the judiciary by giving about 120 interviews that amounted to an endorsement of another candidate and a lending of judicial prestige to a private interest.

But three appellate justices appointed as a Special Court of Review to hear Justice Hecht's appeal overturned the reprimand, which had carried no civil or criminal penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0084123

The true villain, a court majority said, was the ambiguity of the rules adopted by the Texas Supreme Court, the state's highest civil court, on which Justice Hecht has sat since 1989. Two of the three justices agreed with Justice Hecht that the ethics rules were improperly vague and did not apply to what he had done, at the urging of the White House, to further Ms. Miers's bid for the nation's highest court.

A third member of the special court found that Justice Hecht had violated the rules, but that they were unconstitutional because they limited his freedom of speech.

"I'm grateful to see it; I think they reached the right decision," Justice Hecht, the longest-serving member of the Texas Supreme Court, said by telephone after the ruling. He said he had expected to be vindicated, but the court would now have to grapple with rewriting the ethics code.

"We never thought about judges having free speech rights," he said. Revisions of the rules are "already in the mill," he added, "but there's still a lot of fog out there."

The case raised some perplexing questions. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said he had been prepared to call Justice Hecht as a witness if the Miers nomination had not faltered.

Would it have been proper for the justice to speak forcefully for Ms. Miers in the hearing room, but not outside it? If he had stayed silent in the face of questions about Ms. Miers, the justice testified, would that, too, not have been taken as a powerful negative comment, in view of their close 30-year friendship?

And most peculiarly, Justice Hecht testified, if the rules prevent judges from speaking out in support of a candidate, why do they allow comments in opposition?

The opinion by the special court, an appellate panel drawn at random by the Texas Supreme Court, found that the ethics code, or canons, had "a complete lack of definitions of critical terms" involving what judges cannot do to support or endorse candidates for public office.

"There is no bright line of demarcation between acceptable and prohibited conduct," the ruling said. "We decline to come down on the side of condemnation in the face of what we perceive as undeniably obvious: the ambiguity, confusion and apparent contradictions in the content, interpretation and application of the canons." It was signed by Justices Kerry P. Fitzgerald and Amos L. Mazzant, both Republicans from Dallas.

The third justice, Ann Crawford McClure, a Democrat from El Paso, agreed to reverse the admonition of Justice Hecht, but for different reasons. In her concurring opinion, Justice McClure wrote that Justice Hecht had broken the rules by appealing for support for Ms. Miers, thereby "endorsing" her and authorizing the use of his name and judicial office "to sell the Miers nomination." She also found that it had been in Ms. Miers's "private interest."

Moreover, Justice McClure said, because Justice Hecht said he had seen nothing wrong with his conduct and would do it again, "the evidence supports a finding that Justice Hecht willfully violated the canons."

Still, she said, since judges can make political contributions — "a Texas judge may put his money where his mouth can't go," as she put it — she agreed that the rules imposed unconstitutional limits on his freedom of speech. And so, she said, the sanctions had to be reversed.

Because the majority opinion did not rely on constitutional issues, it left little ground for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

The case also left much unclear. "Thirty-seven-hundred judges want to know what to do," Justice McClure wrote. New rules would have to be devised, she said, but she suggested to her fellow jurists: "Our ability to speak does not mean that we should speak. I haven't and I won't."

No Reprimand In Judge's Support Of Miers (AP-Y)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, October 21, 2006

A three-judge panel dismissed the reprimand of a Texas Supreme Court justice who publicly endorsed his friend Harriet Miers after her short-lived U.S. Supreme Court nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0084124

In a ruling announced Friday, the panel of appeals court judges said Nathan Hecht did not violate state rules that bar judges from lending their office's prestige to boost the private interests of themselves or others, and from using their names to endorse candidates for office.

"This is complete vindication for Justice Hecht," said his attorney, Chip Babcock. "It removes the only blemish on a 20-plus-year record of service to the state."

The State Commission on Judicial Conduct had admonished Hecht in May after two complaints were filed against him.

Hecht had told White House staff to send him all media inquiries about Mier's career and campaigned for her in about 120 newspaper, radio and television interviews, the commission said.

Mark Greenwald, an attorney for the commission, said the panel had expected that outcome and was glad that Hecht got his day in court. But he said that the commission had no guidance on rules for the conduct of other judges.

"It does signal our fears will be realized of endorsement shenanigans," he said.

Hecht had argued that he did not violate any ethics codes and had the right to free speech.

Miers was nominated last October by President Bush to replace the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor, but she dropped out under fire from conservatives who questioned her qualifications and would not support her.

Hecht, who worked with Miers in a Dallas law firm starting in the 1970s, said he didn't mean to endorse her, rather he wanted to provide information about her qualifications. He said he felt compelled to comment because being silent would have been perceived as trying to hide something about Miers.

Bush Drops In At Italian-American Dinner (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 21, 2006

President Bush made a surprise appearance Friday night at a National Italian American Foundation dinner show featuring Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons.

"I'm sorry I'm not going to be around to hear you," said Bush, who stunned the crowd when he slipped on stage.

The president recognized famous faces in the audience, including Justices Samuel Alito Jr. and Antonin Scalia, New York Yankees baseball legend Yogi Berra and Tommy Lasorda, the longtime manager of the Los Angeles Dodgers. Then his remarks turned serious.

Bush recognized one prominent Italian American, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was missing from the annual gathering that attracted more than 1,000 people to a Washington hotel. Bush said he would be meeting with Pace and other military leaders on Saturday to discuss the U.S. strategy for addressing ongoing violence in Iraq.

"We're in a titanic struggle between extremists and radicals who cannot stand the way of life of America," Bush said. "They don't like the thought that people from different backgrounds are able to live under a nation and work together and achieve greatness. They can't stand the thought of free societies flourishing in their midst."

The National Italian American Foundation promotes the contributions of nearly 25 million Italian Americans, who represent the fifth largest ethnic and voting group in the nation. Bush's appearance continued a three-decade tradition of every president attending the annual convention.

____

On the Net:

National Italian America Foundation http://www.niaf.org

White House http://www.whitehouse.gov

Ads Accuse Dems Of Not Protecting Kids (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 21, 2006

The text is white against a black screen. The sound is the electronic warbling of a video game. But in this political ad, the message is in the faceless voices of cheerful children engaged in mayhem.

"Hit the hooker with the tire iron!" "Steal the old lady's car." "Shoot her first!"

DOJ_NMG_0084125

The ad accuses a Democratic candidate of voting against banning the sale of violent and sexually explicit video games to children. Another ad, in Connecticut, says a Democrat voted to permit convicted sex offenders in public housing. Yet another, in Arizona, linked a candidate's work as a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union to the ACLU's defense of a pedophile's group.

In the fallout from former Rep. Mark Foley's electronic sex scandal, Republicans are turning the tables on Democrats, airing ads and leveling public accusations claiming their opponents have failed to protect children against sexual imagery, sexual violence or sexual predators.

It's a case that Republicans have made against Democrats for some time. But the portrayal of Democrats as weak in the defense of children now also serves as a counterpoint to Democratic charges that GOP leaders did little to protect teenage congressional pages against Foley's sexually explicit electronic messages.

"I don't think it would be getting much national attention if it wasn't for the Foley case," said Tom McClusky, vice president of government affairs for the conservative Family Research Council.

To be sure, the attention to sex and allegations of sex in this election is not limited to Foley or the voting records or professional associations of certain candidates. In Pennsylvania, Republican Rep. Don Sherwood has been dogged by an extramarital affair he acknowledged last year. In Nevada, a cocktail waitress accused Republican Rep. Jim Gibbons, who is running for governor, of propositioning her and assaulting her in a parking garage. Gibbons on Thursday denied the accusation.

In a handful of other races, Republicans have raised the image of a fringe organization, the North American Man Boy Love Association, and tried to link Democrats to it through their votes or their association with the ACLU. The civil liberties organization defended NAMBLA in a 2000 First Amendment case.

In Arizona, Republican Rep. Rick Renzi aired an ad citing his challenger's work for the ACLU and the ACLU's defense of the man-boy love organization. In California, Republican Rep. John Doolittle accused his challenger, Charlie Brown, of supporting NAMBLA because he has an ACLU membership. And in Ohio, Republican gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell accused his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ted Strickland, of siding with NAMBLA because he voted against a resolution condemning an article in a psychology journal about child sexual abuse.

"Republicans are running a hyper-negative campaign to close out this election season because they are so far behind," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "But voters are smarter than these ridiculous Republican charges give them credit for."

The ad featuring children playing a violent video game is aimed at Rep. Baron Hill, a Democrat and former House member who is trying to recapture his seat from Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel. It cites Hill's vote in 1999 against an amendment to a juvenile crime bill that would have prohibited the sale of violent and sexually explicit movies and video games to teenagers. The amendment failed after lawmakers argued against it on First Amendment grounds. Ninety-two Republicans also voted against the measure.

But Democrats are seeking to inoculate themselves against such charges. In New Mexico, state Attorney General Patricia Madrid, a Democrat who is challenging Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, has run an ad highlighting the work of her office's Internet sex crimes prosecution unit. In Colorado, Democratic House candidate Ed Perlmutter aired an ad emphasizing his commitment to children.

"In Congress," he says, "I'll fight to pass laws protecting kids from online predators and violent video games."

Helping Democrats Bridge The 'God Gap' (WP)

By Daniel Burke

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

At a meeting of the House Democrats' Faith Working Group, a perplexed congressman turned to his colleagues for pastoral guidance. How could he counter a local preacher who argued that all of Jesus's moral teachings were about the world to come, not the here and now?

Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) stood amid the sympathetic sighs and "you can't convert everyone" comments to offer a new spin on an old parable.

DOJ_NMG_0084126

The Good Samaritan is walking down the road and cares for a stranger who has been beaten and robbed, Price said. The next day, on the same road, another person has been beaten and robbed. So it goes for another week -- more robberies, more victims.

"How long is it going to take before the Samaritan says, 'Hey, maybe we ought to patrol this road,' " Price said. In other words, the lawmaker argued, there are some problems that individuals can't solve on their own. They require the resources of a morally responsible government.

As Democrats seek to reframe America's debate over moral values and close their "God gap" with religious communities, conversations such as these are blowing like a mighty wind through party circles.

Gone are the days when "faith outreach" meant visiting African-American churches two weeks before an election, party leaders say. Instead, Democrats are seeking -- and getting -- regular meetings with megachurch pastors T.D. Jakes, Joel Osteen and Rick Warren.

Rather than cede red states to Republicans, the party is buying airtime on Christian radio stations, with the message that Democrats are indeed a party with deep moral convictions.

No longer leaning on 1960s-era preachers to guide progressive politics, Democrats are now also turning to young voices such as strategist Mara Vanderslice, 31, and writer Amy Sullivan, 33, who offer new perspectives and fresh ideas.

While Republicans learned long ago how to connect with religious voters, Democrats are just now starting their efforts.

After interviews with dozens of politicians, strategists, the think-tank set and a Noah's ark of religious leaders, Religion News Service has identified 12 of the most influential voices in helping Democrats reach people of faith. Those on the list are whispering in the ears of the powerful and playing matchmaker between religious and political pace-setters.

They are:

Â· The House Trinity : Reps. James E. Clyburn (S.C.), Rosa L. DeLauro (Conn.) and David Price, who lead the effort on Capitol Hill to frame legislative debates in moral terms.

Â· The Theologian : Shaun Casey, an ethicist at Washington's Wesley Theological Seminary, who provides a moral and historical framework for progressive faith-based politics.

Â· The Preacher : Leah Daughtry, chief of staff at the Democratic National Committee, who champions outreach to religious voters at party headquarters.

Â· The Model : Timothy M. Kaine, governor of Virginia, who showed Democrats how a faith-infused campaign can turn a red state blue.

Â· The Insider : Michael McCurry, former White House press secretary, who coaxes Washington Democrats into sharing their spiritual sides.

Â· The Blessed One : Barack Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, who challenges his party to make room for religion in the public square.

Â· The Prophet : Rabbi David Saperstein, head of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, who is one of Washington's most articulate voices in liberal politics.

Â· The Matchmaker : Burns Strider, a staffer who shepherds the House Democratic Faith Working Group and corrals lawmakers into meetings with the religious community.

Â· The Agitator : Amy Sullivan, an independent but opinionated journalist who pens passionate pleas for Democrats to "get religion."

Â· The Strategist : Mara Vanderslice of the consulting firm Common Good Strategies, who works the campaign trail, helping candidates build relationships with diverse religious communities.

In some ways, these 12 people reflect the diversity for which Democrats pride themselves. They include a former Churches of Christ minister, a Pentecostal preacher, two Catholics, a Methodist Sunday school teacher, an Episcopalian, a progressive evangelical, Baptists and a rabbi.

Some at Democratic Party headquarters are taking an under-the-radar approach to religious outreach and are reluctant to divulge all the party's plans and advisers.

DOJ_NMG_0084127

"Our focus is not in putting someone behind a pulpit," said Leslie Brown, the DNC's "faith in action" coordinator. But after conducting polls, meeting with state party chairs and undertaking an "internal education," Democrats are building a "message-driven machine," Brown said.

"We want to talk about things in ways we can relate to the faith community," said Rep. Clyburn, who heads the Faith Working Group. "I don't talk about the environment just as keeping things green, I talk about it in terms of stewardship."

But while recent polls suggest evangelicals may be growing disillusioned with Republicans, many are still reluctant to pull the lever for Democratic candidates, said the Rev. Richard Cizik, vice president of the National Association of Evangelicals.

"Simply using 'faith language' won't redound to the benefit of any candidate, Republican or Democrat, without some authenticity there," Cizik said.

"When evangelicals think about the reputation of the Republican Party, which isn't too good right now, at least it does have a record of reaching out to those voters and it does have a record on Capitol Hill of at least trying to carry water for their issues," Cizik said.

Still, there are issues such as the environment, poverty, war and health care on which Democratic positions dovetail with those of many religious Americans, party leaders say.

"It's not always pretty," Casey of Wesley Theological Seminary said of Democrats' fledgling efforts to reach these voters. "But the good news is everybody realizes the party has to do a better job."

Politics Why The Center Matters In This Election (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont. -- As candidates head into the final two weeks of midterm election campaigns, Democrats see an opportunity as wide as the Rocky Mountain skies. The question, here and elsewhere, is whether they can hold high ground in the place that matters most in 2006.

That place, oddly enough, appears to be the political center. Polls suggest Republicans so far have lost the center -- in overwhelming proportions. To maintain their grip on power in Congress, they need to find some way to woo a big chunk of it back in the next 17 days.

Prevailing political wisdom holds that the only things that matter are each party's "base" -- that there is no center anymore, and no more swing voters worth chasing. But look at what has happened among independent voters in the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC Poll1, taken this past week: Support for Republicans has collapsed. Just 24% of them say they want President Bush's party to control Congress after Election Day. Independents disapprove of Mr. Bush's job performance by 2 to 1.

That's a big change from 2004, when Mr. Bush and John Kerry split the votes of independents. The president won for two reasons. He maintained higher allegiance within his own party -- just 6% of Republicans backed Mr. Kerry, while 11% of Democrats crossed over to support Mr. Bush -- and he generated sufficient partisan enthusiasm that Republicans matched Democrats as a proportion of the electorate.

Although Democrats display greater zest about this election, the "base" of Mr. Bush's party appears solid: Just 5% of Republicans want Democrats to take over Capitol Hill. Just 2% of Democrats want Republicans to win. By the standards of modern political history, those are extraordinary levels of partisan cohesion. In the landmark midterm elections of 1974 (when Democrats won big), 1982 (ditto) and 1994 (big Republican gains), more than twice that many voters crossed party lines.

Here in Montana, Democrats have nominated Jon Tester for the Senate. With a flat-top haircut, an ample farmer's belly and a hand that was mangled in a meat grinder when he was a boy, he appeals to locals. He attacks incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns for having lost touch with Montana while cozying up to lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"My first priority will be not what any Democrat or Republican wants, but what the state of Montana needs," Mr. Tester says. Popular Democratic Gov. Brian Schweitzer, who has revived his party's fortunes in this red state, says Sen. Burns has developed "senator-itis."

But Sen. Burns hasn't won three terms by lacking political skills. He'll try to make up a deficit in the polls these last two weeks by accusing his opponent of favoring tax increases. He won't rail against "earmarks" the way some Republicans are doing to court their disaffected right wing. In a classic appeal toward centrists, Sen. Burns will invoke his clout as an appropriations subcommittee chairman. "When it comes to the state of Montana, seniority is important, effectiveness is important, and experience is important," he says. The odds may appear to be against him and his party, but his campaign's close will be pointed toward the voters who count most in campaign 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0084128

McCain Tries To Trump Republican Woes (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

John McCain is one of the few Republicans to find a silver lining in an otherwise dreary political season for his party.

That is because the Arizona senator has capitalized in an aggressive and systematic way by using the 2006 fight for control of Congress to lay the groundwork for a probable run for the presidency in 2008.

Mr. McCain is crisscrossing the country on behalf of beleaguered Republicans, tapping his position as one of his party's most popular figures at a time when the image of President Bush and other administration officials is slumping. The senator has steered $1.2 million of campaign funds so far to Republican candidates and political committees. He is enlisting influential grass-roots supporters in Iowa and New Hampshire, pivotal early battlegrounds in the presidential-nomination fight.

And he is firing up the party's conservative foot soldiers, picking a fight with New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, a likely top Democratic presidential candidate, over whether her husband's administration took adequate steps to contain North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

McCain aides say he isn't doing anything differently than in years past, when the combative senator helped rally the Republican faithful during midterm elections. What is different now is that Mr. McCain is the biggest name in the ranks of Republicans considering a run for the presidency. Much of the work he has done this year for others can also help solidify his own status as the likely Republican front-runner.

"Obviously, we'd be committing malpractice as his advisers if we weren't laying the groundwork for a campaign," says longtime McCain strategist John Weaver. "I don't think anyone outside of perhaps the president has put more on the line and worked harder for the party and candidates than John has."

Republican consultant Greg Mueller said the political spadework by Mr. McCain, long considered an outsider within his own party, is helping him build ties with the conservative activists and party mandarins who play a key role in determining the Republican nomination. "McCain right now is leveraging the midterm elections to position himself as the national candidate and national front-runner," Mr. Mueller said.

Meanwhile, the senator's role as a critic of the administration's handling of Iraq -- from troop levels to reconstruction to the treatment of detainees -- has earned him credibility with a wider swath of voters. And while this has put welcome distance between him and a weakened White House, he hasn't wavered from defending his own vote in favor of toppling Saddam Hussein.

The Arizona senator isn't the only Republican with higher ambitions who is trying to forge alliances. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and New York Gov. George Pataki are among the potential Republican presidential hopefuls traversing the country to make campaign appearances with, and distribute contributions to, state and federal candidates.

"Everybody's pretty much equal" in terms of visibility in New Hampshire, said that state's Senate president, Ted Gatsas, referring to the potential Republican hopefuls. But Mr. McCain made a big splash at a Republican fund-raiser in the state earlier this year, raising more than $80,000. "It was probably the single most successful fund-raiser the Senate Republican PAC [political-action committee] had this year," Mr. Gatsas said.

Indeed, no one appears to be working as hard as Mr. McCain and his political team, which now includes Terry Nelson, political director of the 2004 Bush-Cheney campaign. "McCain's got something going almost everywhere," said Charles Black, a veteran Republican strategist.

McCain aides said the senator won't make a formal decision about seeking the presidency until early next year. Should he enter the 2008 race, he would find a much different landscape than in 2000, when he jousted unsuccessfully with Mr. Bush for the Republican nomination. Then, the war hero-turned-politician was the underdog, while then-Texas Gov. Bush traded on his famous last name to become the early favorite of the party establishment.

DOJ_NMG_0084129

Now it is Mr. McCain who is working to assume the establishment mantel.

Since Labor Day, the senator's team has worked hard to create a sense of momentum. Every week has brought new announcements of local officials who have aligned themselves with the senator's political-action committee, known as Straight Talk America. Many are in battleground states such as Michigan, New Hampshire and Iowa. If Mr. McCain decides to run for the presidency, Straight Talk America would effectively serve as a launch pad for his candidacy.

Mr. McCain's ties with Mr. Bush have been strained since 2000. But recently, he has been at pains to stress that many of his new grass-roots supporters have been past backers of Mr. Bush. In Michigan, former Bush fund-raiser James Nicholson, one of the president's top moneymen, has agreed to lead fund raising in the state for Mr. McCain. Mr. McCain's team in Iowa is being led by Dave Roederer, who served as state chairman of the Bush-Cheney re-election team in 2004.

Mr. McCain has plans to campaign almost daily through Nov. 7. He has already been on the road for weeks, recently visiting Wisconsin, South Dakota and Iowa. Though many voters are taking a dim view of the Republican Party, Mr. McCain remains a big draw. On a recent stop in Sioux Falls, S.D., a 17-year-old student interviewer asked for Mr. McCain's autograph. "I couldn't miss the chance to get him to sign my poster," the student said.

Embattled Republican candidates campaigning with Mr. McCain, meanwhile, are benefiting from his carefully cultivated image as an iconoclast who nonetheless remains loyal to the party. In Virginia, incumbent Sen. George Allen, who until recently had harbored his own presidential ambitions and is in an unexpectedly tough race, has featured Mr. McCain in television ads.

The relentlessly bad news from Iraq, along with voter outrage over the Foley-page scandal and unease about the economy, have given Democrats the best chance in more than a decade to retake Congress.

In the months ahead, demand is likely to grow among Republicans for new leadership and a message that broadens the party's reach. That could benefit Mr. McCain, said Fred Greenstein, a scholar at Princeton University. "There is a market for someone who seems to transcend the very sharp cleavages in politics," he says. "McCain has a lot of that."

Questions remain about how much Mr. McCain's work in 2006 will matter as the 2008 fight unfolds and whether he has put at risk his image as an independent voice by entwining himself with the Republican establishment. The answers won't become clear for many months.

Scott Reed, who managed Republican Sen. Bob Dole's presidential campaign a decade ago, says Mr. McCain's work in 2006 will no doubt help down the line. "It is a good time to build a foundation, to put together a real nomination fight," Mr. Reed says. "He's getting some chits."

In Debate, Clinton Deflects Questions About 2008 (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

ROCHESTER, Oct. 20 — Facing a barrage of questions about her national ambitions during the first Senate debate on Friday night, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton firmly maintained that she was focused on her work in Congress and had made no decisions about running for president.

But her Republican opponent seized on her aspirations at every opening, accusing her of already abdicating her responsibilities to New York.

In a lively but cordial hour of exchanges, Mrs. Clinton steered toward substantive answers about foreign and domestic policy, and was sharply critical of the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq.

One of the most spirited exchanges came when she repeated her call for President Bush to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"You know, in the middle of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln did not hesitate to change generals," Mrs. Clinton said, drawing applause from the audience at the University of Rochester auditorium.

"You're not president yet, Mrs. Clinton," her opponent, John Spencer, the former mayor of Yonkers, shot back, noting that Lincoln was the president, not a senator, when he made critical decisions about that war.

DOJ_NMG_0084130

The debate put the former first lady and her little-known challenger on an even stage for the first time in the campaign. But the question of Mrs. Clinton's ambitions beyond Election Day hovered over the event, with the debate considered a rare chance to see how the former first lady might perform in a political ritual common to presidential races.

Mr. Spencer, who is far behind in the polls, alluded to the difference in their national stature, joking that he, for one, had no intention of running for president if he won the Senate race.

Yet Mrs. Clinton, despite her far greater celebrity and resources in a race she appears poised to win, seemed to take her rival's criticisms seriously. She grew visibly defensive at one point, interrupting the line of questioning to respond to his accusations that she had not taken national security seriously enough and had weakened the nation's defenses by raising questions about the administration's secret wiretapping program.

"So many attacks, so little time," she said.

The underlying tone, nonetheless, was civil. Mr. Spencer took the stage first, greeting the crowd somewhat awkwardly. Mrs. Clinton then strode out to meet him, calling Mr. Spencer by his first name and telling him she was glad to see him.

When it was over, the two sides dispersed, barely bothering with the "spin room" where political strategists traditionally try to convince reporters that their candidates won.

The debate, the first of two, is scheduled to be replayed on C-Span on Saturday at 8 p.m. A second debate is set for Sunday morning, a time slot that, like Friday night, is unlikely to draw a sizable audience.

The debate setting proved critical for Mrs. Clinton in her first campaign six years ago: When her Republican rival, Rick A. Lazio, approached her onstage during their first debate and demanded she sign a pledge refusing soft-money donations, he appeared harsh and in turn made her look vulnerable. Strategists later blamed the incident for Mr. Lazio's defeat, saying the moment had helped Mrs. Clinton with female voters who had started out wary of her.

Mrs. Clinton ultimately beat Mr. Lazio by double digits, a relative breeze compared with what might have been a close race with Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani if he had not dropped out.

And she has faced hardly a ripple of trouble in the years since. Her popularity is high statewide, her political opposition minimal; even some Republicans in upstate areas appear to have warmed to her as a senator, a fact her advisers intend to trumpet if she performs well on Nov. 7 and then turns to run for president.

A Quinnipiac University poll released this week showed Mrs. Clinton at 65 percent and Mr. Spencer at 30 percent, with 5 percent of voters undecided. That is an almost exact reversal of the state electorate's feelings about President Bush: 64 percent said they disapproved of his job performance as president, and 29 percent said they approved.

"Barring some cataclysmic reversal, Clinton-for-president can start cranking up for real on Nov. 8," said Maurice Carroll, director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

Mrs. Clinton's smooth trajectory since becoming a senator has been a shift after her turbulent years as a political wife. Few expected that she would court Republican allies after the bitter impeachment of her husband, or have the patience, after eight years in the White House, to focus on the minutiae of constituent work.

Similarly, Mr. Spencer has been in an unexpected spot as Mrs. Clinton's Republican challenger — abandoned financially by the national party, hardly recognized throughout the state. Mr. Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, had less than $475,000 in campaign funds at the end of September, a pittance compared with her approximately $15.8 million in the bank. Mrs. Clinton has raised nearly $50 million and spent about $35 million; both the infrastructure she has built and whatever money is left at the end can be transferred into a presidential race if she decides to run.

Mr. Spencer appears poised to win a good part of the third of the state that tends to vote Republican. With strong anti-abortion views and his ardent support for the Bush administration, he has run a lonely race, with little aid even from other Republicans in New York.

"I've been stabbed in the back," Mr. Spencer told the conservative columnist Robert D. Novak, who wrote that Mrs. Clinton was getting a "free pass to pursue both national party-building and her own presidential ambitions."

Mrs. Clinton, who turns 59 on Thursday, has insisted she is focused on running for re-election, a line that has become something of a comic refrain in her office. Yet she has run television and radio spots in her race, part of an effort to drive up Democratic turnout and run up her score.

DOJ_NMG_0084131

During the Democratic primary season this year, Mrs. Clinton refused to debate her antiwar challenger, Jonathan Tasini, all but ignoring his candidacy and sidestepping his attacks on her vote to authorize the invasion of Iraq.

Yet Mrs. Clinton did recalibrate her tone on the war, growing much sharper in her criticism of its handling — a move that not only secured her landslide victory in the August primary, but also helped lay the groundwork for a possible run in a presidential primary in 2008.

Clinton, Spencer Hold Debate In New York (AP-Y)

By Marc Humbert

AP, October 21, 2006

The Republican seeking to unseat Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton went on the attack against her in their first debate Friday, accusing her of putting presidential aspirations ahead of voters.

"I'm the only one standing on this platform who wants to be a United States senator for New York for the next six years," said John Spencer, a former Yonkers mayor, in his opening remarks.

Clinton acknowledged that she has thought about running for the presidency in 2008, but said she is committed to running for Senate re-election.

"As you might guess, I've been asked that a few times before," she said of her possible White House aspirations. "I am focused on this election. I am focused on my work in the Senate. Obviously, people are talking about whether I will or should be running for president, and I'm flattered by that."

The debate attracted attention because Clinton, whose re-election appears increasingly likely, is the front-runner among potential 2008 Democratic presidential candidates. Analysts say the debates could be an important dress rehearsal for Clinton as she prepares to step onto the national stage.

Spencer is an ultraconservative former mayor of the New York City suburb of Yonkers, battling anonymity and a national party that has forsaken his candidacy.

He bashed Clinton throughout during the debate, attacking her on issues including immigration, North Korea and Iraq.

In Spencer, Clinton faces an abortion-hating, anti-gun-control conservative who has been vocal in his support of President Bush and the war in Iraq. Though she voted for the war, Clinton, who supports abortion rights, has strongly criticized Bush's conduct of the conflict.

Spencer said he favored changing war strategies, while Clinton said she favored changing course. She said that Bush's stay-the-course stance was not a strategy and that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is not credible any longer.

"In the middle of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln did not hesitate to change generals," she said.

Spencer scolded Clinton for taking such a position because Rumsfeld serves the president, and "you are not president yet," he said.

Clinton stressed the need for diplomacy on such issues as the nuclear situation in North Korea — something she said the Bush administration has failed to do.

"This administration doesn't like to talk to people they disagree with," Clinton said.

But she said she would not rule out using military force against North Korea.

Spencer showed flashes of humor, such as when he was asked about speculation that he was using the Senate race to set himself up for another run for mayor of Yonkers.

"I'm not going to leave a six-year term in the Senate to run for mayor of Yonkers again," he said.

A statewide poll released on the eve of the debate by Quinnipiac University's Polling Institute had Clinton leading Spencer 65 percent to 30 percent. She has also far outspent him.

The timing of the one-hour televised debates accepted by Clinton, Friday night in Rochester and Sunday morning in New York City, appeared designed to attract small television audiences. Spencer had sought a series of debates all across the state.

Spencer has been complaining loudly for months that the national GOP has left him hanging.

"Running for U.S. Senate against Hillary Clinton is a lot like walking point," said the decorated Vietnam War veteran. "You find out who your buddies are real fast."

DOJ_NMG_0084132

Friday's debate was sponsored and moderated by Time Warner cable television news channels and was aired across the state.

Focusing On Opinions, Slipping On Some Facts (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The art of politics often calls upon more opinion and generalization than specific factual claims that can be disproved. So it went for most of the first half of last night's debate between Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and her Republican challenger, John Spencer.

In fact, on the question hanging over the race, and the first to arise in the debate — will Mrs. Clinton, a Democrat, run for president in 2008? — there is no provable answer, though it would be hard to find a politically minded American without an opinion.

But as the debate in Rochester wore on, Mr. Spencer — the more heated, less rehearsed of the two — made questionable statements on a number of issues, including the fruits of the Bush administration's warrantless wiretapping, North Korea's nuclear program and Mrs. Clinton's voting record on security matters. At one point, he contradicted his own Web site on the subject of a proposed fence along the Mexican border.

Mrs. Clinton had her own slips, notably in insisting that her failed 1993 health care plan would not have been government-run, but with a lead of about 30 points in voter surveys, she has the luxury of sticking to her script, and she is adept at that. More often it was Mr. Spencer making the doubtful claims.

He derided a deal made in 1994 by the administration of Bill Clinton that was supposed to halt the nuclear weapons program of Kim Jong Il, the North Korean dictator. "He was duping us," Mr. Spencer said of Mr. Kim. "He was taking care of his military, starving his people and making plutonium."

In fact, intelligence officials say that as long as that deal stood, North Korea was not taking plutonium from its nuclear power plant and processing it for use in nuclear weapons, in part because United Nations inspectors were monitoring the program.

The 1994 pact fell apart after George W. Bush became president, a development that became known to the West in 2002, when it was revealed that Mr. Kim's regime had been secretly enriching uranium — another element that can make the core of an atomic bomb — in violation of the agreement.

On Oct. 8, North Korea detonated an atomic bomb for the first time, and United States government officials say that the fuel used was plutonium, processed either before the 1994 agreement, or since the agreement collapsed.

Mr. Spencer defended the Bush administration's program of wiretapping some communications of people within the United States without first obtaining warrants, and said Mrs. Clinton had voted against it. In fact, there has been no vote, in part because the administration says it does not need Congressional authority. Mrs. Clinton has said that she would vote to give the president some ability to conduct warrantless wiretapping, though she has also said that in many cases warrants should be obtained.

One of the debate panelists, in asking Mr. Spencer a question, stated that he favored building a 2,000-mile fence along the Mexican border to keep out illegal immigrants. Mr. Spencer interrupted to say that was not his view.

It was pointed out that his campaign Web site takes that position, saying, "Build a 2,000-mile-long fence to span the U.S.-Mexico border to slow border crossings and aid the efforts of those patrolling the border."

Mr. Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, shrugged and said, "First of all, I haven't looked at my Web site in about six months."

Late in the debate, Mrs. Clinton was asked if she still favored the kind of government-run health care she proposed in 1993. She countered that that plan "is not government-run."

But under the 1993 proposal, the federal government would have required employers to buy health insurance, the government would have established health care cooperatives for buying insurance, and the government would have regulated premiums.

DOJ_NMG_0084133

As for Mrs. Clinton's presidential aims, Mr. Spencer said that of the two candidates, only he intended to serve a full six-year term.

Mrs. Clinton replied, "I don't know what the future holds and I have no decision ready to be made or even waiting in the wings."

People may believe or disbelieve her, but only one person knows for certain whether she is telling the truth.

Elizabeth Edwards Apologizes To Clinton (AP-Y)

By Philip Elliott

AP, October 21, 2006

Elizabeth Edwards, wife of White House hopeful John Edwards, apologized to Sen. Hillary Clinton after saying her choices in life have made her happier than the senator, a Clinton aide said Friday.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Elizabeth Edwards called the New York Democrat on Friday night just after she finished a debate in Rochester, N.Y., against Republican challenger John Spencer.

"Elizabeth Edwards called her and apologized," Wolfson said. "They had a good conversation."

Wolfson said the two spoke only for a couple of minutes.

"The senator thanked her for the call and wished her well on her book tour," Wolfson said.

The apology followed remarks by Elizabeth Edwards on Thursday at a luncheon sponsored by Ladies' Home Journal.

"She and I are from the same generation," she said of the senator and former first lady. "We both went to law school and married other lawyers, but after that we made other choices. I think my choices have made me happier. I think I'm more joyful than she is."

Clinton and Edwards, the former North Carolina senator and Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2004, are potential rivals for their party's presidential nomination in 2008.

Edwards said she didn't know the New York senator very well but said Clinton would be "a formidable opponent" for her husband.

Before the apology, she released a statement Friday evening disputing reports about the event.

"Unfortunately, large portions of the material released by (Ladies' Home Journal) as quoted statements by me were erroneous and nearly all the statements, either because of significant omissions, or editing, or error, give a misimpression about what I said," Edwards said. "This is particularly true with respect to my comments about Sen. Clinton, who holds a serious and demanding public office while I am largely home, joyfully I must admit, with two lovely children."

Edwards also said she has "great respect" for the senator.

Asked for specific examples of errors, a spokeswoman for Edwards' One America Committee said the magazine's transcript combined answers to two questions into one quote. Also, her comments about being joyous referred to previous experiences and were not meant to be a contemporary comparison, said the spokeswoman, Kim Rubey.

Later, Rubey said Edwards called Clinton "to explain that her words had been taken out of context and to express her regret for the misunderstanding."

Ladies' Home Journal, which provided a transcript, said the quotes were accurate.

Edwards, who is promoting her memoir, "Saving Graces," recalled how as first lady Clinton deftly answered questions on Capitol Hill during testimony on President Clinton's health care proposal.

"As a woman, you couldn't help cheering from the sidelines," Edwards said. "That will be a factor for John. She will be a formidable opponent."

___

Associated Press writer Marc Humbert in Rochester, N.Y., contributed to this report.

Lieberman Gets A Boost From A Republican And A Lift From A Recent Survey (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084134

HARTFORD, Oct. 20 — United States Senator Joseph I. Lieberman won the backing of a top Republican in the Senate on Friday as Howard Dean traveled here to rally Democrats behind Ned Lamont's effort to unseat Mr. Lieberman.

On the same day, a new independent poll was released showing Mr. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary to Mr. Lamont and is running as an independent, with a substantial lead as he seeks a fourth term.

Mr. Lieberman appeared at the New London City Pier with Senator Susan M. Collins, a Republican from Maine, to highlight the need for port security — and to campaign together. Ms. Collins said her support for Mr. Lieberman, a one-time Democratic vice-presidential candidate, marked the first time she was backing a "non-Republican."

Ms. Collins said she admired his ability to work with both parties in Washington. "There are certain leaders, and certain issues, that transcend partisan politics and require work across party lines, and Joe Lieberman is that leader, and homeland security is that issue," she said.

While Ms. Collins said she wanted nothing more than to see Mr. Lieberman win, she added that she did not want the Democrats to win back the Senate, where she heads the Homeland Security committee.

"As much as I love Joe Lieberman, I like being chairman," she said, embracing Mr. Lieberman with a laugh.

"This is one area where we have a slight disagreement," said a smiling Mr. Lieberman, who is the ranking minority member on the committee. He has said he will caucus with the Democrats if he wins.

Mr. Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, appeared at a sports bar in the state capital to rally support for Mr. Lamont and other Democratic candidates, including John DeStefano, the mayor of New Haven, who is running for governor, and Christopher S. Murphy, who is trying to unseat Congresswoman Nancy L. Johnson, a Republican.

His stop in Connecticut coincided with the release of a Quinnipiac University poll that showed Mr. Lamont trailing Mr. Lieberman by 17 percentage points, widening a 10-point lead he held in a Quinnipiac poll last month. The poll showed a 52 to 35 lead among likely voters and was conducted from Tuesday through Thursday. It had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

The Republican candidate for the Senate, Alan Schlesinger, trailed with 6 percent of the vote. Another 7 percent said they were undecided.

Mr. Lieberman was ebullient about the results, saying it showed that his bipartisan message was working. The polls suggest that Mr. Lieberman has overwhelming support from Republicans, but has also maintained a large chunk of Democratic support.

But Mr. Dean, along with other state party leaders, used the day to rally for a change in Washington, maintaining that Mr. Lamont's victory in the primary was a sign of progress. "Your state has done something extraordinary," he said. "Your state had a courageous person step up when nobody thought he could win and take on folks who supported the Bush policy." The Democrats are also challenging Republican incumbents in three competitive House seats in Connecticut.

Mr. Lamont took a veiled jab at Mr. Lieberman, who said earlier this week that Democrats should take control over Congress only if they ratcheted down the tone of partisanship in Washington.

"I don't know why it is, but it sure seems like George Bush and Dick Cheney really want Joe Lieberman in the U.S. Senate," Mr. Lamont said in brief remarks at the rally, prompting the audience to boo at the mention of the president's name.

On Thursday, President Bush used Mr. Lieberman's loss in the primary to roundly criticize the Democratic Party, saying that it showed that "if you want to be a Democrat these days, you can be for almost anything, but victory in Iraq is not an option."

Mr. Lieberman dismissed the president's remarks on Friday, saying that "people who are for giving up on Iraq" and "people who don't want to give up" have both tried to use the results of the Connecticut primary to their advantage.

Senate Candidate Confronts Opponent (AP-Y)

By Beth Rucker

AP, October 21, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr. turned up at a news conference Friday in Memphis called by his opponent, Republican Bob Corker, leading to a confrontation about Ford's large, politically active family.

DOJ_NMG_0084135

Ford, a Memphis congressman, and Corker are locked in a tight race that could help determine whether Democrats gain control of the Senate.

Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, has said he wouldn't make Ford's family an issue in the race, but in recent debates said the Fords engaged in "machine-type politics."

Corker has questioned the work of Ford's father, former U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Sr., as a lobbyist for Fannie Mae while Ford Jr. sat on the House committee overseeing the mortgage giant's activities.

Ford Jr. said that no one in his family has ever lobbied him on congressional issues and that he would refuse them if they did.

Corker had scheduled the Friday morning news conference at a Memphis airport to discuss a proposal to prohibit relatives of senators and representatives from lobbying their family members. The Ford campaign had said the congressman would also be there.

The meeting between the two men was captured by WREG-TV in Memphis. It was unclear whether the confrontation happened before or after the news conference.

Ford, who was speaking with reporters, spotted Corker in the parking lot and began walking toward him. Ford told Corker that he wanted to debate him on the Iraq war, then mentioned Ford's plan to partition Iraq into three regions.

But then Corker stopped him and said he had come to talk about ethics. Corker called Ford's visit to the news conference "a true sign of desperation."

Ford replied, "I could never find you...." Corker said he was in Jackson, northeast of Memphis, on Thursday night, but Ford brought the conversation back to Iraq.

"Tell me, what do you think about this Iraq thing?" Ford asked. "I know you're here to talk about my family. I thought you made a promise right after ..."

"No, no, no. I'm here to talk about you, and this race," Corker said before walking away.

The Ford campaign issued a statement Friday afternoon.

"I fully support prohibiting family members from lobbying members of Congress," Ford said. "As Mr. Corker knows full well, I have never been lobbied by any member of my family at any time on any matter before the Congress."

Playboy And Pastors Enlisted For Attack Adverts (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

The Republican attack advertisement starts with a clip from the rival candidate's campaign. It shows Harold Ford, sitting in church, saying he will not be painted as someone he is not. "Fair enough," intones the announcer. "So what kind of man parties with Playboy playmates in lingerie, then films political ads from a church pew?"

Cue: images of Mr Ford, the Democrat candidate for a Tennessee Senate seat, with James Bond-style silhouettes of Playboy bunnies, to highlight his hypocrisy. Then it cuts to images of Osama bin Laden and shadowy mig-rants darting through a forest.

The barbs are typical of a mid-term election campaign that experts say is unprecedented in its negative advertising. Candidates have been accused of all known earthly sins: mistress throttling, paedophile protecting, corruption, caring more about the sex habits of "the Two Spirited Aleutian Eskimos, whoever they are" than body armour.

In the Virginia Senate race, George Allen, the Rep-ublican, accused his opponent of trading on his brief period in the Ronald Reagan administration, invoking a letter from the secular saint, Nancy Reagan, to get him to stop doing so. In return the Democrats charged Mr Allen with failing to disclose stock options and of allowing the "corporate financing of terrorist states".

Such adverts are nothing new in American politics. The Tennessee advert had a precedent in one for another Ford: Gerald Ford, weaving the same twin themes of Playboy and church. President Ford's 1976 re-election campaign advert took a swipe at the Democrat Jimmy Carter for giving an interview to the magazine. It shows a pastor in church saying he had asked Mr Ford if he would have given such an interview and was told "no". Mr Ford is shown nodding from the pews.

DOJ_NMG_0084136

John Geer, professor of political science at Vanderbilt University and author of In Defense of Negativity, said: "2006 marks the most negative mid-term campaign in recent memory. In September the Republican party admitted early on that they would invest heavily in attack adverts. They don't normally say they are going negative."

The Republican national committee will spend 90 per cent of its $50m (€40m, £27m) budget on negative adverts. The toughest come from the national parties: outsourcing attacks offers a veneer of respectability to candidates. The national Republican senatorial committee paid for the Ford ad. When Bob Corker, the candidate, was asked, he demurred: "I haven't seen the ad."

Congressional campaign adverts tend to be nastier than presidential ones, says Mr Geer. "Many are not exactly prime-time candidates and the quality of their advertising teams tends to vary more. Weak consultants and weak candidates do weak adverts."

Negative adverts are usually more accurate, and informative, than positive adverts that offer woolly endorsements of abstract ideals such as peace, democracy or, in the ironic case of Michael Steele, the Senate candidate in Maryland, puppies. "For the record, I love puppies," one advert says. Instead, negative ads cite specific votes or documents.

In the Pennsylvania Senate race, Rick Santorum skewered his rival with facts about how much work Bob Casey had skipped, such as failing to complete 800 audits as governor. "Before running for a new job, shouldn't he show up for the one we already pay him for?"

Getting facts wrong can be fatal. Another Santorum ad-vert depicts Mr Casey's campaign team as shady crooks. The Democratic senatorial campaign committee points out: "Two have even contributed to Santorum's 2006 campaign. One of the alleged 'team' died two years ago."

In Mr Ford's case, the Play-boy advert was grounded in truth. Although he denied he had ever been to a "Playboy mansion party", he did go to one in Jacksonville after the SuperBowl last year. Even so, the advert could still backfire – and get him the sports and the church vote. As Mr Geer notes: "A lot of people would like to go to a SuperBowl party and go to church the next day."

Allen, Webb Are Not Spotlighting Their Positions On Immigration (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Millions of protesters took to the streets this year to demand amnesty for unauthorized immigrants. Congress debated immigration bills for months before approving a 700-mile border fence. In several fiercely contested political races nationwide, illegal immigration has taken center stage.

The candidates in Virginia's Senate race, meanwhile, have barely touched it.

Republican Sen. George Allen and his challenger, Democrat James Webb, have stark differences on the issue. While both call for sealing the borders, Allen brooks no sympathy for illegal immigrants and favors guest-worker plans. Webb supports legalization for some immigrants and opposes broad programs for temporary foreign labor.

Analysts say the relative absence of immigration in the race reflects the increasingly tricky proposition of campaigning on polarizing topics, especially in a traditionally conservative state with a changing political landscape. In recent elections, Northern Virginia voters' allegiance has shifted toward Democrats.

"Statewide in Virginia, I think it's a lot thornier," said Mark J. Rozell, a public policy professor at George Mason University. "With the divide . . . it's really hard to say that someone can play this issue one way and know that he's going to benefit."

Studies show that Virginia's illegal immigrant population has swelled in recent years and that growth has been densest in Northern Virginia. Herndon voters this spring ousted Town Council members who backed a hiring site for immigrant day laborers, but Republican Jerry W. Kilgore lost the Northern Virginia suburbs -- and the governor's race -- after a campaign in which he vowed, among other things, to crack down on illegal immigrants.

In a recent Washington Post poll, 59 percent of likely Virginia voters said immigration would be important in their choice for senator -- but only after issues such as terrorism, Iraq, the economy, ethics in government, health care and taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0084137

Nationally, most candidates campaigning on immigration are of the tough-on-illegal-immigration persuasion, like Allen. But Allen has battled accusations of insensitivity to minorities since the summer, when he called an Indian American campaign worker for Webb a "macaca."

"Immigration, like it or not, is an issue that touches on race," said Steven A. Camarota, research director at the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors limiting immigration.

Asked about the Herndon day-labor center at a Richmond debate this month, Allen responded: "We should not be rewarding illegal behavior because all that will do is encourage more illegal behavior."

Parting ways with President Bush, Allen voted this session against a failed Senate bill that would have given some illegal immigrants a path to citizenship. The senator leans toward House Republicans on immigration, favoring enforcement-only approaches that aim to close the borders.

"First and foremost, Virginians want our borders secured," said Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager. He said Allen considered Congress's final border fence bill a "good start."

To address the question of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, Allen wants stepped-up punishment of their employers, Wadhams said. Strict enforcement, Allen reasons, will dry up the source of jobs over time. Allen backs expanded guest-worker programs that supply migrant labor to farms and skilled employees to tech companies.

That position is a key difference between Allen and Webb, who rails against corporate interests and bemoans the struggle of the middle class. He criticizes large-scale guest-worker programs, saying more oversight is needed so jobs do not go to cheaper foreign labor. Unlike Allen, Webb supports giving a path to legalization to immigrants who have been in the United States long enough to have planted deep roots.

"That in some way means sorting out people who have long ties with their community in the name of fairness and reality," Webb said. But he added: "I'm not for amnesty. I want to make that clear."

Webb said the Herndon day-labor center is an acceptable way to locally manage the effects of a failed federal immigration system. On his Web site, he calls for the United States to strengthen border security above all else and to turn next to the questions of illegal immigrants and a guest-worker plan. In an interview, he did not emphasize the need for border security as strongly. And he added a fourth component: pressuring -- and helping -- Mexico to stem migration through economic development.

Webb has been endorsed by a group of Latino leaders called Adelante Con Webb, which chose Webb in part for his vision of a broad overhaul of immigration laws, said Arlington County Board member Walter Tejada (D), a member of the group.

But Tejada said the endorsement came only after Webb met with the group and justified his views on affirmative action, which he has called "state-sponsored racism." Now Webb says he supports it for blacks but not for other ethnic minorities, unless poor whites are included. Webb says the position is based on fairness and hews to the program's original intent.

"We really understood and realized that this man really is about opportunity," Tejada said.

Allen earned the endorsement of the Latino Coalition, a nonpartisan advocacy group that has often backed GOP proposals and is headed by former Bush appointee Hector V. Barreto, who resigned as head of the Small Business Administration in April. Robert de Posada, the Latino Coalition's president, called Webb's affirmative action position "extremely insulting."

As Virginia governor, de Posada said, Allen "opened doors for Hispanics" by appointing several Latinos, including former Virginia Transportation secretary Robert E. Martinez. That prompted the coalition, which favors legalization for illegal immigrants, to overlook Allen's immigration views.

Staff writer Michael D. Shear contributed to this report.

Wilder Advises Webb To Make Stance Clear (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

RICHMOND -- Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, a former governor and one of the state's leading Democrats, has some advice for his party's U.S. Senate nominee James H. Webb Jr. -- let voters know what you stand for.

DOJ_NMG_0084138

"The question is, what reasons will Jim Webb give people to vote for him," Mr. Wilder, 75, told The Washington Times. "There are so many people in the middle that want to have a reason to lean this way or that."

Mr. Wilder has yet to endorse anyone in Virginia's U.S. Senate contest.

He said that Mr. Webb still trails Republican Sen. George Allen, in part, because he has failed to articulate a message beyond opposing Mr. Allen and President Bush.

He also said it's "amazing" that so many voters he meets are undecided before the Nov. 7 election.

An endorsement from Mr. Wilder, who became the nation's first black governor in 1990, carries high value in any political contest in Virginia. But a Wilder blessing this year would be priceless for either Senate nominee.

Mr. Wilder said that he has spoken with both nominees -- and with Mr. Webb as recently as Thursday.

"I told him that I think a lot of people are looking to see which of the candidates has a concise clear message that distinguishes one from the other," he said. "It's not a matter of voting against somebody but reasons that people would want to vote for Jim Webb."

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, knows the power of a Wilder blessing: He was endorsed by the mayor Nov. 2, less than a week before last year's election.

"It helped a lot," Mr. Kaine told The Times. "At that point, we felt like we had momentum and it was a confirmation of momentum, which created more momentum."

Mr. Wilder, who was elected with 79 percent of the vote in Richmond in 2004, holds influence over many Virginians but has particular sway among black voters.

Twenty percent of the state's population is black, according to the 2004 census.

Mr. Allen captured 20 percent of the black vote in 1993 when he was elected to succeed Mr. Wilder as governor, and 17 percent when he unseated Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

The black vote has become increasingly important in the neck-and-neck contest between Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb.

Both men have been accused of making racist comments when they were young.

Mr. Allen was accused of using the "n-word" as a student at the University of Virginia, and he called an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca" at a campaign event this past summer. The term, which Mr. Allen said he made up, is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

Mr. Webb has faced criticism from blacks for saying that affirmative action is unfair to white men. However, he has since tempered his comments and recently received the endorsement of the state's Legislative Black Caucus.

Mr. Wilder, who dropped a bid for the U.S. Senate in 1994, is unpredictable. He has endorsed Republicans and Democrats, and has turned his back on candidates he previously had favored.

He joined Mr. Allen in March 2004, denouncing a state tax increase proposed by then-Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat he had endorsed a few years earlier.

"Had I had any idea he would be embarking upon raising of taxes of Virginians past anything we had promised during that course, I would not have been there with him," Mr. Wilder said in 2004.

The increase ultimately passed, but left Mr. Wilder at odds with some of the state's most loyal Democrats.

Open Seats Lift Democratic Hopes In The House (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

GOLDEN, Colo., Oct. 19 — Ed Perlmutter, a former Democratic state senator, has had other opportunities to run for the House seat representing the district around Denver, but he waited until this year, when the Republican incumbent decided to run for governor rather than seek re-election.

“It is a clean slate,” Mr. Perlmutter said about the appeal of a race without an entrenched office-holder. “It gives people a real shot at seeing who the right guy is.”

DOJ_NMG_0084139

In the age of gerrymander, the open seat — one where incumbents step aside because of age, ambition, scandal or other considerations — is a rare but sometimes golden opportunity for one party to wrest control from the other. This year, Democrats like Mr. Perlmutter are taking full advantage, giving their party a potentially vital edge in the battle for control of the House.

"I hate open seats," Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in an interview last month as he discussed his party's difficulties in defending its openings.

Deprived of the name recognition, fund-raising and other powers of incumbency — not least the ability to steer federal dollars into local projects — candidates trying to defend open seats for their parties can have a much harder time of it than do sitting members of Congress.

This year, there are 33 open House seats, including three that are vacant at the moment but had been held steadily by one party, and polls suggest that Democrats have a good chance to capture enough Republican-held districts to put them well on their way to tilting the balance of power in Washington.

Surveys show Mr. Perlmutter in command of his race against his Republican opponent, Rick O'Donnell, in the contest to succeed Representative Bob Beauprez, a Republican who is running for governor.

In races for 20 other Republican open seats, recent polls show the Democrat leading in at least 8, putting the party more than halfway to the 15 seats needed to capture the House. Just one of 12 Democratic open seats appears at risk, and even that is considered a long shot.

The state-of-play shows why leaders of both parties pleaded with incumbents who were contemplating leaving the House to stick around, begging them to pass up career changes, more time with the grandchildren or a run for the Senate.

Grabbing open seats has proven critical in past Congressional realignments. In the watershed election of 1994, House Republicans converted 22 Democratic open seats; in the Watergate election of 1974, House Democrats flipped 13 Republican seats. Now, for Democrats to seize the majority, the open seats will be crucial. "You have to win the open seats by a rather substantial proportion because, unless you have a nationalized race, the incumbents are going to win," said John Samples, director of the Center for Representative Government at the Cato Institute.

It is a testament to the partisan makeup of most Congressional districts that even with such a strong political tide running against the Republican majority, Democrats are still trying to assemble enough victories to gain control of the House.

But Colorado's Seventh, which ranges from industrial Commerce City through bedroom communities to the old Gold Rush town of Golden, is a textbook swing district drawn to foster competition. Mr. Perlmutter was considered a top prospect for the new seat in 2002, but said he decided not to run to tend to a young family and a law practice. In 2004, Mr. Beauprez was solidly ensconced, but when he started publicly pondering a run for governor in 2005, Mr. Perlmutter got serious about a race.

The benefits of incumbency can be both large and small — from visibility and the ability to help individual constituents to an aura of political invincibility that discourages challenges and keeps donations flowing.

Mr. Perlmutter, who represented part of the House district as a state legislator, still had to win a tough and expensive primary to get into the general election, though it ultimately helped raise his profile. Mr. O'Donnell, a lifelong resident of the district who lost a primary to Mr. Beauprez in 2002, escaped a primary this year. But he quickly discovered he had work to do to become known.

"Over the summer, I would knock on people's doors, and they would say, 'Who are you? What are you running for?' " Mr. O'Donnell said. "A couple hundred thousand dollars in TV ads takes care of that."

In their closely watched race, Mr. O'Donnell has sought to emphasize a hard line on immigration and raise the specter of Democratic tax increases while Mr. Perlmutter has pressed the need for change in Republican-controlled Washington and emphasized stem-cell research, an issue he has personalized, saying it represents the potential for treatment of his daughter's epilepsy.

If there were a year not to be an incumbent, Mr. O'Donnell argues, this is it with the Republicans he hopes to join in the House facing an electorate anxious about the war in Iraq, frustrated with the Congress and angry over constant scandal.

"This year, I am thrilled to be an open-seat candidate," Mr. O'Donnell said.

DOJ_NMG_0084140

Yet Mr. Perlmutter and his Democratic allies have worked to tie Mr. O'Donnell to the Bush administration and an unpopular war. In doing so, they have saddled Mr. O'Donnell with the disadvantages of incumbency while he lacks the long-term relationship with district voters that might help a sitting lawmaker.

In a new advertisement broadcast this week by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee on behalf of Mr. Perlmutter, a beaming Mr. O'Donnell was shown leaving Air Force One with President Bush as the president arrived for a fund-raising visit this summer. "Another vote for George Bush's agenda," says the advertisement.

Mr. O'Donnell and his aides acknowledge that in the Denver area, where snow is already falling this year, it is tough sledding for Republicans. "I am under no illusions," he said. "It is going to be painstaking, vote by vote by vote."

Republicans hardly needed added trouble in a year when the party controlling the White House traditionally suffers. But their task was greatly complicated by the departure of three veteran lawmakers in safe seats who exited under ethical clouds and left their local ballots in shambles.

Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader under indictment in Texas, quit after winning his primary and state Republicans lost a legal fight to replace him on the ballot, forcing them to put their hopes in a difficult write-in campaign. The name of Mark Foley, who resigned over sexually explicit e-mail to former pages, will remain on the ballot in his Florida district, though votes cast for him will go to another candidate. Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, who recently pleaded guilty to corruption charges, dropped out of his race but left his replacement contending with the fallout from his bribery scandal. Democrats could conceivably win all three seats.

In Arizona, Representative Jim Kolbe, who is retiring, refused to endorse the conservative Republican who won the primary to replace him, putting Republican retention of that seat in jeopardy. In Colorado Springs, Republican divisions over the candidate to succeed Representative Joel Hefley, who is retiring, have national Democrats examining whether to make a serious run at that solidly Republican seat.

"In a year like this, the only Republican open seats that are certain to stay Republican are rock-solid, overwhelmingly Republican districts," said Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan Congressional handicapper.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee just bought advertising time in the race for a Nevada open seat that was previously considered out of reach, and party strategists are looking into investing in others where Republicans are showing signs of weakness.

"We are trying to figure out the combination on the lock of the gerrymandered districts," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, campaign committee chairman.

Republicans are fighting back, spending on television advertisements for Mr. O'Donnell and others in open seat races. But they are also being forced to spend in places like Idaho, where they had expected to avoid a fight. Party officials predict that in the end, many of the seats will remain in Republican hands.

In A G.O.P. Stronghold, 3 Districts In Indiana Are Now Battlegrounds (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

MISHAWAKA, Ind. — Indiana, so heavily Republican that it has not voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since 1964, has become an unexpected battleground in this year's Congressional elections.

Three of the state's seven Republican members of Congress are locked in tough races, with the campaigns drawing big money and big names from both parties, including President Bush, Laura Bush, Barbara Bush, former President Bill Clinton and Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois.

What is happening here in the Crossroads of America?

Just standard election year politics, say Republicans, in a state with a history of close races and of electing some Democrats (two of its nine members of Congress are Democrats, as is one senator). It is more than that, say Democrats, portraying Indianans as unusually disaffected and predicting that their party will make significant gains.

Ed Feigenbaum, editor of The Indiana Legislative Insight, a nonpartisan newsletter, said the situation reflected the nation's souring mood.

DOJ_NMG_0084141

"People are unhappy everywhere," Mr. Feigenbaum said. "And incumbents suffer when they think the country is heading in the wrong direction."

It is not that candidates in the three competitive districts differ substantially on issues that matter most to voters. But their styles are different, as is the political company they keep, as each often reminds voters.

Republicans warn that Democratic victories will mean liberal leadership in Congress, while Democrats say their opponents support failed policies. The overwhelmingly negative advertisements on both sides have focused on personalities, moral values, party allegiances and help for veterans.

Voters seem focused on larger matters. From the hills of New Albany near the Kentucky border to the gray streets of Mishawaka near the Michigan border, scores of voters in the three districts said in interviews that they were uneasy about Iraq, illegal immigration, the economy and the cost of health care.

Some said they feared that gasoline prices would rise again, while others complained about lobbyists. None cited the resignation of Representative Mark Foley over his e-mail exchanges with Congressional pages, though many Republicans were concerned that unhappiness about moral lapses in Washington might depress turnout among Christian conservatives.

Some spoke about local issues, but national matters, especially Iraq, prevailed.

"Iraq is seen as a failed Republican policy that isn't working and costing money," said Brian Vargus, a professor of political science at Indiana University in Indianapolis.

"That really resonates with Hoosiers," Mr. Vargus said. "They are very patriotic, feel that the American military is very efficient so someone is doing something wrong."

Second District

Representative Chris Chocola, a Republican, and the Democrat, Joe Donnelly, a lawyer and businessman, are in a race that was never supposed to be so close, though the district has elected Democrats in the past.

The economy and immigration loom as large as Iraq in this blue-collar district. Many auto-parts plants have closed or been cut back. Workers are nervous, and some say that Mr. Chocola does not understand their predicament because he is independently wealthy.

Plant workers blame Washington for higher gasoline prices, which hurt demand for automobiles; for spending money on Iraq that could be spent at home; and for failing, as they see it, to stop illegal immigrants from taking jobs in nonunion shops.

Mr. Chocola soundly defeated Mr. Donnelly in 2004, but polls now show Mr. Donnelly ahead. Mr. Donnelly appears to be benefiting from spending by independent groups and national Democrats. (Republicans recently stopped broadcasting advertising for Mr. Chocola, cautioning they have not given up on him but declining to say if the advertisements will resume.)

"Billions of dollars go to China, they're taking away our jobs, and they call it free trade," said Richard Rittenhouse Jr., leaning against a friend's pickup after their shift at the AM General Hummer H2 plant in Elkhart.

Illegal immigrants, whose numbers are relatively small in Indiana, but are concentrated in some areas, are "working hard and cheap" in nonunion plants Mr. Rittenhouse said, while union jobs are trimmed.

He and his friend, Steve Patton, said they were also frustrated by high property taxes, the leasing of a state toll road to a foreign entity and changes in the local daylight saving time.

Mr. Chocola said he was not worried.

"This district is always competitive," he said, after addressing students at Penn High School in Mishawaka. "Nothing unusual."

Mr. Donnelly, who criticizes Mr. Chocola for supporting the president on Iraq and foreign trade, sounds equally confident.

"We're going to change the country," he said in a South Bend pub.

Eighth District

The "Bloody Eighth" as it is known because of its close elections. Representative John Hostettler, a six-term Republican, is invariably described an unorthodox public official who does as he likes, from voting against the Iraq war to taking a loaded gun into the Louisville airport two years ago. The congressman said he had forgotten that the gun was in his briefcase.

Political analysts say Mr. Hostettler has been more unorthodox than usual, campaigning and fund-raising less aggressively than might be expected, given his opposition — the telegenic sheriff of Vanderburgh County, Brad Ellsworth.

DOJ_NMG_0084142

Mr. Hostettler, who insists he is campaigning hard, historically wins, usually by small margins, helped by a strong get-out-the-vote operation led by Christian conservatives.

But Democrats see Mr. Ellsworth as the strongest opponent Mr. Hostettler has faced, a conservative Democrat whose record can appeal to working-class voters.

The candidates in fact agree on most issues. Both oppose abortion rights and favor tough immigration laws. Their major difference is Mr. Hostettler's vote against raising the minimum wage and Mr. Ellsworth's support for it.

Nonetheless, Mr. Hostettler paints Mr. Ellsworth as "far to the left," and raises the specter of Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House minority leader from California, becoming speaker if Democrats win a majority.

That registers with some voters. "They are both good men, but the Democrats will put pressure on him to put Pelosi in, an extreme Democrat," Mike Rhoads, an insurance agent, after said services at Bethel Temple, a nondenominational Christian church in Evansville.

Mr. Hostettler's longevity in Washington registers with other voters, among them Betty Paddock, a retired dietitian who voted for Mr. Hostettler in 2004.

"He's been there a long time, time for a change," Ms. Paddock said at the West Side Nut Club Fall Festival in Evansville. Hr sister Jean Tabor, a cashier at a Target store, added, "Too many bad things are happening."

Ninth District

The race is a rubber match, an unusually personal fight between two candidates with distinctly different styles — Representative Mike Sodrel, a Republican who two years ago beat the same Democratic opponent, Baron Hill, a former two-term congressman.

Mr. Sodrel worked the crowd in shirt sleeves during the Harvest Homecoming Festival in New Albany, across the Ohio River from Louisville, Ky. The day before, Mr. Hill appeared in suit and tie, serious and unsmiling as he and Senator Evan Bayh, Democrat of Indiana, discussed domestic security in a town firehouse.

Mr. Sodrel, owner of a trucking company, accuses Mr. Hill of having "gone Washington." He says that Mr. Hill "doesn't share our values" and that Mr. Hill voted against protecting the flag from desecration and opposed a bill banning same-sex marriage.

Mr. Hill says that he honors the flag and opposes same-sex marriage but that the issues should be left for states. He accuses Mr. Sodrel of being too close to the oil industry, and calls on him to return campaign contributions from Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republicans for what he calls a failure of leadership in the Foley case.

Both candidates strike voters as too negative and out of touch with what really concerns people, many football fans said at a recent Friday game at New Albany High School.

"Nobody wants to talk about anything I think is important, like getting out of this stupid war," said Edward Summers, a veteran of World War II.

Neal Lang, a fifth-grade teacher from nearby Floyds Nob, said he was worried that the country "seems angry and strongly divided."

Mr. Lang said he did not know who he would vote for, but predicted, "I think it will be close again."

Working Families Party's Aim: Putting Democrats In Congress (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

Even by the Lilliputian standards of minor political parties, the Working Families Party has typically played the part of feisty underdog. Only four states list the party on their ballots, and even in New York, where it is based and most active, Working Families usually draws far fewer voters than rivals like the Conservative Party or the Independence Party.

Nevertheless, leaders of the Working Families Party, hoping to play a small but crucial role in this fall's Congressional elections, have started an effort to swing unaffiliated voters to Democratic candidates in three tight Congressional races.

DOJ_NMG_0084143

The party is focusing on unaffiliated voters in New York's 24th and 29th Congressional Districts and Connecticut's 5th Congressional District, which all have a Democratic candidate cross-endorsed by the Working Families Party. Both New York and Connecticut allow "fusion" elections in which candidates may run on more than one party line.

In New York's 24th District, Michael A. Arcuri, a Democrat, is battling State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican; and in Connecticut's 5th District, State Senator Christopher S. Murphy, a Democrat, is challenging Nancy L. Johnson, the Republican incumbent.

Working Families is financing direct mail, door-to-door canvassing and phone banks in those districts. In New York's 29th Congressional District, the party will begin a direct-mail effort on behalf of the Democratic candidate, Eric Massa, who is challenging Congressman John Randy Kuhl Jr., the incumbent Republican.

The tight focus on upstate, unaffiliated voters is something of a departure for the Working Families Party, which was founded by a coalition of labor unions and community organizations in 1998. Its supporters are most heavily concentrated in the New York City area, where the party has worked largely in support of liberal Democratic candidates. But party officials said that polling they conducted but did not release showed that a large number of independent voters in the three districts supported views traditionally associated with liberal Democrats, like being in favor of universal health care and in opposition to free trade.

According to the poll, the party said, many of those surveyed said they believed that both major parties were indifferent to such concerns, and that they might be open to voting for a Democratic candidate on a minor party line if the candidate had their values.

"People see our message about jobs and health care not as a left-wing message," said Dan Cantor, the party's executive director. "They put it dead center in focus groups. Trade deals, universal health care. These independent voters are like incipient progressives."

Mr. Cantor also cited past efforts by the party, like its work in 2002 on behalf of Representative Tim Bishop of Suffolk County, as evidence that the party may prove able to provide candidates with crucial voters in tight races. Mr. Bishop, who ran on the Democratic and Working Families lines, beat a Republican incumbent by about 2,500 votes; he earned 2,700 votes on the Working Families line. Of those 2,700, more than half came from people who also voted to re-elect Republican Gov. George E. Pataki.

"Having that extra line, giving independents a place to go, and having them work to get out the vote, all of that was very helpful to me," Mr. Bishop said in an interview.

The party will spend at least $400,000 — a third of it donated from New York's Democratic Congressional delegation — on the effort, a large amount for the party, though a relatively small expenditure given the millions of dollars being spent by the Democratic and Republican campaign committees and the candidates themselves.

But some political experts said that such a political bank shot — persuading unaffiliated voters to register a protest vote for a Democrat by voting for a minor party — could prove more or less unsolvable.

"To the extent that people know that the Working Families Party exists, those people don't view the Working Families Party as less liberal or left than the Democratic Party," said Norman Adler, a political consultant in New York who has advised Republican and Democratic candidates. "People who are liberal are already very comfortable voting for the Democrats.

"Talking to blanks is always useful, since they comprise the largest number of people who haven't made up their mind," he added, referring to people who do not select a party on their voter registration. "But to make the argument that they're the alternative to the Democratic Party for independent voters — I don't think that'll work."

The Political Season Has Gone Sordid (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Republican congressional candidate Tan Nguyen was expendable (meaning he had no chance of beating Loretta Sanchez), so he was expended this week by the Orange County Republican leadership. A heroic decision, tempered only by the fact that as recently as 2004 Nguyen was running as a Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0084144

In other words, Nguyen wasn't exactly dyed-in-the-wool. Still, when it was learned that his office apparently sent out 14,000 copies of a letter to registered voters saying it was illegal for immigrants to vote, the party leadership quickly leaned on him to withdraw and said all the right things about veiled intimidation of Latinos who are duly registered.

It is truly a new day in Orange County, where a generation ago the previous Republican Party leadership would have tabbed Nguyen as an up-and-comer with a good head on his shoulders.

Nguyen, who clearly doesn't yet have the hang of this running-for-office thing, said he had nothing to do with the mailing and ascribed the blame to his office manager. He presumably was going to lay out his defense Friday afternoon at a news conference, but state agents put a crimp in those plans by raiding his Garden Grove office.

You can't help but appreciate (in a twisted way) how this flare-up reflects on Orange County's changing demographics. That is, no longer is the attempted thwarting of the Latino vote limited to Anglo officeholders. Nguyen, according to his web site, is a Vietnamese refugee who was 8 when his family fled the Communists and came to America.

And now, just 25 years later, he's got his name in the newspapers in connection with political dirty tricks.

A cynic would say he's assimilated well.

And speaking of assimilation and participating in the democracy …

Over in Anaheim, Bill Dalati is getting a dose of the American political system in his first run for office. The 41-year-old insurance agent has been called a potential "Manchurian candidate" by a former state Republican Party chairman who cites Dalati's political support of a controversial congresswoman from Georgia and his advocacy of the local Council on American-

Islamic Relations, considered an extremist group by some but which somehow manages to operate quite comfortably and openly under the noses of the entire local and federal law enforcement structure. I was once at a CAIR meeting where local public officials and law enforcement representatives praised it.

For you youngsters, a "Manchurian candidate" is taken from a 1962 movie and refers to someone who pretends to be one of us but is really an agent of the enemy. Dalati's birth name is Belal, and he was born in Syria, so you know who the critics think he's a secret agent of.

Call me irreverent, but I'd like to see what a Manchurian candidate from Syria could do to Anaheim. Sure, he says he's interested in housing and traffic, but the mind boggles at what someone with a secret agenda could do.

Hey, wait a second! Isn't Anaheim Mayor Curt Pringle a more likely Manchurian candidate? Nobody looks more benign than he does. And how do we know for sure his family drapery business wasn't fronting for something else?

Sorry, mayor. It's all in the spirit of a long political season.

I got hold of a subdued Dalati late Friday and asked him how he was enjoying his first run for office. He didn't sound overly amused. "I was trying to run a straightforward campaign," he said. "Unfortunately, they brought race and religion into it. Because of the Islamophobia out there, I think it's hurt me."

He said he was getting calls of support from "true Americans" but that other e-mails included threats. He's one of seven candidates for two council seats, and I asked if he regretted running. No, he said. "I know what I ran for. I wanted to serve … and give back to a community and country that has given so much to me."

In the present climate, you say something like that and your critics only chalk it up to more cunning.

There you have it. That's my report from today's Politics & Ethnicity front.

Kind of gives you a warm, fuzzy feeling about things, doesn't it?

Ehrlich, O'Malley Focus On Turnout As Election Nears (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The hallways were decorated with the green and white of Martin O'Malley's campaign, but more important was what was happening inside the Prince George's County ballroom: thunderous applause from a thousand supporters, most of them African American women.

The Baltimore mayor converted the rostrum into a pulpit.

"Turn to your neighbor and say, 'There's a lot of power in this room,' " O'Malley preached.

DOJ_NMG_0084145

" There's a lot of power in this room ," the women cried out.

Four years ago, Democrats headed into the final stretch of a heated governor's race without much of a message to get their supporters to the polls, and there was a pointed lack of enthusiasm from black voters, the party's most loyal supporters. The Democrats got clobbered.

"We didn't really do our job in '02, and we saw what happened," said Donna Edwards, a Democratic Party activist and former congressional candidate who attended the rally.

Democrats are determined to make this year different, said Edwards and others supporting O'Malley's bid to retake the governor's office from Republican Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. This time, both Ehrlich and O'Malley have elaborate plans, in the works for more than a year, to maximize turnout that are the centerpiece of a two-week sprint to Election Day.

For O'Malley, the focus is on what campaign manager Josh White calls "drop-off voters," those who turn out when presidential candidates are on the ballot but stay home in intervening years.

"We're, in a sense, trying to expand our base," White said. "These are people who need a push out the door. But once they get there, we know they'll be with us."

For Republicans, the task is more complicated. Because Democrats hold a nearly 2 to 1 edge on voter rolls, Ehrlich can't afford to merely try to drive more people to the polls. He needs to motivate his supporters to show up Nov. 7 while doing nothing to energize those backing his opponent.

To accomplish this, his aides said they have been brewing their own turnout recipe -- one that depends on the science of "microtargeting" and on many of the same formulas that helped propel George W. Bush to victory in 2004. Information about every potential Ehrlich voter, down to the magazines they read and the church they attend, will drive the strategy for lighting a spark under them on Election Day.

"Every race is about turnout, but this one especially so for Ehrlich," said one of the governor's top aides, who discussed internal campaign strategy on the condition that he not be named. "Last time, we won partly because I think we had a superior air game -- television ads, radio ads, direct mail. This time, in my opinion, we win by having a better ground game."

While each campaign will spend the next two weeks working several fronts -- O'Malley will launch a bus tour; Ehrlich will begin a barrage of television ads -- the strategy that could ultimately decide the outcome of this year's hotly contested race is the one that succeeds at driving the right voters to the polls.

A crucial piece of the effort for Democrats will involve black voters, who traditionally have been the party's most loyal constituency but who stayed home in large numbers in 2002, when Kathleen Kennedy Townsend became the first Democratic gubernatorial candidate to lose in Maryland in 34 years.

Census records show that although 50.5 percent of registered black voters turned out to vote in 1998, that number dropped to 41.3 percent in 2002.

This year, many Democrats are still waiting for signs that black voters will take an interest in O'Malley, said former Maryland governor Parris N. Glendening (D).

"I think this is going to be the biggest single challenge, because the excitement and the enthusiasm is really not at the level that it needs to be to get a really good, strong turnout," Glendening said, adding that he believes interest will climb as the election approaches.

The Democrats have some obstacles within the black community. For one, Republicans fielded the state's first African American to be elected statewide, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, and he is now on the ballot in the race for U.S. Senate.

And there is also unease about the complexion of the Democratic statewide ticket: All but one of the candidates is white. But that is a "longer-term problem," Edwards said. "I don't think that's going to be enough to keep people from voting."

Democratic Party officials have tried to address those issues by producing a series of door-hangers and brochures aimed specifically at black voters, including one that pictures an African American woman on the front and the words, "Why I am a Democrat . . ."

O'Malley recruited an African American running mate, Del. Anthony G. Brown (Prince George's), and has brought in well-known black figures to help, too. Basketball great-turned-movie theater mogul Earvin "Magic" Johnson is promoting the Baltimore mayor on the radio. Former president Bill Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama have joined him on the stump.

DOJ_NMG_0084146

"Bill Clinton is like the Energizer bunny for Democrats, and especially the key groups we need to make sure come out, African American voters especially," Edwards said.

Today, Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) will kick off a two-week canvassing effort in black neighborhoods that will involve passing out 10,000 postcards reminding residents of their voting rights. O'Malley himself will be knocking on doors of targeted voters in Montgomery and Howard counties tomorrow.

The party has also recruited three to four times as many volunteers as they had four years ago to phone the drop-off voters, White said. It's a strategy that might have yielded little in years past but could prove vital in taking advantage of a national climate that appears to favor Democrats heavily.

That climate has forced Ehrlich's campaign to direct more attention to independents and his own base of support, the state's rural Republicans, to make sure they don't decide to stay home. Part of Ehrlich's success in 2002 stemmed from bringing out 191,000 more Republicans than voted in 1998 for Ellen R. Sauerbrey.

Ehrlich said he is not concerned by the national mood, noting that in two weeks, events in North Korea or elsewhere could shift attention away from the series of GOP scandals in Washington. And he believes the microtargeting effort will overcome any unease about voting.

"You saw in 2004 what it can do," he said, referring to Bush's successful turnout effort.

At the same time, he has been writing to supporters to persuade them to cast absentee ballots. The stated purpose has been to ensure a secure ballot in the face of possible problems with electronic voting. But because he'll know that those ballots have been cast and can scratch those voters off of contact lists, he can improve the efficiency of his turnout operation come Election Day, he said.

When asked what effect surrogates such as Clinton will have on the outcome of the race, the governor laughed. Yes, the former president probably helps energize some Democrats, he said. "But he helps me with my base, too."

Anti-O'Malley Ad Shows Baltimore In A Grim Light (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Mayor Martin O'Malley may be the target but Baltimore also takes a beating in a television ad launched yesterday by the Republican Governors Association, a 30-second tableau of urban decay that declares Maryland's largest municipality "the most dangerous city in America."

The ad, the first the group has aired in the state, features footage of a cemetery and a crime scene. The camera bounces erratically as the images lose and regain focus. The schools are in shambles, a female voice says, and the homicide rate is six times higher than New York City's. "Baltimore," the voice says, "Martin O'Malley's legacy of mismanagement. And now he wants a promotion so he can do for the entire state of Maryland what he did for Baltimore."

The O'Malley campaign was quick to condemn the ad, which they said perpetuated stereotypes about a city they said Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) is "essentially disowning."

"It's essentially unheard of for a governor to allow an outside group to attack the biggest city in his state," said Hari Sevugan, an O'Malley spokesman.

A recent Ehrlich ad raised similar issues far more delicately: A Baltimore resident -- with a criminal record, it later emerged -- describes himself as a Democrat so concerned about crime and the city schools that he intends to vote for Ehrlich.

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese N. DeLeaver declined to comment on whether the campaign has misgivings about Baltimore being portrayed in such a light. The ad, she said, "isn't about Baltimore, it's about Martin O'Malley's failure of leadership of Baltimore."

The governors association is barred from coordinating its activities with the campaign.

"The intent of this advertisement is not to trash Baltimore," said Phil Musser, the association's executive director. "The intent is to point out what's clearly a lackluster record."

The Democratic Governors Association contributed $290,000 to the Maryland Fund, an independent group that has spent nearly $1 million on negative ads linking Ehrlich to the policies of President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0084147

Yesterday, Democrats pointed out that the Republican group received a $100,000 contribution Sept. 29 from a prominent Maryland developer and Ehrlich supporter, Kingdon Gould. Gould, developer of the Konterra project in Prince George's County, has contributed $50,000 to Ehrlich through various companies since 1999. He was traveling yesterday and did not respond to calls seeking comment.

Computer Voting Disks Likely Made For Testers (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

A Maryland election official said yesterday that possibly stolen computer disks believed to be electronic voting software were "apparently produced" for use by a testing firm hired by the Maryland legislature in November 2003.

Ross Goldstein, deputy administrator of the Maryland State Board of Elections, said documents indicate that the disks were sent to Maryland so Raba Technologies Inc. could assess the security of the state's electronic voting system, which is provided by Diebold Election Systems. A receptionist at Raba, based in Columbia, declined to comment yesterday after consulting with her supervisor.

Labels on the disks indicate that they contain the versions of two Diebold programs that powered electronic voting machines in Maryland in 2004, Goldstein said Thursday. Diebold said one version of one program is still in use in some jurisdictions elsewhere in the United States.

Cheryl C. Kagan, a former Maryland delegate who has questioned the security of electronic voting systems, said the disks were delivered anonymously to her office in Olney on Tuesday.

State elections administrator Linda H. Lamone has asked the FBI to investigate the apparent theft and leaking of proprietary voting software.

Critics of electronic voting said the most recent incident in Maryland casts doubt on Lamone's claim that Maryland has the nation's most secure voting system. "There now may be numerous copies of the Diebold software floating around in unauthorized hands," said Linda Schade, co-founder of TrueVoteMD, which has pressed for a system that provides a verifiable paper record of each vote.

Yesterday, Henry Fawell, a spokesman for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), said the suspected leak "raises yet another unanswered question about the Diebold technology on which our election system depends." Ehrlich initially supported the Diebold technology but in recent years has said Maryland should switch to a system that provides a paper trail.

Some computer scientists said the incident shows why the makers of voting systems should publicly disclose their software. "It's hard to keep a secret like this for a long time," said Edward Felten, a Princeton University computer scientist who demonstrated in September how Diebold's machines could easily be hacked. The company called Felten's work inaccurate and unrealistic.

The Washington Post, which obtained copies of the disks Wednesday to verify them, agreed yesterday to Diebold's request to return them.

Kagan said that she expects to meet with FBI agents next week and that she was prepared to grant the FBI's request to turn over the disks.

The disks bear logos from two other testing companies, Ciber Inc. and Wyle Laboratories, which Diebold hired to test its voting system. Maryland retained Raba in 2003 to conduct a security assessment after an academic study revealed vulnerabilities in Diebold's system, said Karl S. Aro, executive director of the Department of Legislative Services.

Aro said he believes that Diebold made its own arrangements to transmit the software to Raba. "To my knowledge, [Aro's staff] never touched those disks," Aro said.

Diebold spokesman Mark Radke said: "We contacted Ciber and Wyle and asked them to send the software directly to someone in Maryland." He said he could not confirm if the recipient was Raba or an intermediary.

Felten, the Princeton computer scientist, said public disclosure of the core instructions or "source code" that powers electronic voting machines would enhance security by allowing experts to find flaws that could then be corrected.

DOJ_NMG_0084148

David Jefferson, a computer scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory who advises California's secretary of state on election matters, said the source code should be public precisely because it is part of voting systems. "Our democratic process has to be completely open, and we cannot conduct transparent elections on top of secret software," he said.

Michael I. Shamos, a computer scientist at Carnegie Mellon University, said the appearance of the disks in Kagan's office is "essentially meaningless." He said electronic voting source code should be disclosed because of the public's strong interest in the credibility of voting systems. "Since the disclosure of source code is a good thing," he asked, "why should we be complaining when some gets disclosed?"

"Anything that happens to convince the makers of voting software to drop the nonsensical claim of 'trade secrets' is a good thing," Shamos said.

Radke said the company was not averse to disclosing its code if the law were changed to require it. But he said disclosure would dampen innovation in the field.

Avi Rubin, a computer scientist at Johns Hopkins University who reviewed the software Wednesday at the request of The Post, said he was all but certain that the material on the disks was Diebold software.

Angelides Urges Gov. To Release Tapes (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO — In private conversations in the governor's office earlier this year, Arnold Schwarzenegger spoke with aides about the "failure of Mexican American immigrants to assimilate into American culture" and made "ad hominem remarks about a variety of legislators," Phil Angelides' gubernatorial campaign said Friday.

An attorney for Angelides sent a 10-page letter to Schwarzenegger aides urging them to release recordings of the governor's conversations before the Nov. 7 election.

In the letter, the Angelides campaign offered more detail about what Schwarzenegger said in unguarded moments in his office than has been made public to date.

Angelides aides know what the recordings contain because they downloaded them from the governor's website in late August. But the campaign has declined to release the tapes on its own, calling on Schwarzenegger to take that step.

"Instead of hiding behind his handlers, he should publicly release these records so that the people of the state of California can hear for themselves what the governor believes in candid moments away from the spotlight," Angelides campaign attorney Lance Olson wrote.

Schwarzenegger officials indicated that the governor would not release the recordings, saying they are not a matter of public record.

Schwarzenegger campaign manager Steve Schmidt, in an interview, said of Angelides: "This is yet another act of political desperation by a failing candidate who, with every passing day, makes it clear he lacks the ethics, integrity and character to be governor of California."

At issue are four hours of recordings. They were made by the governor's speech writing team, whose members taped the governor's conversations to familiarize themselves with his cadence and speech patterns. Six minutes of recordings have been made public so far and are posted on The Times' website at latimes.com/news/local/politics/cal/la-govmeetingmp30954716.mp3file.

In that snippet, Schwarzenegger, talking casually with his inner circle of advisors, made comments about the temperament of Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City). Discussing her ethnicity, he said it didn't matter if she was Puerto Rican or Cuban.

"I mean, they are all very hot," he said. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

Fearing legal repercussions, Angelides campaign officials have been unwilling to release the rest of the recordings. But they've offered hints about what Schwarzenegger says in recent letters to the governor.

DOJ_NMG_0084149

In the letter Friday, Olson rebuts Schwarzenegger's claim that the tapes are exempt from disclosure under a legal provision that protects the governor's internal "deliberations."

Olson writes that the recordings "do not relate to anything 'deliberative' at all and are clearly unrelated to speech writing but, rather, discuss Republican Party politics, derogatory remarks about Mexican Americans and observations about legislators and other public figures."

Were Schwarzenegger to demean Mexican Americans, it could produce a backlash.

The governor has been courting Latino voters in hopes of building on the 32% of the Latino vote he received in the 2003 recall election.

After The Times made public part of the recordings last month, the California Highway Patrol opened an investigation. The Schwarzenegger administration had notified the CHP, claiming the Angelides campaign had "penetrated" a secure, password-protected part of the governor's website.

Angelides campaign officials deny that's the case. They said staff members encountered no passwords or obstacles of any kind in downloading the recordings and they assert that others who have visited the governor's website have done much the same thing.

The CHP said it would produce at least a preliminary report quickly. But at this point, with 17 days left in the campaign, no report has emerged.

Schwarzenegger Story Gets Another Rewrite (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Maybe the make-or-break moment of Arnold Schwarzenegger's governorship was the morning of Nov. 10, 2005, in his hotel suite across the street from the Capitol building.

He had just been walloped in the special election that he had thrust before voters, capping a year when he had fought to put in place a distinctly conservative agenda.

Prepping the Republican governor for a news conference, one of his aides urged a tough stance: Don't apologize, don't give ground.

Schwarzenegger did the opposite. He appeared before the cameras and conceded that he had screwed up and promised to start listening to the Democrat-dominated Legislature.

So began his political resurrection. From a nadir at which he was being compared with Jesse Ventura, the pro wrestler who flamed out as governor of Minnesota after one term, Schwarzenegger rose to be the front-runner in the Nov. 7 election.

His governorship has been a string of such moments: spontaneous decisions that have carried large consequences, for better and for worse. New to professional politics, he has been learning as he goes.

He has overreached; called officials "stooges" and worse; flip-flopped, wasted time and money. All in full view of California voters and in the face of enormous expectations that came with the historic 2003 recall election.

But over the last 11 months he has righted himself, relying on competitive instincts that told him if he was to survive he needed to drop the hubris and build a centrist government more in step with California voters.

It worked. His approval rating is up to 56%, according to the latest Los Angeles Times poll, a rise of nearly 20 percentage points in one year.

Schwarzenegger came to the job convinced he could master it — much as he has everything else he's tried. But the job nearly mastered him. Three years after taking office, he is, in fundamental ways, still figuring out what a governor is supposed to do.

His advisors say they still worry when he speaks in public, wondering if he'll blurt out something that offends a constituency or torpedoes a policy position his administration spent months crafting. Others who have worked closely with him said they have no idea what to expect next if Schwarzenegger wins.

Will he be the combative partisan who, 168 times during 2005, railed about "special interests" corrupting Sacramento, according to transcripts of speeches and interviews?

DOJ_NMG_0084150

Will he be the go-along moderate who has not once uttered that phrase in public this year? "Arnold 2.0" is how some aides now describe him.

Or is another reinvention in the works?

"I don't know where the governor is going to go next year," said Assemblyman Keith Richman, a moderate Republican from Northridge.

Few people reach high elective office with so little political experience. Schwarzenegger walked off the set of "Terminator 3" and into the recall election.

Campaign workers mined interviews he'd given as a champion bodybuilder and movie star, looking for the germ of a policy platform. He was tutored extensively in his Santa Monica office — sessions his staff labeled "Schwarzenegger University."

The cramming helped. Schwarzenegger retains information well and is adept at numbers, which he says he thinks about in his native German. When he grasps something, he utters a two-word acknowledgment: "Got it."

But after he took office, his busy schedule slowed the schooling. And the gaps in what he understood about California government became painfully evident.

Marybel Batjer, the governor's Cabinet secretary in his first year, said, "Yes, he needed more education, and if I could have done it better — and I don't know how we could squeeze more time out of him — I would have had policy briefing time on his schedule weekly."

First Lady Maria Shriver would, on occasion, call then-Chief of Staff Patricia Clarey. Her husband would come home at night with a stack of briefing papers, Shriver said, and realize in frustration that he was not getting everything he needed from the daytime briefings, according to one person familiar with the conversations.

There was an embarrassing moment in his first months in office when Schwarzenegger's inexperience showed.

He often boasted about his negotiating skills. After years of haggling with Hollywood bosses over movie contracts, he was confident he could outwit Sacramento interest groups. But it wasn't as easy as he supposed.

He sat down with officials from the California Teachers Assn., the powerful labor group, to discuss the complex spending formulas that drive the education budget. The governor hoped CTA would agree to concessions that might stave off deep budget cuts.

Schwarzenegger acknowledged to his staff at one point that he wasn't in command of the details. But he plowed ahead, ultimately striking a deal with the union: CTA would forgo $2 billion owed to schools, in return for the governor's promise to repay the money in coming years.

The agreement turned out to be politically costly. It was Schwarzenegger who had been outmaneuvered.

Facing a tight budget the next year, the governor broke the promise. He told the union that if he lived up to the bargain, it would mean drastic cuts elsewhere in government that he was unwilling to make. Union officials turned on him.

The governor hadn't realized the commitment he'd made, said Peter Siggins, then Schwarzenegger's legal counsel, who was taken aback by the agreement.

"I sat down with [another aide] and said, 'Did we really agree to this?' " said Siggins, now a state appeals court judge in San Francisco. "I was surprised. It … really boxed him in."

The teachers union, once a friend, was now a dogged and well-funded enemy.

For all the stagecraft Schwarzenegger employs to make sure he appears in a flattering light, he tends to wing it when he grabs the mike. He says what feels right at the moment. But the spontaneity can backfire, and has.

In April, the administration prepared for an environmental summit in San Francisco. In defiance of his big-business supporters, the governor was going to call for emissions caps meant to curb global warming.

The day came. Schwarzenegger led a discussion that included business leaders unhappy about the plan. An official of a cement trade group objected that mandatory caps would be a burden to business.

Schwarzenegger began to waffle. Maybe it would be better to start "without caps," he said. Aides cringed.

"It undercut the main message of the day," said one administration official, requesting anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0084151

Damage was done — and Schwarzenegger had to undo it. The next day, in an appearance in Davis, he said emissions caps were "a great idea."

In other ways, Schwarzenegger sounds like the most seasoned of politicians, saying one thing but doing another.

The day after winning the election in 2003, he said at a news conference that he would devote himself to the job full time: "There will be no time for movies or anything else."

A month later, he quietly signed an agreement to serve as a consultant to and editor of the tabloid and muscle-magazine publisher American Media Inc., which would pay him an estimated $8 million over five years. He severed the arrangement after it was made public last year.

Schwarzenegger once eloquently warned of the danger of "special interests" — moneyed groups whose fortunes depend on state action. They give millions to politicians and expect favors in return, the governor said.

But since entering the recall campaign, Schwarzenegger has accepted record sums of campaign cash — more than $114 million — from oil companies, insurers, developers and growers that rely on the governor to sign or veto key legislation.

Every year the California Chamber of Commerce, the state's leading business lobbying group, puts out a list of what it calls "job killer bills" — legislation it wants defeated.

Of 11 such bills that passed the Legislature and made it to the governor's desk this year, he vetoed nine, or 82%.

"He came in on a reform platform which essentially was to hose out the Augean Stables," said Martin Kaplan, associate dean of the USC Annenberg School for Communication, referring to the labors of Hercules. "And he ends up raising more money than Gray Davis, or anyone else, for that matter."

Schwarzenegger has said repeatedly that legislators were "spending addicts." But he has signed budgets that have raised state spending 27%, to $101.3 billion from $79.8 billion.

On a radio show, Schwarzenegger explained his ethics policy. Indian tribes that own casinos are "people that I would never take money from," he said. That would be a "conflict of interest," because a governor negotiates gambling compacts with tribes, he said.

Yet six tribes that own casinos have donated at least $800,000 altogether to the California Republican Party in the last two years. And the party has run television ads helpful to Schwarzenegger.

Schwarzenegger has a record of floating ideas and then dropping them. He vowed in 2004 to bust the Legislature down to part-time status. Never did it.

He told the Sacramento Press Club in January that he would set up a bipartisan commission to examine the state's costly pension system. Never happened.

Then there are moments when he seems to simply get carried away.

Frustrated that lawmakers wouldn't pass his budget, he appeared at a rally at a shopping mall in Ontario two years ago to ratchet up pressure. His staff had written a speech for him, but Schwarzenegger ad-libbed.

Before a crowd of more than 1,000 supporters, he called his legislative opponents "girlie men." The audience loved it, but Democratic lawmakers were furious. The tone had been set for the next year, which Schwarzenegger had optimistically dubbed "the year of reform."

Some of Schwarzenegger's top aides never wanted the special election. After a flurry of campaigns in 2003-04, they thought he needed a year to govern quietly and squirrel away some money for a reelection bid.

But Schwarzenegger worried that if he didn't go to the ballot with a dramatic proposal to shake things up, he might be facing years of paralysis in Sacramento, aides said. A big, bold step was needed, he believed.

Things came to a head at a meeting at a Sheraton hotel near the Capitol late in 2004. Schwarzenegger snapped at his staff that they had dithered, failing to prepare for the special election he envisioned.

One advisor recalls Schwarzenegger saying that without a special election, he "would be facing 18 months where nothing would get done." He wouldn't be talked out of it.

Schwarzenegger backed four measures that his allies placed on the November 2005 ballot: He wanted to curb state spending, revamp the way the state draws voting districts, make it tougher for teachers to get tenure and bar unions from making campaign contributions without permission from members.

DOJ_NMG_0084152

The agenda wasn't even his own. It had been cobbled together by the Chamber of Commerce, anti-tax forces and conservative leaders on the fringes of the governor's political circle.

The program also was reminiscent of a Schwarzenegger mentor — former Republican Gov. Pete Wilson. In the 1990s, Wilson went to the ballot to expand the governor's budget-cutting powers and impose restrictions on union political activity. Voters said no.

The Republican operatives surrounding Schwarzenegger remembered those fights from the Wilson years. But maybe they'd have better luck with a former movie star as the salesman.

Joel Fox was co-chairman of a campaign committee that became the prime fundraising vehicle for the Schwarzenegger-backed initiatives.

In Schwarzenegger, he saw a "Mr. Olympia who has the ability to lift the weight of the world — and we were going to jump on his back. That's the attitude we had," he said.

But "it didn't serve Arnold well," Fox said. "And I take part of the blame for this debacle."

Teachers, nurses and firefighters mobilized against the governor's agenda, picketing Schwarzenegger's fundraising events from Manhattan to Los Angeles. Schwarzenegger could not muster grass-roots support or raise enough money to combat the union attacks.

"We stumbled around," said Mike Murphy, the governor's chief political strategist at the time. "We tried to do three years of reform in about six months."

Battered by the unions' TV ads, Schwarzenegger saw his approval ratings plummet. When defeat came last November, he moved quickly to recapture voters' trust.

He had spent much of 2005 declaring he'd been sent to Sacramento to "fix a broken system." Now he understood that voters wanted him to work within that system, broken or not.

A shake-up followed.

Murphy left to focus more on Hollywood projects. Shriver, injecting herself in the personnel search, as she often does when her husband is in trouble, found a replacement in Steve Schmidt, a barrel-chested veteran of the Bush White House who runs a no-nonsense political operation.

Out went Clarey, once an aide to former Republican Gov. Pete Wilson. In came Susan Kennedy, once an aide to former Democratic Gov. Gray Davis.

"That was his apology," Kaplan said. "By hiring her, and taking pretty intense public criticism for it from his Republican base, he was saying: 'I really heard you. I got it.' "

Embracing the Democratic agenda, Schwarzenegger signed bills raising the minimum wage and providing prescription drug discounts. It was effective politics, executed on the cusp of a reelection campaign.

But it also showed some flexibility: Schwarzenegger had tried something. It didn't work. So he tried something else.

"He's been a very reliable partner in advancing a very strong Democratic agenda," said Fabian Nuñez, the Democratic speaker of the Assembly. "It's the ultimate irony."

When something works, Schwarzenegger stays with it, his friends say. Now that his political recovery has put a second term within his grasp, he's unlikely to risk another effort to shake Sacramento to its core.

"I've known him 27 years and I've never seen him happier than he is now," said Bonnie Reiss, a longtime friend and a senior aide.

Others sound a more wistful note. They hoped Schwarzenegger would prove a transformational figure.

Right after taking office, Schwarzenegger embarked on one of the most ambitious projects of his governorship. Acting on his vow to "blow up the boxes" of government, he appointed 275 state employees, aides and consultants to plan how to do it. The group came up with a far-reaching program to wipe out 100 state boards and commissions. But when interest groups complained, Schwarzenegger backed down. The panel's 2,500-page report, released more than two years ago, sits on bookshelves across the capital, ignored.

"I would like to have blown up a box or two," Fox said.

(INFOBOX BELOW)

DOJ_NMG_0084153

Arnold Schwarzenegger
Party: Republican
Occupation: Governor of California
Age: 59; born in Thal, Austria.
Residence: Los Angeles (Brentwood)
Personal: Wife, Maria Shriver; four children.
Education: Bachelor's degree in business and international economics, University of Wisconsin-Superior, 1979

Career highlights: As a bodybuilder, won 13 championship titles; was the subject of "Pumping Iron," a 1977 documentary about bodybuilding, and went on to star in many films; in 1990, was named chairman of the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports under President George H. W. Bush; sponsored Proposition 49, a ballot measure approved in 2002 to increase funding for after-school programs.

Platform: Job creation through economic development and promotion of the California economy; no tax increases; curbs on greenhouse gases through regulation of business; $37 billion in bonds to rebuild state infrastructure.

Los Angeles Times

Boo!? An Inevitable October Surprise (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The October surprise: It's as much a seasonal sure thing in Washington as cherry blossoms and the National Christmas Tree.

When leaves fall and elections loom, the term gets tossed around more than a Manning family football. This October, too, is chockablock with shockers. Already "October surprise" has been applied to: several unflattering new books about the White House, an upwardly revised civilian casualty estimate from the Iraq war, the Mark Foley scandal . . . and October isn't over yet.

Originally the term meant some alakazam rabbit-from-a-hat trick that an incumbent party would unveil to keep its candidate in office. Over time the phrase has been bandied about and overused to the point that it now means any startling surprise from any direction that might somehow affect the outcome of an election.

October, says Michele Swers, a political scientist at Georgetown University, "is when the electorate begins to focus on the candidates and the issues, and voters begin to actually look at what you do and what you say."

A surprise works, she says, "if there's already a national mood building for a certain issue. The surprise can exacerbate the mood of the people. Anything that intensifies a national wave is helpful."

On his MSNBC show last week, former congressman Joe Scarborough pointed out three recent eye-openers, including "the latest October surprise from New York's publishing world." Excited, he cited "State of Denial" by Bob Woodward, which actually went on sale Sept. 30, and "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell" by Karen DeYoung, published on Oct. 10. Both books, by Washington Post reporters, "provided a double-barrel blast at the White House," Scarborough said.

He continued, "But now another book drops within weeks of the midterm elections, claiming the Bush White House played Christians for fools and called them nuts and lunatics behind their backs."

He was talking about David Kuo's "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction." Published this week, the book questions the Bush administration's sincerity when it comes to support for faith-based initiatives and for the social issues important to evangelicals.

On CNBC, Jed Babbin, who was a defense undersecretary in the George H.W. Bush administration, referred to the Johns Hopkins University study of Iraqi civilian deaths -- published in the British medical journal the Lancet -- as "another October surprise. . . . It's not at all credible."

Babbin said the number of Iraqi dead has been used before as a pre-November jolt. "The last time they published this same report," he said of the Johns Hopkins survey, "the same group went out and did a similar analysis two years ago, and guess what? They put it out just before the 2004 election."

DOJ_NMG_0084154

The longest-running eyebrow-raiser of this October -- the Mark Foley scandal -- got its start in the final days of September. Keith Olbermann, host of the MSNBC program "Countdown," referred to it as a pre-October surprise, but the story has drip-dripped through the month. "The Democrats prayed for an October surprise," wrote syndicated columnist Jonah Goldberg, "and like manna from heaven, a hypocritical, sexually disturbed Florida Republican dropped into their laps."

Some Republican strategists suggested that Democrats waited to make a big deal about Foley's instant messages to generate an autumnal bombshell.

The earliest mention of "October surprise" in a Nexis database search of American newspapers is in The Washington Post in late August 1980. William R. Van Cleve, co-director of candidate Ronald Reagan's panel of military policy advisers, said that the notion of the incumbent president, Jimmy Carter, pulling an "October surprise" somewhere in the world to influence the pending election "has been nagging at some of us for some period of time." The rumored surprise was an invasion of Iran, which was holding dozens of Americans captive.

In October 1992, the issue of Penthouse magazine with the Gennifer Flowers interview about her relationship with candidate Bill Clinton went on sale. In late September 1996, questions arose about campaign contributions from foreign sources to the reelection campaign of Clinton and Al Gore. On Nov. 2, 2000, just five days before the election, a Maine television station reported that candidate George W. Bush had been arrested in 1976 on a drunk-driving charge. "Call it the October surprise a few days late," a CBS reporter said at the time.

In some years the October surprise, like the Great Pumpkin or Godot, is much anticipated but never appears. But in recent years it's become so predictable, so commonplace, it should be called the October Same-Old Same-Old.

"Surprises, on schedule, are hardly surprises," Matt Drudge of the Drudge Report says in an interview. "The October surprise has become a tired ritual that needs reinvention."

There are variations. And trying to guess the next iteration -- sex scandal, international policy shift, military assault -- makes for a popular bar game. But in this era of muck-slinging politics with candidates "going negative" and "digging up dirt," a true October surprise would be an October without one.

Obama's Project Runway (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

So the question before us is, should Barack Obama stop lounging around in fashion magazines and do some honest work, like running for president?

How will we ever persuade him to give up his modeling gigs in Men's Vogue, Marie Claire, Vanity Fair and Washington Life? How can we lure the lanky young senator from Illinois out of the glossy celebrity pages and back to gritty substance, away from Annie Leibovitz's camera and back to Abraham Lincoln's tradition? He may not want to come back, now that he has mastered that J.F.K. casual glamour pose in shirt sleeves and tie, suit jacket slung over his shoulder, elegant wife and pretty children accessorizing.

The Washington Post's fashion reporter, Robin Givhan, analyzed the Men's Vogue spread, with its "touch football" aura: "Obama is pictured in warm light or soft focus. He is pondering, nurturing, working. But never glad-handing, pontificating or fund-raising. The pictures celebrate the idea of Obama rather than the reality of politics."

Why should the 45-year-old senator tackle reality in a city that has forsworn it altogether? And why not join the catwalk of Democratic hotties? The Washington Post reported that the Democrats were "fielding an uncommonly high number of uncommonly good-looking candidates." Young and cute, as the party campaign honcho Rahm Emanuel wryly told me, could be a refreshing change from "Hastert, Rumsfeld and Cheney, who look like the retirees from 'Goodfellas.' "

Mr. Obama's main accomplishment so far is sending a chill through Hillary Clinton, the Democrats' dreaded eventuality. It must certainly be more fun cavorting on a cover with Eva Longoria than caucusing in the Capitol with Harry Reid. Working on legislation can be so tedious, compared with a 13-city book tour in which you are feted as the liberal hunk of the 21st century, generating buzz about your future instead of the country's.

DOJ_NMG_0084155

Mr. Obama, who fears being seen as fluffy and who has been known to mock pretty boys in his party, never seems to take off his makeup these days, as he pads from one soft perch to the next, from Oprah to Meredith to Larry. The first black president of the Harvard Law Review is spending too much time in green rooms.

He also logs a lot of time at the gym. (You never know when Anna Wintour will call.) It is the only thing this intellectually nimble, preternaturally articulate smarty-pants has in common with W.

"Politics sometimes blends in with celebrity," he told Oprah this week. "And it gobbles you up because the tendency is for people to want to see you perform and say what they want to hear, as opposed to you trying to stay in touch with, you know, that deepest part of you, that kernel of truth inside." Doesn't he see that when you express this skepticism on Oprah it is not skepticism at all?

Haven't we seen this tease before? Before the 1996 campaign, Colin Powell scared the bejesus out of Hillary's husband by showing a fair amount of leg on his book tour. He sold 2.6 million books and was hugely popular, but caution crimped him. He never ran for president, and when he went to the State Department he never stood up to the forces of darkness.

Senator Obama's caution, too, may cause him to miss the moment. Like Alma Powell, Michelle Obama is afraid for her husband to run.

After 16 years of polarizing presidents driving them crazy, Americans will be yearning for someone as soothing as Obama. ("No one is exempt," he writes in one of many platitudes in his new book, "from the call to find common ground.") He is so hot now that tickets to his political events are being sought, at scalpers' prices, on Craig's List.

His appeal combines the political ability — alien to the Bush administration — to see something from your opponent's point of view with the cool detachment of a J.F.K. He's intriguingly imperfect: His ears stick out, he smokes, and he's written about wrestling with pot, booze and "maybe a little blow" as a young man.

He has been told by Democratic leaders to think about whether he really wants to be president, or whether he's just getting swept away by people who want him to do it. (That's a distinction that entitled and unqualified Republican WASPs like W. and Dan Quayle never bother to make, simply learning — or not learning — on the job.)

Does Barack Obama want to be a celebrity or a man of history — or is there no longer any difference?

The Decline Of Political Competition (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

IN AN ELECTION YEAR IN WHICH grumpy voters from coast to coast are gunning for the scalps of doddering Republicans, Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) would seem a vulnerable target. Named this summer by a nonprofit watchdog group as one of the "20 most corrupt members of Congress," Miller has earmarked road repairs near housing developments he co-owns, declined to pay taxes on three land sales and — in a congressional district one-quarter Latino — wrote legislation denying citizenship to the children of illegal immigrants.

But Democrats have a competitive disadvantage in unseating the four-term congressman: Miller is running for reelection unopposed.

This scene is playing out throughout Southern California and the rest of the state as competitive races and even challengers are becoming endangered species. Because of a cynical bipartisan agreement after the 2000 census, Democrats and Republicans represent frequently convoluted geographical footprints meticulously designed, it would seem, to ensure that no incumbent party will ever lose another election, no matter which way the political winds are blowing. In 2004, for example, not a single one of the 153 redrawn congressional, Assembly or state Senate seats changed political hands, and only three of the 53 House victors won with less than 60% of the vote.

Having carved out their spoils, Yalta-like, the two parties are loath to venture into each other's territories, even with polls showing that people want change. The cities of Diamond Bar, Chino and Rowland Heights all voted for Al Gore in 2000, and the Italy-shaped 42nd District that envelops them abuts the land-splotches of Democrats Linda T. Sanchez, Joe Baca and Grace F. Napolitano, yet no Democrat bothered to muster the 3,000 signatures necessary to take on Miller. One-candidate elections are supposed to be for fiefdoms like Myanmar, or the city of Vernon.

DOJ_NMG_0084156

The unilateral disarmament is not limited to the party of Jimmy Carter. You could buy a car on Brand Boulevard in Glendale, drive southwest through Silver Lake and Hollywood as the street becomes Hyperion and then Fountain, take a left at Western and go all 30 miles to the Pacific Ocean, and only one of the five congressional districts you'd cross through would have a Republican on the ballot. (To add insult to neglect, the 35th's Maxine Waters is on that "20 most corrupt" list too.) That's 150,000 registered Republicans who the national party has left stranded in a sea of blue. Rarely have American Independents and Libertarians looked so inviting.

The solution to this unseemly state of affairs remains simple — put redistricting in the hands of retired judges, just like it was in the 1990s, and stop letting the major parties define the terms for their own cartel. Alas, voters turned down such a reform in last year's special election. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is still committed to an overhaul of the redistricting process, and we wish him well. It'd be a shame to let California devolve into 53 one-party states.

U.S. And China Call For North Korea To Rejoin Talks (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 20 — The United States and China spoke in a unified voice on Friday to call for the resumption of six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program, but they did not announce concrete steps to increase pressure on the North Korean government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had been told by the Chinese government that a special envoy sent by Beijing to North Korea had delivered "a strong message." And the Chinese foreign minister, standing beside Ms. Rice, pledged his nation's commitment to breaking the stalemate over the North's nuclear weapons program.

The meetings in Beijing took place after China's special envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, returned from Pyongyang, where he had met with Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader. Chinese officials described the meeting as "positive" and "greatly significant," but declined to provide details of what Mr. Kim had said.

Two South Korean news organizations quoted diplomatic sources as saying Mr. Kim had offered to resume nuclear talks under certain conditions, and said he gave assurances that he had no plans to conduct a second nuclear test, as many in the region had feared.

Those accounts were not confirmed by either Chinese or American officials, and North Korea held a huge political rally in downtown Pyongyang to "hail the success" of its nuclear test.

Li Zhaoxing, China's foreign minister, said, "We are ready to maintain and continue to strengthen our consultation and cooperation with all the other parties to strive to break the stalemate as soon as possible and reconvene the six-party talks."

Ms. Rice stressed that North Korea should return to those talks "without condition," and that the financial restrictions the United States has imposed to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting would not be lifted just to entice the North back to the negotiations.

In comments later Friday, Ms. Rice expressed confidence that China was committed to enforcing new United Nations military sanctions on North Korea, and that a number of economic and trade measures were under review.

Asked specifically whether the Chinese were considering halting their oil supplies to North Korea, Ms. Rice said the Chinese government had told her it would "consider a whole host of measures."

Ms. Rice also said the Beijing leadership pledged to be "scrupulous" about ensuring that North Korea does not ship prohibited materials across its lengthy border with China.

As she neared the end of a fast-paced swing through Japan, South Korea and China, with a final stop in Moscow planned for the weekend, Ms. Rice said that halting North Korea's trade in nuclear bomb-making materials and missiles would take time; she emphasized that "this is an early trip."

The six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear program stalled after multiple rounds in 2004 and 2005. Mr. Kim ignored Chinese pressure to return to the bargaining table before conducting a missile test in July and the nuclear test on Oct. 9.

Some Chinese experts say they hope Mr. Kim, emboldened by becoming the world's latest nuclear power, is eager to resume negotiations and see the price he can extract in exchange for slowing or scrapping his nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0084157

But others here doubt he has any intention of rolling back the nuclear program, the realization of an enormously expensive effort begun by Mr. Kim's father, Kim Il-sung, after the Korean War.

There were mixed signs on Friday about the potential for resuming talks. Mr. Kim's meeting on Thursday with Mr. Tang was treated as a sign of progress here, if only because Mr. Kim appeared eager to repair relations with his leading benefactor.

A South Korean newspaper, Chosun Ilbo, citing diplomatic sources in China, said Mr. Kim had "expressed regret" for the nuclear test. Ms. Rice, however, said that her Chinese hosts had made no mention of any expression of regret by Mr. Kim. She said that there was nothing surprising in the Chinese summary of the visit by their envoy to North Korea.

Later in the day, though, the Yonhap News Agency of South Korea quoted diplomatic sources as saying that Mr. Kim had promised not to conduct another nuclear test, an event that China and the United States have said would quickly lead to a much harsher set of sanctions on his already isolated country.

That account also could not be confirmed.

It is unclear whether a new offer from North Korea to return to talks, provided certain conditions are met, will persuade China to reduce pressure on Pyongyang.

The risk for the United States is that China may soften its stance if it perceives that the Bush administration, rather than Mr. Kim, is throwing up obstacles to resuming talks.

Mr. Kim has pushed to hold one-on-one negotiations with the United States, but the Bush administration has refused to negotiate with North Korea outside the six-party talks. China has urged President Bush to authorize bilateral talks, but he has declined.

Even so, Chinese scholars who have held discussions with Chinese leaders say that North Korea's missile and nuclear tests, which were conducted despite stern warnings from China, had pushed Beijing toward a less accommodating approach toward its neighbor and onetime ally.

China twice backed United Nations sanctions against North Korea, and has since then indicated internally that it may be prepared to impose a range of bilateral sanctions if Mr. Kim continues to develop his nuclear program.

The Chinese leadership, the experts said, is prepared to reduce inexpensive oil supplies to North Korea if it conducts more nuclear tests or refuses to return to talks.

China has also imposed limited restrictions on banking transactions with North Korea, especially in the trading post of Dandong, on the Chinese side of the North Korean border, bankers there say.

Chinese analysts said they were not surprised that Mr. Kim would seek to blunt international solidarity against him. But they said they doubted he would be prepared to bargain in earnest about dismantling his nuclear program.

"I am pessimistic about the prospects for a diplomatic breakthrough," said Zhu Feng, a senior international affairs scholar and arms control expert at Beijing University. "The talks have to be given a chance, but I see no signs that Kim has undergone a sudden change of heart."

Mr. Zhu said he also doubted that China had much patience for inconclusive negotiations or North Korean "tricks" to buy time.

"I don't think our leaders are prepared to tolerate him much longer," Mr. Zhu said. "My feeling is that they are prepared to implement harsher penalties and will have to proceed with them before long."

China Gave 'Strong Message' To North Koreans, Rice Says (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Beijing Is Called Ready to Apply U.N. Sanctions

BEIJING, Oct. 20 -- China and the United States on Friday appeared to close ranks on North Korea, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice emerged from a day-long series of meetings here to say that a high-level Chinese government delegation had given North Korea "a strong message" about its nuclear test. China urged North Korea, its longtime beneficiary, to return to six-nation negotiations and appeared ready to implement key measures of the U.N. Security Council resolution punishing the Pyongyang government, Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0084158

Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and other Chinese officials did not provide details of the meeting on Thursday between a Chinese envoy and North Korean leader Kim Jong Il. But Li pointedly told reporters after meeting with Rice that China will "continue to implement our relevant international obligations and exert our due role in this process."

Rice, briefing reporters traveling with her, said China is considering a range of responses, but said she did not press the government to take any particular steps to force North Korea back to the bargaining table to discuss its nuclear program. "Let's just watch and see what China will do," Rice said, adding that "nobody wants to be on the wrong side of this resolution, in other words, something slipping through."

The U.N. resolution bars trade with North Korea in major weapons, materials that could be used in a nuclear program and luxury goods. China has an 880-mile land border with North Korea, and Rice said the border would be closely monitored.

China has been North Korea's largest trading partner, and has frequently criticized the Bush administration for its refusal to hold bilateral negotiations with North Korea. But officials here were shocked by Pyongyang's refusal to heed its warnings not to conduct a test.

Rice arrived in China after stops in Japan and South Korea to coordinate strategy on implementing the resolution and to reassure Asians that the United States does not want to escalate the conflict. Among the leaders she met with were Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

Rice said it was clear that early reports on U.S. intentions have "conjured up in people's minds the Cuban missile crisis," in which the United States imposed a quarantine on Cuba, and she wanted to allay those fears.

She also emphasized that she had not come to Asia "with my own list of what every country in the world should do." But she predicted that the sanctions may remain in place for some time. "I do believe that you're getting a firm response," she said. "If there isn't some movement, you may get a firmer response as time goes on, but I think this is going to evolve."

On Thursday, China announced that State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan had met with Kim in Pyongyang. When Rice and Tang posed for photographs before their meeting Friday, Tang was overheard telling Rice, "Fortunately, my visit this time has not been in vain." Reporters were then ushered from the room.

The Tang-Kim meeting spurred a rash of news reports in South Korea that Kim had expressed regret for the Oct. 9 test, that North Korea would return to the talks and even that North Korea had declared it would not conduct a second test. Like the Chinese officials, Rice did not disclose details of the meeting, except to say she did not get any indication that Kim expressed regret for testing the weapon.

"There wasn't anything particularly surprising" about Kim's message, Rice said, suggesting the reports that Kim promised a halt in testing were also inaccurate.

Rice aides declined to elaborate on her remarks. In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said that "the North Koreans have not made proffers to return to the six-party talks" and instead said they would return only if the United States ended a crackdown on North Korean money-laundering operations.

The talks have been suspended for nearly a year. North Korea has blamed a U.S. Treasury Department action against a bank in Macau called Banco Delta Asia, which the department had identified as the main conduit for bringing North Korean-made counterfeit U.S. bills into the international system. The Treasury Department had determined that senior officials at the Macau bank accepted large deposits of cash and agreed to place the bogus money into circulation. The bank is also reputed to hold the private accounts of Kim and his family.

In September 2005, four days before North Korea reached an agreement with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea on a "statement of principles" to guide nuclear negotiations, the Treasury Department formally designated the bank as a "primary money-laundering concern." Banco Delta Asia quickly teetered on the edge of collapse, and banks around the world began to curtail their dealings with North Korea for fear of being similarly tainted. After the impact of the Treasury action became apparent, North Korea refused to return to the six-party talks.

Rice said a recent decision by at least four Chinese banks to stop dealing with North Korea was related to the investigation of Banco Delta Asia. "I will tell you that the reaction to Banco Delta Asia has been quite extraordinary, and it must mean that it's having an effect," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0084159

In Washington, meanwhile, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and South Korean Defense Minister Yoon Kwang Ung met Friday and approved a joint communique emphasizing the "continuation of the extended deterrence offered by the U.S. nuclear umbrella" for South Korea. The 2005 communique had spoken only of "continued provision of a nuclear umbrella."

South Korean officials had urged their U.S. counterparts to expand on the "nuclear umbrella" assurance, although the Pentagon resisted the change, U.S. defense officials said. "They wanted to define it further" said a Pentagon spokesman, Maj. David Smith, such as "if the North does this, we'll do that." But he said U.S. policy is not to provide such details, either publicly or privately.

At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld repeatedly said that this year's joint communique would be virtually the same as last year's, until Yoon contradicted him. "I hope that when the joint statement comes out eventually, it'll have different language from years past," Yoon said.

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson in Washington contributed to this report.

China Urges North Korea To Return To Negotiations (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

BEIJING - China sent "a strong message" to North Korea about its nuclear weapons test and urged Pyongyang to return to negotiations about its nuclear arsenal, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said after meetings here Friday.

Displaying unusual harmony with China on a key security issue, Rice praised Beijing's role in the crisis, and she, too, urged North Korea to return to the six-nation negotiations. She expressed pessimism that the isolated North Korean regime would take up the offer anytime soon, however.

Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing appealed for "cool-headedness" in dealing with North Korea's nuclear ambitions, reflecting Beijing's long-standing fears of instability on the Korean peninsula.

China has long propped up Kim's regime with oil supplies and other aid, but there are signs that Beijing is losing patience with North Korea and reassessing those ties. Some U.S. officials believe that the apparent shift may reflect the fact the China has become a major economic power that values stability more than revolutionary fervor or ideological solidarity with the erratic Communist regime in Pyongyang.

Senior Chinese leaders privately have expressed frustration with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and questioned his judgment with unusual candor, and a senior Rice aide, speaking aboard her flight here from South Korea, said there's been a "sea change" in China's attitude toward North Korea. The aide requested anonymity to speak more frankly. China, which was deeply embarrassed and angered by North Korea's October 9 nuclear test, this week sent a senior envoy, Tang Jiaxuan, to Pyongyang to make its views clear. Tang, who returned to Beijing on Thursday, said that his mission produced results.

"Fortunately, my visit this time has not been in vain," he said as he met with Rice. He wasn't more specific. There was an unconfirmed report from South Korea's Yonhap news agency that North Korean leader Kim promised Tang that his country wouldn't conduct more nuclear tests.

U.S. officials said they couldn't confirm that report, and cast doubt on it.

A major part of Rice's mission here was to ensure that China, North Korea's only major ally, enforces strict U.N. sanctions on the country's imports and exports.

Foreign Minister Li said that China would enforce the U.N. sanctions.

"China will, as always, continue to implement our relevant international obligations and exert our due role in this process," Li said.

That message apparently was delivered to the North Koreans, as well.

Tang "went out of his way to tell the North that (the U.N. resolution imposing sanctions) was a resolution that everybody has to implement," Rice said in a session with reporters accompanying her to Asia.

The U.N. sanctions ban North Korea from importing or exporting materials for its nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs; advanced weapons such as tanks and artillery; and luxury goods.

China will be critical in determining whether the sanctions have any effect on isolated North Korea's political calculus.

DOJ_NMG_0084160

Rice said she didn't dictate to the Chinese how they should enforce them and noted that, since the U.N. resolution was passed with near-record swiftness, discussions are still under way about the details of inspecting North Korean cargoes.

She predicted that Beijing, which is concerned about a potential flood of refugees, would be "scrupulous" about patrolling its 880-mile border with impoverished North Korea.

The six-nation talks have been on ice for nearly a year, since North Korea boycotted them to protest a Bush administration financial crackdown that froze accounts linked to Kim's regime in a bank in China's territory of Macau.

China has been urging Washington to suspend the financial measures in order to restart the talks, which also include Japan, Russia and South Korea.

But Rice said the Chinese told her that the talks should begin without preconditions. "The Chinese are emphasizing the need for six-party talks to begin again," she said.

Rice said that President Bush has made it clear that he won't reverse the financial measures, some of which were taken to protect the U.S. dollar against counterfeiting.

She was skeptical that North Korea would return to the negotiating table soon, and predicted that the sanctions against it could be in place for some time.

"I don't know how quickly they will make a strategic decision to denuclearize," she said. "I think we will be at this for a long time."

Rice also met with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao. She flies to Moscow for meetings on Saturday.

China Takes Tough Stance On North Korea (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

An exasperated China took a newly tough approach to communist ally North Korea on Friday, siding with the United States in saying the North must back away from nuclear confrontation, and moving to cut Pyongyang's vital supply of hard currency.

Chinese banks have stopped financial transfers to North Korea under government orders, bank employees said Friday. And at an appearance with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, China's foreign minister nudged the North to resume negotiations over its nuclear program and assured Washington that China would carry out United Nations sanctions on Pyongyang.

"We hope all relevant parties will maintain coolheadedness, adopt a prudent and a responsible approach and adhere to peaceful dialogue," Li Zhaoxing said as Rice concluded crisis talks in Asia following the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test blast.

China, which is North Korea's longtime protector, has been reluctant in the past to use economic pressure for fear Kim Jung Il's government might collapse.

But Chinese leaders were stung when the North ignored their warnings not to test-fire missiles over the summer, and again when it defied Beijing by detonating the underground blast this month. China previously had reduced food aid to North Korea amid complaints that Pyongyang had ignored Chinese interests.

The move by China's banks could deal a significant blow to the already impoverished North. China is North Korea's top trading partner — accounting for more than half its total foreign trade of less than $4 billion last year — and is a key conduit for its hard currency.

China's actions are considered key to enforcing U.N. sanctions on the North over the test, and to coaxing the North to back away from the nuclear brink and rejoin talks.

Rice told reporters China has new resolve against the North that shows it has re-evaluated its relationship with Pyongyang. Last week's U.N. Security Council vote to impose sanctions on Pyongyang, which Beijing supported, proves the point, Rice said.

"In this entire 30-year history of the North Korean nuclear program, this is the first time that the international system has been able to actually impose a cost on North Korea for its nuclear behavior," Rice said. "It's able to impose that cost because China has been brought into the process in a way that China never was before."

The U.S.-backed sanctions were watered down partly at China's request, but China's vote in favor of punishment still represents a shift for Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0084161

All four major Chinese state-owned banks and British-owned HSBC Corp. have stopped financial transfers to the North, according to bank employees in Beijing and the northeastern Chinese city of Shenyang.

China has also been inspecting North Korean trucks at some points along the two nations' 880-mile border, and it dispatched a top envoy to Pyongyang this week to warn the North against a second nuclear test and try to bring it back to the arms talks.

Discussions over Pyongyang's nuclear program have been stalled for a year because of a boycott by the North over U.S. financial sanctions. The talks involve the United States, host China, the two Koreas, Japan and Russia.

Beijing was the final and most important stop on Rice's hastily arranged tour of Asian capitals. She continues to Moscow on Saturday for talks on the dual nuclear challenges posed by North Korea and Iran.

In Beijing, Rice appealed to North Korea to return without condition to stalled international talks over its nuclear program. She downplayed differences among the U.S., China and South Korea over the strength and tone of world response to Pyongyang.

The U.N. sanctions ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used by its ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs, and in luxury goods enjoyed almost exclusively by elites around Kim.

The U.N. restrictions call for inspections of all cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea, but it is not clear how that will work in practice. Rice has stepped gingerly around that point this week, saying all nations are obligated to enforce the sanctions but leaving the details vague.

Several Defense Department officials said Friday that the U.S. Navy is tracking a North Korean cargo ship that left port and was headed south from the Korean Peninsula. One of the officials, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information, said the U.S. does not know what the ship is carrying or its destination.

South Korean news reported Friday that Kim said Pyongyang doesn't plan to carry out any more nuclear tests and expressed regret about the country's first-ever atomic detonation last week. Kim told a visiting Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, that the North had "no plans for additional nuclear tests," Yonhap news agency reported, citing an unnamed diplomatic source in Beijing.

Rice met with Tang in Beijing on Friday and later told reporters that he had carried a "strong message to North Korea about the seriousness of what has happened."

Rice would not provide details of Kim's response, but White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters in Washington that the North had not offered to return to six-nation arms talks stalled since late last year.

___

Associated Press writer Lolita C. Baldor contributed to this report from Washington.

U.S. Finds Allies Are Reluctant To Enforce North Korea Sanctions (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. In Beijing, Gordon Fairclough In Shanghai And Yuka Hayashi In Tokyo

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

As it leads the charge to punish North Korea for testing nuclear weapons, the U.S. is finding its allies are reluctant to enforce even the minimal sanctions imposed by the United Nations -- and that its own, tougher approach has serious gaps as well.

During her Asia trip this past week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the solution is to put more muscle into an effort launched by the U.S. three years ago to monitor and interdict suspected weapons shipments around the world. The Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, has had its successes. But North Korea's three key neighbors -- China, South Korea and Japan -- are all uncertain about how that crackdown might work, or even if they want to participate.

The logic behind PSI is simple: A loose coalition of countries share intelligence on suspected arms trafficking, and then swoop in on ships or planes suspected of carrying illicit cargo. U.S. officials say the program has resulted in a number of prominent catches around the world, including missiles and chemicals, mainly involving North Korean shipments.

Pyongyang has been accused for years of trafficking in everything from counterfeit currency to nuclear-weapons parts. The U.N. resolution, approved days after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, calls for countries to prevent Pyongyang's trafficking in illicit materials. It left the details to be worked out later.

DOJ_NMG_0084162

Ms. Rice's immediate challenge is to get real cooperation from North Korea's neighbors. Yet she appeared to make little progress on that front during her Asia trip, which ended Saturday.

South Korea remains reluctant to sign on, and members of Seoul's ruling liberal party argue that it shouldn't. Demonstrators outside the Foreign Ministry headquarters chanted slogans opposing PSI during Ms. Rice's visit. Chinese authorities, meanwhile, who are otherwise taking tough steps to crack down on North Korea, have said they may draw the line at interdicting shipments at sea.

Beijing and Seoul worry that any attempts to stop North Korean freighters could spark an armed skirmish. Japan, while more eager to crack down on Pyongyang, is severely limited by its pacifist constitution.

Even if the U.S. were to get full cooperation on PSI, participants would face challenges in tracking and interdicting banned shipments. Getting sound intelligence on shipments is tough, especially when it is easy to disguise a vessel's identification and registration.

Countries are also wrangling over the legal justification for interdicting shipments, especially in international waters. Neither PSI nor the U.N. sanctions gives countries clear legal leverage. Ms. Rice has argued that under the U.N. resolution, countries have a "mandatory obligation" to scrutinize shipments from North Korea under the authority of their domestic laws.

The legal hurdle is particularly high in Japan. To pave the way for its military participation, Tokyo may have to invoke for the first time a clause in a 1999 law that grants expanded responsibility to the country's self-defense forces.

As the North's top trade partner, China has a tall order, too, policing a long land border with its neighbor. In the past week, Beijing has stepped up inspections of trucks bound for North Korea at the main border crossing in Dandong.

Some U.S. officials, too, are wary of the consequences of stopping or seizing North Korean vessels or their cargoes at sea. One U.S. official said the military, currently fighting two wars, is short of the resources to effectively police shipping. "I don't think our military is anxious to dedicate significant resources to that sort of effort," the official said.

Write to Neil King Jr. at neil.king@wsj.com1, Gordon Fairclough at gordon.fairclough@wsj.com2 and Yuka Hayashi at yuka.hayashi@wsj.com3

Asia Goal Proving Elusive For Rice (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

BEIJING — As U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left China today for Russia, her goal of uniting Northeast Asia in a strong, unambiguous punitive stance against North Korea remained elusive.

China continued to balk at using its economic leverage too aggressively against its longtime ally, given the risk that a wave of refugees along their 880-mile shared border could destabilize its industrial northeast. China would be the linchpin of any effective sanctions since it supplies most of North Korea's fuel and much of its food.

South Korea has refused to shutter two major economic projects with the North that put millions of dollars in hard currency into the pockets of the isolated Stalinist regime.

Russia, the final stop on Rice's four-nation trip in the wake of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, opposes tough economic sanctions or intrusive searches.

And Japan, closest to Washington in its thinking on the crisis, is roundly viewed in the region as the wrong player at the wrong time to make like neighborhood cop. The concern is that memories of Japan's wartime brutality on the Korean peninsula and throughout Asia would inflame tensions were it to inspect North Korean ships at sea or take other tough enforcement steps.

With no easy answers, a wily adversary in Pyongyang, the North's capital, and limited options, Rice sought Friday to lower expectations, even as she praised China's willingness to consider tougher measures in the interest of regional and global stability.

"This is an early trip. People are reviewing where they are," she told reporters in Beijing. "What do we know about securing the land border with North Korea? Not very much."

Amid South Korean and Japanese media reports that Pyongyang had no plan to test a second nuclear device, and that it was contrite about the test that rattled nerves around the world, the North remained publicly defiant.

DOJ_NMG_0084163

"The nuclear test was an exercise of the independent and legitimate right of [North Korea] as a sovereign state," said Choe Thae Bok, a senior member of the North's Korean Workers' Party, according to the country's official news agency.

The record is not very good when it comes to nations getting the nuclear genie back into the bottle.

"No country has stopped nuclear tests after only carrying out one," Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso told reporters in Tokyo. "We have to think that [a second test] will be done."

Faced with few alternatives, North Korea's neighbors have put renewed faith in the heretofore unsuccessful six-nation talks as a way to contain the isolated, impoverished state. Negotiations stalled after Pyongyang walked out a year ago. In addition to China and the United States, the participants are the two Koreas, Japan and Russia.

As usual, a great deal comes down to mercurial North Korea's stance, behavior and negotiating tactics.

"I can't answer to whether they're serious about returning to six-party talks or not," Rice told reporters. "I don't think anybody believes that six or seven six-party talk sessions in which we again get into an argument about the sequencing of a light-water reactor is going to be very helpful to anyone."

China's desire to see the talks succeed — it had a crucial role in setting them up — and its role as mediator and host are additional reasons it is reluctant to push North Korea too hard on sanctions. Beijing believes that if it is identified too closely with a U.S. hard-line stance, it loses the opportunity to broker a solution in the future, with the international prestige that entails.

"Our purpose is to do some punitive things," said Shen Dingli, an international relations professor at Fudan University in Shanghai. "But the ultimate goal is to bring them back to the six-party talks and to abandon their nuclear weapons."

mark.magnier@latimes.com

Times staff writer Bruce Wallace in Tokyo and Yin Lijin in The Times' Beijing Bureau contributed to this report.

China Wrests N. Korean Pledge (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

BEIJING -- China reportedly won a pledge from North Korean leader Kim Jong-il not to conduct another nuclear test and at the same time blocked bank transfers to the isolated state.

"In this entire 30-year history of the North Korean nuclear program, this is the first time that the international system has been able to actually impose a cost on North Korea for its nuclear behavior," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

"It's able to impose that cost because China has been brought into the process in a way that China never was before," she said after meetings with President Hu Jintao and other senior leaders.

Chinese State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan briefed Miss Rice on his meeting with Mr. Kim a day earlier in Pyongyang. As state councilor, Mr. Tang outranks China's foreign minister in the government hierarchy.

"Fortunately, my visit this time has not been in vain," Mr. Tang said.

Meanwhile, acting on government orders, four state-owned Chinese banks halted financial transfers to North Korea, bank employees told the Associated Press in Beijing and the northeastern city of Shenyang.

Miss Rice flew out of the Chinese capital today for Moscow, where she will hold further talks on implementing U.N. sanctions. Miss Rice is scheduled to discuss North Korea with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov.

The secretary of state has also visited Japan and South Korea on her tour of North Korea's neighbors.

"We have no plans for additional nuclear tests," South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted Mr. Kim as telling the Chinese envoy. The newspaper cited an unidentified diplomatic source in Beijing.

South Korea's Chosun Ilbo daily reported that the North Korean leader also told the Chinese visitors "he is sorry about the nuclear test" already conducted. The newspaper cited a diplomatic source in China.

The Japanese news agency Kyodo quoted Foreign Minister Taro Aso as saying he had information, although not confirmed, that the North Korean leader had said he would not conduct another test.

U.S. and Chinese officials stopped short of confirming the reports, saying only that Mr. Kim pledged not to escalate the situation further.

DOJ_NMG_0084164

Mr. Tang "went out of his way to emphasize that he told the North" that China "intends to implement" U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718, Miss Rice told reporters in a joint press conference with Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing.

The U.N. measure imposed sanctions on missile- and nuclear-related imports and exports and called for inspections of cargo heading in and out of North Korea.

"The Chinese made the point to us that they are scrupulous about [their] land border" with North Korea, Miss Rice said. "You will see cooperation on cargo, particularly if there is suspicious cargo."

China had said publicly that it would not participate in inspections called for in the U.N. resolution. Nevertheless, Chinese officials this week began inspecting North Korean trucks crossing the two nations' 880-mile border.

Miss Rice said that her visit to China, and earlier to Japan and South Korea, was intended to emphasize the importance of enforcing the resolution.

"Their implementation is going to differ according to their own authorities, with the specific problems they face," she said.

During his joint appearance with Miss Rice, Mr. Li, the Chinese foreign minister, urged North Korea to end its yearlong boycott of six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear future.

"We hope all relevant parties will maintain coolheadedness, adopt a prudent and a responsible approach and adhere to peaceful dialogue," Mr. Li said.

As North Korea's longtime ally and protector, China had used its veto-wielding clout in the U.N. Security Council to soften the sanctions package.

The measure explicitly ruled out the threat of military force if North Korean defiance continued.

Nevertheless, China's vote for the final resolution and measures it has since implemented represented a major shift in its posture toward the North.

Russia, China, Japan, the two Koreas and the United States are parties in the six-nation talks that have been boycotted by North Korea since late last year.

N. Korea Threat Lies In Nuclear Sales (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

U.S. intelligence officials and weapons experts say the possible export of atomic material and know-how is a greater concern than an attack.

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence officials and weapons proliferation experts say they are concerned that North Korea could add plutonium to the extensive inventory of arms components and technologies it already has sold to such nations as Syria, Pakistan and Libya.

Because of North Korea's track record as an eager exporter of weaponry, some experts are more worried about the government in Pyongyang spreading nuclear technology to other "rogue" nations than about the possibility of it launching a nuclear attack.

"Iran having nuclear weapons is a threat," said David Albright, a former weapons inspector and current president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington.

"It's hard to articulate that North Korea having nuclear weapons is a threat to anybody, except by selling it."

That concern prompted a warning from President Bush on Wednesday that Pyongyang would face a "grave consequence" if caught trying to sell plutonium or nuclear weapons to "rogue" nations or terrorist groups.

Albright and other experts, as well as American intelligence officials, said they had not seen evidence that North Korea was attempting to sell the nuclear technology it demonstrated in an underground explosion Oct. 9. Doing so, they said, would be an extreme and dangerous step even for one of the world's most defiant regimes.

But the combination of North Korea's newly demonstrated capability and its long history of selling arms has refocused international attention on the nuclear proliferation threat.

DOJ_NMG_0084165

"I don't think you'll find guys saying they've got devices ready to sell off the shelf," said a U.S. intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the classified nature of the subject. "I think the concern would be about components and raw material."

Tracking North Korea's weapons programs and shipments has been a major priority for U.S. intelligence agencies.

Last year, American intelligence analysts concluded that samples of processed uranium surrendered by Libya probably had come from North Korea. Libya turned over the materials when it agreed in 2003 to abandon its illegal weapons programs.

Pyongyang has a more extensive and established record as an exporter of conventional missile components.

A study by the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies says North Korea had sold "several hundred" mid-range ballistic missiles "as well as materials, equipment, components and production technology" to countries that include Egypt, Iran, Libya, Pakistan, Syria and Yemen. Most of the exported missiles have been variants of the Scud design the Soviets first sold to North Korea in the late 1960s, the study says.

Over a two-decade period, sales of missiles and components have brought in revenue of several hundred million dollars, "a significant portion of North Korea's hard currency earnings," the study says.

North Korea is an impoverished country that relies on China for much of its food, and it depends on the sale of weapons and contraband, allegedly including counterfeit U.S. currency, for much of its revenue.

North Korea is believed to have engaged in barter arrangements by which it has provided missiles to Iran in exchange for oil. Of greater concern has been an apparent deal with Pakistan begun in 1997 by which North Korea provided missile components and technology in return for expertise on developing a uranium enrichment program — a means of producing weapons-grade nuclear material that is more difficult to detect than the reprocessing of plutonium.

Numerous North Korean weapons shipments have been intercepted. In 1996, Swiss authorities stopped a consignment of Scud missile components headed to Egypt, prompting Cairo to promise to curtail its purchases from North Korea.

Given North Korea's record, its nuclear test has triggered fears that it may next seek to export such weapons technology as well.

As recently as several years ago, American intelligence agencies concluded that North Korea probably had enough plutonium for two or three bombs. But in December 2002, North Korea expelled international inspectors, soon thereafter withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and subsequently declared that it was resuming the reprocessing of more than 8,000 spent fuel rods.

"They have certainly produced enough plutonium since that time to make a number of more weapons," said a U.S. defense official familiar with the intelligence on North Korea.

It is unclear whether Pyongyang plans further nuclear tests. American spy satellites and other surveillance have detected suspicious activity at other underground facilities, possibly indicating preparations for another test, U.S. intelligence officials said. However, South Korean and Japanese media reported Friday that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had told a Chinese envoy that Pyongyang would not conduct another test.

Experts said that further tests would suggest that North Korea has an ample supply of plutonium, enough to make additional bombs and raise concerns about proliferation.

Recent sanctions imposed by the United Nations bar North Korea from spreading nuclear material or technology. And most experts said the country would probably refrain from doing so. "It's still a low-probability worry," said Michael Levi, a nuclear weapons expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, "but it's the high consequences that make people concerned."

greg.miller@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

A history of arms exports

Here are some of the transfers of weapons and related materials from North Korea to other countries:

Egypt

• Bought Scud-B missiles in 1980s

• Bought Scud-C throughout 1990s

DOJ_NMG_0084166

• Negotiated for Nodong missiles in 2000, but U.S. diplomatic intervention blocked transfer

Iran

• Had Scud-B missiles and mobile launchers shipped in 1987 for Iran-Iraq war

• Received Scud-C missiles in early 1990s

• Began to have Nodong missiles shipped in 1995

• May have received advanced Taepodong technology

Pakistan

• Reportedly agreed around 1997 to trade uranium enrichment technology for Nodong missiles and production technology

• Arranged for missile components and technicians to be transported by aircraft from North Korea in late 1997

• Tested version of Nodong in April 1998

Syria

• Reports of negotiations surfaced in 1989

• Received Scud-C missiles in 1990s

• Few reports of substantial sales since 1990s, perhaps because Syria and Iran developed missile cooperation

Libya

• Ship destined for Libya carrying Scud missile materials, components and blueprints intercepted June 1999 by Indian customs officials

• Unconfirmed reports of purchases of Nodong missiles or components since 2000

• U.S. intelligence analyzed Libyan-processed uranium after December 2003 and concluded it came from North Korea

United Arab Emirates, Yemen

• Minor purchases of Scud missiles during 1990s

• North Korean ship carrying 15 Scud missiles for Yemen temporarily detained in December 2002

Source: "North Korea's Weapons Programs — A Net Assessment," International Institute for Strategic Studies

Amid Nuclear Crisis, Sun May Be Setting On `sunshine Policy' (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea - Many South Koreans shrug off North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, saying that while a nuclear-armed Pyongyang may menace the United States and Japan, it's unlikely to attack its prosperous southern neighbor.

Their attitudes changed markedly under the "sunshine policy" launched in 1998 by former President Kim Dae-jung, which fueled investment in impoverished North Korea and helped defuse the fear that the Korean Peninsula might be at war once again.

But North Korea's entry into the global nuclear club may be a coda for the sunshine policy. Some South Koreans say engagement has failed to encourage significant reform in North Korea. Others view it as appeasement, saying their nation has served as a virtual ATM for North Korea.

The sunshine policy, which also has put Seoul in conflict with Washington, clearly is nearing sunset.

"Public opinion is divided," said Choi Jang-jip, a Korea University political scientist. "After the nuclear test, questions have been raised about people's trust in the policy."

A prominent political scientist, Nam Sung-wook, said he expected the policy "to expire in the near future" because it had failed to halt North Korea's nuclear quest. "North Korea is a brand-new country since Oct. 9," he said.

The sunshine policy dramatically increased the exposure of South Koreans to North Korea, and many South Koreans came to believe that they were forestalling North Korea's economic collapse and setting the pace for eventual orderly reunification. Each month, tens of thousands of South Koreans cross the heavily fortified border to visit a mountain sanctuary resort in North Korea, getting a small taste of life on the other side.

Now, however, polls show that an increasing number of South Koreans think that Seoul should stand up more firmly to Pyongyang, even as their fear of North Korea has diminished.

DOJ_NMG_0084167

"You need to use a stick as well as a carrot in conducting the engagement policy," said Kim Yong-won, a 25-year-old university student studying computer science.

The pillars of the policy are two massive cross-border investment projects, the Mount Kumgang resort - Diamond Mountain in English - and the Kaesong Industrial Zone.

About 40,000 South Koreans go each month to the resort in the Kumgang Mountains, a site exalted in Korean literature as the embodiment of the peninsula's scenic beauty. Some 1.35 million South Koreans have traveled to the resort, crossing the once-feared Demilitarized Zone into North Korea.

The Kaesong Industrial Zone, an hour's bus ride from Seoul just north of the DMZ, employs 9,000 North Koreans now and is slated to grow rapidly in the next few years.

The Hyundai Group, which has financed the projects, has pumped in about $1.6 billion, helping to increase cross-border trade to more than $1 billion last year.

Newspapers fill with emotional stories of reunions among relatives who were separated after the 1950-1953 Korean War. Some 14,600 people have been reunited, and tens of thousands of South Koreans, mainly businessmen, have visited North Korea under the sunshine policy, mostly searching for opportunities.

"For 50 years, before Kim Dae-jung's sunshine policy, only 200 South Koreans had visited North Korea," said Jung Chung-rae, a legislator from South Korea's ruling Uri Party.

As a result of the increased exposure, Jung said, polls consistently show that fewer than 10 percent of South Koreans feel an immediate threat from North Korea.

The last major nuclear scare occurred in 1994, when Pyongyang threatened to turn Seoul into a "sea of fire." Panic ensured, with many South Koreans fleeing to markets in "ramen runs," believing that catastrophic war might erupt.

But a majority of South Koreans now think that North Korea is using its newfound nuclear capacity as a bargaining chip and would target other nations - probably Japan and the United States - only if pushed to the wall.

"I don't think Kim Jong Il will fire nuclear weapons toward South Korea because that would be killing his own brethren," said Oh Sang-tae, a 64-year-old deliveryman for an office-supply store in central Seoul.

Like many residents of Seoul, he said he wasn't sure where there might be a secure bomb shelter. The Donga-ilbo newspaper reported recently that the city of some 10 million people has nuclear shelters capable of holding only 1,500.

Conservatives, who've long decried the sunshine policy, said many South Koreans had grown foolishly inured to real threats of war.

"Maybe people are numb," said Cha Myung-jin, a legislator with South Korea's largest opposition force, the Grand National Party. "The threat has been going on for so long, people don't feel it."

Pyongyang is known to have 8,000 artillery pieces dug into mountains and aimed at Seoul, ready to lob conventional, chemical and biological shells.

From his perch at Seoul's South Gate Market, vendor Kim Myong-seon - who sells military surplus gear, including gas masks - said citizens weren't nervous as they once were.

"It was after Sept. 11 that people bought gas masks," he said. "People thought South Korea could be another target of al-Qaida because it is a U.S. ally."

Now sales are slow. No one is rushing out to stock up for conflict.

"Nobody is frightened," Kim said. "It's not like in the past."

Yet polls have found that South Koreans do worry about the role the Bush administration may play in a crisis, fearing that they might get dragged into a war and dreading anything like the war U.S. troops are waging in Iraq, where some 2,400 South Korean troops are posted.

"I am afraid of President Bush. It is possible he could start a war in Korea as he did in Iraq," said Cho Sung-moo, an electrical engineering student at Chonnam University in Seoul.

U.N. Reports On Genetic Concentration Camps (WT)

By Damien Mcelroy

DOJ_NMG_0084168

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

North Korea operates a rigorous system of eugenics that locks up those deemed subnormal, ranging from the disabled to dwarfs, according to a U.N. report released yesterday.

A system of gulags is designed to ensure that those who do not conform to the state's designation of normal do not pass on their genes by having children.

"Those with disabilities are sent away from the capital city and particularly those with mental disability are detained in areas or camps known as 'Ward 49' with harsh and subhuman conditions," wrote Vitit Muntarbhorn, a Thai lawyer who is special rapporteur for human rights in North Korea.

Evidence was gathered from defectors to South Korea.

The report said dwarfs are not allowed to reproduce and they are rounded up and relocated. Marriages at the camps are permitted but having children is not.

Shut away for life, the afflicted are subjected to harsh and subhuman conditions. Food is scarce and of poor quality and beatings are commonplace, according to the report.

There are extensive descriptions of other forms of torture, including chemical weapons tests and germ agent experiments. Those not used as laboratory guinea pigs are ordered to carry out back-breaking work.

North Korea is not the only totalitarian state to retain a fascination with the goal of breeding a better population by eliminating those with "weak" genes. But since the fall of the Soviet bloc, it apparently is one of the last states to implement the practice.

Pyongyang is also dedicated to the principle of racial purity. Women who have sexual relations with the small Chinese community in North Korea are often purged.

"If they carry a child of non-Korean ethnicity, they may be subjected to discrimination and/or violence, with a dire impact on the babies," the report stated.

The report was delivered to the U.N. General Assembly, which has been asked to censure the Stalinist dictatorship.

U.S.: China Must Address Trade Disputes (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, October 21, 2006

China has made progress in resolving long-standing trade disputes with the United States, but more needs to be done in a number of areas, the administration's top trade official for Asia said Friday.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia said that when he holds talks next week with Chinese trade officials in Beijing, he would review a number of commitments China made last spring.

He said the government seemed to be fulfilling some pledges, such as an agreement to load legal software on all new computers sold in China. But in other areas, the Chinese have been less forthcoming, he said.

"We are looking, frankly, for speedy resolution in areas where they have made policy commitments," Bhatia said.

In addition to the commitment on computer software, other commitments made by the Chinese included ways it planned to crack down on the sale of illegal, pirated computer software and expanding the opportunity for U.S. and other foreign firms to compete for Chinese government contracts.

Bhatia's trip is just the latest by administration officials seeking to show progress in dealing with America's ballooning trade deficit with China, which hit a record $202 billion last year and is on track to exceed that amount this year.

In addition to discussions with government officials in Beijing, Bhatia was traveling to the Chinese cities of Dalian and Shenyang to meet with local government officials and business leaders during five days of talks that will begin next Tuesday.

Before arriving in China, Bhatia planned a stop Monday in Seoul, South Korea, for meetings with government officials, business groups and students to present U.S. administration views on the current free trade negotiations with South Korea.

Bhatia said the United States still has significant issues to resolve before it will be able to complete the free trade deal with South Korea or a separate free trade agreement being negotiated with Malaysia.

DOJ_NMG_0084169

Both sets of talks face a deadline for completion at the beginning of next year for the deals to be submitted to Congress before President Bush loses his negotiating authority under the Trade Promotion Act, which is set to expire next July.

Bhatia said both South Korea and Malaysia stood to gain a great deal economically by concluding agreements. He said North Korea's recent testing of a nuclear device underscored the need for close ties between the U.S. and South Korea but did not have an impact on the "nuts and bolts" of the talks on removing trade barriers.

The fourth round of the U.S.-South Korea trade talks are scheduled to be held next week in Jeju, South Korea.

Those negotiations will be followed the next week in Kuala Lumpur with the third round of talks on a free trade agreement with Malaysia.

Bhatia said those talks had faced recent obstacles including debate inside the Malaysian government over negotiating positions in such areas as opening bidding on government contracts to U.S. companies.

But Bhatia said the administration still believed a deal could be done before Bush's negotiating authority expires.

"We are prepared to work as quickly as Malaysia wants to," he said.

China's Milestone, Our Millstone (NYT)

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The Chinese sell a lot of merchandise in the United States and, in the process, accumulate a lot of dollars. They then loan many of those dollars back to the United States in exchange for all manner of American i.o.u.'s, including Treasury bonds, federal agency bonds, and private-sector debt.

America's indebtedness to China, as a result, is staggeringly high, although the Bush administration — which needs foreign loans to help finance the budget deficit — seems unfazed. But there is reason for pause. The Wall Street Journal reported this week that China's holdings of foreign currency and securities would soon top $1 trillion, a fivefold increase since 2000. Roughly 70 percent of that is believed to be in dollars or dollar-based assets.

Of course, $1 trillion does not confer significantly more clout than, say, $990 billion. But the size and growth of China's holdings mean increasing vulnerability for the United States.

For several years, China's loans have helped to keep prices and interest rates low in the United States, and to finance big tax cuts. If the lending began to dry up — because Chinese officials decided to diversify into other currencies or to spend more at home — prices, interest rates and taxes in the United States would very likely rise. If the loans dried up quickly — a worst-case scenario — the result could be a sharp financial crisis. A gradual shift could mean a long downward trend in American living standards as a higher cost of living took its toll.

China might never pull back in a way that harmed the United States. But the fact that it could already makes the global financial system more volatile. Investors and traders are hypersensitive to any hint that Beijing may switch allocations.

The Journal also reported that administration officials are concerned that developing nations, unhappy with conditions on loans from the International Monetary Fund, may decide to borrow directly from China. That would give Beijing more influence over emerging markets and their governments.

To its credit, the Bush administration has repeatedly stressed that the rise of China is not to be feared or begrudged. But excessive borrowing during the Bush years has made the United States unnecessarily vulnerable.

Iran's Leader Warns West On Support For Israel (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 20 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran warned Europe on Friday that continued support for Israel could lead to an act of revenge by those in the Middle East angry about the Palestinians' plight.

He issued the warning at a critical time; the United Nations Security Council is expected to begin public deliberations next week on whether to impose sanctions on Iran for defying a United Nations demand to suspend uranium-enrichment activities by the end of August.

DOJ_NMG_0084170

Mr. Ahmadinejad, addressing European countries, said, "People in the region blame you for any crime or invasion against any country and will take revenge on you."

"You should know that the rage of people is boiling and is like an ocean that is welling up," he said in his speech at a rally here. "Once its storm begins blowing, it will go beyond the borders of Lebanon and Palestine, and it will hurt European countries."

He did not describe what revenge could entail in his speech, which was also carried live on radio.

The rally was called for Jerusalem Day, held here every year on the last Friday of the fasting month of Ramadan in support of the Palestinian struggle against Israel. Mr. Ahmadinejad told tens of thousands of demonstrators that Israel could not last long after its battle this summer against Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. "Hezbollah shattered the myth that Israel is undefeatable," he said. "Now Israel has no reason to exist."

State-run television showed tens of thousands of demonstrators around the country who chanted "Death to America" and "Death to Israel." People carried pictures of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah in Lebanon, and burned American and Israeli flags.

Over the last year, Mr. Ahmadinejad has caused international outrage by questioning the Holocaust and saying, "Israel should be wiped off the map," a slogan used often by the father of the 1979 revolution, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

On Friday, Mr. Ahmadinejad talked again about the Holocaust, saying: "Even if we assume that six million Jews were killed in World War II, how come you don't have sympathy for the other 54 million who were killed, too? It is not even clear who counted those you have sympathy for." He said Israel has effectively held European countries hostage for what happened during World War II.

Television reports also showed demonstrators chanting in support of Iran's nuclear program.

Mr. Ahmadinejad repeated Friday that Iran would not give in to international demands to suspend its uranium-enrichment program and dismissed United Nations efforts to impose sanctions on Iran as illegitimate. "They want to use the Security Council as an instrument to put pressure on our people," he said. "But thank God they will never succeed."

Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the former president, warned Western countries at the same rally that sanctions on Iran would have serious consequences for Europeans. "I advise them not to implement the harmful decision they have made over Iran's nuclear program," he said. Mr. Rafsanjani has backed Iran's nuclear program in public speeches but is believed to favor policies that would prevent confrontation between Iran and the West.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said last week that Iran would welcome sanctions because local industries would have a chance to grow.

Britain, France, Germany and the United States have been working on a Security Council resolution on Iran that they hope to introduce early next week. It may include a ban on nuclear or missile cooperation with Iran. European Union foreign ministers, meeting Tuesday in Luxembourg, agreed to call for limited sanctions.

In its first official response to the threat of United Nations action, Iran's Foreign Ministry said in a statement that Iran would not "remain idle if sanctions are imposed."

"It is big miscalculation to think the policy of carrot and stick can be pursued at the same time," the statement said, according to ISNA, a government-affiliated news agency.

Israel Accuses Iran Of Blocking Release (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

Israel accused the Iranian government of paying $50 million to block a deal that would have freed an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants who crossed from Gaza into Israel on June 25. Hamas and Iran dismissed the accusation as untrue.

Israel's U.N. Ambassador Dan Gillerman told the Security Council on Thursday that "we heard news" earlier in the day that Tehran bribed Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal "to sabotage the negotiations on the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and prevent his release."

DOJ_NMG_0084171

Gillerman later refused to divulge the basis of the allegation or provide details, saying only that "we have every reason to believe that the Iranian regime has bribed Khaled Mashaal."

Iranian diplomat Mansour Sadeghi told the council his government "categorically rejected" all allegations against his country made by Israel, dismissing Gillerman's allegations as "baseless and absurd."

He said Gillerman's allegations were an attempt to divert attention from Israel's "aggression, occupation and state terrorism," and its defiance of Security Council resolutions.

According to a report Thursday in the Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot, which cited anonymous sources from a Western country, the deal was foiled when an Iranian delegation met Mashaal in Damascus and offered him $50 million to block it.

Mashaal, who lives in exile in Damascus, accepted the money and ratcheted up his demands for Shalit's release, the report said, deadlocking the negotiations.

"If this is the way in which Iran threatens humanitarian situations," Gillerman said, "I shudder to think about the lengths to which Iran will go to undermine a diplomatic one, and achieve its dangerous regional aspirations and nightmarish and megalomaniacal dreams of nuclear capability."

Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon, said in a telephone interview on Friday that the report "is an obvious Israeli lie."

"Everybody knows that the Israeli soldier was captured in order to exchange him with Palestinian prisoners, so, the issue has no relationship with money, or any other matter," Hamdan said. "The issue is related to the release of Palestinians captives."

Israel has long been targeting Mashaal. In 1997, Israel botched an assassination attempt in Jordan. Two Mossad agents injected Mashaal with poison, but were caught, and as Mashaal lay dying in a Jordanian hospital, King Hussein of Jordan forced Israel to provide the antidote in return for the release of the Mossad agents.

In June, then-Justice Minister Haim Ramon said Mashaal is a target for assassination for ordering Shalit's kidnapping.

Alvaro de Soto, the U.N.'s Mideast envoy, told the Security Council that Egyptian officials are leading diplomatic efforts to free Shalit "and report that a package is on the table designed to address both parties' concerns, but the captors say they seek additional guarantees."

The package reportedly involved a swap of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners jailed by Israel for Shalit.

Israeli War Plan Had No Exit Strategy (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Just two days after Israel launched a punishing counterattack against Hezbollah this summer, Israeli military and diplomatic officials were deeply split over war strategy.

On July 14, as Israeli aircraft prepared to bomb south Beirut, the research unit of Israel's military intelligence branch presented a report to senior Israeli officials that questioned the war plan's ability to achieve the government's goals.

The analysis, according to senior Foreign Ministry officials who read it, concluded that the heavy bombing campaign and small ground offensive then underway would show "diminishing returns" within days. It stated that the plan would neither win the release of the two Israeli soldiers in Hezbollah's hands nor reduce the militia's rocket attacks on Israel to fewer than 100 a day.

Those initial conclusions held true when the war ended 31 days later.

"The question we want to know to this day was why the military chose an option that had no exit strategy," said a senior Foreign Ministry official who read the report. "They never had one, as far as we could tell."

An examination of the first days of the war shows that leaders of Israel's newly elected government launched a broad military campaign without a clear strategy for how it was to end. It also reveals that while Israeli military officials anticipated an entrenched guerrilla force, front-line officers were surprised by just how well prepared Hezbollah was.

This account was drawn from interviews with Israeli military commanders, senior political and diplomatic officials and soldiers, and a visit to the site where the war began. Several commissions are investigating how Israel's political and military leadership managed the war, and those conclusions could determine how long Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government remains in office.

DOJ_NMG_0084172

Maj. Gen. Ido Nehushtan, the military's chief of strategic planning, declined to comment directly on the research unit's assessment. But he acknowledged that "yes, you are right, that at one point we reached a point of diminishing returns."

"But you never know when that crack will come," he said.The Ambush

On July 12, two Israeli Humvees passed within yards of a Hezbollah ambush point. It was a hollow carved in the underbrush, just above the track used by Israeli military patrols. The hidden Hezbollah camp was stocked with food, water, radios, rifles, antitank missiles and diagrams detailing the insignia and size of Israeli military units. The Hezbollah fighters aimed and fired at the Israeli convoy just after 9 a.m. along a remote bend in the fence-lined road.

Lt. Col. Ishai Efroni, deputy commander of the Baram Brigade, had for months seen donkeys carrying sacks on the other side of the border, led by men who appeared to be Lebanese farmers. "We thought it was fertilizer," he said of the sacks. Later, he realized it was weapons and equipment. "This is what you learn in guerrilla school," he said of the Hezbollah fighters. "You take your time."

Efroni noticed that the Hezbollah gunmen had grown increasingly brazen walking the fence line in his sector along the northwestern border, and on May 28 the guerrillas fired a barrage of Katyusha rockets toward Israel's coastal towns. "I got the feeling something had changed," said Efroni, 41, who has spent most of his career in the northern border area.

On July 12, the dull thump of explosions reached Efroni's brigade headquarters as he reviewed morning intelligence reports. Six other army posts reported taking fire at the same time, coordinated attacks that knocked out surveillance cameras.

Contact with the patrol was lost after the Hezbollah team knocked out the trailing Humvee, killing the soldiers inside. But it took 20 minutes to confirm that Staff Sgts. Ehud Goldwasser, 31, and Eldad Regev, 26, were missing from the first vehicle, a delay that gave the gunmen a large lead as they fled through olive orchards to the Lebanese border village of Aita al-Shaab.

Efroni sent a Merkava tank, an armored personnel carrier and a helicopter in pursuit. But the most direct route into the village was a dirt track lined with explosives-filled trenches. Instead, Efroni ordered the tank through a rocky canyon from the east. Tracking its progress from the operations room, he watched with alarm as it unexpectedly veered onto the road near a known Hezbollah post.

The blast beneath the tank was enormous, killing the four soldiers inside instantly. The fight to retrieve the bodies lasted hours and killed the eighth Israeli soldier of the day.

"All they wanted was some part of their bodies," Efroni said, referring to the Hezbollah fighters. He recalled that Israel had released hundreds of Palestinian, Lebanese and other Arab prisoners in exchange for the remains of three soldiers taken in 2000 and a kidnapped civilian. "They know we go to great efforts to get our people back."An Evolving Response

At 9:45 on the morning of July 12, Olmert sat across from Noam and Aviva Shalit, an unassuming couple who had come to hear how Israel's leader intended to free their son, captured by radical Palestinians outside the Gaza Strip 2 1/2 weeks earlier.

There was a knock on Olmert's office door. His military aide entered with a note.

The slip contained news of the ambush. "Hannibal," the army code word for a captured soldier, had been passed up the chain of command.

"I think you should read this, too," Olmert said as he handed the note to Noam Shalit, according to his communications director, Asaf Shariv, who watched events unfold that morning.

The Hannibal code triggered instant aerial surveillance and airstrikes inside Lebanon to limit Hezbollah's ability to move the soldiers it had seized. "If we had found them, we would have hit them, even if it meant killing the soldiers," a senior Israeli official said.

Olmert ordered his government to assemble that evening for an emergency meeting at military headquarters in Tel Aviv.

Just before 6 p.m., Olmert arrived at the compound of palms and grassy courtyards. For the next two hours, his generals and intelligence chiefs presented him with a plan to strike Lebanon's roads, bridges, international airport and other infrastructure, especially in the Shiite Muslim south that is Hezbollah's heartland. This was followed by a government meeting, which went on until midnight.

Several officials said there was little dissension among ministers over the scope of the response. Within hours it had become an air-and-sea blockade of Lebanon. But Olmert, who was elected in March having never held a security portfolio, expressed concern over what Hezbollah intended to do in response.

DOJ_NMG_0084173

"He wanted to know what would happen in the north," a senior Israeli official who attended the meeting recounted. "On that day, though, everyone was in favor of war."

Scores of targets were hit in the first hours, including many of Hezbollah's longer-range rocket launchers in a single 34-minute period. But rockets launched by Hezbollah soon began falling across northern Israel.

The conventional Israeli military plan for an attack on southern Lebanon is called "Stones of Fire." The doctrine has been revised over the years, but it still relies on a ground invasion force of four army divisions.

Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, Israel's chief of staff, set that plan aside. Instead, Halutz, the first air force general to lead the military, emphasized air power. He hoped aerial assaults would encourage Lebanon's Sunni Muslim and Christian populations to turn against Hezbollah, a radical Shiite movement that has an armed wing and a vast social services network, and that operates as a state within a state.

"We couldn't fight Lebanon as a country," said Nehushtan, the military's head of strategic planning. "The only way to stop them was to make them take the blame for their attacks."

Given the expected rocket reprisals from Hezbollah, some Israeli officials believed a large ground war was inevitable and should begin sooner rather than later. But Nehushtan, then a brigadier general, said "Stones of Fire" had lost its relevance after Syria's military withdrew from Lebanon last year. He said Hezbollah's guerrilla tactics required a different approach.

According to Israeli intelligence estimates, Hezbollah had invested $1.5 billion over the past six years preparing for war, chiefly with material and logistical help from Syria and Iran, whose Shiite government uses the militia to project power in the Arab world. Weapons had been stockpiled in tunnels, bunkers and private homes, a nightmarish scenario for a conventional army in the age of cable news.

Israeli military officials had watched much of the preparation take place from ground posts and aerial surveillance, and even knew which houses were used for storing some of Hezbollah's rockets months before the war began. But senior Israeli officers said the extent of the tunnel networks, the size of the arsenal and some of the more sophisticated weapons in it were not anticipated.

The officers also said Israel's airstrikes on some bunker systems and built-in short-range rocket sites were less effective than planned. Also, the Lebanese did not turn against Hezbollah as the Israelis had hoped.

"This was not the beginning," Nehushtan said of Hezbollah's ambush. "This was the end of one process and the beginning of another."Support From Abroad

Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, was one of those who initially supported the military assault on Hezbollah. She was influenced by events earlier in Gaza, when the soldier had been captured by radical Palestinians. Some of her senior advisers had been arguing that there were bigger issues involved -- that Israel should strike hard at Hamas, one of the groups involved in the soldier's capture, and attempt to focus international attention on its radical supporters in Syria and Iran. Livni had not fully agreed with them at the time. But when Hezbollah struck, she readily assented.

"I think July 12 was the day she accepted the thesis we submitted weeks before that we were being threatened by a radical axis," a senior Foreign Ministry official said. "This was another in-your-face event that if we allowed to go unpunished would lead to many more abductions."

Livni's chief concern was avoiding the international condemnation of a military strike that accompanied Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon. She reached out to the Bush administration, to European governments and to moderate Arab nations, whose Sunni leaders publicly criticized Hezbollah for the ambush and viewed Israel's response as an opportunity to rid the region of a menacing Iranian proxy.

The support she found, according to two senior officials, was surprising given the international criticism that accompanied past Israeli operations in Lebanon. Some within the ministry interpreted the support as encouragement to deepen the war.

"It took us more than a week to understand how the world had changed," the senior Foreign Ministry official said.Internal Dissent

The internal consensus, trumpeted in public by Israel's leaders, crumbled with the military intelligence assessment. A senior Foreign Ministry official said Livni was briefed on the report at 2 p.m. July 14 and immediately ordered her staff to begin devising a diplomatic exit strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0084174

Later that day in a meeting of the seven-member war cabinet, she voted against bombing Hezbollah's urban stronghold in south Beirut. She was concerned that the plan would only bring an escalation in Hezbollah rocket fire and not further the government's goals. Most of the cabinet voted to continue the bombing, according to Foreign Ministry officials, even though a number of cabinet members were expressing angry surprise over the size of Hezbollah's arsenal and tenacity on the ground.

In the days that followed, the cabinet, led by Olmert, continued voting to expand the war as proposed by Halutz and other proponents of the air campaign. While failing to deplete Hezbollah's rocket fire, the Israeli bombardment avoided heavy casualties for Israel, casualties that a major ground invasion would have brought.

Avi Dichter, Olmert's public security minister and a member of the war cabinet who also opposed the bombing of southern Beirut, said 10 days after the military intelligence report was filed that "if there are surprises, I think they are local surprises, not strategic ones."

"You can do this in a very short time," Dichter said. "But you are going to kill many more innocent civilians and cause many more casualties among the troops. We have no intention of doing either."

On Aug. 11, Israel finally went beyond the air campaign and pushed thousands of troops across the border as the debate over a U.N.-brokered cease-fire began. The goal of the troops was to destroy Hezbollah's short-range Katyusha rockets that the air force had been unable to knock out.

Just three days later, the troops froze after Olmert's cabinet accepted the cease-fire terms -- a period when 35 soldiers died, nearly a third of all Israeli troops killed in the war. "We realized we had to do this from the ground," Nehushtan said. "And it was left incomplete."

Muslims Flood Streets Of Jerusalem For Ramadan (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 20 — With Israel imposing tight restrictions on Palestinian movements, the holy month of Ramadan marks a rare occasion when large numbers of Palestinians from the West Bank can enter Jerusalem to worship at the Aksa Mosque compound, one of the most sacred sites in Islam.

On Friday, the last one before Ramadan ends, an estimated 180,000 Muslims from the West Bank and Israel filled the narrow stone streets of Jerusalem's Old City and prayed at the compound. But it was no consolation for the thousands of West Bank men who were turned back at the city's edge, some in scuffles with Israeli security forces.

Israel, citing security concerns, only permitted West Bank men over age 45 to enter Jerusalem and the mosque compound, while the Israeli security forces maintained a large presence at the crossing points along the nation's West Bank security barrier.

On Jerusalem's southern border with Bethlehem, Israeli security forces fired tear gas and lobbed stun grenades to drive back hundreds of Palestinian men who were not allowed to pass the security checkpoint through the 25-foot-high concrete wall dividing the cities.

"It's a terrible feeling," said Qassem al-Balboul, 42. He sought to pray in Jerusalem with his 8-year-old daughter, Sundus, who has been asking for years to visit Al Aksa Mosque. "We have no jobs and no money, and now we can't even pray at our greatest mosque."

The Palestinians in Bethlehem began gathering shortly after sunrise, hours before the main prayers at the Aksa compound a few miles away. As the crowd grew, with many clearly below the minimum age limit, the police ordered them to disperse.

"Please, please, move back; I don't want to use this," said an Israeli border policeman clutching a stun grenade. But as the crowd pressed forward, the policeman and his colleagues began tossing the stun grenades and firing tear gas.

It was the second consecutive Friday that the security forces had clashed with Palestinians seeking to enter Jerusalem, though no serious injuries were reported either time.

Arab citizens of Israel and those living in East Jerusalem do not face restrictions in visiting the mosque compound, the place where the Palestinian uprising began in 2000. But since then, Palestinians from the West Bank have had an increasingly difficult time entering Jerusalem. With occasional exceptions, Palestinians from the Gaza Strip cannot get permission to visit Jerusalem.

DOJ_NMG_0084175

Israel says that the huge crowds show its commitment to the freedom of worship, but insists that the restrictions are necessary to guard against possible violence at the site.

The mosque compound was built about 1,300 years ago over the ruins of the biblical Jewish Temples. The holiest site for Jewish prayer is the Western Wall, which forms one side of the compound, known to Jews as the Temple Mount.

The four Fridays during Ramadan always draw large crowds, and this year the Muslim holy month overlapped with Jewish holidays that brought tens of thousands of Jewish worshipers to the Western Wall.

"We have to make arrangements for huge numbers of people, and in our view, everything went according to plan," said Micky Rosenfeld, a police spokesman.

Palestinians took a different view.

Mufeed Dadoah, 39, has had a permit to work in Israel for the past 15 years, and enters Jerusalem daily for his job as a construction worker. But on Friday, he was prevented from entering in the morning because he was not 45.

"Today, Israel decides everything for us, but some day this will change," Mr. Dadoah said.

When Jordan controlled Jerusalem's Old City from 1948 to 1967, it did not permit Jews to enter and pray at the Western Wall.

Mr. Dadoah said he envisioned a day when Muslims would again rule the city and its religious shrines. He was asked if Jews would then be allowed to pray at their holy sites. "God willing, no," he said.

He then joined about 200 Palestinian men who prayed in the street, with Israel's separation barrier looming in the background.

In Jerusalem, worshipers emerged from the Aksa Mosque compound and clogged the streets lined with small shops. But this year, Palestinian economic conditions are worse than ever, and most said they lacked the money to buy the usual gifts for the Id al-Fitr holiday next week, at the end of Ramadan.

"How can we enjoy the holidays?" asked Safiyeh al-Awadeh, 42, from the West Bank town of Hebron. Normally, she comes to Jerusalem to pray and stock up on gifts for her nine children, as well as to prepare for a large family feast.

"Today, I can't afford anything," she said. "All I have is this," she added, opening a plastic bag with the prayer rug she had brought from home.

In the Gaza Strip on Friday, Palestinian gunmen fired on Palestinian security forces traveling with Prime Minister Ismail Haniya. One security force vehicle was set on fire, but no injuries were reported.

Residents Shut Out Of West Bank (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Scores of Palestinians are separated from their families since Israel tightened reentry rules.

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Abdelhakeem Itayem, a Palestinian with American citizenship, was counting on a simple overnight stay when he traveled from the West Bank to Jordan on a business trip.

Six months later, he is still there, trapped in bureaucratic limbo.

Israeli officials, who control the border between Jordan and the West Bank, refused to let him return when he presented his U.S. passport at the crossing from Jordan.

"I came to Amman for one day. I had one suit and a change of clothes for one day. And now I can't go back," Itayem said by telephone from the Jordanian capital, where he has rented an apartment while awaiting an answer.

The long delay has kept him from his wife, Lisa, and their seven children, who remain in the family's home near Ramallah, said Itayem, 41. It also has cost him his job as a manager for a Palestinian distributor of foreign consumer goods.

"It's breaking my heart," he said.

His plight is not unique. Activists say scores of Palestinians who carry foreign passports, mostly American, have been denied entry this year since Israel moved to close a loophole that once allowed residents to enter repeatedly on renewable Israeli tourist visas.

DOJ_NMG_0084176

The policy has created a quandary for the Palestinian Americans who remain: If they leave to get a new three-month stamp, they may not be allowed back. If they stay, their current Israeli visas will expire. Many say their previous applications for formal residency in the Palestinian territories were rejected by Israel or never acted upon.

"The Israelis are turning their back to any logic," said Adel Samara, whose wife, Enayeh, was refused entry in May after she crossed to Jordan to get her American passport stamped with a fresh Israeli tourist visa.

Samara, a Palestinian economist and writer, said Enayeh, 56, is staying with a sister in Chicago after living in the West Bank for 31 years on a succession of short-term Israeli visas. Making matters worse, he said, Israel won't let him leave because of his past involvement in nationalist Palestinian groups.

"I can't go outside, and she can't come inside," Samara, 62, said in Ramallah. "It is like a form of divorce."

Israeli officials say the tourist visas were not meant to serve as documents for Palestinian residency or work in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The new restrictions have created uncertainty and anger among Palestinian Americans, especially in the West Bank, where they number at least 30,000 and are leading players in business and academic life.

A group of Palestinians with American citizenship has lobbied diplomats and launched a campaign to draw attention to the problem. Samara, who is also a U.S. citizen, is working with an Israeli advocacy group to challenge the legality of the new rules.

He and others charge that Israel imposed the tighter rules to punish Palestinians for electing the militant group Hamas in January's parliamentary elections, and to reduce the Palestinian population of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Israel rejects those claims.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice raised the visa issue in meetings with Israeli officials in Jerusalem this month. American diplomats say they have asked Israel to explain the policy.

Israel acknowledges that the rules, overseen by the Interior Ministry, have caused problems. Officials said the change was an attempt to curb misuse of tourist visas, which had become a favored means of entry for thousands of Palestinians with foreign citizenship.

"It was decided in the government, at a medium-level bureaucratic level, that this is wrong. How can you let people be here when they are obviously not tourists? It's an abuse of the tourist visa," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

The tightened policy, however, is having "unintended consequences" that officials are now trying to correct, Regev said.

Israel has said that Palestinians living in the West Bank should apply for residency, which is granted by the Jewish state, rather than continue seeking tourist visas.

But many Palestinians complain that they have been denied residency, or have met with inaction.

After the signing of the Oslo interim peace accords in the early 1990s, Israel agreed to allow 3,000 people to move into the West Bank and Gaza Strip each year, an annual quota later raised to 10,000 and then 20,000, said Shlomo Dror, a spokesman for the office that serves as liaison to the Palestinians.

But he said the Palestinian Authority, created in 1994, often failed to provide the names of those who were living in the Palestinian territories and in need of formal residency.

Israel has frozen applications aimed at unifying families since the outbreak of violence in 2000. And since Hamas won office in January, Israel — which considers the group as a terrorist organization — has refused to deal with the Palestinian Authority government.

Dror said the number of people without proper residency status had grown to 60,000, in part because of Israel's freeze on the family-reunification process. "We are trying to sort the problem out and find a different way," he said.

Itayem, who was born in the West Bank but moved to Chicago at 15, said he might relocate his wife and children to Amman during the winter break for schools. But doing so would leave no one to watch over his 75-year-old mother and 38-year-old sister, who is disabled, he said.

The episode has left Itayem angry and disoriented. He found work in Amman at a sister company of his former West Bank employer. But Itayem is staying in an unfurnished apartment and has no clear answers to why he cannot go back to the West Bank, his home for the last 12 years.

DOJ_NMG_0084177

"What kind of a life?" he asked. "My wife is in one country, and I'm alone in another country."

ellingwood@latimes.com

U.S. Courts Hamas Rival (WT)

By Harry De Quetteville

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- To his enemies, he is ruthless and corrupt.

But to his allies in the West, Mohammed Dahlan is a potential Palestinian savior to stand up to the radical Islamist group Hamas.

Secular and tough -- some say brutal -- Mr. Dahlan, a member of the rival Fatah party, is being courted by U.S. diplomats eager to counter Hamas' burgeoning influence in the occupied territories.

Last week, as the worst interfactional fighting in 10 years fueled fears of a Palestinian civil war, U.S. officials described him as a man who can "get things done" in a violent climate.

In less diplomatic terms, that means having the clout, if needed, to summon armed Palestinians into battle with Hamas, which Washington regards as a terrorist group.

"He can be viewed as a thug," said one official, "but he is one of the very few people who has authority and can impose some order on the ground who is not from Hamas."

U.S. officials are increasingly reluctant to apply that "can-do" description to Fatah's moderate leader, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, 71.

While outwardly backing him, they privately condemn Mr. Abbas as hesitant and timid in taking on Hamas since the Islamic movement came to power in January's democratic elections.

Since then, living standards for most Palestinians, particularly in the coastal Gaza Strip, have plummeted as a result of Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist or accept previous peace agreements with the Jewish state. In the face of such intransigence, international aid has been cut off.

Sitting in his plush and heavily guarded office in Gaza, Mr. Dahlan is openly contemptuous of Hamas' ideological rule.

"They thought that running a government was like running a charity," said Mr. Dahlan, who ran Palestinian security services in Gaza under Yasser Arafat until 2002. "But we need health care, education, roads, salaries. We don't need speeches and sermons at the mosque on Friday."

The main proposal to restart international funding, on which the crippled Palestinian economy depends, had been to form a national unity government. But talks between Fatah and Hamas now look irremediably deadlocked.

U.S. officials say they have few options to stop the carnage. They are covertly grooming a few potential successors to Mr. Abbas, including Mr. Dahlan.

As security chief, Mr. Dahlan arrested thousands of Hamas members. Some purportedly were tortured and others had their beards -- signs of their religious devotion -- forcibly shaved off.

"Dahlan is a gangster. He tortured us and abused us," said Islam Shahwan, a spokesman for Hamas' militia.

A Liberal Brother At Odds With The Muslim Brotherhood (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

CAIRO

GAMAL AL-BANNA is 85, and for much of his life he has been overshadowed by his famous brother, Sheik Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamist political party and antecedent of a host of militant Islamist organizations, from Al Qaeda to Hamas.

That seems to have suited him just fine, though. He liked to write, read and think. His sister left him a lot of money, and so for decades, that is exactly how he spent his days.

DOJ_NMG_0084178

His bedroom is at one end of a dusty old apartment on a chaotic street in the center of the city. At the other end is his office, his desk piled high with papers. In between are books — some 30,000 of them — arranged neatly on floor-to-ceiling shelves. One section is devoted to the 100 or so books he has written and translated over the course of his lifetime.

But Mr. Banna is no longer living in his brother's shadow. And, like the organization his brother founded, the younger Mr. Banna is no friend of the establishment, but for quite a different reason. He is a liberal thinker, a man who would like to see Islamic values and practices interpreted in the context of modern times. Egypt's gatekeepers of religious values, the government-appointed and self-appointed arbiters of God's word, condemn, dismiss and dispute what he says. They have also banned at least one of his books.

"Gamal al-Banna has opinions that fall outside the scope of religion," said Sheik Omar el-Deeb, deputy in charge of Al Azhar, the centuries-old seat of Islamic learning in Cairo. "The people, of course, oppose anybody who talks about things that violate religion."

Mr. Banna likes to wear a blue collarless suit, buttoned to the very top. He prefers sandals to shoes, and wears his thin, wiry white hair swept back. He is often laughing, a kind of knowing chuckle that seems to say he knows better, by virtue of his age and experience.

He doesn't press his ideas, does not try to wage a contest with the institution of Al Azhar, but instead takes the long-term view, hoping to plant a few seeds that will, in time, take root and spread. He recognizes that, at the moment, the other side is winning the contest of ideas in Egypt, and the region.

"If religion was correctly understood, it would be a power of liberation," Mr. Banna said. "But it is misunderstood, and so it is driving us backward."

The views alleged to fall outside religion include those on women: They are not required to wear a veil, as most do in Egypt, Mr. Banna believes; they should not be forced to undergo genital cutting, as most do now in Egypt; and they should be allowed to lead men in prayer, which is forbidden in Egypt.

"My idea is that man is the aim of religion, and religion only a means," said Mr. Banna. "What is prevalent today is the opposite."

Egypt, often looked to as a center of moderate Islam, is, like the rest of the Arab world, becoming more conservative and less tolerant of opposing religious views, according to thinkers like Mr. Banna. Since August there have been at least three high-profile cases here where religious officials condemned, or sought to have criminally charged, people or publications promoting religious ideas they deemed offensive.

"When the Muslims used to disagree, they had different schools of thought," said Sayed el-Qemni, another reform-minded writer who lives in a small city outside of Cairo. "No one would point to the other and say, 'This is not Islam.' But when one school of thought says, 'I am the correct school of thought and everyone else deserves death,' then you are starting a new religion."

Mr. Qemni has received death threats for some of his writings, and sleeps with two police officers guarding his house.

BY contrast, Mr. Banna exudes a sense of impunity. That, he says, is not a result of his name, though it is a powerful force in a society where family ties are deeply respected, but because "I am free."

He is free because he has been careful not to become involved in political movements — and because of his sister, Fawziyya, who left him the equivalent of about $100,000. That is a huge sum in Egypt, especially considering Mr. Banna has no family and lives and works in the same apartment at a nominal rent.

"I am a completely independent man," he said with a smile. "I am not an employee, I am not in any party, and I am not affiliated with anything — completely independent."

Mr. Banna was born Dec. 15, 1920, in Mahmudiya, a village in Egypt's northern Nile Delta, northwest of the capital. The youngest of five children, he moved with his family to Cairo at age 4. His oldest sibling, Hassan, went on to form the Muslim Brotherhood, which is the largest organized opposition group in Egypt, although banned.

Their father, Ahmad Banna, a self-taught prayer leader and religious teacher, supported the family by repairing watches (his small wooden worktable sits in the hall of Gamal's apartment). The elder Mr. Banna spent years of his life indexing the many thousands of sayings of the Prophet Muhammad, assembling them in a multivolume set that sits on his youngest son's shelves and inspires the son to this day.

DOJ_NMG_0084179

As a young man, Mr. Banna was kicked out of high school after a dispute with an English teacher. He finished his studies at a technical school and did not pursue college, he said, because he knew he wanted to pursue writing. So he went out and began to write. In 1946, he published a book, "A New Democracy," which included a chapter titled "Toward a New Understanding of Islam."

MR. BANNA says one of the fundamental problems with religious leaders in Egypt is that they look to the interpretations of their ancestors and not to the Koran itself. To look directly at the book, and not at the words as interpreted by men living in a different time, would have a liberating effect, he says.

Many of his ideas challenge the core beliefs of the radical Muslims who have been driving the religious agenda in the region. Some Islamists say, for example, that elected governments are un-Islamic because people must follow God's law, or Shariah, and not that of a parliament.

But Mr. Banna says the radicals are guilty of pursuing the very logic they say is un-Islamic. They would impose what amounts to their interpretation of the Koran onto other Muslims. That, he says, is no different than relying on a parliament to pass laws, as both are a result of man's intervention, not divine revelation.

Islam, he says, needs to be seen in a modern context. "Because Islam is the last of religions, if it was rigid and closed, it could not stand the changes of the ages," he said.

Mr. Banna does not deliver his message as a lecture. He speaks casually, slipping between English and Arabic, smiling, waving his hands. He has his own name now, and a philosophy quite different from the Islamist organization his brother founded.

Unlike the Brotherhood, he has stayed far from politics, but that does not mean he is apolitical. On the contrary, Mr. Banna says he believes that the reason his ideas have not gained momentum is that political freedom in Egypt is stifled by the nation's rulers.

"They want only power," he said. "They don't want freedom of thought. Free thought, that will condemn them."

Scrambling To Save Trade Perks (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia — The Bush administration has a prescription for fighting coca growing, sidelining Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and saving thousands of jobs in Latin America: extending free trade for Andean nations.

A senior Bush administration official said this week that the White House would push Congress to pass a bill continuing trade benefits for Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia under a little-known law. It wants the bill passed during the "lame-duck session" after the November elections and before the new Congress is sworn in in January — while free-trade-friendly Republicans are still in control.

The administration has acknowledged that an extension of trade preferences would improve frayed diplomatic relations in Latin America while countering Chavez's influence, analysts said. The White House has mounted an 11th-hour campaign to preserve the trade perks, which have generated thousands of jobs, given birth to entire export industries and provided alternatives to drug trafficking. The benefits are set to expire Dec. 31.

The Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act was initiated in 1991 by then-President George H.W. Bush. U.S.-Colombia trade alone has tripled to $15 billion since 1990, thanks partly to the boom in the flower, apparel, liquor and fresh-produce industries.

Industries such as pouched tuna in Ecuador and asparagus in Peru have sprung up to take advantage of special rules that allow products to enter the U.S. market duty-free. Colombian flower exports have grown 10% annually since 2002 to $758 million in 2005. Flower-related jobs now total 190,000, according to the nation's largest flower growers association.

Expiration of the trade preferences could deliver a death blow to industries that overnight will lose exemptions on duties of 6% to 20%. That margin is crucial to flower growers here and in Ecuador, which face rising competition from countries including China.

This month, Miami-based Dole Fresh Flowers, a major exporter of roses and other flowers to the U.S., announced that it was cutting 3,500 jobs at greenhouses in Colombia and Ecuador, partly because of the uncertainty surrounding free trade.

DOJ_NMG_0084180

The nations involved in the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act accepted that one-way trade preferences eventually would be replaced by bilateral free-trade agreements between the U.S. and each of the four countries. The deals, which would give U.S. companies access to Andean markets, would be sealed in international treaties.

"Preferences can be taken away, but a free-trade agreement is hard to change, so it's imperative that Colombia passes one," said Richard Francis, an analyst at Standard & Poor's in New York. "It would also make Colombia more attractive for foreign investors by giving them a longer-term horizon."

For a variety of reasons, none of the four countries will have individual free-trade agreements in place by year's end. Peru and Colombia are the furthest along, as both have completed free-trade negotiations with the U.S. By December, both will have signed formal agreements that could take months, perhaps a year, to take effect.

Negotiations on a free-trade agreement for Ecuador have stalled for political reasons, and a prospective effective date is even farther out. Bolivia is not ready for a formal free-trade agreement but wants an extension of the one-way preferences.

The White House recognizes that the "hole" between the expiration of the current trade preferences and the effective dates of the free-trade agreements could have dire economic consequences, according to a senior Bush administration official who spoke on condition that he not be identified.

"People have organized their commercial relations around the lack of tariffs," the official said. "We would prefer to see those relations continue without being disrupted by an on-again, off-again tariff situation."

Gary Hufbauer, an economist with the Washington-based Institute for International Economics, said the White House recognized that the loss of trade benefits would unduly punish Colombia and Peru, staunch U.S. allies in the drug war, and also "give the populists in Bolivia and in Ecuador more reason to push back against the United States."

Hufbauer was referring to Bolivian President Evo Morales, who, though not rejecting an eventual free-trade agreement, has used harsh anti-U.S. rhetoric.

In Ecuador, a presidential runoff election set for Nov. 26 will pit pro-free-trade candidate Alvaro Noboa against Chavez friend and free-trade opponent Rafael Correa.

The White House said it would push Congress for an extension of trade preferences for all four countries even though relations with Ecuador and Bolivia have been strained. In May, Ecuador's state oil company seized an oil field operated by Westwood-based Occidental Petroleum Corp. A month later, U.S. embassy officials there said chances of a new free-trade deal were slim in light of the seizure.

But this week, the senior administration official said the U.S. now believed it was best to "engage" both Ecuador and Bolivia with trade preferences.

"We would support an extension for all four countries for a year or two perhaps," he said.

For Ecuador, the extension might hinge on whether its president, whoever he is, agrees to abide by impending international arbitration of the oil field seizure, which could end in a judgment requiring Ecuador to reimburse Occidental hundreds of millions of dollars.

Bruce Bagley, a political science professor at the University of Miami, said the new U.S. posture was a clear effort to send a message to Ecuadorean voters to support candidate Noboa, because Correa has said during the campaign that he will not take part in the Occidental arbitration process.

"The U.S. government is showing political acumen for once in trying to tip the balance away from Correa, the pro-Chavez candidate, and toward Noboa, whom they see as an entrepreneur, free trader and capitalist," Bagley said.

Santiago Pardo, vice president of Andalex, Colombia's largest foreign trade business group, said the move to get the trade preferences extended might have come too late.

"There is very little time, and the U.S. Congress will have lots of other things to do," Pardo said. "We are already losing investment because of the uncertainty."

Organization of American States Secretary General Jose Miguel Insulza and Inter-American Development Bank President Luis Alberto Moreno have joined in lobbying Congress for the extension.

"They're making a big push," Hufbauer said.

DOJ_NMG_0084181

Peru has already signed a free-trade agreement with the U.S. that awaits approval by the legislatures of both countries. Colombia is expected to sign a free-trade deal in late November, but it will not take effect until next fall, assuming that the legislatures of both nations approve it, observers here say.

Failure of Congress to extend the trade preferences would result in significant losses of Colombian jobs and exports, said Mauricio Reina, an economist with Fedesarrollo, a think tank in Bogota. Four of every 5 Colombian export-oriented apparel firms, for example, rely on the trade preferences, as do 5 of every 6 firms that export liquor or tobacco. Those firms would find themselves in immediate financial difficulty, he said.

"It's hard to know what percentage would be left out of the U.S. market because it's impossible to know how many companies could absorb that extra tariff they would begin to pay," Reina said. "But it's safe to say that it would be a very important percentage."

*

EU Urges Putin To Honour Oil Contracts (FT)

By George Parker In Lahti

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

European leaders on Friday night pressed Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, to honour contracts with western oil companies, amid fears in the EU over Moscow's tightening grip on the energy sector.

In a strained summit dinner in the Finnish town of Lahti, EU leaders also chided Mr Putin on questions of human rights, press freedom and Moscow's tough treatment of the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

The meeting with Mr Putin served as a reminder to European leaders that their attempt to build a more equal energy partnership with Russia has so far yielded few positive results.

Instead of encouraging European investment in Russia, Moscow has questioned contracts signed in the 1990s by companies including Royal Dutch Shell and Total. This month it also shut foreign capital out of the development of the huge Shtokman gas field.

In spite of the differences among EU member states in their relations with Moscow, some leaders bit their tongues at last night's dinner. They jointly argued that Mr Putin should treat western companies fairly if he wants Russian companies to have greater access to European markets.

"We offer security in contracts and we expect the same from Russia, namely also legal security in contracts and access to the Russian market," Angela Merkel, German chancellor, said before the dinner.

Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, called for a "two-way street" in investment, in spite of criticism that he has already signalled that Gazprom could be considered as a buyer for Centrica, the British gas company, without reciprocal market opening in Russia.

Mr Putin said that he had no intention of bowing to European demands that Russia should open Gazprom's pipelines to other companies, as required under the energy charter treaty, which Russia has signed but has not ratified.

He also defended Russia's decision to clamp down on "environmental breaches" by Royal Dutch Shell in the Sakhalin 2 field, and said he hoped foreign companies could be involved later in the Shtokman project.

Mr Putin also issued an uncompromising warning to Georgia to calm a dispute with Russian-backed breakaway regions in the former Soviet republic, claiming it could end in "disaster and bloodshed".

Faced with their implacable dinner guest, the EU's 25 heads of government had spent much of lunch discussing how to present a common line to the Russian president. Matti Vanhanen, Finland's president, said they succeeded: "We were very united," he said.

José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president, said Russia and the EU needed a partnership based on reciprocity, openness, transparency, non-discrimination and market prices.

"We cannot allow energy to divide Europe as communism once did," he said.

The timing of Mr Putin's appearance as the guest of honour at the EU summit was viewed as awkward by many European diplomats.

DOJ_NMG_0084182

Russia's dealings with western oil companies, its tough treatment of Georgians living within Russian borders and the assassination of the journalist Anna Politkovskaya have all caused increasing concern in Europe.

On Friday Mr Barroso was forced to justify why the EU was honouring a leader who was overheard on Thursday joking that he "envied" the Israeli president, who is facing rape allegations.

The Russian Kommersant daily newspaper quoted Mr Putin, a former KGB agent, as saying: "He turns out to be a really powerful guy! He raped 10 women!" The Kremlin said his attempt at humour had been lost in translation.

Putin Ducks EU Demands On Energy Charter (AP)

By Constant Brand, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin defended his government's tough stance on Georgia and dodged EU leaders' demands Friday that he commit to a legally binding energy charter that would guarantee better access to Russia's oil and gas fields.

The 25 EU leaders, meeting with Putin over dinner following a one-day summit on energy, also grilled Putin about the recent killing of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya — an apparent execution-style slaying that EU leaders raised as an example of slipping human rights in Russia.

Putin called her death "a brutal murder" and pledged to hunt down her killers, diplomats said.

But he sidestepped European appeals for moderation on Georgia, and said he was acting to prevent conflict between Georgia and its breakaway regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which have close ties to Russia.

"To our great sorrow and concern, the situation is developing in the direction of possible bloodshed," Putin told reporters. He accused Georgia of trying to take back the two regions "by military means. This is what you and I should be afraid of ... bloodshed in that region."

Russia and Georgia have had a history of friction since they went their separate ways with the collapse of the Soviet Union 15 years ago.

The Kremlin has recently cracked down on Georgian migrants in Russia as retaliation for Georgia's arrest in late September of four Russian military officers on charges of espionage. Russia has deported hundreds of people and closed dozens of Georgian-run firms and restaurants.

Summit host Finnish Prime Minister Matti Vanhanen confronted Putin on human rights and democracy in Russia, as well as EU concerns about Moscow's military campaign in Chechnya, officials and diplomats said.

"It was a tough message," Lithuanian President Valdas Adamkus told The Associated Press. But Putin "was very forceful" in defending his country's policy on Chechnya.

EU leaders spent Friday in the lakeside town of Lahti, north of Helsinki, forging a united front on energy before meeting with Putin in the evening.

The leaders of the European Union — which already depends on Russia for a quarter of its energy — urged Putin to implement a legally binding energy charter that would ensure supplies of Russian oil and gas for Europe.

The EU is anxious to secure future supplies of oil and gas from Russia but concerned about Moscow's reliability as a source — at a time of questions about a backsliding on democracy in increasingly authoritarian Russia.

Last winter, a dispute with Ukraine led Moscow to temporarily turn off the taps, disrupting natural gas supplies for several EU nations.

"From the economic point of view, we demand that Russia is a stable and reliable supplier," said Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi.

The 25 EU leaders succeeded in devising a common stance on how to approach Russia on energy — but Putin disagreed with their views, Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip told the AP.

"The European Union was speaking in one voice — one single voice — and of course, Russia wasn't speaking in the same voice," he said with a laugh.

Dutch Prime Minister Jan Peter Balkenende said Friday's talks with Putin were just the start of a wider discussion on EU's partnership with Moscow. The two sides meet again Nov. 24 for an EU-Russia summit.

DOJ_NMG_0084183

Also at the summit, EU leaders called on the Sudanese government to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force in the western region of Darfur, where 200,000 people have died and more than 2.5 million displaced in three years of violence.

EU leaders also discussed illegal immigration, with Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero appealing for more boats, planes, patrols and money to help Italy, Malta, Greece and Spain tackle the growing problem of migrants from Africa landing on European shores.

___

Associated Press writers Maria Danilova, Paul Ames, Robert Wielaard and Matti Huuhtanen contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:
http://www.eu2006.fi

Aftermath Of A Murder (WP)

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

IT HAS NOW been 14 days since Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya was murdered in Moscow. No one has been arrested for the crime, which is hardly surprising: None of the dozen other killings of journalists since Vladimir Putin became Russia's president has been solved. This one eliminated one of the fiercest and bravest critics of his government, a reporter who had tenaciously documented the depravity of Mr. Putin's war against Chechnya. We don't have any evidence implicating the Kremlin, but it's revealing to examine how Mr. Putin and his regime have behaved over the past few days.

The president's first reaction was a strange silence. While politicians, media outlets and statesmen in Russia and around the world condemned Ms. Politkovskaya's murder, no word came from Mr. Putin for three days. When finally compelled to speak, at a joint news conference in Germany with Chancellor Angela Merkel, Mr. Putin offered a rote condemnation of the attack. He then disparaged Ms. Politkovskaya, saying that "the level of her influence on political life in Russia was utterly insignificant." He made the ugly suggestion that foreign-based enemies of his government were somehow behind the killing -- a claim echoed in the state-controlled press. "We have information, and it is reliable, that many people hiding from Russian justice have long been nurturing the idea of sacrificing somebody in order to create a wave of anti-Russia feeling in the world," he said.

Really? If so, Mr. Putin's enemies also must have found a way to manipulate his own security forces. It was interior ministry operatives, after all, who violently broke up a peaceful vigil in Ms. Politkovskaya's memory in the Caucasian city of Nazran on Monday. Flowers and pictures of the slain journalist were ripped from the hands of the participants and stomped on. Ekaterina Sokiryanskaya, a well-known activist of the human rights group Memorial, was punched in the face and head; she suffered a broken nose and a concussion. Three days earlier, a court ordered the closure of the Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, one of the few nongovernmental organizations still attempting to document abuses in that devastated province. On Thursday the government suspended the operations of Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch and more than 90 other NGOs, saying they had not met the requirements of a controversial new registration law.

One other part of this story has played out with depressing predictability: the absence of any serious follow-up by Western leaders. At the same news conference at which Mr. Putin uttered his ugly insinuations, Ms. Merkel vowed that her government would press to complete a new partnership agreement between the European Union and Russia when Germany has the rotating E.U. presidency next year. Yesterday Mr. Putin was invited to dine with European leaders at a summit in Finland. If Ms. Politkovskaya's murder remains unsolved, will it be an obstacle to "partnership" between Russia and Europe? Sadly, Mr. Putin has been given no reason to think so.

'Enemy' Schoolchildren In Moscow (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

MOSCOW -- A Georgian migrant worker died at a Moscow airport this week while awaiting deportation. Tengiz Togonidze, 48, had asthma and was gasping for breath, but he was reportedly denied permission to get some fresh air either during the five days he was held in a detention center or afterward, during the trip to the airport, which took many hours. He was one of some 700 ethnic Georgians deported over the past three weeks as the government's anti-Georgia policies turned into a campaign of harassment of Georgians in Russia. The political conflict between Russia and Georgia has led to an ugly outburst of political xenophobia here.

DOJ_NMG_0084184

In recent years intolerance and even violent ethnic and racial crime have become increasingly common in Russia. Just this summer, in a vicious attack on "non-locals," dark-skinned residents were driven out of the northwestern town of Kondopoga and some of their businesses set on fire or property smashed.

But this anti-Georgian campaign is different, in a scary way. Until now, if government authorities contributed to public xenophobia it was through inaction, incompetence or irresponsibility. Now ethnic hostility is being incited by government figures -- legislators and executive officials alike.

Three weeks ago, in a new round of the tit-for-tat fight between Moscow and Tbilisi that has been going on since Mikheil Saakashvili became Georgia's president, four Russian servicemen were arrested in Georgia on charges of espionage. Apparently caught off guard, the Kremlin responded with a barrage of threatening language. Though the immediate conflict was resolved after a few days through Western mediation, the anger and resentment over an obviously arrogant act by the Georgian government appeared to call for revenge.

In the days that followed the arrests, Russian officials sought to outdo one another in anti-Georgian rhetoric. Georgians were declared the most criminal of all ethnic minorities in Russia. A broad range of officials and loyalists demanded that they be barred from entering Russia and that migrant workers be forbidden to send home remittances.

President Vladimir Putin remarked that "migration flows should be regulated so that . . . our citizens would not be disadvantaged in various sectors of the economy." The speaker of the lower house proclaimed that "indigenous residents should be assured of advantages in trading activity at marketplaces." At the same time, on Kremlin-controlled television, Georgians were vilified as fat cats running casinos and driving Mercedes-Benzes. Raids on casinos (with their owners' unmistakably Georgian-sounding last names repeatedly cited) were shown on national news programs. One of the federal channels showed a documentary about "guests" from the south -- all with Georgian last names -- coming to Russia to commit crimes.

Georgia has been virtually blockaded, with transport from and to Russia severed. Though the Russian government wouldn't admit that the blockade was political (it was described as a punitive measure for failure to observe various rules and regulations), the message was unambiguous: Georgia and Georgians were the enemies of Russia.

Ethnic Georgians all over Moscow have been harassed by the police, regardless of whether they were Georgian nationals or held Russian citizenship. Fearing raids and shakedowns, Georgian restaurants suspended operations. Georgians were denied Russian entry visas regardless of their status and occupation; those barred from entering Russia included a popular dance company. Meanwhile, the Russian youth chess team refused to take part in the world championship being held in the Georgian city of Batumi.

The campaign took an especially ugly turn when some Moscow schools were ordered to submit lists of children with Georgian last names to police to facilitate the search for their parents, whose Georgian origin now made them suspect.

Until recently, Georgians would have seemed an unlikely target for such hostility. Georgian culture, art and cuisine have long been inseparable from Russian/Soviet life. Georgian moviemakers directed some of the most popular Soviet movies, which are watched by millions of Russians as eagerly today as they were in the U.S.S.R. The Russian cultural elite is inconceivable without Georgian actors, singers and artists. Georgian food is found not only in Georgian restaurants, which are mercifully cheap by Moscow standards, but as part of family holiday meals throughout Russia. And Georgians share a common Orthodox Christian religion with Russians.

But the sad truth is that ethnic hostility can be readily embraced by the Russian people, and the ethnicity involved doesn't seem to matter much. As the TV news was filled with anti-Georgian themes, television monitoring services registered increased interest in news programming. In a national poll taken in mid-October, 38 percent of Russians said they would support the deportation of all Georgians from Russia, even those with Russian citizenship. A significant majority said they approve of deportations, transportation blockades, stepped-up inspections of Georgian businesses and other anti-Georgian measures taken by the government. And there has been little in the way of protest against the xenophobia: Russia's remaining liberal media outlets condemned what they referred to as "ethnic cleansing," and a couple of rallies opposing the anti-Georgia campaign were held.

DOJ_NMG_0084185

After a while, however, the authorities seemed to realize that things had gone too far. They have begun to backpedal. The initiative to check schools for Georgian children was strongly condemned by a Moscow government official, who was joined by many others; high-ranking law enforcers even apologized for the action. Several officials came out with reassuring statements that the government is acting to restore order, not to harass individual Georgians.

The campaign may well turn out to be simply a resentful overreaction to Georgia's arrogance with regard to the alleged spying rather than a deliberate policy aimed at capitalizing on public xenophobia. But the government's desire to punish Georgia has broken the fragile taboo on ethnic hostility in official language. In the xenophobic atmosphere of today's Russia, this threatens to further encourage ethnic hatred and lead to more loss of life.

Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal, writes a monthly column for The Post.

DOJ_NMG_0084186